M^R BAYLE's
Hiſtorical and Critical
DICTIONARY

THE SECOND EDITION,

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR,

BY

M^R DES MAIZEAUX,

Fellow of the Royal Society.

VOLUME THE THIRD.

F—L.

BRITISH MUSEUM

THE DICTIONARY Hiſtorical and Critical OF Mr PETER BAYLE.

THE SECOND EDITION,

Carefully collated with the ſeveral Editions of the Original; in which many Paſſages are reſtored, and the whole greatly augmented, particularly with a Tranſlation of the Quotations from eminent Writers in various Languages.

To which is prefixed,

THE LIFE OF THE AUTHOR,

REVISED, CORRECTED, AND ENLARGED,

BY

Mr DES MAIZEAUX,

Fellow of the Royal Society.

VOLUME THE THIRD.

F—L.

LONDON:

Printed for J. J. and P. Knapton; D. Midwinter; J. Brotherton;
A. Betteſworth and C. Hitch: J. Hazard; W. Innys and
R. Manby; T. Ward and E. Wicksteed; W. Meadows;
T. Woodward; B. Motte; W. Hinchliffe; J. Walthoe, jun.
E. Symon; T. Cox; A. Ward; D. Browne; T. Longman; S. Birt;
W. Bickerton; T. Astley; S. Austen; L. Gilliver;
H. Lintot; H. Whitridge; R. Willock; J. and R. Tonson.

MDCCXXXVI.

MVSEVM
BRITAN
NICVM

Mr BAYLE's

Hiſtorical and Critical

DICTIONARY.

F.

10.

FABRICIUS LUSCINUS (Caïus) a Roman captain, as commendable for his probity and frugality [A] as for his valour, gave ſignal proofs of all thoſe accompliſhments during the war with Pyrrhus. He was conſul for the firſt time in the year of Rome 471, and gained (a) ſignal victories over the Samnites, the Brutians, and the Lucanians [B]. He raiſed the ſiege of Thurium, and got ſo conſiderable a booty, that after having given a large donative to his ſoldiers, and reimburſed all the citizens of Rome for what each of them had contributed towards the war, he had ſtill four hundred talents left, which were carried into the treaſury on the day of his triumph. He was the only man who had not his ſhare of thoſe rich ſpoils. His colleague was Quintus Æmilius Papus, with whom he was conſul a ſecond time in the year 475 (b); but between thoſe two conſulſhips we muſt place his embaſſy to Pyrrhus [C]. He was ſent to that prince, to treat about the ranſom of the priſoners made at the battle which the conſul Lævinus had loſt in the year 473. Pyrrhus, being informed that Fabricius was very poor, offered him a ſum of money (c): which Fabricius refuſed, tho' they proteſted, that the king preſented it to him, not with deſign to bribe him to any thing diſhonourable, but only as a mark of his friendſhip. The reflexion Fabricius made at that prince's table, upon what Cineas ſaid concerning the Epicureans, that they made [A] He was commendable for his frugality.] He refuſed not only the preſents of Pyrrhus, but likewiſe thoſe of the Samnites. The thing deſerves to be related (1). The ambaſſadors they ſent to him, having enlarged upon the good offices he had done their nation ſince the peace, deſired him to accept a good ſum of money, which they were ordered to offer him; urging, he wanted a great many neceſſary things to furniſh his houſe and table, and that he had not ſuch an equipage as became his rank and merit. Thereupon Fabricius extended his hands from his ears to his eyes, and then laid them on his noſe and mouth, and afterwards on his boſom, and ſo down to his belly, and ſaid to the embaſſadors, As long as I can command all the parts I have touched, I ſhall want nothing: Therefore, having no occaſion for money, I will be ſure not to recieve any from thoſe who I know want it. All the plate he had conſiſted in a ſilver cup and ſaltſeller; and he would not allow generals to have any more: (2) Bellicoſos imperatores plus quam pateram & ſalinum ex argento habere vetabat. He lived upon herbs, which he plucked and cultivated himſelf (3).

[B] He gained ſignal victories over the Samnites, Brutians, and Lucanians.] Sigonius (4) had not groped in the dark, as he has done as to this conſulſhip, and would not have ſaid that Fabricius triumphed over the Tuſcans and Gauls, if he had known what I have quoted out of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus. He is to be blamed for applying to the ſecond conſulſhip of Fabricius, what Valerius Maximus relates of the raiſing of the ſiege of Thurium (5); in which action the Romans pretended the god Mars had viſibly fought for them (6). Compare that with the St George of our Croyſades. The raiſing of that ſiege happened under the firſt conſulſhip of Fabricius (7). The city of Thurium raiſed a ſtatue to it's deliverer (8).

[C] We muſt place between thoſe two conſulſhips his embaſſy to Pyrrhus.] Authors diſagree as to the time of that embaſſy: ſome will have it, that Fabricius was ſent to Pyrrhus before the arrival of Cineas at Rome (9); others

BRITISH MUSEUM

(a) Dionyſ. Halicarn. Excerpt. de Legat.

(b) Cicero, de Amicitia, c. xi.

(c) Plutarc. in Pyrrho. Dionyſius, ubi ſupra.

(1) Julius Higinus, de Vita Rebuſque illuſtr. Virorum, lib. vi, apud A. Gellium lib. i, cap. xiv. See alſo Valer. Maxim. lib. iv, cap. iii.

(2) Plinius, lib. xxxiii, cap. xii. See alſo Valer. Maxim. lib. iv, cap. iv.

(3) Seneca, de Provid. cap. iii.

(4) Comment. in Faſt. ad annum 471.

(5) Val. Maxim. lib. i, cap. viii, n. 6.

(6) Idem, ibid. Amm. Marcell. lib. xxiv, cap. iv.

(7) Ex Dionyſ. Halicarn.

(8) Plin. lib. xxxiv, cap. vi, ſub fin.

(9) Vide Sigonium in Faſt. ad ann. 473. & Eutrop. lib. ii.

made the ſupreme good to conſiſt in a voluptuous life, altogether free from public affairs, and did not believe that the gods troubled themſelves with the government of the world; the reflexion, I ſay, which Fabricius made thereupon, crying out, Heaven grant Pyrrhus and the Samnites may reliſh that philoſophy as long as they are in war with us (d)! was not the leaſt thing which made Pyrrhus conceive a great opinion of the Romans. He liked Fabricius to that degree, that he offered him the firſt place in his council and his armies, if he would go along with him after the peace (e). The Roman, with his uſual plainneſs, anſwered him, It is by no means for your intereſt to have me near you; for thoſe who honour and admire you now, would rather chuſe me for their king, if they knew what I can do. Tho' this anſwer was not very obliging, yet Pyrrhus did not ſeem offended at it; nor did it hinder Fabricius from obtaining ſatisfaction about the ſubject matter of his embaſſy. During his conſulſhip in the year 475, he gave Pyrrhus a great inſtance of his probity, by giving him notice, that his own phyſician offered to poiſon him [D], provided he was ſure of a recompence. It is in this year we ought to place the battle of Aſculum, which was the ſecond againſt Pyrrhus [E]. The moſt probable opinion is, that the Romans loſt it [F]; but that it coſt the conqueror ſo many brave men, that he hoped no advantage from the continuation of the war; ſo that he was very glad to ſee himſelf called to the aſſiſtance of the Sicilians. Fabricius was cenſor in the year 478; and his colleague (f) was the ſame Æmilius Papus, with whom he had twice been conſul. Both of them gave an inſtance of ſevere regularity, by degrading (g) a ſenator, named Cornelius Rufinus, who had been dictator, and twice conſul, only becauſe they found in his houſe ſilver plate for the uſe of his table, to the weight of ten pounds. Fabricius had long hated that man; and nevertheleſs he ſerved him, towards the obtaining the conſulſhip, at a time when he thought him more capable than his

(d) Plutarch. ubi ſupra. Val. Max. lib. iv, cap. iii. See alſo Cicero, de Seneɛt. cap. xii.

(e) Idem. Plut. ibid. Eutropius ſays, That Pyrrhus offered the fourth part of his kingdom to Fabricius.

(f) Cicero, de Amicitia, cap. xi.

(g) Gellius, de Legibus, lib. iv, cap. viii. & lib. xvii, cap. ult.

others put it back till after the return of Cineas to his maſter. Plutarch (10) is of this laſt opinion. What is moſt certain is, that Pyrrhus did nothing conſiderable during the ſecond campaign; for the two firſt battles were fought, the one during the firſt campaign, the other during the third; the year between being ſpent in propoſals of peace.

Now it was in the interval that Fabricius went to Pyrrhus, and that Cineas was ſent to the Romans: but which of the two ſet out firſt, is what cannot be determined with any certainty. Adhuc ſub judice lis eſt.

[D] He gave Pyrrhus notice, that his own phyſician offered to poiſon him.] Authors differ extreamly concerning this fact: ſome (11) ſay, that an unknown man brought to Fabricius a letter from Pyrrhus's phyſician, by which he promiſed to poiſon his maſter if they would give him a good recompence for it; and that Fabricius, abhorring ſuch a propoſal, wrote, jointly with his colleague, to Pyrrhus, and ſent him the phyſician's letter. The ſubſtance of the letter written by the two conſuls is in Plutarch, who afterwards deſcribes the battle of Aſculum as a paſſage poſterior to that. Others ſay (12), that after the two firſt battles won by Pyrrhus, one Timochares came ſecretly to the conſul Fabricius, and promiſed him, that, provided they could agree upon the reward, he would poiſon Pyrrhus; which he might do eaſily, becauſe his two ſons were cup-bearers to that monarch. Fabricius informed the ſenate of it, who ſent embaſſadors to Pyrrhus, to warn him, in general, to be upon his guard againſt his domeſtics; but who were not to mention any thing of Timochares. They had a mind to ſhew ſome regard to a man who had been willing to do them ſervice, and at the ſame time to be generous towards the king. 'Timocharis 'nomen ſuppreſſit, utroque modo æquitatem amplexus, quia nec hoſtem malo exemplo tollere, neque 'eum qui bene mereri paratus fuerat prodere voluit (13). '—— They ſuppreſſed the name of Timochares, maintaining a ſtrict regard for juſtice to both; for neither 'would they take off an enemy by any unwarrantable 'practices, nor betray the man that offered to do them 'ſervice.' Others (14) affirm, that he who came to Pyrrhus was named Nicias; and that he was ſent by the two conſuls, and not by the ſenate. They quote the conſul's letter word by word; but it is not the ſame with that whoſe ſubſtance we find in Plutarch. Some will have it (15), that the name of Pyrrhus's phyſician was Cineas; that he wrote to the ſenate of Rome; and that the ſenate, rejecting his propoſal, communicated it to Pyrrhus. Others (16) ſay, that Fabricius ſent back to Pyrrhus the deſerter who offered to poiſon him, and that the ſenate approved what Fabricius had done. There are ſome (17) who pretend, that Pyrrhus's phyſician went himſelf to Fabricius, and that the latter ſent him bound hand and foot to his maſter. Florus (18) robs Fabricius entirely of the honour of this action, to give it to Curius, Medicum venale regis Pyrrhi caput afferentem Curius remiſit: —— Curius ſent back the phyſician who profered to ſell the life of his maſter Pyrrhus. Wherein he was not ſo good a judge as Pyrrhus, who by thoſe actions knew Fabricius again, and cried out, That it was he, and no other, whom it would be more difficult to divert from the accuſtomed road of virtue, than the ſun from it's ordinary courſe (19). Among ſo many different opinions of the ancients, it is no wonder to me if thoſe who cite theſe paſſages ſometimes miſtake the one for the other. See Frienſhemius upon Florus, and you will find he relates altogether wrong what Aulus Gellius had taken from Valerius Antias, and Quadrigarius. I will make no reflexions upon that great variety of accounts, but ſhall leave it to every one's judgment, and content myſelf to ſay, that we ſhould not have facts tranſmitted to us with ſuch a medley of circumſtances, if authors could cure themſelves of theſe two faults: firſt, the truſting too much to their memory; ſecondly, the liberty they take to give great examples ſuch a turn as beſt fits the ſubject they treat of. As for moral reflexions upon the probity of the ancient Romans, ſo much ſuperior to that of our times, they are obvious to every body, without my mentioning them. See the 120th epiſtle of Seneca.

[E] The battle of Aſculum .... was the ſecond againſt Pyrrhus.] They reckon generally but three battles between that prince and the Romans; the two firſt of which preceded his journey into Sicily, and the other was fought after his return into Italy. But thoſe who ſay, that the conſul P. Decius was killed in a battle againſt Pyrrhus (20), muſt of neceſſity ſuppoſe, either that there have been four battles (21), or that there was none fought between Pyrrhus and Fabricius: for it is certain, that the conſulſhip of P. Decius preceded the ſecond conſulſhip of Fabricius, and followed that of Lævinus, under which the firſt battle was fought. Eutropius, who places the ſecond under the conſulſhip of Decius, ſays, that Pyrrhus went into Sicily the following year; and that the conſul Fabricius had only to do with the Samnites and the Lucanians, over whom he triumphed. Plutarch and Florus poſitively affirm, that the ſecond battle was fought between Pyrrhus and Fabricius. How can we truſt old hiſtorians in things little remarkable, ſince the years of the moſt deciſive battles are not certain?

[F] The moſt probable opinion is, that the Romans loſt it.] The ancients had, as well as we, ſome Senef battles, of which each party claimed the victory, and for which they returned thanks to heaven with ſolemn pomp. See what is ſaid concerning the battle of Aſculum, in the remark [M] of the article PYRRHUS. In ſome reſpects, nothing is more eaſy than for providence to pleaſe every body. When people are in war, they ſeldom own that fortune has been favourable

to

(10) In Pyrrho, pag. 395.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 396.

(12) Val. Antias, apud Gellium, lib. iii, cap viii. See alſo Valer. Max. lib. vi, cap. v.

(13) Val. Max. ibid.

(14) Quadrigarius apud Gellium, ubi ſupra.

(15) Ælian. Div. Hiſt. lib. xii, cap. xxxiii. It ſeems we muſt read Nicias, and not Cineas, as Andrew Schottus has remarked, lib. iii, Obſerv. Hiſt. cap xxxiv. Scheff rus is miſtaken on this place of Ælian, by ſaying, that Valerius Antias gives the name of Nicias to the Phyſician.

(16) Cicero, de Offic. lib. iii, cap. xxii.

(17) Eutrop. lib. ii. Aurel. Vict. de Viris illuſtr.

(18) Lib. i, cap. xviii.

(19) Suidas, in ἀποςυγῦντες & in Φαβρίκιος. See alſo Eutrop. lib. ii. and Aurel. Victor, ubi ſupra.

(20) Quod quidem ejus factum niſi eſſet jure laudatum, non eſſet imitatus quarto ſuo conſulatu filius; neque porro ex eo natus cum Pyrrho bellum gerens Conſul cecidiſſet in prælio, ſeque è continenti genere tertiam victimam reipublicæ præbuiſſet. Which action of his, had it not been juſtly applauded, would never have been followed by his ſon-in-law in his fourth conſulſhip, nor again would the ſon of the latter, when conſul, have offered himſelf the third ſucceſſive victim to the republic when he fought againſt Pyrrhus. Cicero, lib. ii, de Finib. cap. xix.

(21) Father Labbe, Chronol. Fra c and La Faiole, Hiſt. de la Republ. Romaine, acknowledge four; but the firſt places before the conſulſhip of Fabricius that wherein Decius was killed: the ſecond places it afterwards.

his competitors to diſcharge that office for the good of the commonwealth. He had a fine ſaying about it, which is related by Cicero [G]. It is no wonder that ſuch a man died ſo poor, that the public was obliged to give his daughter a portion to marry her [H]. I find in no author what Moreri relates, that the ſenate were at the charge of his funeral. I only knew, that, to honour his virtue (b), they made an exception, in his favour, to the law of the twelve tables, which allowed no body to be buried within the city of Rome.

(b) Cicero, de Legibus, lib. iii.

to the enemy; they generally give out he has been beaten, and has a thouſand reaſons to be uneaſy. If the enemy has had any ſucceſs, they inſult over him for not improving it better: they ſuppoſe he had formed a hundred great deſigns; and that being ſo far out in his reckoning, he ought to be the object of public laughter. There are no men that want ſo little to be exhorted to celebrate and rehearſe the bleſſings of GOD, as public news-writers: they might well be excepted out of a canticle that may be made after the pattern of that of the three Hebrew children. They admirably well obey the precept, rejoice evermore (22).

[G] He had a fine ſaying about it.] This P. Cornelius Rufinus was a brave man and a great commander, but prodigiouſly covetous and rapacious (23). He ſtood for the conſulſhip at a time when the commonwealth was in danger; and his competitors were men who did not underſtand the war, and who had no merit. Fabricius, though he hated him, did nevertheleſs uſe all his intereſt in his favour. Some, who very much wondered at it, asking him the reaſon why he did ſo, Becauſe, anſwered he, I had rather be plundered than ſold. Nihil eſt quod miremini ſi malui compilari quam venire (24). Cicero pretends, that Fabricius made this anſwer to Rufinus himſelf, who rerurned him thanks for his good offices: Nihil eſt quod mihi gratias, agas inquit, ſi malui compilari quam venire (25).

[H] The public was obliged to give his daughter a portion.] I ſhall quote two authors for it. ‘Senatus Fabricii Luſcini, Scipioniſque filias ab indotatis nuptiis liberalitate ſua vindicavit quoniam paternæ hæreditati præter opimam gloriam nihil erat quod acceptum referrent (26). —— The ſenate, by their liberality, ſupplied the want of fortunes to the daughters of Fabricius Luſcinus, and Scipio; the only patrimony which they could boaſt of being honour.’ That is the firſt. The ſecond is Apuleius; ‘Quod ſi modo judices de cauſa iſta ſederent C. Fabricius, Cn. Scipio, Manius Curius, quorum filiæ ob paupertatem de publico dotibus donatæ ad maritos ierunt, portantes gloriam domeſticam pecuniam publicam (27). —— Were C. Fabricius, Cn. Scipio, Manius Curius, whoſe daughters had fortunes allowed them out of the treaſury, by reaſon of their poverty, and brought their husbands private glory, and public money, to be judges in this cauſe.’

(22) 1 Theſſ. v, 16.

(23) Aul. Gell. lib. iv, cap. viii.

(24) Id. ibid. See alſo Quintil. lib. xii, cap. i, pag. m 558.

(25) Cicero, lib. ii, de Oratore.

(26) Val. Max. lib. iv, cap. iv.

(27) Apuleius, Apol. i, p. m. 286.

FABRICIUS (VINCENT), a native of Hamburgh, in the XVIIth century, has been famous by his wit and learning, and the political employments he has diſcharged. He was both a good poet and phyſician, an able orator, and a learned lawyer. He gained the eſteem of the moſt learned men in Holland, whilſt he ſtudied at Leyden; and they liked his Latin poems ſo well, that they adviſed him to print them; which he did in the year 1632. That edition was followed by ſome others [A]. He was, for ſome time, counſellor to the biſhop of Lubec, and afterwards ſyndic of the town of Dantzic: which town honoured him with the dignity of burgomaſter, and ſent him thirteen times as it's deputy into Poland. He died at Warſaw, during the diet of the kingdom, on the eleventh of April 1667, being fifty four years old. A collection of his works was printed in 1685, by the care of Frederic Fabricius his ſon (a). See the remark.

(a) Taken from the Journal of Leipſic, for the month of June 1686, pag. 278, 279.

[A] That edition of his poems was followed by ſome others.] I muſt not forget that he was principally encouraged by the famous Daniel Heinſius, at whoſe houſe he lodged, to print his Latin verſes. He was not very well pleaſed with that firſt edition, and therefore he put out another, corrected and improved, in the year 1638. He added to it a ſatire in proſe, which he dedicated to Salmaſius, and is intituled, Pranſus paratus: wherein the makers of anagrams, and of leud and extemporary verſes, and ſuch as deſpiſe the poets, are moſt bitterly railed at. Note, that he made a poem, which a phyſician of Geneva (1) inſerted in the ſecond part of his Medicina ſeptentrionalis collatitia. Here follows what was ſaid of it in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, when an abſtract of that phyſician's book was given. ‘That is perhaps leſs ſurpriſing than the adventure of the Dutch maid, who was confined to a garden as ſoon as three plague-ſores appeared on her body, during the horrible peſtilence in the year 1636. She thought on nothing but on her journey to the other world, when a young man, who loved her, beſtowed no other remedy upon her than the moſt amorous embraces he was capable of; and perceiving they were of ſome virtue, and the better to repeat the doſe, he went and lay every night with his infected miſtreſs. She perfectly recovered, and he got no harm by it. This occaſioned a fine Latin poem, which Vincent Fabricius dedicated to Salmaſius, and which was ſoon after printed at Hamburgh. It is inſerted here at large, p. 210 (2).’ The ſubject was as favourable as a poet could wiſh, and I am ſure Mr la Fontaine would have made a very diverting tale of it: which might have been intituled, Love the beſt Phyſician. Let us leave to the diſciples of Hippocrates and Galen, to make inquiries into the natural cauſe of that little prodigy. What triumph of love is here! If that paſſion makes the dulleſt witty, it alſo gives courage to the moſt timorous; for in all probability, the gallant of that maid had run away like a hunted hare from the encounter of a fellow infected with the plague; but becauſe he was in love with the infected woman, and had a fair opportunity to ſatisfy his paſſion, he dared and laughed at the danger, and was ſo lucky as to find, by experience, that fortune favours the bold (3).

The moſt compleat edition of our Fabricius's poems, is that of Leipſic (1685; for beſides the verſes contained in the edition of Leyden 1638, it contains many others never before printed. It alſo comprehends many adopted pieces; and both the ſpeeches the author made to the kings of Poland, and that he pronounced at Leyden in 1632, De obſidione & liberatione urbis Leidenſis, beſides the theſes of phyſic which he defended in the ſame city in 1634, &c (4).

(1) Theophilus Bonnet.

(2) Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, Febr. 1687, pag. 176.

(3) Audaces fortuna juvat.

(4) Taken from the Journal of Leipſic, ubi ſupra.

FAKREDDIN (a), prince of the Druſians in Syria, was driven out of his dominions by the Turks, and fled to Malta, then to Florence, and afterwards to Rome, about the year 1620 (b). He pretended to be related to the duke of Lorrain. ‘The deſire of reigning made him return to mount Libanus. He gave freſh jealouſy to the Turks, who made war upon him. He was perſuaded to go to Conſtantinople to vindicate himſelf, and had his head cut off in that city. Mir Ali, his ſon, ſucceeded him,

(a) He is named FACHRADDIN in a paſſage I have mentioned, above, in the remark [B] of the article ECCHELLENSIS.

(b) Journal des Savans of the 12th of March 1703, pag. 170, Paris Edit.

' him, and was ſucceeded by his ſon Mir Achmed Bin Mahan ; and it is the ſon of ' this laſt who reigns at preſent (c)'. Theſe people had formerly ſeveral emirs ; but Ibrahim, baſha of Cairo, ſubdued them all in 1584, under Amurath III. Thirty or forty years after this Fakreddin ſeized ſeveral fortreſſes (d). The French Mercury (e) mentions his arrival at Florence under the year 1613, and relates ſome circumſtances of it ; but whoever would know his hiſtory exactly, and without the trouble of much reading, ſhould have recourſe to a work of Mr de la Croix (f) : there it appears, that this prince, whom the Arabians called merely Eben Maan, the ſon of Maan, took the name of Fecred-din, which ſignifies flambeau, or light of the faith ; that he ſet up for a conqueror, that he oppreſſed the people he had conquered : that having continued five years in Italy, he returned into his own country in 1618, with vaſt deſigns in his head ; but not being able to put them in execution he was forced to ſubmit to ſultan Amurath, who ordered him to be ſtrangled in his own preſence the fourteenth of March 1633.

(c) Idem, pag. 174.

(d) Ibidem.

(e) Pag. 243 of the IIId Vol.

(f) Intituled Etat preſent des Nations & Egliſes Greque, Armenienne, & Maronite, en Turquie. See the IV, V, and VI chapters of the IIId book, p. 174, and following, Edit. Holl. 1695.

FANNIA, wife to Caïus Titinius (a) a citizen of Minturnæ, dealt very generouſly with Marius, tho' ſhe was not ſatisfied with the judgment he had given in a law-ſuit wherein ſhe was very much concerned. That Woman had loſt her Reputation by her leud life ; but nevertheleſs Titinius married her : nay, her very leudneſs was the chief motive that made him take her to wife, becauſe he expected he might put her away when he would, and keep her portion, if ſhe could be convicted of adultery. He did not fail of an opportunity to put his project in execution ; but Fannia ſtood upon her defence, and had recourſe to law. Marius was to be judge, who, as ſoon as he had been acquainted with the caſe, took Titinius aſide, and adviſed him to reſtore Fannia her portion ; but not being able to perſuade him to it, by a peremptory ſentence he adjudged Titinius to give back the portion [A] ; and that Fannia ſhould be deemed fully convicted of impudicity, and ſhould pay a fine of a groat (b). Some time after, Marius was obliged to fly from Rome, and was declared an enemy to the commonwealth. He hid himſelf in the moraſſes of Minturnæ, from whence he was taken and put under the guard of the magiſtrates, who provided him a lodging in Fannia's houſe, becauſe they concluded ſhe would reſent the defamatory ſentence he had pronounced againſt her. But they were miſtaken : Fannia did herſelf juſtice [B], and took all the care imaginable of her gueſt (c).

(a) Plutarch. in Mario, pag 427, E. calls him Tinius.

(b) Plut. ibid. Valer. Maxim. lib. viii, cap. ii, n. 3, ſays ſhe was fined Seſtercio nummo.

(c) Taken from Valer. Maxim. ubi ſupra.

[A] Marius . . . . adjudged Titinius to give back the portion.] Nothing could be more juſt than to force him to it, becauſe he was not unacquainted with Fannia's leud life when he married her. If he had taken her for an honeſt woman, and deſired ſhe ſhould have lived as ſuch, the caſe had been altered ; but in order to ſeize upon Fannia's great fortune (1), he was well enough contented to be her cuckold for ſome time. It was not therefore reaſonable that he ſhould ceaſe to be ſo, and have all the benefit of it : And ſo Marius's ſentence was moſt judicious. ' Mulierem impudicitiæ ' ream ſeſtertio nummo, Titinium ſumma totius dotis ' damnavit, præfatus idcirco ſe hunc judicandi modum ſecutum, quod liqueret ſibi Titinium patrimonio ' Fanniæ inſidias ſtruentem impudicæ conjugium expetiſſe (2). —— The lady being convicted of the acc'uſation, he fined her a ſeſterce, and condemned Titinius ' to reſtore the whole of her fortune, declaring that he ' had followed this form of judgment, becauſe it appeared to him, that he had married Fannia to ſecure her ' fortune, ſince he knew of her leud practices before.' Plutarch touches upon the ground of the ſentence. Ἐφαίνετο καὶ τὴν Φαννίαν ἀκόλαςον γεγονέναι, καὶ τὸν ἄνδρα τοιαύτην εἰδότα λαβεῖν, καὶ συμβιῶσαι πολὺν χρόνον. Quum Fanniam conſtaret impudicam fuiſſe, & virum qui talem ſciret eſſe eam duxiſſe, diuque cum ea in matrimonio vixiſſe (3). —— It was publickly known that Fannia had been a leud woman, and that her husband who knew it married her, and lived a conſiderable time with her.

[B] Fannia did herſelf juſtice.] She knew in her conſcience, that ſhe deſerved all the infamy Marius had laid upon her ; and conſequently that he deſerved all the eſteem one ought to have for a juſt judge. She had recovered her fortune by Marius's ſentence, which was a greater advantage for ſuch a woman as ſhe, than if Marius, in full court, had declared her an honeſt woman ; for he could not thereby have made up the flaws which her amours had made in her reputation. Her neighbours, and in general all her acquaintance, would ſtill have had the ſame opinion of her virtue as before : And therefore Marius did more ſenſibly oblige her, by declaring her a whore, and by reſtoring her her portion, than if he had proclaimed her honeſt, without allowing her her fortune. When a woman's leud life has once made a noiſe, ſhe is no longer concerned for her reputation, but ſhe deſires then as much or more than ever to have riches, and to enjoy them. We muſt not therefore wonder, that Fannia behaved herſelf towards Marius as towards a juſt judge. See Valerius Maximus, whom I quote in the margin (4). However, we muſt not doubt but ſeveral perſons, in the like circumſtances, would have abuſed Marius.

(1) Τȣ́τȣ διαςᾶσα τὴν φερνὴν ἀπήτει λαμπρὰν ȣ῏σαν. Divortio facto dotem quæ lauta erat repetebat. Plut. in Mario, pag. 427, E.

(2) Valer. Max. lib. viii, cap. ii, num. 3.

(3) Plutarch. ubi ſupra.

(4) Fannia autem hæc eſt, quæ poſtea Marium, hoſtem a ſenatu judicatum, cœnoque paludis, qua extractus erat, oblitum, etiam in domum ſuam cuſtodiendum Minturnis deductum, ope quantacunque potuit, adjuvit : memor, quòd impudica judicata eſſet, ſuis moribus ; quod dotem ſervaſſet, illius religioni acceptum ferri debere. Valerius Max. Lib. VIII, Cap. II, num. 3.

FANNIA, an illuſtrious Roman lady, the worthy daughter of the famous Pœtus Thraſea, and worthy grand-daughter of Arria, was ſo eminently magnanimous and virtuous, that ſhe might not only be a pattern to other women, but likewiſe be propoſed as an example of reſolution to men. She followed her huſband Helvidius twice into baniſhment, and was afterwards exiled herſelf upon his account, that is, becauſe ſhe had deſired Senecio to write Helvidius's life, and had furniſhed him with memoirs. She confeſſed it openly before the judges [A], and only denied that her mother was privy

to

[A] She had furniſhed memoirs for the life of Helvidius : ſhe confeſſed it openly before the judges.] Metius Carus, a famous informer, accuſed Senecio of having compoſed Helvidius's life. The accuſed defended himſelf, by ſaying, he could not deny that ſmall ſervice to Fannia's entreaty ; whereupon Fannia being asked with a threatening tone, whether what Senecio ſaid was true, anſwered, it was. But it is better to hear Pliny ſpeak. ' Bis maritum ſequuta in exſilium eſt, ' tertio ipſa propter maritum relegata. Nam cum Senecio reus eſſet, quod de vita Helvidii libros compoſuiſſet, rogatumque ſe à Fannia in defenſione dixiſſet, quærente minaciter Metio Caro, an rogaſſet, ' reſpondit ; Rogavi : an commentarios ſcripturo deto it (a). This happened in the reign of Domitian. That greatneſs of ſoul was joined with that ſweetneſs of temper and good humour, that Fannia was no leſs loved than reſpected (b).

' diſſet ;

(a) Taken from Pliny junior, Epiſt. XIX, lib. vii.

(b) Eadem quam jucunda, quam comis, quam denique (quod paucis datum eſt) non minus amabilis quam veneranda. Plinius, ibid.

diſſet; Dedi: an ſciente matre; Neſciente. Poſtremo nullam vocem, cedentem periculo, emiſit. Quin etiam illos ipſos libros, quanquam ex neceſſitate & metu temporum abolitos, S C. publicatis bonis, ſervavit, habuit, tulitque in exſilium, exſilii cauſſam (1). —— She twice followed her husband in his exile, and was baniſhed a third time on his account; for Senecio being accuſed of compoſing ſome books concerning the life of Helvidius, and alledging in his defence that it was done at the requeſt of Fannia; Metius Carus, with an angry tone, asked whether ſhe had deſired him to do it: ſhe anſwered, yes. Whether ſhe had furniſhed him with memoirs: ſhe anſwered, ſhe had. Whether with the knowledge of her mother: no, replied ſhe. In ſhort ſhe let fall no expreſſion, but what was attended with danger. And notwithſtanding the books had been ſuppreſſed, and her goods confiſcated, ſhe made them the companions, as they had been the cauſe, of her baniſhment.' If on the one hand, it raiſes our indignation to ſee the cringing adulations of an infinite number of Romans, who ſued for preferments under the firſt emperors; we are on the other hand ſtruck with admiration, to ſee not a few great ſouls, who preſerved the old Roman ſpirit amidſt the public corruption. The author, whoſe words I have quoted, beſtows a thouſand praiſes on Fannia; and acquaints us with one paſſage, which the curious will be glad to ſee. It was the cuſtom for the high-prieſts to appoint certain ladies to take care of the Veſtal virgins, who were by ſickneſs obliged to leave their convent; and Fannia being named for that ſervice, ſhe contracted a diſeaſe by the extraordinary care ſhe took of one of thoſe Veſtal virgins. 'Angit me Fanniæ valetudo. Contraxit hanc dum adſidet Juniæ, virgini Veſtali, ſponte primum, (eſt enim adfinis) deinde etiam ex auctoritate pontificum. Nam virgines, quum vi morbi atrio Veſtæ coguntur excedere, matronarum curæ cuſtodiæque mandantur. Quo munere Fannia dum ſedulo ſungitur, hoc diſcrimine implicita eſt (2). —— I am concerned for Fannia's indiſpoſition, which ſhe contracted by attending Junia, a Veſtal virgin, and her relation; her attendance was at firſt voluntary, and afterwards enjoined by the authority of the high-prieſts. For when the virgins are by ſickneſs obliged to be removed from their apartments, they are committed to the care and inſpection of the matrons. Which ſervice whilſt Fannia was diſcharging with the greateſt fidelity, ſhe was unhappily ſeized with a fit of ſickneſs.'

(1) Plinius, ubi ſupra.

(2) Id. ibid.

FANNIUS, a Roman family. We are going to mention ſome perſons that belong to it; and we ſhall not forget Moreri's faults [A].

[A] We ſhall not forget Moreri's faults.] I. He places the queſtorſhip of Caius Fannius under the conſulſhip of C. Calpurnius (1) Piſo & M. Popilius Lænas, and in the year of Rome 611. Here are two miſtakes; for that Fannius was queſtor in the year 614, and that conſulſhip does not fall in the year 611, but in the year 614 of Rome. II. Fannius Strabo was not twice conſul, but only once; the conſulſhip of the year 632, which is aſcribed to him by Moreri, belongs to Caius Fannius, ſon to the other. III. Theſe words, perhaps this Fannius, conſul in the year 632, was ſon to the firſt, are abſurd; for there is no body but will explain them thus, perhaps he was ſon to the firſt Fannius, of whom I (Moreri) have ſpoken. Now that firſt Fannius is the annaliſt, who, far from being Fannius Strabo's father, is only his nephew. If to excuſe Moreri, you ſuppoſe that his firſt Fannius is Fannius Strabo, you will expoſe him to three reproaches: his pitiful way of expreſſing himſelf; his affirming a thing, of which he ſpeaks doubtfully ſome lines after; and his being ignorant of a known truth. There is no reaſon to doubt, that Domitius Enobarbus's colleague, in the conſulſhip of the year 632, was ſon to the conſul of the year 592 (2). Let us paſs on to other faults. IV. Fannius, Pliny the younger's friend, did not compoſe a hiſtory that was loſt. Indeed it was loſt in proceſs of time, with an infinite number of other books; but there is no doubt but it was extant a long time: and after all, it is very falſe that Pliny mentions the loſs of that hiſtory. Moreri, who affirms it, ſhews he did not underſtand the Latin of Voſſius, who having related Pliny's lamentations (3), becauſe Fannius's death had overthrown the preparations of a great work, makes this ſad reflexion (4). 'Ita profecto eſt, nam ut alibi de alio loquitur Plinius (5), omnia illa cum ipſo ſine fructu poſteritatis obierunt. —— It is indeed ſo, as Pliny ſpeaks on a like occaſion in another place, all thoſe labours died with him, without any advantage to poſterity.' Moreri did not underſtand that this paſſage of Pliny does not relate to Fannius's works, but to another man's, as Voſſius expreſsly remarks. It is true, Voſſius has made uſe of the words of Pliny, to expreſs what became, in time, of thoſe works of Fannius. That is the leaſt privilege of the art of applications: the ſame words, which would be moſt falſe in the book of the firſt author, are moſt true when, a thouſand years after, they are applied to other matters. Moreri was ſo well ſatisfied that Pliny ſpoke of his Fannius in the ninth letter of the fifth book, that he has quoted it at the bottom of the article. V. He ſhould not have ſaid, that Fannius's poems were placed with his picture in the temple of Apollo and the Muſes, and in a public library. This is beyond hyperbole: this is not to magnify an object, but to give a quite different idea. It is almoſt as much as to ſay, that Fannius's image became an idol, an object of people's devotions in the temple of falſe gods; than which nothing can be more falſe: For the moſt that can be ſaid, is, that the poems and picture of Fannius were put in Auguſtus's library. I own, that that library was put in a temple of Apollo (6); but that ought to be taken in the ſame ſenſe, as when we ſay now, that there is a fine library in the cathedral church of ſuch a place; and it is no leſs abſurd to confound thoſe two phraſes, To put a picture in the cathedral church, to put a picture in the library of a cathedral church; than to take for the ſame thing, to put the picture of a poet in the temple of Apollo, to put the picture of a poet in the library of the temple of Apollo. Let us therefore confeſs, that Voſſius has ill expreſſed himſelf in relation to Fannius (7): his negligence has deceived Moreri; but however, the latter ſhould have taken notice of the disjunctive aliamve; which if he had done, he would not have ſaid, that Fannius's works were placed with his picture in the temple of Apollo and the Muſes, and in a public library. The copulative and, inſtead of the disjunctive or, and the omiſſion of aliam, are in this place a prodigious fault: for it not only multiplies things without neceſſity, but gives us alſo to underſtand, that the honour which was done to Fannius, when his picture was placed in a public library, was of another nature than that which was done him when his image was placed in the temple of Apollo. If it was of another nature, what could it be leſs than a kind of conſecration, and a ſort of idolatry? Moreri cannot be excuſed, by ſaying, that by the temple of Apollo he meant the library of that temple; for the particle and, of which he has made uſe, robs him of that ſubterfuge. Was not that library public?

(1) He ſhould have ſaid Cn. Calpurnius.

(2) I have followed Sigonius: Moreri ſays 593:

(3) Quod me recordantem miſeratio ſubit quantum vigilarum quantum laboris exhauſerit fruſtra. It is not without the greateſt concern I reflect what infinite pains he took, which his death rendered fruitleſs. Plinius, Epiſt. v, lib. v.

(4) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 161.

(5) Lib. v, Epiſt. ix.

(6) Sueton. in Auguſto, c. 29.

(7) Cujus poëmata in ædem Apollinis & Muſarum aliamve bibliothecam publicam cum imagine fuerunt delata. Voſſ. de Poët. Latin. pag. 34.

FANNIUS STRABO (CAÏUS) a Roman conſul with Valerius Meſſala in the year of Rome 592. That conſulſhip is remakable for two things: I. For the regulations made by the ſenate concerning the expence of feaſts; II. For a decree of the ſenate, authorizing the pretor (a) to expel the rhetoricians and philoſophers from Rome [A]. They were not ſatisfied with the regulations which the ſenate made to reſtrain the profuſeneſs of feaſts, there was alſo a law made about it, which from the conſul Fannius was called Fannia [B]. We ſhall mention elſewhere (b) the exceſſes which made way for it. I find nothing

[A] To expel the rhetoricians and philoſophers from Rome.] Suetonius (1) and Aulus Gellius acquaint us with it. Theſe are Aulus Gellius's words. ‘ C. Fannio Strabone, M. Valerio Meſſala Coss. Senatusconſultum de Philoſophis & de Rhetoribus Latinis factum eſt. M. Pomponius Prætor Senatum conſuluit. Quod verba facta ſunt de Philoſophis & de Rhetoribus, de ea re ita cenſuerunt. Uti M. Pomponius Prætor animadverteret, curaretque uti ei è republica fideque ſua videretur, uti Romæ ne eſſent (2). —— In the conſulſhip of C. Fannius Strabo, and Marcus Valerius Meſſala, a decree was made concerning the philoſophers and rhetoricians of Rome. M. Pomponius, the pretor, asked the opinion of the ſenate. The affair of the philoſophers and rhetoricians was diſcuſſed, and they came to this determination; that M. Pomponius the pretor ſhould take effectual care, agreably to the intereſt of the republic, and his own duty, to clear the city of them.’

[B] A law which . . . . was called Fannia.] Aulus Gellius ſpeaks diſtinctly of that law, and of the ſenate's decree, as of two things which followed one another. The ſenate's decree was firſt made, and the law afterwards. ‘ Legi adeò nuper in Capitonis Atei conjectaneis ſenatus decretum vetus C. Fannio & M. Valerio Meſſala Coss. factum; in quo jubentur principes civitatis, qui ludis Megalenſibus antiquo ritu mutitarent, id eſt, mutua convivia agitarent, jurare apud Conſules verbis conceptis, non amplius in ſingulas cœnas ſumptus eſſe facturos, quam centenos vicenoſque æris, præter olus & far & vinum; neque vino alienigena, ſed patrio, uſuros; neque argenti in convivio plus pondo, quàm libras centum illaturos. Sed poſt id Senatus-conſultum lex Fannia lata eſt, quæ ludis Romanis, item ludis plebeiis & Saturnalibus, & aliis quibuſdam diebus, in ſingulos dies centenos æris inſumi conceſſit, decemque aliis diebus in ſingulis menſibus tricenos; cæteris autem omnibus diebus denos (3). —— I have read lately in Capito Ateus's conjectures, that an old decree of the ſenate was made in the conſulſhip of C. Fannius, and M. Val. Meſſala; whereby the magiſtrates, who according to cuſtom gave mutual entertainments during the Megalenſian games, were obliged to ſwear in form before the conſuls, not to expend above a hundred and twenty pieces of braſs money, beſides bread, herbs and wine, upon every feaſt, and not to uſe foreign wines, but of their own growth, nor to bring to table above one hundred weight of plate. But after that decree the Fannian law was enacted, which allowed one hundred pieces of braſs to be expended at a time, during the Roman, Plebeian, and Saturnalian games, and on ſome other particular days; and on ten other days in every month thirty, but on all other days only ten.’ This was a marvellous frugality, and ſuch as put a great conſtraint upon people. What rich nation would now-a-days undergo ſuch a yoke? but paſſing by all moral criticiſms, let us enquire under which Fannius the law Fannia was made; for ſome people think, it was not made under him whom Aulus Gellius mentions.

Glandorp (4), conſidering the diſtinction which Aulus Gellius has obſerved between the ſenate's decree and the law, is perſuaded that the law was made a long time after the ſenate's decree; that is, under the conſulſhip of Caïus Fannius, ſon to our Caïus Fannius Strabo, in the year of Rome 632. But that opinion can never agree with what we read in Pliny, that the law Fannia was made eleven years before the third Punic war. I ſhall quote the whole paſſage, becauſe it contains ſome curious particulars. There you will ſee that the inhabitants of Delos were the firſt that crammed hens, which introduced the cuſtom of eating no fowls but what were crammed. In order to reſtrain that piece of luxury, the law Fannia ordained, that no manner of fowl ſhould be ſerved up at table, except a hen uncrammed. But this law was ſoon after eluded, under pretence that it did not prohibit crammed chickens. ‘ Gallinas ſaginare Deliaci cœpere: unde peſtis exorta opimas aves & ſuopte corpore unctas devorandi. Hoc primum antiquis cœnarum interdictis exceptum invenio jam lege C. Fannii Coſſ. XI. annis ante tertium Punicum bellum, ne quid volucre poneretur præter unam gallinam quæ non eſſet altilis: quod deinde caput tranſlatum per omnes leges ambulavit. Inventumque diverticulum eſt in fraude earum gallinaceos quoque paſcendi lacte madidis cibis: multo ita gratiores approbantur (5).’ Macrobius would furniſh us with very good weapons againſt Glandorp, if his Computations were not ſomewhat intricate. He enumerates, one after another, the laws of the ancient Romans againſt expences in eating, and this is the order he obſerves. The firſt law was made at the requeſt of C. Orchius, tribune of the people; the ſecond, which was the law Fannia, was made twenty two years after the firſt. ‘ Prima omnium de cœnis lex ad populum Orchia pervenit, quam tulit C. Orchius tribunus plebis de ſenatus ſententia, tertio anno quam Cato cenſor fuerat. Cujus verba quia prolixa ſunt prætereo. Summa autem ejus præſcribebat numerum convivarum. Et hæc eſt lex Orchia, de qua Cato in orationibus ſuis vociferabatur, quod plures quam præſcripto ejus cavebatur ad cœnam vocarentur. Cumque auctoritatem novæ legis aucta neceſſitas imploraret: poſt annum viceſimum ſecundum legis Orchiæ Fannia lex lata eſt, anno poſt Romam conditam, ſecundum Gellii opinionem, quingenteſimo octogeſimo octavo (6). —— The Orchian law was the firſt which was publiſhed concerning entertainments. C. Orchius tribune of the people enacted it with the approbation of the ſenate three years before Cato was cenſor. As it is very tedious I ſhall not tranſcribe it. The principal thing which it regarded was the number of gueſts. This is the Orchian law on which Cato declamed with ſo much warmth; becauſe more were invited than were allowed by that law. And as the exigency ſtill encreaſing called for the authority of a new decree; twenty two years after, the Fannian law was enacted, &c.’ The firſt was made three years before Cato obtained the cenſorſhip; and therefore the law Fannia was made nineteen years after he was raiſed to that office. Now he was created cenſor in the year 569 of Rome, and ſo the law Fannia muſt have been made in the year 588. This concluſion rightly drawn from Macrobius's Words, joined with the Faſti Conſulares, is agreeable to the text itſelf of Macrobius. ‘ Poſt annum viceſimum ſecundum legis Orchiæ Fannia lex lata eſt anno poſt Romam conditam, ſecundum Gelli opinionem, quingenteſimo octogeſimo octavo (7). —— Twenty two years after the Orchian law had been enacted, the Fannian law was paſſed, in the year of Rome, according to Gellius, five hundred eighty eight.’ But here we find this inconveniency, that, according to Aulus Gellius, the law Fannia was made in the 588th year of Rome. Now look as long as you pleaſe in Aulus Gellius, and you will not find there that point of chronology; but only, that after the decree made by the ſenate, under the conſulſhip of C. Fannius, and Valerius Meſſala, the law Fannia was enacted. Macrobius cannot ſay, that, according to Aulus Gellius's opinion, that law was made in the year 588, without ſuppoſing that Aulus Gellius affirms, that the law Fannia was made under the conſulſhip of Fannius and Meſſala, and that that conſulſhip falls in the year 588. But it is certain that Aulus Gellius has neither of thoſe two aſſertions, and that he rather ſpeaks like one that rejects the firſt, than like one that deſigns to maintain it. Poſt id ſenatuſconſultum lex Fannia lata eſt (8). I know very well that it cannot be concluded from that Latin, that the ſenate's decree and the law were not made the ſame Year, and this is what I oppoſe to Glandorp's reaſoning: for there is time enough in one year, both for the ſenate to make a decree, and afterwards for the people either to confirm, correct, or amplify by an authentic law, that decree of the ſenate. Aulus Gellius might therefore have expreſſed himſelf as he does, although he had been ſure that the ſenate's decree and the law were made the ſame year; but it is moſt certain that his words do rather lead to another ſenſe, and that therefore Macrobius is not exact, in pretending that Aulus Gellius has placed both the ſenate's decree and the law under the ſame conſulſhip. As for the other aſſertion, Macrobius is yet more to blame: for Aulus Gellius would

(a) He was called Marcus Pomponius.

(b) In the remark [B] of the article TITIUS (CAÏUS).

(1) Sueton. de clar. Rhetorib. cap. i.

(2) Aul. Gell. lib. xv, cap. xi.

(3) Idem, lib. ii, cap. xxiv.

(4) Gland. Onomaſtic. p. 333.

(5) Plin. lib. x, cap. l.

(6) Macrob. Saturnal. lib. ii, cap. xiii.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Aul. Gell. lib. ii, cap. xxiv.

nothing worth mentioning touching Marcus Fannius, brother to him who is the ſubject of this article. Thoſe two brothers left each of them a ſon named Caïus, as we ſhall ſee preſently.

would advance a very groſs lye, if he placed the conſulſhip of Fannius and Meſſala under the year 588. Theſe intricacies in Macrobius will not allow us to make uſe of his teſtimony towards a chronological exactneſs; but here are others which will ſuffer it yet leſs.

According to his ſuppoſition, it is moſt certain that the law Fannia was made in the 588th year of Rome; for he places an interval of twenty two years between that law, and that which was called Orchia, and pretends that the later was made three Years before Cato was created Cenſor. Now that office was beſtowed on Cato in the 569th year of Rome (9); and ſo the law Orchia was made in the Year 566, to which number if you add twenty two years, you will come to the 588th year of Rome. It is therefore unneceſſary to correct Macrobius's words (10); for if they are not right, it is the author's fault, and not the tranſcriber's. Father Hardouin, by ſuppoſing that they have adulterated the numbers in Macrobius's text, aſſigns a very probable cauſe of that alteration. ‘Hinc Macrobium emendamus, lib. 2. Saturn. cap. 13. pag 367. apud quem corruptus annorum numerus legitur. Fannia lex, inquit, lata eſt anno poſt Romam conditam, ſecundum Gellii opinionem, quingenteſimo octogeſimo octavo. Scriptum erat per litterarum compendium, DLXXXXIII. Librarii deinde, ut alias ſæpe advertimus, denarii nota poſtrema in quinarium verſa, DLXXXVIII, perperam reſcripſerunt (11). —— Hence I correct Macrobius, lib. 2. Saturn. c. 13. p. 365, where the number of years is corrupted. The Fannian law, ſays he, was paſſed in the year of Rome, according to Gellius's opinion, five hundred eighty eight. It was wrote in numerals DLXXXXIII. The tranſcribers, as I have often obſerved in other places, by changing the laſt X into V corruptly wrote it DLXXXVIII.’ But that ſuppoſition happens unluckily to be falſe; for if Macrobius had not ſet down the year 588, but either the year 592 or 593, he had confuted himſelf by his own calculations. Turn the thing which way you pleaſe, and you will never find him exact: and if you ſhould maintain, that according to him the law Orchia was enacted three Years after Cato was made cenſor (12), you would but increaſe the confuſion. See the article TITIUS (13), wherein I examine, whether what Macrobius ſays concerning that Man, can any ways back Glandorp's opinion.

(9) See Sigonius, in Faſtis.

(10) Pighius, inſtead of Quingenteſimo octavo, would have us read Quingenteſimo nonageſimo ſecundo. Father Hardouin would have it Quingenteſimo nonageſimo tertio. See the following Quotation.

(11) Harduinus in Plinium, lib. x, pag. 482, Tom. II.

(12) One might maintain that the ellipſis of theſe words of Macrobius, Tertio anno quam Cato Cenſor fuerat, is not ante but poſt.

(13) Rem. [B].

FANNIUS (Caïus) ſon of the fore-mentioned, diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence [A]. He was conſul with Cn. Domitius Ænobarbus, in the year of Rome 632, and oppoſed the factious attempts of Caïus Gracchus, tho' he was indebted to him for the conſulſhip (a). He publiſhed an oration againſt him, which Cicero has commended [B].

(a) Plut. in vitâ Gracch.

[A] Diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his eloquence.] Leſt my reader's fancy ſhould go too far, I muſt acquaint him, that the orator I ſpeak of in this place was never of the firſt rank, but always paſſed for one of the middle claſs. Fannius in mediocribus oratoribus habitus eſſet (1); however, the following remark will ſhew you that I might ſpeak of him, as I have done, without hyperbole. Does not Paterculus place him among the moſt famous orators (2)?

[B] He publiſhed againſt C. Gracchus an oration which Cicero has commended.] Theſe are his words. ‘Horum ætatibus adjuncti duo C. Fannii, Caii & Marci filii fuerunt, quorum Caii filius qui Conſul cum Domitio fuit unam Orationem de ſociis, & nomine Latino contra Gracchum reliquit, ſane & bonam & nobilem (3). —— Cotemporary with theſe were the two C. Fannius, ſons of Caïus and Marcus; the former, who was conſul with Domitius, has left an oration againſt Gracchus, which is truly good and noble.’ That oration was thought ſo good by nice judges, that ſome fathered it upon Perſius (4), and others ſaid, that ſeveral men of quality had a hand in it; becauſe they found in it more beauties than they thought could proceed from a mean orator, ſuch as Fannius was accounted to be. Cicero confutes that opinion among other reaſons, by this, that Fannius had always excelled in his language, and had rendered himſelf illuſtrious in his tribuneſhip. ‘Eam ſuſpicionem propter hanc cauſam credo fuiſſe, quod Fannius in mediocribus oratoribus habitus eſſet, oratio autem vel optima eſſet illo quidem tempore orationum omnium: ſed nec ejuſmodi eſt, ut à pluribus confuſa videatur: unus enim ſonus eſt totius orationis, & idem ſtylus, nec de Perſio reticuiſſet Gracchus, quum & Fannius de Menelao Maratheno, & de ceteris objeciſſet, præſertim quum Fannius nunquam ſit habitus elinguis: nam & cauſas defenſitavit, & tribunatus ejus arbitrio & autoritate Publii Africani geſtus, non obſcurus fuit (5). —— I imagine this ſuſpicion took it's riſe from hence, that Fannius was only eſteemed a ſecond rate orator: but that oration even excelled any of that time. It is not however ſuch as may argue it to be the compoſition of a club; for the periods have all the ſame turn, and the ſame ſtile runs thro' the whole; nor would Gracchus have paſſed Perſius in ſilence, when Fannius had made objections concerning Menelaus Marathenus, and the reſt, eſpecially as Fannius was never accounted a man that wanted elocution, for he pleaded at the bar, and his tribuneſhip, which he obtained by the intereſt of Publius Africanus, was not inglorious.’ This paſſage acquaints us, that Fannius was of a Plebeian family. Cicero is taxed with beſtowing elſewhere upon Fannius, the ſon of Marcus, the tribuneſhip, which he aſcribes in this place to Fannius, the ſon of Caïus. ‘In præſentia mihi velim ſcribas quibus Censs. C. Fannius M. F. Tribunus pl. fuerit. Videor mihi audiſſe P. Africano, L. Mummio (6). —— I wiſh you would inform me as ſpeedily as may be, who were Censors when C. Fannius, ſon of Marcus, was tribune of the people. If I miſtake not, I have [illegible] been told, that P. Africanus, and L. Mummius were.’ But I do not find that that criticiſm (7) is well grounded; for it is very poſſible that Fannius, the ſon of Marcus, was tribune during the cenſorſhip of Scipio Africanus, and that Fannius, the ſon of Caïus, followed Scipio Africanus's counſels in the diſcharge of his tribuneſhip. Now if theſe two things are very poſſible, why may not we ſay, that Cicero has ſpoken of the one in this place, and of the other in his letters to Atticus? I find more difficulty in the word cenſoribus, which has been put inſtead of conſulibus, in the paſſage of his letter to Atticus; for as Cicero chiefly wanted to know in what year ſuch and ſuch had been either tribunes of the people, or pretors, &c (8), without doubt he enquired under what conſulſhip they had exerciſed thoſe offices. The cenſors were renewed but every fifth Year, and ſo he could not have known the year of a tribuneſhip, if he had only known under what cenſor ſuch or ſuch a man had been tribune of the People.

(1) Cicero in Bruto, cap. xxvi.

(2) Paterc. lib. ii, cap. ix.

(3) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. xxvi.

(4) He was one of the moſt learned men of that age. See the article PERSIUS (Caius).

(5) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. xxvi.

(6) Cicero, epiſt. xiii, ad Attic. lib. xvi.

(7) It is made by Corradus. Theſe are his words in Brutum Ciceron. pag. 187. Videbatur Cicero audiviſſe tunc Fannium Tribunum plebis fuiſſe: quanquam libro decimo ſexto ad Atticum de C. Fannio M. F. hoc ipſum ſcribit: ſed quum poſtea nihil infra ſuo loco ea de re dicat, videtur errorem, ſuo Attico fortaſſe monente, cognoviſſe, & hunc pro illo repoſuiſſe.

(8) See the fifth letter of the ſecond book to Atticus.

FANNIUS, (Caïus) ſon to Marcus, and couſin-german to the fore-going, was queſtor in the year of Rome 614, and pretor two years after. He bore arms in Africa under Scipio Africanus the younger (a), and in Spain under Fabius Maximus Servilianus (b). He was diſciple of Panætius (c) a great Philoſopher of the ſect of the Stoics, and married the younger daughter of Lælius. He compoſed annals which were in eſteem eſteem [A]. He reſented his father-in-law Lælius's beſtowing the office of Augur upon Quintus Mutius Scævola his other ſon-in-law; nor would he admit of Lælius's excuſes [B]. It will not be amiſs to obſerve, that Cicero having ſaid that Fannius the hiſtorian was ſon-in-law to Lælius, he was confuted by Pomponius Atticus in a demonſtrative manner [C], tho' at the ſame time he was not miſtaken. The Reader will ſee, in one ſingle remark, the miſtakes of ſome authors in relation to the Fannii [D].

(a) Ipſe Fannius apud Plutarch. in vita Gracch. pag. 826. A.

(b) Appian. in Iberic. pag. m. 476.

(c) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. xxvi.

[A] He compoſed annals which were in eſteem.] Cicero ſpeaks pretty honourably of them (1): 'Ejus omnis in dicendo facultas ex hiſtoria ipſius non inelеganter ſcripta perſpici poteſt, quæ neque nimis eſt infans neque perfecte diſerta. —— All his skill in oratory may be ſeen in his hiſtory which is not ill wrote, being neither too puerile, nor altogether elaborate.' Brutus made an abridgment of them, as we learn from one of Cicero's letters to Atticus (2), where we read theſe words. Conturbat me epitome Bruti Fanniana, an Bruti epitoma Fannianorum. Voſſius (3) obſerves, that Manutius has ill explained that Latin in his commentary. He thought, ſays he, that that work of Brutus was either a ſhort hiſtory of the Fannian family, or of the memorable actions done by the Fannii. Manutius ſays no ſuch thing in his commentary, but has underſtood the thing rightly. 'In Bruti epitoma Fannianorum, that is according to him, quam confecit Brutus annalium Fannianorum, id eſt hiſtoriæ à Fannio conſcriptæ (4) —— In Brutus's epitome of Fannius, that is, according to him, of the annals of Fannius, or the hiſtory which Fannius wrote.' Inſtead of accuſing Manutius of that fault, it ought to have been laid upon Corradus (5). As for the reſt, if Fannius's annals came ſhort of being a maſterpiece of eloquence, they had however an excellence better than a fine ſtile, which was ſincerity; for that is the character Salluſt gives of Fannius. 'Cum aliis Hiſtoriographis ſingula tradidiſſet (Salluſtius) in libro primo hiſtoriarum, Catoni brevitatem, Romani generis diſertiſſimus paucis abſolvit; Fannio vero veritatem (6). —— Saluſt, in his firſt book of hiſtory, gives each hiſtorian his particular characteriſtic; to Cato brevity, to Fannius's truth.'

[B] Nor would he admit of Lælius's excuſes.] He had married Lælius's younger daughter: the elder was married to Scævola. But Scævola being younger than Fannius, the latter pretended that his birthright ought to incline Lælius to prefer him before the other in the diſpoſal of the augurſhip. Lælius excuſed himſelf, by ſaying, that he had not preferred the younger of his ſons-in-law to the elder, but the elder of his daughters to the younger: but Fannius would not be ſatisfied with that diſtinction. 'Is ſocerum quia cooptatus in Augurum collegium non erat, non admodum diligebat, præſertim cum ille Q. Scævolam ſibi minorem natu generum prætuliſſet, cui tamen Lælius ſe excuſans non genero minori dixit ſe illud, ſed majori filiæ detuliſſe (7).' This paſſage of Cicero does not altogether agree with his dialogue of friendſhip, wherein he introduces Fannius ſpeaking to his father-in-law, as if he was very well pleaſed with him, and as being his colleague in his dignity of augur.

[C] Cicero ..... was confuted in a demonſtrative manner.] I do but tranſlate Cicero's words, Sed tu me γεωμετρικῶς refelleras (8). I am miſtaken if there be not ſome irony in it. Cicero would inſinuate to his friend, who was a man conſummate in the knowledge of families, that we ought not always to truſt our memory; and that we may ſometimes take for invincible reaſons, what at bottom is but a meer illuſion. You proved geometrically to me, that I had falſly advanced that Fannius was ſon-in-law to Lælius. This I had from Hortenſius, who is very credible in thoſe things; however, I was fain to yield to your geometrical proofs: But here is Brutus, who confutes you in the abridgment he has made of Fannius's hiſtory; get you out of that plunge as well as you can. 'Scripſi quod erat in extremo: idque ego ſecutus hunc Fannium qui ſcripſit hiſtoriam, generum eſſe ſcripſeram Lælii: ſed tu me γεωμετρικῶς refelleras: te autem nunc Brutus & Fannius. Ego tamen de bono auctore Hortenſio ſic acceperam, ut apud Brutum eſt. Hunc igitur locum expedies (9).' Thus Cicero ſpeaks to his friend Atticus. It is viſible he is upon the jeering ſtrain, when he gives the name of geometrical demonſtrations, to the pretended reaſons of Atticus. Note, that Cicero's words prove, 1. that Fannius had ſaid in his hiſtory, that he was ſon-in-law to Lælius. 2. That Cicero learned only, from the abridgment of that hiſtory publiſhed by Brutus, that Fannius had ſaid ſuch a thing; for if he had known it otherwiſe, he would not have alledged, as his only proof, the ſingle authority of Hortenſius. If Mezerai had ſaid in his hiſtory, that he had married the daughter of ſuch one, thoſe who ſhould mention that marriage, and ſhould remember what the hiſtorian had ſaid about it, would not quote an hear-ſay; or if they did, they would deſerve to be laughed at.

[D] See the miſtakes of ſome authors in relation to the Fannii.] Let us begin with Mr Lloyd. I. He places in the 508th year of Rome, the paſſing of the law Fannia, and quotes the fourteenth chapter of the ſecond book of Aulus Gellius, inſtead of quoting the twenty fourth. He alſo quotes the ſeventeenth chapter of the third book of Macrobius's Saturnalia, inſtead of quoting the twelfth chapter of the ſecond Book. II. He ſays, that Caïus Fannius, ſon to Marcus, and ſon-in-law to Lælius, was more famous than Fannius his couſin, both by his morals and his eloquence, moribus & ipſo dicendi genere clarior. That is a notorious falſhood; for Cicero, to whom he refers us, is very far from ſaying any ſuch thing (10). III. As for the poet Fannius, he ſays, that his poems were carried with his image into the temple of Apollo and the Muſes, or into ſome other library: which fault he has copied from Voſſius (11). IV. He applies to Fannius Cepio an epigram of Martial (12), which he does not tranſcribe right; for he ſays, Hoſtem cum peteret (13) ſe Fannius ipſe peremit,

Hic rogo non furor eſt ne moriare mori?

Theſe two verſes have no manner of ſenſe. The word peteret, put inſtead of fugeret, blunts the point of the epigram; and if you leave fugeret in it, it will not hit upon Fannius Cepio, the head in a conſpiracy againſt Auguſtus. I do not quote Macrobius (14), who relates the great fidelity of one of that Fannius's ſlaves towards his maſter, and who acquaints us, that Fannius ſhunned death with all the caution imaginable: I do not quote, I ſay, Macrobius, who does not ſay, that Fannius was at laſt weary of ſhunning death; but I quote Dion, who ſays poſitively that Fannius was killed (15), and betrayed by one of his ſervants (16). Is not this a proof that he did not kill himſelf. Let us paſs on to Mr Hofman. He has committed the four faults of Lloyd, and ſome of thoſe of Moreri. He has quoted the ninth letter of the fifth book of Pliny, which has no reference to any of the Fannii. He ſays, that Fannius Strabo was twice conſul; firſt with Valerius Meſſala, and then with Domitius Ænobarbus. He adds, that the law Fannia was made under the firſt conſulſhip of Fannius; and refers us, for that matter, to his article Fannia, where we find that that law was made in the year 508. He therefore places the firſt conſulſhip of Fannius Strabo, in the year 508, whereas it ought to have been placed in the year 592 or 593. Before he ſpoke of Fannius Strabo, he had made an article of Caïus Fannius, conſul with Domitius; and ſo of one man he has made two.

(1) In Bruto, cap. xxvi.

(2) The fifth of the twelfth book.

(3) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 28.

(4) See Grævius's edition, Tom. II, pag. 75, 76, of Manutius's Commentary.

(5) See Grævius's edition, Tom. II, pag. 296, col. 1.

(6) Marius Victorinus in primum Ciceronis de Inventione apud Voſſium de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 28, 29.

(7) Cicero, in Bruto, cap. xxvi.

(8) Idem, Epiſt. V, ad Atticum, lib. xii.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) He ſays, Moribus & ipſo genere dicendi durior. Idem, in Bruto, pag. 185.

(11) See, above, the faults of Moreri, remark [A] of the article FANNIUS, (the Family) num. 5.

(12) It is the 80*th of the* 2*d book.*

(13) There ſhould have been fugeret.

(14) Saturn. lib. i, cap. xi.

(15) Καὶ (οὐ γὰρ ὑπέμειναν τὸ δικαςήριον) ἐρήμην μὲν ὡς καὶ φευξόμενοι ἥλωσαν, ἀπεσφάγησαν δὲ οὐ πολλῷ ὕςερον. Hi quum die dicta in judicio non comparuiſſent, abſentes exilio damnati ſunt & paulo poſt necati. Dio, lib. 54, pag. m. 508, ad ann. 732.

(16) Τινὰ δὲ ἕτερον (τῶν δούλων) τὸν προδόντα αὐτόν. Alterum (ſervorum) qui herum prodidiſſet. Id. ibid.

FANNIUS QUADRATUS, a Latin poet, whoſe poems, though ridiculous, were placed, with his picture, in the library which Auguſtus had erected [A]. Horace, cotemporary

[A] His poems ...... were placed in the library which Auguſtus had erected.] It was in the temple of Apollo Palatinus. See what Horace ſays of Fannius:

- - - - - beatus Fannius ultro
Delatis capſis & imagine: quum mea nemo
Scripta legat, vulgo recitare timentis (1).

Mr Dacier

(1) Horat. Sat iv, lib. i, ver. 21.

cotemporary of that Fannius, has ſpoken of him with much contempt, and has reflected on him as a paraſite (a). That is the common character of bad poets.

(a) Aut crucier quod Vellicet ab ſentem Demetrius, aut quod ineptus Fannius Hermogenis lædat conviva Tigelli. Horat. Sat. x, lib. i, ver. 78.

Mr Dacier underſtands theſe words in the following manner: ‘ That Fannius, ſays he, though a bad poet, ‘ made a ſhift, by his intrigues, and by a ſort of cabal ‘ he had raiſed by reading his poems in all places, and ‘ to all comers, to get leave, againſt all manner of ‘ juſtice, that he himſelf ſhould be permitted to carry ‘ both his compoſures and his picture into the library ‘ which Auguſtus had dedicated: and this is what Horace ridicules very wittily .... Fannius, by making ‘ daily aſſemblies where he read his works, had got ‘ a vaſt number of admirers, who cried up his verſes, ‘ and diſperſed copies of them every where; whereas ‘ the verſes of Horace, who would be indebted ‘ to no body but himſelf for his reputation, and who ‘ communicated them but very ſeldom, to very few ‘ people, were almoſt unknown, and did not make a ‘ quarter part of the noiſe the fooliſh works of Fannius ‘ did: for at that time, as well as now-adays, faction often prevailed over merit. This is the true ſenſe of that ‘ paſſage, which has not been well underſtood: for what ‘ Acron ſays, that the ſenate had done that honour to ‘ Fannius, to be rid of his importunities; or that ſome ‘ people that hankered after the eſtate of Fannius, who ‘ was childleſs, in order to curry favour with him, and ‘ become his heirs, had carried his writings and his ‘ picture into the public library; all that, I ſay, is a ‘ meer fancy, which has no manner of ground. I put in the margin (2) the words of the old interpreter, which Mr Dacier condemns. I have ſaid ſomewhere (3), that ſatires want to be commented upon, either by the author himſelf, or by ſome cotemporary writer. Here is a paſſage of Horace which confirms my opinion. We know not the true meaning of it, we only gueſs at it; and how happy ſoever our conjectures be, there are ſtill ſome doubts behind. We ſhould not be at that loſs if Horace had commented upon his own ſatires, or if ſome writer of Auguſtus's age had writ commentaries upon them: but becauſe one of the perfections of that kind of compoſures conſiſts in a thouſand ſtrokes of raillery, expreſſed by obſcure hints, and which allude to ſome adventures not known to every body, I believe a ſatirical author does not much care for commentaries. The modern Theophraſtus (4) was not pleaſed, to ſee that people made him enemies by applying his characters to ſuch and ſuch perſons.

(2) Fannius Quadratus Poëta loquaciſſimus & ineptiſſimus fuit, cui ſenatus audiendi faſtidio ultro capſas & imaginem obtulit, ut libros ſuos mitteret, & in auctoritatem reciperetur tanquam optimus Poëta: vel, ut alii referunt, Fannius Poëta malus cum liberos non haberet, hæredipetæ ſine ejus cura & ſtudio libros ejus & imaginem in publicas bibliothecas referebant, nullo tamen merito ſcriptoris.

(3) See, above, remark [A] of the article ABELLY; and remark [C] of D'ASSOUCI, at the end.

(4) La Bruyere.

FANNIUS (CAÏUS), a Latin author, who lived in Trajan's time, and had a great ſhare in the eſteem and friendſhip of Pliny the younger. Though he was buſy in pleading cauſes, yet he found time to make a collection of Nero's cruelties; that is, he compoſed the laſt dying words of thoſe whom that wicked prince had either put to death, or baniſhed. He had publiſhed three very exact and polite books upon that ſubject [A]; and he beſtowed the more pains upon the ſequel, becauſe he ſaw that the firſt parts were read with applauſe: but death prevented the finiſhing of that work. He had himſelf a fore-ſight, occaſioned by a certain dream, that he ſhould die before the publiſhing of the fourth book (a).

(a) Taken from Pliny the younger, Epiſt. v, lib. v.

[A] He had publiſhed three very exact and polite books upon that ſubject.] Nothing was more proper than a work of that nature, to render the memory of Nero odious: for it was a kind of martyrology; and it is well known, that ſatires, though moſt nicely written, do much leſs prejudice to a tyrant than a martyrology unskillfully compiled. The laſt dying words of the perſecuted recommend them by two powerful reaſons: the one is, the miſerable condition to which they are generally reduced; and the other, the patience and fine diſcourſes that uſually accompany their conflicts, at leaſt in relations: which make us forget thoſe paſſages of their lives which might hinder the effects of compaſſion and veneration. Judge you what coals of fire all theſe things heap upon the head of the perſecutor and tyrant: and I leave you to think, whether that work of Fannius was not very proper to make Nero's memory deteſted; for it contained the laſt dying words of a great many illuſtrious perſecuted perſons, written with great clearneſs. Let us hear Pliny ſpeak: ‘ Pulcherrimum opus ‘ imperfectum reliquit. Quamvis enim agendis cauſſis ‘ diſtringeretur, ſcribebat tamen exitus occiſorum aut ‘ relegatorum à Nerone: & jam tres libros abſolverat, ‘ ſubtiles, & diligentes, & Latinos, atque inter ſermonem hiſtoriamque medios. Ac tanto magis reliquos ‘ perficere cupiebat, quanto frequentius hi lectitabantur (1). —— He left a moſt beautiful work imperfect. For though he was engaged to attend almoſt ‘ conſtantly at the bar, yet he wrote the laſt words of ‘ thoſe who were either put to death, or baniſhed by ‘ Nero, and had already finiſhed three books, wrote ‘ with the greateſt art, elegance, and purity, keeping ‘ a mean between hiſtory and familiar ſtile. He was ſo ‘ much the more deſirous to have compleated the reſt, ‘ as he found that thoſe which he had done were greatly ‘ admired.’

(1) Plin. Epiſt. v, lib. v.

FAREL (WILLIAM), one of the moſt eminent miniſters of the reformed church, was ſon of a gentleman of Dauphiné, and was born at Gap, in the year 1489 (a). He ſtudied at Paris with great ſucceſs: he learnt there philoſophy (b), the Greek and Hebrew languages (c), and was ſome time a teacher in the college of cardinal le Moine (d). James Faber Stapulenſis procured him that employment (e), and, as I believe, alſo the invitation which William Briçonnet, biſhop of Meaux, ſent to him. That biſhop was a little inclined to the reformation, and upon that account he invited into his dioceſe, ſome perſons who had reliſhed the new opinions. Farel, among the reſt, was called to preach to them there in 1521 (f). The perſecution which was begun at Meaux, in the year 1523, againſt thoſe they called heretics, obliged him to provide for his ſafety elſewhere than in France (g): whereupon he retired to Straſburg [A], where he received the hand of fellowſhip from Bucer and Capito (h), as he did afterwards from Zuinglius at (a) Ancillon vie de Guillaume Farel, pag. 1.

(b) Ibid. pag. 10.

(c) Ibid. pag. 18, & 28.

(d) Ibid. pag. 29.

(e) Ibid.

(f) Ibid. pag. 110, & 193.

(g) Ibid. pag. 110.

(h) Ibid. pag. 197.

[A] He retired to Straſburgh.] I thought I ought to follow the account of a man (1) who tells us he has Farel's Diary in his poſſeſſion. I have therefore ſaid, upon the faith of this voucher, that our William, flying from Meaux, retreated to Strasburg; but I ought not to conceal, that another miniſter (2), who to me ſeems to have written after good memoirs, relates the thing a little otherwiſe. He ſays, that Farel, being conſtrained to quit Meaux, went to Gap, and endeavoured to ſet up the Reformation there; which deſign had no ſucceſs, and did but expoſe him to the hatred and ill offices of his countrymen. Thereupon he retired to Baſil, where he publickly defended a theſis; which having expoſed him to great dangers, he retired to Strasburg, where he was received with open arms by Bucer and Capito, and where he preached the truth to the refugees from France, till, in the year 1527, he removed to Montbeliard in order to promote the reformation (3). This laſt aſſertion is very falſe; for we ſhall ſhew preſently, that Farel preached the goſpel in the country of Montbeliard in 1524.

(1) Ancillon, miniſter of Metz before the revocation of the edict of Nantes, and ſince of Berlin. See his life of Farel, publiſhed at Amſterdam, in 1691, pag. 202.

(2) Frederic Spanheim.

(3) Taken out of the oration of Frederic Spanheim, intituled, Geneva reſtituta, pag 39, 40.

at Zurich, from Haller at Berne, and from Oecolampadius at Baſil (i) [B]. Being found very proper to gain proſelytes, he was adviſed to undertake the reformation of Montbeliard; in which enterprize he had very great ſucceſs, through the favour of the duke of Wirtemberg, the lord of that place (k). He abated ſomewhat of his zeal, according to Oecolampadius's advice [C]. He had the like ſucceſs in the year 1528, in [B] He received the hand of fellowſhip . . . . . from Oecolampadius at Baſil.] I add the name of that city to the account of my author, becauſe that omiſſion is illuſory, and ſeems to intimate that Oecolampadius was miniſter of Bern. Theſe are Mr Ancillon's words: 'In 'the year 1524 Zuinglius, the burning and ſhining 'candle at Zurich: Haller, the veſſel of election at 'Bern; Oecolampadius, the lamp of the houſe of 'GOD, embraced Farel (4).' I find in his narrative another omiſſion of more conſequence; for he ſays nothing of a famous diſpute which Farel maintained at Baſil in the year 1524. I know very well that he has mentioned it in another place (5); but beſides that he has not rightly ſet down the time of it (6), he has not mentioned it in the right place, that is, when he related (7) hiſtorically, and according to the order of chronology, all the labours of Farel. Let us therefore ſupply what he has omitted. Farel being arrived at Baſil, in the year 1524, addreſſed himſelf to the faculty of divinity, to whom he declared, he deſired to defend a theſis publickly. The divines of Baſil, particularly Lewis Berus, provoſt of St Peter, refuſed him their permiſſion for it, under pretence that his poſitions were agreeable to the new doctrine. The ſenate having notice of that refuſal, gave leave to Farel to maintain his aſſertions; which Farel cauſed to be poſted up at the gate of the college. The grand vicar, the rector of the univerſity, and the profeſſors, publiſhed a prohibition to be preſent at that diſputation, under pain of excommunication: which the ſenate looking upon as a manifeſt encroachment upon their authority, ordered all divines, curates, and ſcholars, to aſſiſt at that diſputation, upon the forfeiture of the uſe of mills and ovens, and of the liberty of buying their neceſſaries in the market (8). By that means Farel had all the advantage he could have wiſhed, and defended his theſis in the preſence of an infinite number of perſons, both eccleſiaſtics and laics, on the fifteenth of February 1524: but nevertheleſs the popiſh faction was ſo prevalent, that he was ſoon after obliged to quit Baſil (9).

[C] He abated ſomewhat of his zeal, according to Oecolampadius's advice.] Theſe are Mr Ancillon's words: 'Farel, according to the caution given him 'by Oecolampadius, moderated his ardour, managed 'his zeal, and proportioned it to the temper of his 'hearers, whom he drew all to the communion of 'JESUS CHRIST (10).' This relates to Montbeliard. Others ſay, that having ſhewed too much paſſion in thoſe parts, he was adviſed by Oecolampadius to join prudence with zeal in another place, whither he went to preach the goſpel. 'Baſilea exactus in monte Bel'licardi Evangelium Chriſti aliquandiu docuit: poſt & 'in aliis Gallici idiomatis peritis viciniſque locis: tanta 'animi contentione tantoque ardore, ut divinitus illum 'ad munus ejuſmodi excitatum res demonſtraret: 'quanquam alicubi moderationem in eo quidam de'ſiderarint, ut dicemus. Circa annum viceſimum ſep'timum iterum annunciandi verbi locum invenit, in 'quodam oppido, cui Ælin nomen: ubi ut fortiter '& prudenter ageret, Oecolampadius ſubmonuit †. '—— Being obliged to quit Baſil, he preached the 'goſpel for ſome time at Montbeliard, and after that in 'other places which lay near France, whoſe Inhabi'tants ſpoke French, where he behaved himſelf 'with ſuch zeal and reſolution, that he appeared to 'have been commiſſioned by heaven for that purpoſe: 'though ſome, as I ſhall hereafter obſerve, complained 'of his want of moderation. About the year twenty 'ſeven he found another place to preach the goſpel in, 'namely a town named Ælis, where Oecolampadius 'adviſed him to mix prudence with his zeal.' The author, from whom I borrowed this Latin, recites (12) the words which Oecolampadius made uſe of when he exhorted his friend not to be ſo violent. 'Ita Oeco'lampadius alicubi ǂ: Qui hic tibi & evangelio favent, 'ne quid ardore zeli inter initia attentes, timent. De 'quo ſatis monui antè, quàm abires: nunc non item. 'Neque enim excidiſſe animo crediderim, quomodo in'ter nos convenerit: nempe ut quantò propenſior es ad 'violentiam, tantò magis te ad lenitatem exerceas; 'leoninamque magnanimitatem columbina modeſtia fran'gas, Duci, non trahi, volunt homines. Unum ſpecte'mus; quomodo lucrifaciamus animas Chriſto: & quo'modo ipſi doceri vellemus, ſiquidem adhuc teneremur 'in tenebris & captivitate Antichriſti. Vide ut Chri'ſtum etiam vita exprimas, exemplo inquam docendi. 'Et alibi ‡ apertius: Rogavi ex N. ſuper manſuetudine 'tua: qua nihil magis Chriſtianum, nedum Apoſtolum 'decet. Is cum mire extuliſſet ſedulitatem infatiga'bilem, ardoremque inextinguibilem, & ſatis felicem 'ſucceſſum, ſubdidit, quod in ſacrificos imbres effundas 'convitiorum. Non ignoro, quid illi mereantur, & 'quibus coloribus depingi debeant: pace tamen tua 'dixerim, amicus & frater fatri: non videris per om'nia officii tui reminiſci. Evangelizatum, non male'dictum miſſus es. Condono, imo laudo zelum: modo 'ne deſideretur manſuetudo. Da operam, mi frater, ut 'ſpiritum meum exhilares etiam hoc nuncio: quod in 'tempore ſuo vinum & oleum infundas: quod Evange'liſtam, non tyrannicum legiſlatorem præſtes.' —— 'Thus Oecolampadius in one of his letters: Thoſe here 'who wiſh well to you and the goſpel, are under 'ſome apprehenſions leaſt your zeal ſhould, at your 'ſetting out, tranſport you too far; on which head 'I gave you my advice in full before your departure; 'and for that reaſon ſhall be as brief as poſſible. For 'I can by no means imagine you ſhould have forgot 'our agreement: that the more prone you are to paſ'ſion, the more you ſhould compoſe yourſelf to mild'neſs, and temper the lion's courage with the meek'neſs of the dove. Men may be lead, but will not 'be driven by force. Let us have this only in view, 'how to win ſouls to CHRIST, and how we ourſelves 'ſhould chuſe to be inſtructed, if we were ſtill in dark'neſs and ſlaves to Antichriſt. Let your converſation 'and method of doctrine be an imitation of CHRIST. 'And in another of his epiſtles more openly: I enquired 'of N. concerning your meekneſs, than which nothing 'is more becoming to a chriſtian or an apoſtle. He 'wonderfully extolled your unwearied induſtry, your 'boundleſs zeal, and happy ſucceſs, but added that 'you were apt to pour an inundation of the bittereſt 'expreſſions on the prieſts. I am not ignorant what 'they deſerve, and in what colours they ought to be 'expoſed: but give me leave, as a friend, and as a 'brother to a brother, to ſay, you do not ſeem in 'every reſpect to remember your duty: you were ſent 'to preach and not to rail. I excuſe, nay I commend 'your zeal, ſo that it be not without meekneſs. En'deavour, my brother, that this advice may have it's 'deſired effect, and I have reaſon to rejoice that I 'gave it. Pour on wine and oil in due ſeaſon, and 'demean yourſelf as an evangeliſt, and not as tyran'nical legiſlator.'

Here follows an inſtance of his too paſſionate zeal: upon a proceſſion-day Farel wreſted from the hands of a prieſt the image of St Antony, and threw it from the bridge into the river. He would have been knocked down dead, if GOD had not prevented it by ſtriking a panic terror among the populace. It is thus, at leaſt, a miniſter I quote ſaves Farel: 'Cum vero 'Farellus noſter aliquando, publica occaſione gloriæ 'divinæ aſſerendæ oblata, Antonii idolum, magna cum 'pompa per urbem circumgeſtatum, ſacrificulorum 'manibus excuſſum in ſubjectum flumen è ponte 'præcipitaſſet, Pentheus alter haud dubiè futurus erat, 'ni mira Dei providentia furibundæ plebis ora & manus 'injecto terrore panico præter ſpem compeſcuiſſet (13).' Eraſmus very much diſapproved Farel's humour: 'Ha'betis iſthic in propinquo, ſays he, in a letter to the 'official of Beſançon, novum evangeliſtam Pharellum, 'quo nihil vidi unquam mendacius virulentius aut ſedi'tioſius (14). —— You have, in your neighbourhood, a new 'evangeliſt, one Farel, a moſt virulent, defamatory, and 'ſeditious perſon.' He makes a hideous picture of him in another place; but we muſt remember, that he thought himſelf injured in ſome writings of Farel: 'Supereſt Pharellus, bone Chriſte, quam pius, quam 'innocens vir! In quem quid ſcripſerim non referunt.

'Si

(i) Ibid.

(k) Ib. pag. 204.

(4) Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 197, 198.

(5) In the 43d page, where the buſineſs is not to relate the labours of that miniſter in a chronological order.

(6) He has placed it on the 15th of Febr. 1520.

(7) In the 13th chapter, pag. 191, & ſeq.

(8) Secus facturis uſu molendinorum furnorum & mercatus interdicit. Melch. Adam. in Theol. exter. pag. 114.

(9) Taken from Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 113, 114.

(10) Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 204.

(11) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 114.

† In Epiſt. lib. iv.

(12) Id. ibid. pag. 115, 116.

ǂ Lib. iv, Epiſt. pag. 916.

‡ Lib. iv, Epiſt. pag. 956.

(13) Fredericus Spanhemius, in Geneva reſtituta, pag. 40, 41.

(14) Eraſm. Epiſt. xxx, lib. xviii, pag. 791. It is dated the 29th of Decemb. 1524. From whence it appears that Farel went that year into the country of Montbeliard. See alſo the 14th letter of the 30th book; but correct the date of it, putting 1525, inſtead of 1515.

in the town of Aigle, and ſoon after in the bailiwic of Morat (l) [D]. He went afterwards to Neufchatel, in the year 1529, and there combated the Romiſh party with ſo much vigour and efficacy, that this city eſtabliſhed the reformed religion the fourth of November, 1530 (m). He was (n) deputed to the ſynod of the Vaudois, in the valley of Angrogne, and came afterwards to Geneva, where he diſputed againſt Popery; but the great vicar, and other eccleſiaſtics, oppoſed him with ſo much violence, that he was forced to retreat from thence. He was recalled thither in the year 1534, by the inhabitants, who had renounced the Romiſh church, and was the principal inſtrument of the entire ſuppreſſion of Popery, which happened in that city the next year. He was baniſhed from thence, with Calvin, in the year 1538 (o), and retired to Baſil, and afterwards to Neufchatel (p), where he exerciſed his miniſtry till 1542; at which time he went to Mentz (q), where there was a hopeful appearance of a ſpiritual harveſt.

Si nunc eſt converſus ad meliorem frugem, gratulor homini. Qualis olim erat, mihi valde diſplicuit, ſeditioſus, acidæ linguæ, & vaniſſimus. Sic rem geſſit in monte Pellicardi ut bis inde profugerit. Baſilienſis ſenatus, quum cuperet civitatem eſſe tutam à ſeditione, juſſit Pharellum ire exulatum. Oecolampadius cujus menſâ tum utebatur non ſemel objurgavit hominem, quòd obtrectandi nullum faceret finem, teſtatus ſe non poſſe ferre in convivio tam amarulentas obtrectationes. Id mihi narravit qui in eadem menſa accumbebat, vir integritatis rariſſimæ. Appellarat me Balaam, hac de cauſa cum illo expoſtulanti, nihil certi reſpondit, ſed ſic elapſus eſt, ut diceret negotiatorem quendam Dupletum hoc dixiſſe, is enim jam abierat; & fieri poteſt ut dixerit, ſed à Pharello doctus. De colloquio noſtro ſcripſit epiſtolam ad fratres Conſtantiam, in qua ſæpe in decem verſibus non erat unum verbum verum. Omitto jam leviora. Talem expertus, ſi talem depinxi, nihil mirum. Nunc qualis ſit neſcio (15). —— There remains ſtill one Farel, O heavens, how religious and innocent a perſon is he! They do not ſay what I have wrote againſt him. I ſhould be well pleaſed to hear of his reformation. As he was formerly I could by no means admire him, conceited, virulent, and ſeditious. He behaved himſelf at Montbeliard in ſuch a manner that he was twice obliged to quit the town. The magiſtrates of Baſil, to prevent ſedition, expelled him the city. Oecolampadius, at whoſe table he was then fed, more than once reprimanded him for his endleſs inſolence, declaring he could no longer bear ſuch ill manners in his company. This I know from a perſon of uncommon integrity, who ſat with him. He had called me Balaam. When I expoſtulated with him on this head, inſtead of giving an anſwer he had recourſe to a mean ſubterfuge, and ſaid he had it from one Duplet, a correſpondent of his, who was dead. It is poſſible he might have ſaid it, but he had it from Farel. He wrote an epiſtle concerning our conference, in ſeveral parts of which there was not one word of truth for ten ſentences together. I paſs over things of leſs moment. It is no wonder I ſhould repreſent him ſuch as I found him. What he may be now, I know not.' Since Eraſmus was perſonally offended, we are not obliged to believe, that he has here drawn Farel's character to the life: but, however, we may reſt perſuaded, that our Farel was one of thoſe who have more need of the bridle than the ſpur. The natural temper is almoſt always the firſt and principal ſpring, even in perſons who are God's inſtruments. Some pretend, that it was neceſſary for Luther, Calvin, Farel, and ſome others, to be hot, paſſionate, and violent; elſe, ſay they, they could not have overcome all oppoſition. The church was then in the ſame circumſtances, as when Jesus Christ ſaid, The kingdom of heaven ſuffers violence, and the violent take it by force (16). See Mr Claude's thought, in remark [T], of the article LUTHER.

[D] He ſucceeded . . . . . in the town of Aigle, and ſoon after in the bailiwic of Morat.] According to Mr Ancillon, he did not go to Neufchatel till after he had reformed the town of Aigle and the bailiwic of Morat; but Mr Spanheim, the father, makes him go from Montbeliard to Neufchatel, and then to Aigle, &c. His narrative is curious enough, to deſerve being cited at length: the reader will find in it the undauntedneſs of the reformer, and with what vigour he ſurmounted the oppoſition of the prieſts, who cauſed the bells to be rung to drown his voice: they alſo practiſed the wile of which Ulyſſes made uſe, to prevent the ill effects of the ſyrens ſongs; that is, they ſtopped their ears with flakes of ſilk. This is what they oppoſed to Farel's thundering eloquence; tho' at laſt they hearkened to reaſon, and heard him favourably. 'Inde, that is, from Montbeliard, Neocomum delatus Farellus, ſed & ibi duriter habitus Aquileiam Bernatum oppidum Valeſiis conterminum incolere cœpit, & ludum aperire erudiendæ juventuti in ſpeciem, revera docendæ veritati. Turbatum hic etiam à ſacrificulis, & Farello quærenda ſedes alia. Delecta Moratum, Helveticæ gentis fortitudine & victoria nobile municipium. Sed nec ibi Farello noſtro quies. Extruſus itaque in agrum Biellenſem divina providentia totum illum tractum ingenti ſucceſſu Evangelii prædicatione implevit, eumque inter ludibria, verbera, & contumelias innumeras, Diaboli & Cleri ingratiis, Chriſto vindicavit. Acceſſêre mox Orba & Granſonium, quicquid fremeret Satan, quicquid ſacrificuli in Farelli & evangelii perniciem molirentur. Imperterritus hominis animus omnes in ſtuporem dabat, cùm viderent animum ſimul ac vocem illi ad ſtrictos enſes conſtare, adeò quidem, ut & illi ex clero, qui continuo campanarum clangore, & aura bombycina lanugine oppleta, conciones ejus eludere diu ſategerant, poſtmodùm patulas aures & faventes animos ad Farelli auditorium adferrent (17). —— From thence, namely, from Montbeliard, Farel came to Neufchatel, but meeting there with a rough reception, he removed to Aigle, a town of the canton of Bern, bordering on the Valois, and opened a ſchool, under a pretence of inſtructing the youth, but in reality to teach the goſpel. But here he was moleſted by the prieſts, and obliged to move his quarters. He choſe Morat, a town famous for the battle won there by the bravery of the Swiſſes. But neither could Farel there be at quiet; being driven therefore to the diſtrict of Biel, by the providence of GOD he entirely converted it, and notwithſtanding the difficulties he met with, and the ſeverities which were practiſed to deter him, he baffled all the arts of the devil, and the prieſts, and eſtabliſhed the reformed religion. Orbe and Granſon ſoon followed. Farel's undaunted courage deſpiſed the roarings of ſatan, and the attempts of the prieſts. At laſt when they ſaw his heroic ſoul was proof even againſt drawn ſwords, terror and amazement ſeized them to that degree, that the very clergy, who by continual ringing of bells, and ſtopping their ears with ſilk, had endeavoured to fruſtrate his preaching, came afterwards to hear him, with open ears, and more favourable ſentiments.' You do not find Lauſanne in this catalogue of the towns wherein Farel planted the reformation; though he planted it at Lauſanne alſo, if we may believe Theodore Beza (18), and the inſcription of his picture. Note, I beſeech you, that, during the firſt ſermon he preached at Metz, the Dominicans had recourſe to their bells, as a ſovereign remedy; but their peals were not able to interrupt the zealous preacher. He contended with the bells who ſhould beſt be heard, nor did he ſuffer himſelf to be overcome. 'Primam concionem in cœmeterio Dominicanorum habuit. Qui cùm aliud non poſſent, campani æris impulſu impedire concionem conati ſunt. Ibi tum Farellus contra ad ravim uſque vocem intendit: nec vinci ſe à ſtrepitu ullo paſſus eſt (19). —— He preached his firſt ſermon in the church-yard of the Dominicans, where, when all other attempts had proved ineffectual, they endeavoured to hinder him from proceeding by ringing of bells. Then Farel ſtrained his voice, till he was hoarſe, being reſolved to vanquiſh.' His voice was like thunder; and it may be applied to him what Frederic Spanheim has ſaid of a monk who preached againſt Lutheraniſm. 'Dominicanæ familiæ Monachus, qui pro concione in Palatii cœnobio ſtentoreâ declamatione Cornua quæ vin-

catque

(l) Ibid. pag. 206, 207.

(m) Ibid. pag. 207, 209.

(n) Spanheim. in Geneva reſtituta. pag. 42, 43.

(o) Beza, in vitâ Calvini.

(p) Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 170.

(q) Ancillon, pag. 210.

(15) Eraſm. in epiſtola ad fratres Germaniæ inferioris, pag. 2128, 2129. It is the 59th of the 31ſt book, and was written in 1530. I have corrected ſome faults in the London edition. Compare what I ſhall quote from Eraſmus in the remark [L].

(16) Matth xi, 12.

(17) Spanheim. ubi ſupra, pag. 41, 42.

(18) Beza, in Iconibus.

(19) Melch. Adam. ubi ſupra, pag. 114. See a letter from Bucer to Calvin. It is the 37th among thoſe of Calvin, dated Octob. 6, 1541; which date does not agree with Theod. Beza's Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. xvi, p. 433, who places Farel's journey in 1542.

harveſt. Some months before, he had received a great affront at Neufchatel, for which he had ſuch ſatisfaction made him [E], that it cannot be ſaid he was forced to go to Metz. He had a thouſand difficulties to ſtruggle with in that new-born church, and was forced to retire, with the faithful, into the abbey of Gorze (r) [F], where the count of Furſtemberg ſheltered them under his protection; but they could not be ſecure there; they were beſieged, and forced, at laſt, to ſurrender upon terms (ſ). Farel happily made his eſcape [G], and endeavoured to procure their reſtoration by the means of the proteſtant princes, and ſtates of Germany (t). He went and reſumed his ancient poſt of miniſter of Neufchatel, from whence ſometimes he took a journey to Geneva. In the journey he made thither, in the year 1553, he was informed that he was very odious to ſome perſons in that City [H]. He aſſiſted then at the execution of

(r) Ib. pag. 211.

(ſ) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſiaſt. lib. xvi, pag. 434.

(t) Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 99, 100.

'catque tubas, in Lutheranum nomen invehebatur, à Petro Roberto Olivetano . . . . publicè increpitus & correptus (20). ——— A monk of the Dominican order, who in his ſermon in the Palatine monaſtery, declaimed moſt furiouſly againſt Luther, in a tone that would have drowned the trumpet and the clarion, was ſharply and publickly reprimanded by Peter Robert Olivetanus.'

(20) Spanheim. ubi ſupra, p. 56.

[E] He received a great affront at Neufchatel, for which he had ſatisfaction made him.] 'Farel having made it his buſineſs to eſtabliſh order and decency in the church of Neufchatel, was conſtantly employed in reforming manners, correcting abuſes, removing ſcandals, and oppoſing vice with all his might. This ſtrictneſs, in cauſing diſcipline to be obſerved, rendered him odious, and even inſupportable to the vicious and libertines. It happening one day, that a woman of noble extraction went away from her huſband, Farel exhorted her not to put aſunder what God had joined together, and alledged other powerful reaſons to bring her back to her duty. But that woman refuſing to hearken either to private admonitions, or the remonſtrances of the conſiſtory, or even the ſollicitations of the magiſtrates of Neufchatel, Farel thought himſelf obliged to blame and condemn that diſobedience in another manner, and that from the pulpit he ought to remove that ſcandal: Therefore upon a Sunday morning, being the laſt day of July, he ſpoke with his uſual heat, both againſt that contumacious woman, and againſt thoſe who encouraged her in her perverſe humour. The perſons who intereſted themſelves for the guilty lady, took his public reprehenſion very ill, and that very day formed a party againſt Farel, and prevailed ſo far with the people, that they got together, at two of the clock in the afternoon, in the field near the church and the caſtle, to conſult what they ſhould do with Farel. The people were divided; ſome being for Farel, ſome againſt him: But at laſt it was carried by the majority, that in two months he ſhould quit Neufchatel. The prudence of the governour, and of the council of ſtate, as they call it, was ſuch, as prevented any ſedition, or effuſion of blood. Farel having no other motive or aim but the glory of God, and the honour of his church, was neither ſurprized at, nor ſhaken by that popular emotion, but continued the exerciſe of his office without any remiſſneſs. The magnificent lords of Bern were no ſooner informed of the tumult raiſed by the friends of that lady, than they wrote about it to the governour and council of Neufchatel, that they might prevent the miſchief, and ſtifle it in it's birth. This letter they ſent by two eminent members of their council, who being arrived at Neufchatel, remonſtrated both to the four miniſters, to the council, and to the burghers, the great wrong they did to Farel; and how ill they acknowledged the great ſervices he had done, and the graces of God which had made him the inſtrument towards them. Whereupon the twenty eighth of November the council made a decree, ordaining, that all miſunderſtandings ſhould be removed, all factions ſtifled, all jealouſies terminated, and all feuds extinguiſhed: that Farel ſhould continue the exerciſe of his function, as being blameleſs both in his doctrine and morals, and one to whom the church was very much beholden: that whoever ſhould ſpeak againſt Farel, ſhould pay a great fine; Farel being truly the bulwark and ornament of Neufchatel, by his piety, probity, and capacity. The fourth of January, 1542, according to the advice of the lords of Bern, by the majority of votes of the burghers of Neufchatel, Farel was continued, to the great comfort of all good men, and confuſion of his enemies, whoſe mouths were ſtopped, and their hands and feet tied; whereas Farel with new vigour thundered more fiercely than ever againſt the depravation of manners (21).' We muſt obſerve, that this miniſter maintained with ſo much zeal and vigour the ſeverity of church-diſcipline, that he ſubjected to public penance thoſe ſinners that had given ſcandal. Here follows the ſubſtance of a letter written to the claſs of Neufchatel, by the miniſters of Baſil, the twenty eighth of July, 1554. 'They ſay, they commend the zeal of Farel, who made it his buſineſs to cauſe the church-diſcipline to be religiouſly obſerved, vice ſuppreſſed, and the ſacraments devoutly received: adding, that they approved Farel's opinion, that thoſe, who by their open ſinning gave offence to the church, ſhould make a ſolemn confeſſion of their faults, give a public teſtimony of their repentance, and by an extraordinary humiliation make reparation for the ſcandal they had given (22).'

(21) Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 176, & ſeq.

(22) Id. ibid. pag. 153.

[F] He was forced . . . . . to retire into the abbey of Gorze.] The women were like to have pulled him to pieces, if we believe Mr Madaure (§ α). 'He accuſes him of having confidently affirmed, that it is falſe that the virgin Mary remained a virgin after ſhe was brought-to-bed (23): the women of Gorze, adds he, aſtoniſhed at that blaſphemy and impudence, ruſhed upon him with their nails, and plucked off his hair and beard; and worried him in ſuch a manner, that he could never have eſcaped from their hands with his life, if captain Henry Frank had not reſcued him.' Mr Ancillon ſhews that this is but a fable.

(23) Madaure, in the book intituled, La naiſſance & la decadence de l'hereſie à Metz, apud Ancillon. ubi ſupra, pag. 66.

[(§ α) Mr Bayle is miſtaken in this and the following remark, by taking the name of a city, of which the perſon he means was titular biſhop, for the name of a man. This man was called Martin Meurisse: he was a Franciſcan, biſhop of Madaur, ſuffragan, and adminiſtrator of the biſhopric of Metz. Theſe are the titles he takes at the head of his works, and particularly at the head of that which is here quoted by Mr Bayle, which is intituled Hiſtoire de la Naiſſance, du Progrès, & de la Décadence de l'Héréſie dans la Ville de Metz & Païs Meſſin: a title which ſeems to have been copied from that of the hiſtory of Florimond of Remond. Probably what deceived Mr Bayle was the manner of Mr Ancillon's quoting this author in the life of Farel: he commonly calls him the Sieur de Madaur †; and that expreſſion is as inaccurate, as if one quoted Coeffeteau by the name of Sieur de Dardanie or de Marſeille, or cardinal du Perron by the name of Sieur d'Ereux or de Sens. Meuriſſe's book, which occaſioned this note, was printed at Metz, by J. Antoine, in 1642, in 4to. His other works may be ſeen in Waddingi Scriptores Ord. Minorum, and in the Bibliotheca Telleriana, page 115, 192, and 294. Rem. Crit.]

† See the Mêlange Critiq. of Mr Ancillon, Tom. II, pag. 271.

[G] Farel happily made his eſcape.] Theodore Beza having related (24), that this abbey was beſieged, and at laſt ſurrendered upon articles, adds, and though a ſtrict enquiry was made after Farel, yet he eſcaped their hands, having been put in a waggon among the lepers. Mr Madaure pretends, that Farel was ſaved by being put in a waggon full of lepers, having his face daubed with meal, with a lazar's clicket in his hands (25). But Mr Ancillon has anſwered, that his being daubed with meal, and the clicket, are both of Mr Madaure's invention. He grounds himſelf on Theodore Beza's ſilence, which ground is not very ſolid; for Beza's buſineſs was not to relate the circumſtances, but only the material part of that adventure.

(24) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. xvi, pag. 434.

(25) Madaure, ubi ſupra, apud. Ancillon. pag. 95.

[H] He was very odious to ſome perſons at Geneva.] They indicted him as a criminal, and he was obliged of Servetus (u). He took another journey to Geneva, in the year 1564 (x); to take his laſt leave of Calvin, who lay dangerouſly ill. He married at ſixty nine years of age [I]. He went a ſecond time to Metz, in 1565, being invited by his old flock to

to

to appear before the judges; for the ſenate of Geneva wrote to the magiſtrates of Neufchatel, to deſire them to order that the accuſed perſon might come to anſwer to the charge that was brought againſt him. As ſoon as the ſenate had notice that Farel was arrived, they let Calvin know that he ſhould not be ſuffered to aſcend the pulpit. Calvin does not acquaint us with the ſequel of this affair, but contents himſelf to ſay, that he wiſhed he could with his own blood wipe off the diſgrace thoſe of Geneva had caſt upon themſelves by that ungrateful proceeding. Here is the whole paſſage: 'Nunc ad ſummum pervenit nequitia, ut omni pudore excuſſo, templum Domini in lupanar convertere obſtinate cupiant. Atque ut ſciatis, quam fœda ſit deformitas, cum hic nuper eſſet frater noſter Farellus, cui ſe totos debent, ut ſatis noſtis, & pro jure ſuo eos libere moneret, tantus in eum furor exarſit, ut capitale judicium in eum intentare non ſint veriti. Scio equidem non debere novum videri, ſi reperiantur in urbe libera factioſi homines, qui turbas concitent. Sed deploranda eſt Senatus noſtri cæcitas, quod libertatis ſuæ patrem, & patrem hujus Eccleſiæ ſibi reum cauſſæ capitalis mitti a Neocomenſibus popoſcit. Dedecus hujus urbis proferre cogor, quod ſanguine meo delere cuperem. Venit Farellus: antequam urbem ingreſſus eſſet, denuntiavit domi meæ Apparitor Senatus, ne ſuggeſtum conſcenderet. Reliqua non perſequor: quia ſatis eſt ejus ingratitudinis guſtum dediſſe, quæ bonis omnibus, & ingenuis merito ſtomachum movebit. Sed quoniam me complures cauſæ impediunt, ne mala noſtra aperte deplorem, ſic breviter habete, niſi per vos cohibeatur ſatan, habenas ei laxatum iri (26). —— Vice has now reached it's meridian, and men, devoid of all ſhame, obſtinately endeavour to convert the temple of the Lord into a brothel-houſe. That ye may have a juſt idea of this monſtrous baſeneſs, know then, that our fellow-labourer, Farel, one, to whom they owe even themſelves, as ye are not ignorant, being here lately, and agreeably to his character, taking the freedom to admoniſh them without reſerve, their fury againſt him was kindled to that degree, that they ſcrupled not to proſecute him for capital offences. I allow, it ought not to ſeem ſtrange, if in a free city there ſhould be perſons that delight in faction, and raiſing tumults. But the blindneſs of our ſenate is ſurprizing, in demanding the inhabitants of Neufchatel to deliver up the father of their liberty, and father of this church as guilty of a capital crime. I am obliged to proclaim the diſhonour of this city, which I could wiſh to wipe away with my blood. Farel came; before he entered the city, the marſhal of the court delivered orders at my houſe not to permit him to mount the pulpit. I ſhall proceed no farther; let it ſuffice to give you a taſte of their ingratitude, which will raiſe a juſt averſion in all men of probity and honour. But becauſe I have many reaſons which hinder me from publickly deploring our calamity, take it briefly thus. Unleſs ſatan be chained up by you, he muſt be let looſe.'

[I] He married, being ſixty nine years old.] 'It appears by a writing under Farel's hand, that he married a maid advanced in years, named Mary, the daughter of Alexander Torel, of the city of Roan; that that maid having retired to Neufchatel, upon the account of religion, had been brought up in the diſcipline of the Lord by her mother, who was a true widow, and who feared and ſerved God: that this maid was wiſe and virtuous, and her life and converſation regular and edifying. The bans of marriage between Farel and Mary Torel are found written with great plainneſs by Farel's own hand. They were publiſhed the eleventh and twenty firſt of September, and the ſecond of October, 1558 (27).' Let us ſee how Mr Ancillon juſtifies that marriage (28): 'Farel did not marry till he was ſixty nine years old, and, as his friends ſaid, till he had already one foot in the grave. Farel's friends thought his marriage very ſtrange, and unſeaſonable; but nevertheleſs he convinced them of the reaſons he had to ingage in a conjugal ſociety in an age ſo very much advanced. The general opinion has hitherto been, that Farel was prompted to marry by a ſecret inſpiration and extraordinary impulſe. Whatever it be, it is well known, that, by marrying, he meant to provide for the infirmities of old age by the means God himſelf has ordained, and taking a help to piety to entertain himſelf in it; a help to civil ſociety, that it might not grow tedious to him; a help to husbandry, to eaſe himſelf of the cares of this life; and laſtly, a help for infirmity, to poſſeſs his own veſſel in ſanctification and honour. It is well known that Farel married to ſhew, that, contrary to the opinion of thoſe of the Romiſh church, celibacy is neither meritorious nor ſatisfactory; and to juſtify, that the gift of perpetual continence is neither given to all, nor for ever *.' The end of this apology will ſurprize all ſuperficial wits, and many others alſo; for they will not eaſily conceive how the gift of continence, preſerved till the age of fixty nine years, can diſappear and vaniſh on the ſudden. The moſt ſenſual and laſcivious do generally loſe at that age, and even before, their incontinence; and even thoſe who have not abuſed the exceſſive heat of their conſtitution, find their ſtrength exhauſted before they reach the ſixty ninth year of their age; and here is a man who begins then to be incontinent. The thing is undoubtedly very ſingular, but nevertheleſs let us not look upon it as a fable. Let us conſider, that the impreſſion of ſome objects upon our brain are independent upon our ſoul. It is not becauſe we would have it ſo, that certain objects pleaſe us; but becauſe they move, in a certain manner, the fibres of our brain; and open ſome valves that were ſhut. This alteration produces others, almoſt ad infinitum, in our machine; and from thence ſpring deſires, and prelibations of pleaſure, and an hundred other innovations, which deſtroy continence. Thus Mary Torel altered the courſe of animal ſpirits in that good old man: ſhe pleaſed him; ſhe had that proportion of the object to the faculty which excites ſentiments of love, &c. And that was enough. Do not tell me, that maid was not young, ſhe is not repreſented as handſome: No matter for that. The proportion here in queſtion, that great ſpring, that great mover, neither conſiſts in youth, nor in beauty: It is ſomething, I know not what, which lies in ſome inſenſible particles, whoſe efficacy we feel without being acquainted with the manner of their acting (29). There is many a man, who for twenty years has converſed with an infinite number of women, without having a mind to marry: the ſame man will meet by chance, either in a boat, at a feaſt, or viſit, a woman, with whoſe beauty he ſhall be ſo ſmitten, that he will be ready to marry her inſtantly. She is, perhaps, neither ſo young nor ſo handſome as thoſe that could not pleaſe him; and, on the other hand, ſhe has converſed with men more ſuſceptible of love than he, without wounding their hearts. The proportion of the object to the faculty was wanting; which being found in this particular caſe, a match is ſoon concluded. It may alſo be affirmed, that a man advanced in years, who, after a long train of reaſonings, concludes that he ought to renounce celibacy, does thereby diſpoſe himſelf to incontinence: he grows eaſy to be ſtruck in that part of the brain which ſtirs up love; the object which ſtrikes him in that place pleaſes and charms him, he continually thinks upon it, he has a mind to enjoy it. This robs him of that fine gift of continence which nature had given him; he finds himſelf in a burning condition, and ſo marries, according to St Paul's advice. Therefore there is nothing improbable in the apology I have made for the marriage of our old man; and we rather find in it a remarkable inſtance, to prove, that there is nothing more raſh than the vow of celibacy. The gift of continence is not a thing on which a man may depend. He has, you will ſay, been proof againſt a thouſand moſt lovely objects for a great many years: well, does it follow that he will be ſo eternally? Can you anſwer that at laſt you will not ſee ſome other object better proportioned to the fibres of your brain? Love comes as a thief in the night, when you leaſt expect him. Keep therefore your liberty always; poſſeſs your gift as not poſſeſſing it; think that you may loſe it, and that you will loſe it, perhaps, when you leaſt

(u) Ib. pag. 228.

(x) Melch. Adam. in vitis Theolog. exter. pag. 115.

(26) Calvinus, Epiſtola ad Tigurinos Miniſtros. It is the 16th, dated from Geneva the 26th of Novemb. 1553.

* Chryſoſt. Hom. 47, upon St Matthew.

(27) Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 242, 243.

(28) Id. ibid. pag. 240, 241.

(29) See the Nouvelles Lettres contre le Calviniſme de Maimbourg, pag. 557.

to come and reap the fruit of the ſeed he had ſown in their hearts (y). The next day after his arrival (z), he preached in the church of the retrenchment. He was not then ſo old as it is reported [K]. He returned to Neufchatel, and died there the thirteenth of September, the ſame year (aa). He left a ſon who was but a year old, and who died three years after (bb). Though his talent lay rather in preaching, than writing books, yet he commenced author [L]. Let us not forget that he laid the foundation of think on it: It is but meeting a perſon who may create love in you. This will be the ſpunge of your continence. .

Yet, after all, it is ſomewhat ſurprizing that our Farel remained a bachelor to his old age. One would think, that his conſtitution, which was ſo briſk and vigorous, that at the age of ſeventy five years (30) he got a ſon, tho' his wiſe was then old, ſhould have induced him to marry before. The efficacious eloquence, with which he oppoſed the validity of monaſtical vows, required no leſs his marriage; ſince at that time, to avoid being ſuſpected of heterodoxy, a man was obliged to preach by example (31). Eraſmus, ſpeaking of the progreſs which the reformers made, ſays, among other things, that many friars and nuns married. He had ſaid, but juſt before, that Farel preached in the country of Montbeliard: ‘In montem Bellicardi vocatus eſt Pharellus ad prædicandum Evangelium hoc novum, cujus hic mirus eſt ſucceſſus. Jam multi repudiârunt Baptiſmum, & revocârunt Circumciſionem. Miſſam abominantur plurimi: ſunt qui publicè doceant in Euchariſtia nihil eſſe niſi panem & vinum: Velum & Cuculla deponitur paſſim. Nubunt & ducunt uxores monachæ & monachi (32). —— Farel was called to Montbeliard to preach this new goſpel, the ſucceſs of which is ſurprizing here. Multitudes have now renounced baptiſm, and recalled circumciſion. Great numbers abhor the maſs; there are ſome who publickly teach that there is nothing in the euchariſt but bread and wine. The veil and the cowl are diſcarded by many. Monks and nuns marry, and are given in marriage.’ Mr Maimburg obſerves, that Farel's ſermon to the nuns of Geneva was full of exhortations to marriage. ‘The ſiſters of St Clare, who were the only nuns of Geneva, were obliged to go from thence, tho' no violence was offered to thoſe holy virgins, ſave only, that the moſt prevailing arguments were uſed to perſuade them to quit their veils, and to accept of ſuch as offered to marry them: and they were compelled to hear a tedious and ridiculous ſermon, which the miniſter Farel preached in their monaſtery, in the preſence of their ſyndics, on this text of the goſpel, Exurgens Maria abiit in Montana, to prove to them, that, in imitation of the virgin Mary, who went to viſit her couſin Elizabeth on the mountains of Judæa, they ought not to be recluſe, and were obliged to live in the world, and to marry like other people (33).’ I ſhall ſay, by the way, that thoſe who think that the reformed miniſters laboured too much at that time, to ſhew the excellence of marriage, and to thunder againſt vows of continence, do not conſider the circumſtances of the time. It muſt be remembered, that the celibacy of prieſts had been for ſome ages an unexhauſted ſource of ſcandalous impurities which diſhonoured the chriſtian name. It was therefore neceſſary to put the ax to the root of the tree, and to drain that ſource by the abolition of vows. It was neceſſary manfully to confute that pernicious tenet, that a whoring prieſt committed a leſs ſin than a prieſt that married. That tenet is a neceſſary conſequence of the law of celibacy: for, according to the principles of the Romaniſts, a clerk, who marries after the vows of continence, engages himſelf by oath to violate all his life-time an inviolable law; and therefore he is more guilty than if he ſhould fall ſometimes into the ſin of fornication. This is but a tranſient fault, and does not hinder him from acknowledging his fall, and repenting of it, or from returning to the obſervation of his vow; but if he marries, he runs himſelf into the neceſſity of violating it without remorſe, and without return. It was therefore neceſſary vigorouſly to preach up the honeſty and dignity of marriage, and againſt the audaciouſneſs of thoſe who diſparaged it ſo far as to prefer fornication to it. Beſides, it was to be feared, that if the prieſts and monks who renounced popery ſhould abſtain from marriage, the ſame impurities might ſoon creep into the reformed church, which had expoſed the Romiſh clergy to the deteſtation and contempt of honeſt men. In order therefore, to prevent that great diſorder, it was neceſſary to encourage thoſe gentlemen to marry, in caſe they wanted encouragement; and ſo the moſt eminent men were obliged to ſhew them the way, and ſerved for an example. We muſt do the great men of the primitive church the juſtice to own, that they were led by excellent motives to recommend celibacy; for nothing is more proper to make the goſpel ſpread and fructify, than the belief, that thoſe who preach it have mortified their fleſh, and debar themſelves even of thoſe pleaſures which worldly men may enjoy without ſin. They conſidered that marriage was attended with a thouſand earthly and ſenſual cares, which made too much diverſion from the ſacerdotal functions; and, in ſhort, being dazzled by the fair outſides of celibacy, they went ſo far, at laſt, as to turn it into a law. But it may be ſaid, that the promoters of ſuch a law had not ſufficiently ſtudied human nature; for if they had been thoroughly acquainted with it, they would never have impoſed ſo heavy a yoke on the necks of the miniſters of the altar. Every one of them ought to have ſaid to the other, we go no deeper than the bark; the ſhining ſuperficies deceives us.

Maxima pars vatum, pater & juvenes patre digni,
Decipimur ſpecie recti (34).

Moſt poets fall into the groſſeſt faults,
Deluded by a ſeeming excellence.

ROSCOMMON.

If they had foreſeen the conſequences of that law, they would, in all probability, have looked upon their fine notions as a ſnare of the tempter.

Note, that Florimond de Remond affirms, that Farel had had a former wife, when he married ſo old. Theſe are his words: ‘Farel having quitted his place to him, to make himſelf miniſter at Neufchatel, where at a decrepit age of ſeventy years, having the ſtone and gout, (the uſual lot of old age) he married again with the daughter of his houſe-keeper, full of luſt, like an old ſtag; lamenting in vain his youthful vigour, more idle and unprofitable in her arms than among his books (35).’

[K] He was not at that time ſo old as it is reported.] Beza affirms that Farel went to Metz in the year 1565, notwithſtanding his extream old age, which was above fourſcore years (36). But he has better ſet down Farel's age in another book (37), where he allows him only ſeventy ſix years. Mr Ancillon ſhould not have copied this miſtake of Theodore Beza, ſince he had placed the birth of Farel in the year 1489 (38). Thus you ſee how authors forget in one place of the ſame book what they have ſaid in another. God, ſays he (39), put it into the heart of Farel, who was then above eighty years old, to take a journey to Metz . . . . . . where he arrived the twelfth of May, 1565.

[L] He commenced Author.] He publiſhed in Latin an account of a diſputation he maintained at Bern in the year 1528 (40). Mr Ancillon does not ſpeak of it, but only of the ſubſtance and brief declaration, neceſſary for all chriſtians, printed in the year 1552; and of the book of the bleſſed ſacrament of the Lord, and of his teſtament, printed in the year 1553 (41); and of another book, intituled, the ſword of the ſpirit (42), printed at Geneva in 1550, and levelled againſt libertines. Eraſmus mentions ſome anonymous writings of Farel in theſe words (43): ‘Cum Phallico fuit mihi congreſſiuncula perbrevis. Ejus hiſtoriam ſcripſit cuidam Conſtantienſi. Exemplum clàm ad me perlatum eſt. Nihil vidi vanius, nihil glorioſius, nihil virulentius. Sunt ibì interdum decem verſus in quibus nè ſyllaba quidem vera eſt. Idem edidit libellum de Pariſienſibus & Pontifice. Quantum illic inſicetiarum, quantum ineptæ virulentiæ, quàm mul‘ ti

WHY the miniſters in the beginning of the reformation inſiſted on the neceſſity of marriage.

(y) Ancillon, ibid. pag. 263.

(z) That is the 13th of May.

(aa) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra,

(bb) Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 272.

(30) He lived 76 years, and left a ſon who was but a year old. See Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 272.

(31) See the article BUCER, remark [E].

(32) Eraſmus, Epiſt. xiv, lib. xxx, pag. 1907. It is dated from Baſil, the 10th of February, 1515, but it ſhould be 1525.

(33) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Calviniſme, lib. i, pag. m. 48.

(34) Horat. de Arte Poët. ver. 24.

(35) Flor. de Remond. Hiſt. de l'Héréſie, lib. vii, cap. xviii, pag. m. 929.

(36) Beza, ubi ſupra, lib. xvi, pag. 456.

(37) Beza, in Iconibus.

(38) Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 1.

(39) Id. ibid. pag. 263.

(40) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra, pag. 116.

(41) Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 44.

(42) Id. pag. 212.

(43) Eraſm. Epiſt. cxiii, lib. xix, pag. 951. It is dated the 6th of Septemb. 1524.

of the church of Grenoble, during a journey he took to Gap (cc). By marking the miſtakes of Moreri, we ſhall ſhew the errors of ſome other writers [M]. Note, That ti nominatim traducti? & tamen ipſe ſolus non apponit nomen ſuum. Idem ut audio auxit ſtolidum Alberi judicium, quod nondum videre licuit. Viſi ſunt Conſtantiæ & alii duo libelli quos in me ſcripſit. Et profitetur novum dogma, ſic traducendos qui obſiſtunt Evangelio, inter quos me numerat, & Balaam paſſim appellat. ——— I have had a ſhort rencounter with Farel: he wrote his life to a correſpondent at Conſtance: a copy was privately conveyed to me. I never ſaw any thing more vain, or virulent. There are ſometimes ten ſentences together without one ſyllable of truth. He publiſhed a treatiſe de Pariſienſibus & Pontifice. What a heap of unmeaning traſh, and inſipid malice is there. How many has he expreſsly traduced? He does not however put his name to it. He has, as I am informed, enlarged Alber's fooliſh judgment which I have not yet had an opportunity to ſee. Two other pamphlets have appeared at Conſtance which he wrote againſt me. He has therein broached a new doctrine, that all ſhould be uſed after the ſame baſe manner, who oppoſe the goſpel, of which number he makes me to be one, and often compliments me with the name of Balaam.’

[M] By marking the miſtakes of Moreri, we ſhall ſhew the errors of ſome other writers.] I. Moreri ſays, that by Farel's means hereſy made alſo the greateſt progreſs in Dauphiné. He is miſtaken; for all the ſhare Farel had in the converſion of that province, is contained in theſe words of Beza (44): ‘It happened in the mean time, that William Farel going from his church of Neufchatel in Swiſſerland to Gap, his native place, and paſſing through Grenoble, he made a lively and ardent exhortation; he being a man full of zeal for God beyond any in our days, and having diſpoſed them to do well, he left there, for their miniſter, Aynard Pichon, to encourage them.’ II. Farel, I confeſs, was miniſter at Neufchatel after he went from Geneva; but before he had been miniſter at Geneva, he had exerciſed the ſame office at Neufchatel; and conſequently Moreri has not followed chronology. III. He falls into the like error, when he ſays, that this miniſter, having been ſomewhat hardly uſed by thoſe of Geneva, taught his doctrine afterwards at Metz, Montbelliard, Lauſanne, and elſewhere. After his baniſhment from Geneva, he only taught it at Neufchatel and Metz. His firſt feats at arms, if I may ſo ſpeak, was the reformation of Montbelliard; and what he did at Lauſanne preceded his miniſtry at Geneva. IV. He ſhould not have quoted the annals of Sleidan; for the hiſtory of that author is not ſo called. V. According to Moreri, Farel was charged with reviving the hereſy of Paulus Samoſatenus, and thoſe of the Elceſaïtes; which appears by a letter he wrote to Calvin, which begins thus: Literas tuas quæque eſt, &c (45). and which is the ſeventy eighth among Calvin's letters. I could not yet find out the ground of all this: I have only diſcovered (46), that one Peter Caroli, formerly a doctor of the Sorbonne, retired to Geneva about the year 1535; and being known to be a trimmer in matters of religion, and too great a lover of women and good chear, it was not eaſy for him to find a good church: he aimed at being miniſter of Neufchatel, but could not compaſs it. Farel was undoubtedly the cauſe of it, and Calvin and Viret were alſo againſt him; which, in all appearance, is the true reaſon that prompted that Caroli to accuſe them ſometimes of Arianiſm, and ſometimes of Sabellianiſm. A ſynod was thereupon called at Lauſanne, where he produced all the proofs he could poſſibly get together to maintain his accuſation. But the accuſed defended themſelves ſo well, that his proofs were declared null, and they obtained a ſentence declaring them orthodox; and as for him, the ſynod adjudged him unworthy of the miniſtry (47). Caroli was not thereby diſheartned: he appeared with his bag full of accuſations, ſwelled with new pieces, in a ſynod of Bern, and endeavoured to obtain a declaration, that the accuſed had at leaſt given occaſion to ſuſpicions. They confuted him fully as to that, and were abſolved in that particular, as well as in relation to hereſy (48). ‘Ubi à nobis excuſſa omnia fuerunt quibus ſuſpicionem aliquam de tempore præterito injicere conabatur ...... atque hac ratione, cui non ſatisfaceret, nemo præter ipſum repertus eſt. Fratres ut dignum erat fidis Chriſti Miniſtris nos iniquiſſime in ſuſpicionem aliquam (49) adductos ſibi videri pronuntiarunt. —— Having refuted all his arguments, by which he endeavoured to ſhew there had been ſufficient room for ſuſpicion formerly, there was none beſides himſelf who were not ſatisfied with the anſwer. Our brethren, as became faithful miniſters of CHRIST, declared we had been moſt iniquitouſly proſecuted upon groundleſs ſurmiſes.’ By Calvin's letter, out of which I borrow thoſe words, it appears, that the abſtracts of Caroli's accuſations being ſpread every where, had cauſed very ill impreſſions againſt thoſe accuſed miniſters: ſo true it is, that man is apt to be wrought upon by the aſſurance of an impudent calumniator! Caroli would not yield to the authority of the ſynod, but perſiſted alone in maintaining his accuſation (50). It is the character of pragmatical, proud and revengeful ſpirits, never to own they have raſhly defamed their brethren. ‘Dum hæc geruntur, afferuntur à Myconio literæ publice ad conventum ſcriptæ. Aliæ rurſum à Capitone ad Farellum generatim miſſæ, quibus utriſque intellectum eſt, horrendum longe lateque rumorem de noſtra controverſia pervagatum eſſe. Denique ad excitandam erga nos gentium omnium invidiam malicioſe à certis hominibus fabrefactum. Quod autem homo nihili futiliſſima ſua vanitate tantum proficere potuerit, ut tot eccleſiis ſiniſtram de nobis opinionem injiceret: id vero eſt, quod nos vehementer perturbavit. —— Whilſt theſe things were carrying on, a letter came from Myconius to the ſynod, another from Capito to Farel; from both of which it appeared, that a dreadful rumour had been ſpread far and near concerning our controverſy, and that certain perſons laboured to draw upon us the hatred of all people. That a worthleſs man by his ridiculous vanity ſhould be able to effect this, made us really uneaſy.’ Calvin obſerves, that Caroli was condemned to baniſhment (51). Note, that by all this it does not appear that William Farel was charged with Samoſatenianiſm. I know very well what Lindanus obſerves, that this miniſter taught, that the HOLY GHOST was nothing but the motion God imprinted upon the creatures (52). I know alſo, that, to make good his aſſertion, Lindanus quotes a letter from Caroli to the cardinal of Lorrain (53), but I am certain there are here a great many frauds. He falls into a blunder, which I ſhall not paſs over in ſilence. Thoſe of Baſil, ſays he (54), dreaded ſo much Farel's mutinous ſpirit, that, having been informed of his two eſcapes from Montbelliard, they baniſhed him. He quotes Eraſm. epiſt. ad Prin. Infer. Germ. It is eaſy to convict him that he examined very ſlightly the authors he quoted: for Eraſmus's letter, on which he grounds himſelf, is not directed ad Principes, but ad Fratres inferioris Germaniæ; neither does Eraſmus ſay, that thoſe of Baſil did baniſh Farel ſince his two flights from Montbelliard, well knowing that Farel did not go to Montbelliard till after his baniſhment from Baſil. Prateolus (55) adopts all the faults and phraſes of Lindanus: and they talk both of a chimerical ſect of Farelliſts, which never exiſted but in the fancy of the impertinent makers of catalogues of heretics. Gaultier the jeſuit brings that ſame ſect upon the ſtage, and quotes Prateolus. He ſays, that Farel (56) revived the whole hereſy of Paulus Samoſatenus, and renewed the doctrine of the Elceſaïtes. He pretends to prove it by a letter, wherein he ſuppoſes, that this miniſter does not declare thoſe to be damned who diſſemble their faith in time of danger, provided they do not openly profeſs idolatry. ‘Dicens nolle ſe eos damnare qui periculorum formidine adducti fidem ſuam diſſimulant modo idololatriam exterius non profiteantur (57). He quotes Farell. ep. ad Calv. cujus initium, Literas tuas, quæque eſt 78. inter epiſtolas Calvini (58). We have ſeen before, that Moreri founds himſelf on the ſame quotation. I have Calvin's letters, printed at Hanaw in the year 1597. The ſeventy eighth is from Bucer to Calvin. None of thoſe of our Farel begins with Literas tuas, nor favours the Nicodemites; and I find in his life, compoſed by Mr Ancillon (59), that

---

(cc) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. v, pag. 891. See the laſt remark.

(44) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. v, pag. 890, 891.

(45) See, below, citat. (58) of Father Gaultier, where you will learn that quæque eſt is not in the text of the letter.

(46) Beza, ubi ſupra, lib. xvi, pag. 435.

(47) Nos ſynodi ſententia fuimus abſoluti, ille indignus judicatus qui miniſterio fungeretur. Calvinus, Epiſt. ad Grynæum. It is the fifth in the Edition of Hanaw, 1597.

(48) Id. ibid.

(49) Sycophanta ille ſenatus conſulto in exilium actus eſt, nos plane abſoluti non à crimine modo, ſed ab omni quoque ſuſpicione. Id. ibid.

(50) See quotation (47).

(51) See quotation (49).

(52) Hic præter ſacramentariſmum etiam Samoſateni renovavit hæreſim, Spiritum Sanctum affirmans motum in rebus creatum. Lindanus in Dubitantio, Dial. ii, pag. m. 147.

(53) Ita in Summa Gallicana Scripturæ, teſte Petro Carolo epiſt. ad Card. Lotharingum. Id. ibid.

(54) Hunc adeo ſeditioſum metuebant Baſilienſes, ut cum bis monte Pellicardo profugiſſet eum in exilium abire juſſerint. Id. ibid. pag. 146.

(55) Prateol. in Elencho Hæreſ. pag. m. 180. See alſo pag. 290.

(56) Pauli Samoſateni hæreſim in integrum reſtituit docens Spiritum Sanctum eſſe quendam motum creatum. Jacobus Gaulterius, in tabula Chronograph. pag. m. 757.

(57) Id. ibid.

(58) See, above, citat. (45).

(59) Ancillon, ubi ſupra, pag. 212.

That he was ſuppoſed to be the author of ſome papers poſted up in ſeveral ſtreets of Paris, and even on the gates of the Louvre, in the year 1543 (dd), which did the whole party a great deal of prejudice in the kingdom.

(dd) Florim. de Remond, Hiſtoire de l'Héréſie, Livr. VII, cap. v, pag. m. 859.

‘ that it is to the letter he wrote to Calvin, the ſecond of November 1544, we owe that excellent work of Calvin againſt the Nicodemites, which we have in his Opuſcula from page 789 to 803. Here follows an evident lie of father Gualtier. He ſuppoſes that Calvin took Geneva from Farel, qui tamen eam (Genevam) illi poſtea eripuit, adeo ut deinde Neocomenſis miniſter creatus ſit (60). It is moſt certain that thoſe two miniſters were driven out of Geneva at the ſame time, and for the ſame cauſe; and that when Calvin was recalled, they would alſo have recalled Farel, who notwithſtanding Calvin's earneſt intreaties (61) would never comply to this new invitation of thoſe of Geneva.

This lye of father Gualtier is more pardonable than that in Prateolus, who aſſures us that the archers ſurprized Farel at Baſil, in a houſe of proſtitution, upon a Holy Friday (62)

(60) Gualt. Tab. Chronogr. pag. 737.

(61) See Calvin's 40th letter.

(62) Prateolus, in Elencho Hæreſ. pag. 290.

FARNABY (THOMAS) was a learned philologer of the XVIIth century. His notes upon the greateſt part of the Latin poets have been of great ſervice to the youth. They are ſhort, and full of learning, tending chiefly to explain the text. He lived at London (a), and applied himſelf to teach children of figure and quality, and found a good account in it for the maintenance of his family (b). I believe alſo his epiſtles dedicatory brought him in ſome profit, tho' he ſays, ſomewhere, that the time was over for making much that way [A]. He dedicated his Horace to prince Henry, eldeſt ſon to king James I, and afterwards his Juvenal and Perſius. He was very graciouſly received by the young prince (c), when he had the honour to preſent the latter book to him, and he gave him a kind of order to make a like commentary upon all the Latin poets; but he was ſo ſenſibly touched at certain criticiſms made upon him, that he reſolved out of indignation and againſt the bent of his own genius to diſcontinue his work. Some time after he was perſwaded to change his mind (d). He had a country houſe twenty miles from London, whither he retired in the year 1636 (e). Charles I commanded him to compoſe a Latin grammar for the uſe of all the ſchools; he received, I ſay, this order when there was a neceſſity to reform that grammar which had been eſtabliſhed by authority, and which had been very much complained of (f). He died in the year 1647 (g). A French Dominican has beſtowed great encomiums upon the writings of this author [B]. See alſo what is ſaid concerning his notes upon Martial, in a book of the jeſuit Vavaſſeur de Epigrammate (b).

(a) Barlæus, Epiſt. cxix, pag. 292.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) See the epiſtle dedicatory of his Lucan.

(d) Taken from the ſame epiſtle dedicatory.

(e) Farnab. Epiſt. ad Voſſium, pag. 303. Epiſtolarum ad Voſſium ſcriptarum.

(f) Id. ibid. pag. 302.

(g) Witte, in Diar. Biograph.

(b) Pag. 270, & ſeq.

[A] He ſays ſomewhere that the time was over to get much by epiſtles dedicatory.] He applies to this purpoſe a particular related by Valerius Maximus, which is, that though they did not conſult, as formerly, the flight of birds at marriages, yet they invited to the wedding the perſons appointed to take thoſe obſervations, retaining, at leaſt in name, ſome footſteps of the ancient ceremony. ‘ Quod antiquis, apud quos nihil niſi auſpicio prius ſumpto gerebatur factitatum, ut ex more, nuptiis auſpices interpoſiti, quamvis auſpicia deſiiſſent (Val. Max. lib. 2. cap. 1.) ipſo tamen nomine veteris conſuetudinis veſtigia uſurparent: hoc pleriſque noſtrum quos vexat inſanabile hoc ſcribendi cacoëthes, uſu venit ut quamvis patronorum exoleverit cum autoritas tum benignitas, non citra ambitionem tamen ſummis & gravibus viris perituræ chartæ tutelam obtrudamus (1). —— As the antients never engaged in any enterprize, without firſt conſulting the omens, for which reaſon the ſoothſayers were applied to in marriage, and tho' that cuſtom was laid aſide, there ſtill remained ſome marks of it; ſo moſt of us moderns are infected with an incurable itch of ſcribbling, though the authority and benevolence of patrons is out of date, and ſtill obtrude our ſhortlived labours on perſons of the greateſt merit and diſtinction.’ His meaning is, that though the real benefits of epiſtles dedicatory is loſt, yet the cuſtom of dedicating is not given over.

[B] A French Dominican has beſtowed great encomiums upon the works of this author.] It is in the place where he undertakes to ſhew that the jeſuits are inferior to abundance of other writers, who have ſhone in polite learning (§α). ‘ Doleo, continues he (2), meo tempore, cùm literis humanioribus ſtuderem, defuiſſe nobis illud ſubſidium ad rem litterariam maximum, quod ſuppeditarunt à paucis annis Farnabius & alii; Poëtis omnibus commentariis marginalibus ita clarè explicatis, ut mediocris grammaticus poſſit etiam difficillimos inoffenſo pede locos decurrere. Hæc non poſſunt expectari aut parari adjumenta, ad auctorum peritiam, ab iis, qui per tres aut quatuor annos literas humaniores docent, & ad Theologiæ conſcendunt vel philoſophiæ cathedram, ſed ab his, qui conſeneſcunt & immoriuntur Grammaticæ, aut rhetoricæ ſcholis; quales non dubito fuiſſe illos, qui adeò utilem & neceſſariam opem contulerunt bonarum litterarum ſtudioſis, Commentatores marginales. —— I am ſorry that during the time of my ſtudy we had not thoſe helps to learning, which Farnaby and others have of late years given. All the poets are ſo clearly iluſtrated with marginal notes, that a mean grammarian may with eaſe get over the greateſt difficulties. Such helps as theſe cannot come from thoſe, who teach polite learning for three or four years, and then ſtep into the chair of divinity or philoſophy, but from thoſe who grow old in the ſchools of grammar or rhetoric. Such I do not queſtion thoſe to have been, who by their marginal comments have beſtowed on all lovers of learning, a moſt uſeful and neceſſary work.’

[(§α) I believe the author of this obſervation is Cæſar Cremoninus, in his harangue pronounced in 1591, for the univerſity of Padua, againſt the jeſuits. Mr Antony Arnaud quotes the place, page 6, and 7, of his Franc & veritable diſcours, &c. edition of 1662, and the piece itſelf is to be found in page 445, of the Mercure jéſuite, edition of 1626. REM. CRIT.]

(1) Thomas Farnabius, Epiſt. Dedicatoria Tragœdiar. Senecæ.

(2) Vincent Baronius, Apolog. lib. iv, ſect. i, pag. 316.

FATIMA, daughter of Mahomet, and wife of Ali. Some accounts ſay, ſhe is the great ſaint they worſhip with ſo much devotion at Com (a) [A]; but moſt travellers

(a) A city of Perſia.

[A] Some accounts ſay ſhe is the great ſaint . . . . . at Com.] Herbert, in his Perſian travels, having ſaid that the moſque at Com is magnificent, adds (1): The devotion they have for this place has inriched it with many great preſents brought to the ſepulchre of Fatima the wife of Mortis Ali, and daughter of Mahomet, the great prophet of all the Muſſulmen, who is buried here. The building of the moſque is round, and made after the Epirotic manner. The tomb of the pretended ſaint is raiſed twelve feet from the ground, and lers are of another opinion. Some ſay the ſaint at Com is the daughter of Ali and Fatima [B]. According to Peter della Valle ſhe is their grand-daughter [C]. Others ſay, ſhe is the daughter of Mouſa the ſon of Dgafer. This latter opinion is ſupported by one authentic Proof, viz. the titles they give the ſaint at Com in the ſolemn prayers the pilgrims direct to her [D]. Theſe are forms of prayers, and conſequently they furniſh us with a good proof how little exact travellers are, ſince ſome of the moſt celebrated of them relate ſo ill the titles of ſuch a ſaint. It appears by this formulary of prayers that Fatima, the daughter of Mahomet, the wife of Ali, and mother of ſome children, is nevertheleſs venerated as a virgin [E].

(1) Pag. 339, cited by Beſpier, Remarques ſur l'etat preſent de l' Empire Ottoman par Ricaut, Tom. I, pag. 24.

and is covered with white velvet: you go up to it by ſteps of ſolid ſilver.

[B] Some ſay ſhe is the daughter of Ali and Fatima.] This appears in Figueroa's narrative: they informed me, ſays he (2), that at Com there was a famous moſque, dedicated to the memory of a great ſaint named Lela, grand-daughter of Mahomet, and the daughter of Ali and Fatima. The Sieur Beſpier advances a conjecture which is very probable: The name of Lela, ſays he (3), is commonly given to the great ladies of Africa, and it is alſo the title of honour which they give there to the Bleſſed Virgin, mother of our Lord JESUS, for whom the Mahometans have a great deal of reſpect and veneration, as well as for her ſon. He cites Diego de Torres, who aſſures us (4) that they call the Holy Virgin, Lela Mariam, which ſignifies, the Lady Mary, and that (5) all the daughters of the cherif took the title of Lela, and he names them all four, viz. Lela Mariam, Lela Aya, Lela Fatima, and Lela Lu. After this Beſpier adds, that he is inclined to think that Lela was not the proper name of the ſaint mentioned by Figueroa, but only the title of honour preceding it, and that ſhe had another name which Figueroa has omitted, or was not informed of. The inhabitants of Com, who held that maid for a ſaint, were content with calling her Lela, or The Lady by way of excellence: much after the ſame manner, as moſt chriſtians now call the Virgin Mary Our Lady.

[C] According to Peter della Valle, ſhe is their grand-daughter.] ' There is a fine bridge at Com, and near ' the bridge a magnificent moſque, in which they told ' me that a ſiſter of Iman Riza, whom they have a veneration for, and who was one of the moſt eſteemed ' ſucceſſors of Mahomet, is buried, whom alſo they ' look upon as a ſaint in their way; ſo that they have ' a great reſpect and veneration for the place of her burial (6).' Iman Riza was the ſon of Hoſſein, who was Fatima's ſon (7): let us ſay therefore that the ſiſter of Iman Riza is the grand-daughter of Fatima. Tavernier's relation agrees here with that of Peter della Valle. ' What is moſt remarkable at Com is a great ' moſque . . . where are ſeen the ſepulchres of Cha-' Sefi and Cha-Abas the ſecond, and that of Sidi-Fatima the daughter of Iman-Hocen, who was the ſon ' of Ali, and of Fatima Zurha, Mahomet's daughter (8).'

[D] The ſolemn prayers which the pilgrims direct to her.] Mr Chardin (9) has copied the two chief prayers they make the pilgrims repeat at Com. The firſt begins thus: I viſit my lady and miſtreſs Fathmé, the daughter of Mouſa, ſon of Dgafer, upon whom be ſalvation and peace for ever. There is one remarkable thing in theſe prayers, which is, that therein they recommend themſelves to the interceſſion of this ſaint, and make vows for her. We have ſeen already that they wiſh her peace and eternal ſalvation: here is another part of that formulary: I wiſh thee eternal ſalvation, O Fathmé daughter of Mouſa, virgin, holy, virtuous, juſt, directrix of truth, pious, ſanctified, worthy of all our praiſes, who ſupreamly loveſt the faithful, and art ſupreamly beloved by them: Virgin without ſpot, and free from all impurity. May GOD take his greateſt delight in thee, be always well pleaſed with thee, and eſtabliſh thee in paradiſe, which is thy eternal refuge and abode (10). But immediately they recommend themſelves to her prayers in the following manner (11): I am come to ſeek thee, O lady and miſtreſs of my ſoul, with a view of approaching by this pious act to the moſt high GOD, and to his apoſtle and his children. May the mercy of GOD be upon him, and them for ever. I deteſt and abhor my ſins, the load of which miſerably oppreſſes me, and I do my endeavour to break the yoke of hell. Vouchſafe me thy interceſſion, O holy Virgin, in that day when the righteous ſhall be ſeparated from the wicked. Be then propitious to me; for thou are deſcended from parents who will ſuffer none of thoſe that love them to fall into trouble, who refuſe nothing to thoſe that pray to them, who divert all kinds of evil from thoſe that cheriſh them, and whoſe enemies on the contrary can never proſper. Chardin informs us (12) that the tomb of this Fathmé has been three times rebuilt: Her father, continues he, carried her to Com on account of the perſecution which the califs of Bagdat raiſed againſt his family, and all that held Ali and his deſcendants for the only lawful ſucceſſors of Mahomet. She built ſeveral fine houſes in this city, and died there. The people believe that GOD took her up into heaven, and that her tomb has nothing in it, being only a repreſentation. The Romiſh church then is not the only one that honours the aſſumption of virgins. We have ſeen that the immaculate conception, and the virginity of a mother, ſeem to be two doctrines of the Mahometan religion. One thing is wanting in Mr Chardin's narrative. He ſhould have told us in what time Mouſa the father of Fathmé lived.

[E] Though the wife of Ali, and mother of ſeveral children, ſhe is nevertheleſs venerated as a virgin.] The pilgrims are obliged, according to the formulary of prayers, among other things, to ſay thus: ' I wiſh thee ' eternal ſalvation, O virgin moſt pure, moſt juſt, and ' immaculate, glorious Fatima, daughter of Mahomet ' the elect, wife of Ali the well beloved, mother of ' twelve true vicars of GOD, of illuſtrious birth (13).'

(2) Ambaſſade, pag. 220, cited by Beſpier, ibid.

(3) Id. pag. 22.

(4) Hiſtoire des Cherifs, cap. lxxiv.

(5) Id. cap. cvii.

(6) Pietro della Valle, pag. 58, of the ſecond volume of his Travels, cited by Beſpier, ubi ſupra, p. 23, 24.

(7) Beſpier, ibid. pag. 24.

(8) Tavernier, Voiages, lib. i, pag. 75. Dutch Edit. 1679.

(9) Journal de Voiage de Perſe, pag. 464, of Wolfgang's Edit. of Amſterdam, 1686.

(10) Journal du Voiage de Perſe, pag. 465.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Ibid. pag. 468.

(13) Ibid. pag. 464.

FAUCHET (CLAUDE) a Pariſian, and firſt preſident of the court of the mint at Paris, publiſhed ſome books which gained him the reputation of a learned man [A]. He died very old in the year 1601. Lewis XIII was not pleaſed with his way of writing (a). The Sieur Sorel, in his French Bibliotheque, makes a parallel between him and Scipio du Pleix (b). It deſerves to be read.

(a) See the remark [O] of the article LEWIS XIII.

(b) Pag. 377, of the ſecond edition.

[A] He publiſhed ſome books, which gained him the reputation of a learned man.] ' He has tranſlated with ' great labour and learning the hiſtory of Cor. Tacitus, ' printed at Paris by Abel l'Angelier in 1582, 1583, ' 1584, in folio, in 4to, and 8vo, without putting ' his name to it, no more than to his book of Gallic Antiquities . . . . . . ſo little does he thirſt after ' fame, only deſiring to benefit the public (1).' Thus la Croix du Maine ſpoke in the year 1584. Mr Baillet does not mention this tranſlation as an anonymous work. ' Claude Fauchet, ſays he (2), has tranſlated ' into our language the works of Tacitus, which were ' printed under his name in divers forms, but the firſt ' five books are tranſlated by Stephen de la Planche ' (3).' Fauchet publiſhed a Collection of Gallic and French antiquities in two books, in the year 1579, in 4to. Twenty years after he gave a ſecond edition of it in 8vo, and carried it down to the end of the firſt race of the kings of France. He publiſhed the ſequel of it, in 1601, in 8vo: it is intituled, Fleur de la maiſon de Charlemagne . . . . contenant les faits de Pepin & ſes ſucceſſeurs depuis l'an 751, juſques à l'an 840 de JESUS CHRIST. He died while they were printing, Declin de la maiſon de Charlemagne . . . . . contenant les faits de Charles le Chauve & ſes ſucceſſeurs depuis l'an 840, juſques à l'an 987 de JESUS CHRIST & entrée du regne de Hugues Capet. This volume came out in 1620, in 8vo. As to the work des Origines des Chevaliers, Armoiries, & Heraux, enſemble de l'ordonnance, armes & inſtrumens deſquels les François ont anciennement uſé en leurs guerres, it was printed at Paris in the year 1600, in 8vo. His

(1) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Franç. pag. 57.

(2) Baillet, Jugement des Sçavans, Tom. IV, n. 939, pag. 535.

(3) Du Verdier calls him Plance.

Recueil de l'origine de la langue & poëſie Françoiſe, Rhyme & Romans; plus les noms & ſommaire des Oeuvres de 127 poëtes François, vivans avant l'an 1300, was printed at Paris in 4to, in the year 1581. The edition of his works done at Paris in 1610 (4), which Moreri mentions, was reprinted at Geneva the year following.

(4) It is in 4to.

(a) I have ſeen him cited in Latin Falcarius

FAUCHEUR (a) MICHAEL LE) was an illuſtrious miniſter among the proteſtants of France in the XVIIth century. Preaching was his great talent [A], in which indeed he excelled. He made himſelf admired in this way in the church of Montpellier [B]; and as his reputation increaſed, and the church of Paris uſed to appropriate to herſelf the greateſt preachers of the provinces, he was called up thither. He was not ſorry of an opportunity to undeceive thoſe who thought his capacity was confined to the making a good ſermon and delivering it well. Wherefore he engaged in a larger work upon the euchariſt againſt cardinal Perron. They were agreeably ſurprized to ſee a large folio come from his pen, full of Greek and Latin quotations, and all ſorts of erudition relating to that controverſy. His other works are ſeveral volumes of ſermons, and a treatiſe of the action of an orator [C], which was lately reprinted in Holland. I have ſeen a latin manuſcript letter of his, in which he gave very good advice to the great du Moulin upon his book of the Salmurian controverſies. Le Faucher died at Paris the firſt of April 1657 (b).

(b) Witte, in Dario Biograph. See alſo la Vie de Mr Daillé, pag. 44.

[A] His talent was preaching.] I have heard that one day he preached with ſo much eloquence againſt duelling, that the marſhal de la Force, who was preſent at the ſermon, proteſted before ſome men of the ſword, that if a challenge was ſent him, he would not accept it.

[B] He made himſelf admired in the church at Montpellier.] The ſermon, he preached there upon a faſt-day in the year 1618, was ſeveral times reprinted. It is a moſt ſolid and pathetic piece.

[C] He wrote a treatiſe of the action of an orator.] It was printed at Leyden the year 1686, and falſely attributed to Mr Conrart; whether they believed he was the author, or deſigned to make the book ſell the better, by putting the name of a man to it who was celebrated for his politeneſs. The journaliſts of Leipſic give a very exact abſtract of it, in their Journal of the month of January 1687 (1). They did not forget the place where the author ſpeaks of a preacher, who made himſelf a rule to cough exactly at ſuch and ſuch a period; and leaſt he ſhould forget, he made marks in his notes wherever he propoſed to cough. In thoſe places he wrote hem, hem, as was ſeen in the original after his death. The advice given by theſe journaliſts was followed by a profeſſor of Helmſtadt (2), who tranſlated that treatiſe into Latin. This tranſlation was publiſhed in the ſame city in 1690. They make mention of it (3), informing the public that the tranſlator had reſtored that work to it's true author. Their ſuppoſition that this book, having been printed at Lyons without the author's name in 1676, was publiſhed at Paris ten years after under Mr Conrart's name, and that the Holland edition, in imitation of that of Paris, alſo aſcribes it to Mr Conrart, wants to be corrected. I. The anonymous edition of Lyons in 1679 is not the firſt. I remember to have ſeen this book ever ſince 1666. II. They did not print it at Paris in 1686, with Mr Conrart's name to it. Thoſe words ad exemplar Pariſ. 1686, which thoſe gentlemen quote (4), ſignify, not that it was printed from the edition which came out at Paris in 1686, but that it was printed in 1686 according to the Paris edition. And ſo they do not give the date of the Paris edition.

(1) Pag. 17, 18.

(2) Melchior Smidius.

(3) At the month of July 1690, pag. 368.

(4) Pag. 17, Ann. 1687.

FAUNO (LUCIO) in Latin Faunus, an Italian author, who lived about the middle of the XVIth century (a), compoſed a book of the antiquities of Rome delle antichita della città di Roma, which has been printed in Italian and Latin [A]. He tranſlated alſo into Italian certain works of Flavius Blondus (b).

(a) Quem ætate Pauli IV (it ſhould be Pauli III) Romani Pontificis, anno Chriſti M.D.XL, vixiſſe conſtat. Hankius, de Scriptoribus Rerum Romanarum, Tom. II, pag. 134. (b) Epitome Bibliothecæ Geſneri, pag. m. 552.

[A] His book of the antiquities of Rome, has been printed in Italian, and in Latin.] In the catalogue of the Bibliotheca Thuana, the Italian edition of Venice is placed in the year 1558, in 8vo. It is ſaid (1) there was another edition of it in the ſame city in 1553. The Latin edition, if we believe Geſner's abridgment, came out at Venice in the year 1546. Others take notice of none but the Venice edition in 1549 (2).

(1) See Mr Teiſſier, in Catalogor. &c. pag. 550.

(2) Hank. de Scriptor. Rer. Roman. p. 134.

FAUSTA, daughter of Maximian Herculeus (a), was wife to the emperor Conſtantine. She was beſtowed upon him with a deſign to deceive him (b); but ſhe diſcovered Maximian's treachery to her huſband (c). They ſay that Conſtantine ſuſpecting that Criſpus, a ſon he had (d) by a concubine (e), had an unlawful commerce with Fauſta, cauſed him to be put to death; and to comfort his mother Helena, who was infinitely grieved at the death of that young man, he ordered Fauſta to be ſmothered in a very hot bath. This is affirmed by Zoſimus (f). Some ſay that Fauſta, falling in love with Criſpus, diſcovered her paſſion to him; but not being able to prevail upon him, ſhe complained to Conſtantine that he would have attempted her virtue. They add, that Conſtantine believing Fauſta's calumny, put Criſpus to death; but afterwards, being convinced of his ſon's innocence, he ordered her to be executed [A]. Cardinal Ba-

ronius

(a) Zoſimus, lib. ii, pag. m. 81.

(b) Id. ibid. pag. 82.

(c) Idem ibid. See alſo Eutropius, lib. x.

(d) Id. Zoſim. ibid. pag. 93.

(e) Her name was Minervina. Zoſimus, lib. ii, pag. 93.

(f) Id. ibid. pag. 103, 104.

[A] Some ſay that Fauſta falling in love with Criſpus ..... Conſtantine put Criſpus ..... and that woman to death.] This tragical event is related a thouſand different ways by authors, and almoſt always curtailed of ſome of the moſt eſſential circumſtances. Zoſimus (1) pretends that Conſtantine ſuſpected Criſpus had to do with Fauſta; and yet he aſſures us that the emperor put Criſpus to death without inflicting any puniſhment upon the empreſs; for he ſays ſhe was ſtifled in the bath, only becauſe it was found neceſſary to do ſo, to comfort Conſtantine's mother. Such a relation deſerves much to be cenſured. Criſpus could not be ſuſpected as guilty of inceſt with Fauſta, without Fauſta's being ſuſpected of the ſame crime. How comes it to paſs then that Conſtantine puniſhed none but Criſpus? this is an objection Zoſimus ought to have foreſeen and obviated, and yet he has taken no manner of precaution againſt it: therefore he has not given an exact account of Conſtantine's behaviour in this affair. According to the latter part of his narrative, it ſhould have been

(1) Zoſim. lib. ii, pag. m. 103, 104.

ronius (g) juſtly complains of the writers of eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, who have either ſuppreſſed been ſaid in the firſt, that Criſpus was ſuſpected, not of committing inceſt with Fauſta, but of having attempted her chaſtity in vain. Then the conſequence would have been natural, and every body would have eaſily conceived that Conſtantine ſacrificed the innocence of his wife to his mother's grief, or that by certain artifices they had perſuaded him that the empreſs's conduct had not been faultleſs. To have a full account of this event we muſt have recourſe to Metaphraſtus: I confeſs he is not an author very worthy of credit; but yet he leaves the feweſt chaſms, he is one that puts the circumſtances into good order. Criſpus accuſed by his mother-in-law is puniſhed: his father looks upon him as the only criminal. No wonder then that Fauſta ſuffers nothing. Afterwards ſhe is convicted of being a falſe accuſer, and is puniſhed on that ſcore. Note, Metaphraſtus ſuppoſes that Artemius the martyr relates this to juſtify Conſtantine, and anſwer the objections of Julian the apoſtate. Read the following paſſage of Baronius (2): ‘ Artemius præfectus Auguſtalis, idemque martyr, cum chriſtianitatis reus cauſam ageret coram Juliano Apoſtata, deroganti illi Conſtantino, multaque in eum objicienti, ac præſertim propinquorum necem, hæc tunc in eum pro Conſtantino reſpondit *: Ille autem (inquit) uxorem Fauſtam juſte admodum interfecit, ut quæ priſcam Phædram eſſet imitata, ejuſque filium Criſpum calumniata, quòd ejus amore captus eſſet, & vim ei conatus eſſet afferre, ſicut etiam illa Hippolytum Theſei filium. Atque primùm quidem qui ſic in matrem inſanierat (ut volebant ejus verba) ille cùm eſſet maritus, punivit. Poſtea autem cum ſciviſſet eſſe mentitam, ipſam quoque occidit, in eam ferens ſententiam omnium juſtiſſimam. Hæc Artemius ad Julianum. —— Artemius the emperor's lieutenant, and a martyr, being accuſed of chriſtianity, and obliged to appear on his trial before Julian the apoſtate, who inveighed againſt Conſtantine, laying ſeveral heavy things to his charge, but more particularly the murder of his neareſt relations, made this anſwer in defence of Conſtantine. He killed, ſays he, and that moſt juſtly his wife Fauſta, becauſe like another Phædra ſhe had falſly accuſed his ſon Criſpus of having fallen in love with her, and attempted her honour, as the firſt had done to Hippolytus ſon of Theſeus. In the perſon of a huſband he puniſhed the ſon, who, according to his wife's inſinuation, had been tranſported with ſo unjuſtifiable a paſſion. But when he was afterwards convinced of his wife's perfidy: he put her likewiſe to death, making her undergo a ſentence, than which none could be more juſt. Thus Artemius replied to Julian.’ Sidonius Apollinaris tells us, that Ablavius the conſul made a diſtich which was fixed upon the palace gates, containing a ſtinging ſatire upon Conſtantine's cruelty. ‘ Ut mihi non figuratius Conſtantini domum vitamque videatur vel pupugiſſe verſu gemello conſul Ablavius, vel momordiſſe diſticho tali clam palatinis foribus appenſo:

Saturni aurea ſæcla quis requirat?
Sunt hæc gemmea (3), ſed Neroniana.

The age of ſaturn was an age of gold;
But this, like Nero's, is an age of gems.

‘ Quia ſcilicet prædictus Auguſtus iiſdem ferè temporibus extinxerat conjugem Fauſtam calore balnei, filium Criſpum frigore veneni (4).’ Theſe words of Sidonius Apollinaris ſay nothing of the cauſe of Conſtantine's proceeding; they only inform us that this prince put his wife Fauſta to death by the heat of a bath, and his ſon Criſpus by the deadly cold of poiſon. Moſt writers ſay that Criſpus was killed, not poiſoned. ‘ Ad Iſtriam duxit prope oppidum Polam, ubi quondam PEREMPTUM Conſtantini filium accepimus Criſpum (5). —— To Iſtria near the town of Pola, where, it is ſaid, Criſpus the ſon of Conſtantine was killed.’ St Jerom's expreſſion is: ‘ Hic (Lactantius) extrema ſenectute magiſter Cæſaris Criſpi, filii Conſtantini in Gallia fuit, qui poſtea à patre INTERFECTUS eſt (6). —— Lactantius in his old age was preceptor to Criſpus, ſon to Conſtantine, in Gaul, who was afterwards ſlain by his father.’ We read in Euſebius's chronicle, that Criſpus the ſon of Conſtantine, and young Licinius the ſon of Conſtantine's ſiſter, were barbarouſly murdered, crudeliſſimè INTERFICIUNTUR, the firſt year of the CCLXXVIth Olympiad, that is in the year 325; and that Conſtantine put his wife Fauſta to death the fourth year of the ſame Olympiad. Oroſius ſays nothing of Fauſta; but he ſays that Conſtantine, about the time that the Arian hereſy was condemned in the council of Nice, put to death Criſpus his own ſon, and Licinius his nephew, without any body's knowing the reaſons of his being thus exaſperated againſt his own blood. ‘ Sed inter hæc latent cauſæ, cur vindicem gladium & deſtinatam in impios punitionem Conſtantinus imperator etiam in proprios egit affectus. Nam Criſpum filium ſuum, & Licinium, ſororis filium INTERFECIT (7). —— It is not well known what ſhould induce Conſtantine to draw his vindictive ſword, and to inflict the puniſhment deſtined for heathens on his own family; for he put to death his own ſon Criſpus, and his ſiſter's ſon Licinius.’ It is very ſtrange this hiſtorian ſhould never have heard what is atteſted by ſo many others, that Criſpus was put to death upon ſuſpicion of a criminal love to his mother-in law; but perhaps Oroſius had heard that, and other reaſons alſo, but judged from the diverſity of opinions that the true cauſes of it were concealed. Aurelius Victor, who ſays that it was believed Conſtantine made away with Criſpus at Fauſta's inſtigation, does not add the motive which ſhe ſuggeſted to her huſband. But he however agrees with Zoſimus concerning the cauſe of Fauſta's death; he ſays that Conſtantine ordered her to be put to death in a bath, becauſe his mother Helena, exceedingly afflicted with grief for the death of Criſpus, reproached him with it. ‘ Fauſta conjuge, ut putant, ſuggerente Criſpum filium NECARI jubet. Dehinc uxorem ſuam Fauſtam in balneas ardentes conjectam interemit, cum eum mater Helena dolore nimio nepotis increparet (8). —— He cauſed his ſon Criſpus to be put to death upon the ſuggeſtions, as it is believed, of his wife Fauſta. Afterwards he put her alſo to death in a hot bath, moved thereto by the complaints of his mother Helena, who extremely regretted the loſs of her grandſon.’ Nothing is more ſurprizing to me than that Eutropius ſhould enlarge upon Conſtantine's cruelty, without touching upon the death of Criſpus, though he did not forget to mention particularly that of young Licinius, and Fauſta (9). It is pretended that St Chryſoſtome, without naming any body, has related this action of Conſtantine; but he ſuppoſes that this prince, ſuſpecting his wife of adultery, ordered her to be bound upon the top of a mountain, to be devoured by wild beaſts. He adds that the ſon of that prince was killed by his own father, or rather by his brother (10). Gregorius Turonenſis affirms that Conſtantine put his ſon Criſpus, and his wife Fauſta to death, for high-treaſon (11). Philoſtorgius ſays that Conſtantine being prepoſſeſſed by the calumnies of his wife, Criſpus's mother-in-law, ordered him to be killed, and afterwards having diſcovered that ſhe committed adultery with a courier, he cauſed her to be ſtifled in the bath (12). Beſides the authors I have named, the reader will do well to conſult Suidas (13) and Zonaras.

I have produced all theſe authorities, that the reader may ſee the defects, variations, and want of exactneſs, in ancient hiſtorians. Note alſo, that having ſo many authors to cite upon this ſubject, it is ſtrange that no body ſhould be quoted in Moreri but Ammianus Marcellinus, who ſays nothing, either of Fauſta, or of the reaſon why Criſpus was put to death. We have ſeen before (14) all that is to be met with in this writer concerning this matter.

I cannot omit the liberty Cauſſin the Jeſuit has taken to add abundance of things of his own invention to the account of this adventure. This would be tolerable in a piece of poetry, or a romance; but in a ſerious work, and which is intituled The holy court, ſuch rhetorical decorations are not to be allowed. Nothing is more delightful than this to young ſcholars, or more inſipid to perſons advanced in age, and judgment. They cannot behold without indignation a long deſcription of the beauty of Criſpus, the riſe and progreſs of Fauſta's paſſion, the manner ſhe made her paſſion known, her rage to be denied, her contrivance to be revenged, her ſorrow for the death of Criſpus, &c; they cannot bear, I ſay, the repreſentation of all preſſed theſe facts, or have even endeavoured to confute them [B]. He places the marriage of Conſtantine with Fauſta in the year 307 (b), and the death of Criſpus and that empreſs in 324. Nothing could have been more dangerous to this ſon of Conſtantine, than to have his mother-in-law in love with him, for which way ſoever he acted, he was ſure to be ruined by it. A compliance had expoſed him to the wrath of God; and beſides, if it had been known, he could hope for no favour from Conſtantine; his refuſal was no leſs fatal, for this was what expoſed him to the indignation and rage of an empreſs [C]. Some ſay that (i) Fauſta brought back Conſtantine to worſhip falſe deities,

---

(g) Baron, ad Ann. 324, n. 5, & ſeq.

(2) Baronius, ad ad. ann. 324, n. xi, pag. m 295.

* Ex Metaphr. apud Sur. die 20 Octob. Tom. V.

(3) Savaro makes this note upon that word, ſcilicet quod Criſpus . . . veneno gemmæ id eſt gemmatæ pateræ infuſo potionatus occubuit. —— Becauſe Criſpus had been poiſoned with a liquor preſented in a cup ſet round with GEMS.

(4) Sidon. Apollinar. Epiſt. viii, lib. v, pag. m. 338.

(5) Ammianus Marcellin. lib. xiv, cap. ult. pag. m. 57, 58.

(6) Hieronym. de Script. Eccleſ. in in Lactantio.

(7) Oroſius, lib. vii, cap. xxviii, fol. m. 321, verſo.

(8) Aurel. Victor. in Epitome, pag. m. 224.

(9) Primum neceſſitudines perſecutus, egregium virum, & ſororis filium, commodæ indolis juvenem interfecit, mox uxorem, poſt numeroſos amicos. Eutrop. lib. x, pag. m. 117.

(10) Chryſoſt. Homil. XV in Philippenſes. See Henr. Valois, in Ammian. Marcell. lib. xiv, pag. m. 58.

(11) Greg. Turon. Hiſtor. Franç. lib i, cap. xxxiv.

(12) Philoſtorg. Hiſt. Eccleſ lib. ii, cap. iv.

(13) Suidas, voce Κρίσκης.

(14) Citat. (5).

all theſe things, though they are not derived from any hiſtory. As to the laſt particular, the author ſays as follows. ‘ As ſoon as this news (15) arrived at court, ‘ the wicked Fauſta knowing it to be the effect of her ‘ own perfidy, and having before her eyes the image ‘ of the poor prince whom ſhe had ſo paſſionately ‘ loved before, but now baſely butchered in the bloom of ‘ beauty, and at an age, moſt to be lamented, and of ‘ ſo ſweet a temper as would have excited compaſſion ‘ in lions and tigers; all her paſſion and hatred was ‘ turned into outragious grief, which forced her to ‘ cry and howl at her huſband's feet, confeſſing ſhe ‘ had murdered the chaſte Criſpus by her abominable ‘ calumnies; that ſhe had ſollicited him to wickedneſs; but had found him, like Joſeph, armed with invincible chaſtity, abhorring her ſin to the degree it ‘ deſerved; whereupon, ſtung with rage, and fearing ‘ to be prevented, ſhe had invented that calumny againſt him; for which reaſon ſhe was unworthy to ‘ live any longer, after having deſtroyed the moſt innocent prince in the world, and ſtained his own father with his blood (16).’ What boldneſs this! An author of the XVIIth century pretends to give us the particulars of a thing which happened in the IVth, and all out of his own head. No ancient author has informed us how Conſtantine came to know his ſon's innocence, much leſs that it was Fauſta herſelf who diſcovered it to the emperor.

[B] Cardinal Baronius juſtly complains of the writers . . . . who have ſuppreſſed theſe facts, or who have even endeavoured to confute them.] He attacks on this head three hiſtorians; Euſebius, Sozomen, and Evagrius. The firſt is ſilent: the other two diſpute againſt thoſe who have ſpoken. Euſebius keeps a profound ſilence concerning this matter in his life of Conſtantine, but not in his chronicle. Sozomen durſt neither poſitively acknowledge, nor deny the death of Criſpus; he (17) is content to refute the Pagan authors, who had ſaid that Conſtantine finding no way in Paganiſm to expiate ſuch execrable murders, but finding a method to do it in the chriſtian religion, forſook the religion of his fathers, and turned chriſtian. Evagrius (18) abſolutely denies theſe two things; firſt, that Conſtantine put Criſpus and Fauſta to death; and ſecondly, that he embraced chriſtianity for that reaſon. Baronius (19) having condemned the ſilence of the firſt of theſe three hiſtorians, as a baſe flattery, charges (20) Sozomen with incredible ſtupidity, who, to ſhew that Conſtantine did not put Criſpus to death, only makes uſe, ſays he, of this argument: Criſpus lived to the twentieth year of Conſtantine's reign, and enacted ſeveral laws with him. Baronius (21) ſtill wonders more at Evagrius's behaviour: he refers him to the chronicle of Euſebius, to Aurelius Victor, Eutropius, Oroſius, Sidonius Apollinaris, &c. Afterwards he confutes the arguments that Sozomen and Evagrius have oppoſed, the former to the Pagan authors in general, the latter to Zoſimus in particular. I. We may obſerve in the firſt place that he mutilates their arguments, and that he ſhould not have affirmed that Sozomen denied the death of Criſpus (22); for that hiſtorian is ſatisfied with leaving the matter doubtful, and only confutes the conſequences which the Pagans would infer from it. The argument, he urges againſt them, is much better than Baronius makes it; for if Conſtantine and Criſpus had jointly enacted laws in favour of chriſtianity, as Sozomen ſuppoſes, it follows that Conſtantine had abjured the Pagan religion before the death of Criſpus; therefore he did not abjure it, becauſe he could not find in it the neceſſary expiations, ſtained as he was with the blood of his ſon, as the Pagans pretended. This is Sozomen's argument: the annaliſt deſtroys the force of it, by ſuppoſing that this author only ſaid, that Criſpus had made laws together with Conſtantine (23). His obſervation was not ſo indefinite: he ſaid thoſe laws were in favour of the chriſtians (24). Baronius does not deal more fairly with Evagrius: he charges him (25) with urging againſt Zoſimus, Euſebius's ſilence; but it is certain that Evagrius goes farther: he relates (26) three paſſages in Euſebius's eccleſiaſtical hiſtory, which teſtify, that the emperor Conſtantine was always zealous for the true faith, and that his ſon Criſpus, beloved of God, was like his father. II. In the ſecond place let us ſay, that Sozomen's other arguments have been well anſwered by the annaliſt (27), who has plainly made it appear that Soſipater the philoſopher was acquainted with Conſtantine, and ought to have told him, according to the Platonic hypotheſis, that the parricides of that emperor could never be expiated: and Zoſimus aſſures us that this was the anſwer that philoſopher did give Conſtantine. But he has been confuted (28) among other reaſons by this: that Soſipater could not be ignorant that the religion of the Greeks had expiatory ceremonies for the moſt heinous murders; witneſs Hercules who killed his ſons, and his hoſt, and yet found means to expiate it. Baronius (29) refutes theſe anſwers of Sozomen excellently well, by ſhewing a capital difference between the parricides of Conſtantine, and thoſe of Hercules. The former were committed by a prince in his ſenſes, and the latter by a madman, whoſe actions could not be deemed voluntary.

No doubt it will be asked, why this annaliſt undertakes to confirm the ſlanders of the Pagan authors, and confutes the eccleſiaſtical hiſtorians, who have anſwered them as well as they could. Does it become a cardinal to declare in a manner for infidels, who have affected to vilify Conſtantine's converſion, as if that emperor had only abjured Paganiſm, becauſe the diſcipline of it was ſo ſevere, that there was no remedy againſt the terrors of his own conſcience, whereas the chriſtians offered him an eaſy method to waſh away his guilt in the waters of baptiſm? we muſt not think Baronius does all this for nothing: he does it only to ſupport certain traditions which are favourable to the Roman ſee; he (30) makes uſe of this to confirm the acts of pope Silveſter, and to prove that Conſtantine received baptiſm at Rome, from that pope, a little before the celebration of the council of Nice. The annals of Idatius are not in his favour; for they place the death of Criſpus in the year 326. Father Pagi (31) places the third conſulſhip of Criſpus in the year 324. Conſult Godefroy's notes upon Philoſtorgius (32). After all, it is hard to imagine that, one year before or after the council of Nice, Conſtantine ſhould conſult a heathen philoſopher upon the expiatory ceremonies for murder. Could he be ſtill immerſed in Pagan ſuperſtition after ſo long a profeſſion of the true faith? note, that even to this day there are ſome people (33) who queſtion whether he put his wife Fauſta to death; and forgot not to compare the pagans with thoſe who have publiſhed, and do ſtill publiſh, that the reformers of the church in the XVIth century, did not leave the Romiſh communion, for any other cauſe but to free themſelves from the rigours of celibacy, and abſtinences, and that the liberty of living without auricular confeſſion, and without any auſterities, procured them a crowd of followers.

[C] His refuſal . . . expoſed him to the indignation, and rage of an empreſs.] Thoſe, who are beſt acquainted with affairs of gallantry, ſay that it is very imprudent to play the part of a tempter, when their deſign is nothing more than to try the virtue of a woman; for they run a very great hazard, if they go ſo far as to gain her conſent. The affront they do her, by neglecting the favourable diſpoſition ſhe is in, fills her with reſentment, which puts her upon inventing a thouſand ways to revenge herſelf: ſhe cannot bear to remember that ſhe has been deceived, and that the weakneſs ſhe diſcovered, has produced nothing; ſhe cannot, I ſay, think upon this without violent tranſports of rage, which her deceiver has reaſon to dread,

(b) Mr Baluze, in Lactant. de Morte Perſec. cap. xxvii, proves that this chronology is right.

(i) Michel Glycas, lib. iv, apud Baronium, ad ann. 324, n. 35.

(15) Of the death of Criſpus.

(16) Cauſſin, Holy Court, Tom. II, pag. m. 56.

(17) Sozomen. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. i, cap. v, pag. m. 406, 407.

(18) Evagrius, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. iii, cap. xli, pag. m. 371.

(19) Baron. ad ann. 324, n. 5, pag. m. 293.

(20) Idem. ibid. n. 7, pag. 294.

(21) Ibid. n. 8.

(22) Ut neget Criſpum occiſum à patre. Baron. ibid. n. 7. Non admittens omnino Criſpum à Conſtantino juſſum occidi. Id. ibid. n. 20. James Godefroi, Notis in Philoſt. pag. 50, makes the ſame miſtake.

(23) Eo uno utitur argumento quod Criſpus vivens ad vigeſimum uſque patris imperii annum pervenerit, multas interea leges cum eo ſtatuens. Baron. ad ann. 324, n. 7.

(24) Πολλοὺς σὺν αὐτῷ θέμενος νόμους ὑπὲρ Χριςιανῶν. Multas una cum patre leges pro Chriſtianis tulerat. Sozom. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. i, cap. v, pag. 406, 407.

(25) Baron. ad ann. 324, n. 8.

(26) Evagr. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. iii, cap. xli, p. 372.

(27) Baron ad ann. 324, n. 22, & ſeq.

(28) Sozom. Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. i, cap v, pag. 407.

(29) Baron. ad ann. 324, n. 25.

(30) Baron. n. 29, & ſeq. ad ann. 324.

(31) Pagi, Diſſer. Hypat. pag. 249.

(32) Jac. Gothofredus, in Philoſtorg. pag. 51.

(33) See Cellarius in Eutrop. lib. X.

deities, and that God ſent the leproſy upon him to reclaim him.

it is much worſe when a woman has declared herſelf firſt, and made advances which have met with ill ſucceſs. Wo to the man ſhe has tried in vain: ſhe meditates nothing but his ruin. The patriarch Joſeph is a proof of this (34): and beſides this great example in holy writ, the hiſtory of the heroic times will furniſh no leſs ſhining inſtances of the ſame: read the adventures of Bellerophon, and thoſe of the chaſte Hippolytus. The hiſtory of the following ages will alſo ſupply us with ſomething of the like, were it only in our Fauſta the falſe accuſer of Criſpus, who would not gratify her luſt. Juvenal has well obſerved, that if the ſhame of ſuch a denial inflames hatred, in that caſe a woman ſhews the greateſt cruelty.

(34) Gen. xxix.

Sed caſto quid forma nocet? quid profuit olim
Hippolyto grave propoſitum? quid Bellerophonti?
Erubuit nempe hæc ceu faſtidita repulſa:
Nec Stenobœa minus quam Creſſa excanduit, & ſe
Concuſſere ambæ, mulier ſæviſſima tunc eſt,
Cum ſtimulos odio pudor admovet (35).

(35) Juvenal, Sat. x, v. 324.

She may be handſome, yet be chaſte you ſay,
Good obſervator not ſo faſt away.
Did it not coſt one modeſt youth his life,
Who ſhunn'd th' embraces of his father's wife?
And was not t'other ſtrippling forc'd to fly,
Who coldly did his patron's queen deny?
The ladies charg'd them home, and turn'd the tale,
With ſhame they redden'd, and with ſpight grew pale.

'Tis dangerous to deny the longing dame,
She loſes pity who has loſt her ſhame.

Dryden.

An empreſs, a queen, and in general, ladies of the higheſt rank, are eſpecially to be dreaded when their enticements are ſlighted: their quality makes them more ſenſible of the injury, and gives them greater opportunities of revenge. To them may be well applied theſe words of Juno in Virgil (36):

(36) Virgil. Æneid. lib. 1, ver. 37.

Mene incepto deſiſtere victam?

Muſt I then vanquiſh'd quit the form'd deſign!

Upon ſuch occaſions a contempt of beauty is an offence which ſinks deep into the heart.

Manet alta mente repoſtum
Judicium Paridis ſpretæque injuria formæ (37).

(37) Id. ibid. ver. 26.

Deep graven in her heart the doom remain'd
Of partial Paris, and her form diſdain'd.

Dryden.

I know not whether Lactantius had made his diſciple (38) read the hiſtory of Phædra: it might have been of ſome ſervice to him.

(38) Criſpus the ſon of Conſtantine.

FEITHIUS (Everard) was born at Elburg in Guelderland, in the XVIth century. He ſpent ſome years in the ſtudy of philoſophy, after which he devoted himſelf entirely to polite learning, and made a great progreſs therein. He made himſelf maſter of the Greek, and even of the Hebrew tongue. The profeſſors of the Academy, which the French proteſtants had in Berne, gave an ample teſtimony of it. Having been abroad a long time, he returned into his own country, where he found every body in a conſternation on account of the Spaniſh expedition under Spinola. This made him reſolve to leave his native country. He retired into France, where he taught the Greek tongue, and was honoured with the friendſhip of Caſaubon, Meſſieurs du Puy, and Thuanus. As he was walking in Rochelle, attended with a ſervant, he was deſired to go into a certain citizens houſe (a). It could never be known ſince what became of him, tho' the magiſtrates made the moſt ſtrict inquiry. It was great pity; for if this young man had arrived to old age, he would have wonderfully improved literature. This opinion is founded upon the manuſcripts he left behind him (b); one of which was publiſhed at Leyden in 1677 [A].

(a) In civis Rupellani ædes vocatur. Brumanus, ubi infra.

(b) Taken from Brumanus, Epiſt. Dedicat. Antiquitatum Homericarum.

[A] One of his works was publiſhed at Leyden in 1677.] It is a volume in 12ves conſiſting of 350 pages, intituled Antiquitatum Homericarum libri quatuor. It contains a great deal of curious and uſeful learning. Henry Bruman rector of the college of Swol, great nephew to the author (1), took care to publiſh it. He promiſed alſo to collect Feithius's other writings which were diſperſed through the negligence of his heirs. I am well informed, that they are not all loſt, and that the tract De Athenienſium Republica, and that De Antiquitatibus Atticis, are in the hands of a moſt learned antiquary (2).

(1) Avo meo materno frater fuit (Feithius). Bruman. Epiſt. Dedic. Antiquit. Homer.

(2) Mr Cuper.

‘FELIBIEN (Andrew) Sieur des Avaux and de Javercy, counſellor, hiſtoriographer to the king, &c. made himſelf remarkable by his knowledge of the polite arts. He was of Chartres, where no ſooner had he finiſhed his claſſic learning at fourteen years of age, but he was ſent to Paris to learn the ſciences and fit himſelf for buſineſs. But his inclination for the muſes ſoon diſcovered itſelf. The firſt eſſays of his pen ſhewed the happineſs of his genius, and the gracefulneſs of his ſtyle. The Marquis de Fontenay-Mareüil being nominated a ſecond time ambaſſador extraordinary to Rome in 1647, Mr Felibien was appointed ſecretary to the embaſſy, and anſwered all the expectations of that worthy miniſter towards him. During his ſtay at Rome, his natural paſſion for the polite arts made him willingly ſacrifice all his leiſure time in viſiting perſons who excelled in them, and eſpecially the famous Mr Pouſſin, in whoſe converſation he became acquainted with the greateſt beauties which were in the ſtatues and paintings. From the ſublime ideas he then formed of the excellence and perfection of painting, he afterwards compoſed thoſe learned works which have gained him ſo much reputation. Upon his return from Italy he went to Chartres, and as his deſign was to ſettle, he married Mrs Marguerite le Maire, daughter to the king's advocate in the Preſidial, related as well as he to the beſt families in the city, and among others to the illuſtrious houſe of Aligre originally of Chartres. Afterwards his friends preſented him to Mr Foucquet, who would have given greater marks of 'his favour if he had not too ſoon fallen under diſgrace. But Mr Colbert, who loved the arts and ſciences, did not neglect him. After he had made him draw certain plans for his majeſty, that he might proceed upon the other works he had begun, he got for him a brevet to be hiſtoriographer to the king, to his buildings, and the arts and manufactures of France, which was diſpatched the 10th of March 1666. The royal academy of architecture being erected in 1671, he was choſen their ſecretary. After this his majeſty made him keeper of his cabinet of antiquities, and gave him an apartment in the Brion palace. He had alſo one of the firſt places in the royal academy of inſcriptions and medals. Monſ. le Pelletier ſucceeding Monſ. Colbert in the direction of the finances, appointed Mr Felibien by commiſſion to be comptroller-general of the bridges and cauſeways of the kingdom. Tho' he had buſineſs enough upon his hands, he did not refuſe his aſſiſtance to the poor, being many years adminiſtrator of the hoſpital of the Quinzes-vingts at Paris .... He died the 11th of June 1695, at the Age of ſeventy ſix years. He left five children (a) [A].' We ſhall ſee, below, the catalogue of his principal works, with the abridgment of the encomium upon them, and the character of his heart [B]. See the journal des Savans of the 28th of November 1695.

(a) Taken word for word from a memoir received from Paris.

[A] He left five children.] 'Three ſons and two daughters: the eldeſt ſon, formerly dean of the cathedral church of Bourges, is now vicar-general in that archbiſhopric. The ſecond ſucceded him in the office of hiſtoriographer to the king, and keeper of his majeſty's antiquities. We have of his an hiſtorical collection of the lives and works of the moſt celebrated architects. The third is a monk, Dom Michael Felibien of the congregation of St Maur (1).'

[B] We ſhall ſee the catalogue of his principal works, with the abridgment of the encomium upon them, and the character of his heart.] 'His chief books are the conferences upon the lives and works of the moſt excellent painters, ancient and modern, in two volumes in 4to, the ſecond edition. The principles of architecture, ſculpture, and painting, with a dictionary of the proper terms in thoſe arts in 4to. Of the origin of painting together with ſeveral miſcellaneous pieces in 4to. Several deſcriptions either of Verſailles, or of the diverſions given by the king, or of pictures, collected into one volume in 12ves. The conferences of the royal academy of painting in one volume in 4to. The deſcription of the abbey de la Trappe in 12ves; and he alſo left ſome tranſlations, as an account of what paſſed in Spain at the diſgrace of the count duke of Olivares; tranſlated from the Italian; the caſtle of the ſoul of St Thereſa tranſlated from the Spaniſh. The life of pope Pius V tranſlated from the Italian. There appears in whatever he wrote, a ſolid judgment, an exquiſite taſte, great politeneſs and perſpicuity. His ſtile is pure, natural, noble, and elegant. The variety of things he has mixed together, eſpecially in his dialogues, and the beautiful ſtrokes he has interſperſed with a ſuitable decorum to his Subject, makes the reading of them exceedingly delightful. But however great his talents were, it was not from thence alone that he gained ſo much eſteem. It was partly owing to the reputation of his integrity; and the honour to be employed by five miniſters ſucceſſively, who were excellent judges of men, is an authentic proof of their approving his conduct. The king himſelf more than once commended his knowledge and virtue. Had he been ambitious or leſs moderate than he was, he might eaſily have advanced himſelf more in the world, being always welcome to the great men at court, but he could never bring himſelf to handle other people's money; which was his great conſolation at his death. Between eight and nine thouſand livres which he annually received from the king's favours, together with his own paternal eſtate, ſeemed to him a ſufficient reward for a man of letters, who ought rather to be a friend to virtue, than a ſlave to fortune. He always preſerved a great ſenſe of honour and religion. Though he was naturally of a grave and ſerious temper, nay, haſty and ſevere, yet his converſation was very agreeable, and upon occaſion gay and ſprightly. He had a heart full of ſincerity and regard to truth, to which he excited himſelf by theſe words, benefacere & dicere vera, which he had cauſed to be engraven upon his ſeal, and which they put in the exerge of his medal. He lived in the practice of theſe two duties, which make the honeſt man, and the true chriſtian (2).' You may find all this more particularly in the journal des Savans (3).

(1) Taken word for word from a memoir received from Paris.

(2) Taken from the ſame memoir.

(3) Of the 28th of November, 1695, pag. 695, & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

FENOILLET (Peter) biſhop of Montpellier in the XVIIth century, was of Annecy in Savoy. He applied himſelf to ſtudy with great diligence, and after receiving his doctor's degree in divinity, he applied himſelf to preaching, and became very famous in it. He was much eſteemed by Francis de Sales biſhop of Geneva, who gave him a benefice in his dioceſe, after which he was made canon of the cathedral of Annecy. Being invited to Paris to preach during Lent, he was ſo much applauded, that Henry IV honoured him with the title of his preacher, and at the end of three years nominated him to the biſhopric of Montpellier (a).

(a) Taken from the fourth letter of the firſt book of Francis de Sales, pag. 24, 25, Paris edit. 1662, in 8vo.

FERNELIUS (John) phyſician to Henry II, king of France, was born in Picardy [A]. He was ſent ſomething late to Paris to learn rhetoric and philoſophy; but he made ſo ſwift a progreſs, that commencing maſter of arts at the end of two years, the heads of the college unanimouſly offered him to be teacher of Logic, with a very conſiderable ſalary. He refuſed theſe offers, chuſing rather by private ſtudy, and lectures, to fit himſelf for a public profeſſion. He followed his ſtudies with ſuch application,

[A] He was born in Picardy.] I confine my ſelf to this general expreſſion, to be more ſecure; for I ſee on one hand that he ſtiles himſelf Ambianus, a native of Amiens, and on the other that we are aſſured in his life, that he was born at Clermont, twenty miles from Paris, and that he took the ſirname of Ambianus, becauſe his father was of Amiens. Claromontio oppidulo (quod viginti duntaxat milliaribus à Lutetia diſtat) natus atque ingenue educatus, Ambianum in operibus idcirco ſe prædicat, quod patrem inde habuerit (1). By Clermont is to be underſtood here Clermont in Beauvaiſis. Dom Peter de St Romuald alledges another reaſon why Fernelius was named Ambianus. 'He was born, ſays he (2), at Clermont in Beauvaiſis, in a houſe in the ſuburbs, where to this day hangs the ſign of the ſwan. Some have called him Ambianois, becauſe the ſuburb he was born in is called the ſuburb of Amiens. Mezerai affirms (3) that Fernelius was a native of Montdidier in the dioceſe of Amiens.

(1) G. Plantius, in vita Fernelii, initio.

(2) Abrégé du Threſ. Chronol. Tom. III, at the year 1558.

(3) Hiſtoire de France, Tom. II, pag. 1558.

tion, that he denied himſelf the moſt innocent pleaſures of life which might deprive him of his Cicero, his Plato, or his Ariſtotle (a). He got this advantage by reading Cicero, that his philoſophical lectures were as eloquent as thoſe of other maſters were barbarous at that time. He alſo applied himſelf much to the mathematics; this hard ſtudy threw him into a long fit of ſickneſs, which forced him to leave Paris. Returning thither after the recovery of his health, he reſolved to ſtudy Phyſic; but before he entered upon it, he taught a courſe of philoſophy in St Barbe's college. After this he ſpent four years in the ſtudy of phyſic, and taking his doctor's degree, he confined himſelf entirely to his cloſet in order to read the beſt authors, and cultivate the knowledge of the mathematics. He had an intimate friendſhip with an excellent rhetorician (b), who taught him polite learning, and whom he inſtructed in the mathematics. The inſtruments he invented, and ordered to be made in this ſcience, were very expenſive to him, which the wife, he had juſt married, not approving of, it breaking in upon her fortune, ſhe murmured, wept, and complained to her father (c), and incenſed him againſt Fernelius; at length he deſiſted, diſmiſſed all his inſtrument-makers, and applied himſelf wholly to the practice of phyſic; but becauſe viſiting the ſick could not take up all the time of a man, who, like him, allowed very little to eating and ſleeping [B], he reſumed an occupation which he had followed before he was doctor in phyſic; I mean he read public lectures upon Hippocrates and Galen. This ſoon acquired him a very great reputation through all France, and in foreign countries. He was forced at the end of ſix years to break off theſe lectures; for the eſteem he was in drew ſuch multitudes of patients to him, that he had not time to aſſiſt all thoſe that came to conſult him; but as nothing could make him leave his private ſtudies, he employed all his leiſure hours in compoſing a book of phyſic (d), which was publiſhed ſome time after. His diſciples preſſed him ſo warmly to read lectures upon this work, that he reſolved to do it notwithſtanding the oppoſition of his wife [C], and the advice of his friends. He ſpent three years in theſe lectures, and as during that time he undertook another work, which he alſo made public (e), he laid himſelf in a manner under a neceſſity of reading publickly ſome years longer, for they paſſionately deſired him to explain that ſecond book to the youth

(a) See the Remark [B].

(b) James Strebæus.

(c) He was a counſellor at Paris. But it is not ſaid in what court.

(d) This is the book which he intituled Phyſiologia.

(e) De venæ ſectione.

[B] He allowed little time to eating and ſleep.] Every other pleaſure but that of learning was inſipid to to him; he valued neither play, nor walking, nor entertainments, nor converſations. I ſpeak of the time when he was yet only a ſcholar. 'Ludos, jocos, 'compotationes, & comeſſationes, ſermones etiam omnium pene condiſcipulorum, ac familiarium, fugere 'ſtatuit, non cibi, non ſomni, non corporis, non valetudinis, non rei familiaris rationem habere, omnia 'perpeti, dum liberalium artium cognitionem aſſequeretur: omne in eis ſtudium, diligentiam, curam, induſtriam adhibere, nullam præterquam ex diſcendo 'voluptatem capere: arbitratus omnem horam perire 'quæ in bonorum authorum lectione & ſtudiis non 'collocaretur: tanta in illius animo inſita erat diſcendi cupiditas, tantus cognitionis amor & ſcientiæ '(4).—— He ſhunned all plays, diverſions, clubs, entertainments, the converſation of his companions, and 'friends, and payed no regard to feaſting, ſleeping, dreſs, 'exerciſe, health, or fortune, but devoted himſelf entirely to ſtudy; laying out all his application, induſtry, 'and care in the ſearch of learning, in which was his 'ſole delight. He imagined every hour was loſt that was 'not dedicated to the reading of good Authors, ſuch was 'his deſire for learning, ſuch was his love for knowledge and improvement.' The ſequel of his life did not contradict ſuch a beginning; never man was more active than he. He roſe at four a clock in the morning, and ſtudied till the time came on to read the public lectures, or to viſit the ſick. Then he examined the urines that were brought to him, and preſcribed medicines according to the conjectures he could form (5). When he returned home to dinner, he ſhut himſelf up with his books till he was called to ſit down to table, from table went into his cloſet again, which he did not leave till he was called to go abroad upon buſineſs. When he returned in the evening, he did as at noon, attended his books till called to ſupper; after ſupper he reſumed them again till eleven at night, when he lay down to reſt. When he had invited any friend to eat with him, he made no ſcruple to leave them as ſoon as the entertainment was over, and go to his books again. 'Omnia animi & corporis oblectamenta præ literarum ſtudiis, & medicæ artis exercitatione, pro nihilo ducens: ut nulla vitæ pars neque publicis, neque privatis, neque medicis, neque domeſticis in rebus vacaſſe officio videretur. Si quem fortè ad cœnam vel 'prandium aliquando invitaret, ab eo neque turpe, 'neque inhoneſtum ducebat, aliquantò poſt ſumptum 'cibum ſtudiorum cauſa ſe ſurripere (6).'

Some years before his death, at his wife's requeſt, he bought a country houſe (7): but he never went to it but once or twice a year to refreſh himſelf. He found more pleaſure in an active life, and in the exerciſe of his profeſſion than in retirement. 'Erat 'hoc robore animi, atque hac indole virtutis, & continentiæ, ut reſpueret omnes voluptates, omnemque 'vitæ ſuæ curſum in labore corporis atque in animi 'contentione conficeret; quem non quies, non remiſſio, non æqualium ſtudia, non ludi, non convivia delectarent, nihil in vita expetendum putaret, 'niſi quod eſſet cum laude, & honore, & cum dignitate conjunctum (8). —— He was of that ſtrength 'of mind, of ſuch a diſpoſition to virtue and continence, 'that he rejected all manner of pleaſures, and ſpent his 'whole time in the labour of his body, and the application of his mind. Neither reſt, relaxation, the company of his equals, plays, nor feaſts, had any charms 'for him. He thought nothing in the world was 'worthy his deſires, except what was attended with 'dignity and honour.' He never ſent away the ſick that came to implore his aſſiſtance, how poor ſoever they were; and, they came in ſuch great numbers to him in ſummer time, that he had not leiſure to ſit down to table, but dined ſtanding. 'Tantus ægrorum numerus ad eum confugiebat, ut per totam fere 'æſtatem ſtans prandere cogeretur: neminem quantumlibet pauperem à ſe abire dimittebat morbi quo 'angeretur ignarum, remediiſque ad eum profligandum 'deſtitutum (9).' When he was adviſed to give himſelf a little relaxation, his anſwer was that death would give him time enough to reſt in. 'Quod ſi illum 'nonnunquam de curanda corporis ſui valetudine, deque nocturnis ſtudiis intermittendis, commonefacerem, '& ad quieſcendum cohortarer, (erat enim ſomni 'parciſſimus) reſponſum in promptu habere ſolebat, 'Longa quieſcendi tempora fata dabunt.

The wives of ſuch phyſicians are much to be pitied, when they love their husbands, and are not of a covetous temper; for indifference and avarice can find relief in ſuch an abſence of the Husband.

[C] Notwithſtanding the oppoſition of his wife.] It is not hard to gueſs why his wife would not conſent to ſuch kinds of lectures: they hindered him from ſeing his patients, and ſo conſiderably diminiſhed the daily profit of his practice. His hiſtorian is not ſilent upon this damage: 'Quod onus . . . uxore, a'micis

(4) Plantius, in vita Fernelii.

(5) It was the method of the common people in thoſe times. They did not call a phyſician, but ſent the patient's urine to him, and he preſcribed for them. See Plantius, in vita Fernelii.

(6) Plantius, ibid.

(7) Ibid.

(8) Ibid.

(9) Ibid.

youth alſo. He had not gone thro' this when he was called to court, to ſee if he could cure a lady, whoſe cure was deſpaired of [D]: he happily ſucceeded, and this was the firſt cauſe of the eſteem which king Henry II, who was then only dauphin, and tenderly love that lady, had for him. That prince offered him the place of his firſt phyſician; but Fernelius, who preferred his ſtudies to the tumult of a court, refuſed the offer, and even made uſe of ſome artifice to get leave to return to Paris [E]. He obtained it without any diminution of the penſion that had been promiſed him (f). Having finiſhed the explication of his book, he was continually ſollicited to read upon ſomething elſe; but the multitudes of patients, who ſent for him, hindered him from engaging in it (g). However, he did not ceaſe from being ſerviceable to the public, otherwiſe than by his practice. In his ſpare time he compoſed a work de abditis rerum cauſis, which was followed by ſeven books of pathology; after which he treated of medicines [F]. Before he had finiſhed this laſt work, he was forced to obey the orders of Henry II: that prince would have him with him as his firſt phyſician, and it happened juſt contrary to what Fernelius had dreaded; for he found more quiet and leiſure at court than he had had at Paris, and had it

(f) It was of ſix hundred livres.

(g) Hoc perfunctus munere alia quædam Hippocratis & Galeni interpretari ſcripta cogitabat, idque ab eo quotidianis precibus & acclamationibus contendebant philiatri omnes, ſed præ ægrorum qui undique ad eum opis cauſa quotidie confugiebant turba, id muneris aggredi non potuit. G. Plantius, in vita Fernelii.

micis omnibus, & ægrorum curis reclamantibus, vel magno rei domeſticæ diſpendio ſuſcepit (10). —— This laborious employ he undertook, notwithſtanding the inſtances of his wife and friends, and the inconvenience which would attend his practice.'

[D] He was called to court, to ſee if he could cure a lady whoſe cure was deſpaired of.] Thoſe who imagine that the hiſtorian had a view to the barrenneſs of Catherine de Medicis, would be groſsly deceived, and this will be eaſily granted me if his manner of expreſſion be conſidered (11): ‘Nec abſolverat ejus commentationis explicationem, cùm in graviſſimo mulieris nobiliſſimæ (12) caſu ad aulicos quaſi edicto regio rapitur. Pervagabatur enim incredibilis ad hujus imperii proceres de Fernelii eruditione fama & perſuaſio, quaſi unus eſſet è Galliæ Medicis calamitoſi illius morbi perſtrenuus oppugnator, & impendentis mortis fortiſſimus vindex, malorumque depulſor, quaſi Hercules Alexicacus: quam ille opinionem de ſe ſtrenuè ſuſtinuit, ut non tam ſit creditus mulierem in vita retinuiſſe, quàm jam profligata ſalute ex inferorum faucibus revocaſſe. —— Before he had finiſhed the explication of his commentary, he was ſent for to court, as it were by a mandate from the king, on a moſt dangerous caſe of a lady of great quality: for the nobles of this kingdom, from the incredible reputation which had ſpread itſelf of him, had entertained a belief, that he was the only phyſician in France that could combat with ſucceſs that deplorable diſtemper, the braveſt champion againſt impending death, and a very Hercules at deſtroying and driving away diſtempers; which opinion of him he bravely kept up, it being believed, that he did not ſo much keep the lady alive, as reſcue her from the moſt deſperate circumſtances, and the cloſing jaws of death.' Firſt it is a queſtion whether Catherine de Medicis is intended here at all: in the ſecond place, no doubt nothing leſs than her barrenneſs was deſigned. If the author meant to ſpeak of that princeſs who was then dauphineſs, is it not ſtrange that he ſhould deſcribe her by the general name of a lady of great quality? Is it not ſtrange that he ſhould ſay ſhe was moſt tenderly beloved by the dauphin (13)? if it was not the dauphineſs, the expreſſion is good and proper: it might be a miſtreſs: it might be a lady for whom the dauphin had a particular friendſhip; but if it was his wife, the hiſtorian explains himſelf impertinently. It is always ſuppoſed in relations of this kind that a husband loves his wife, that he is extreamly concerned for his wife's cure, and is exceedingly grateful to the phyſicians who cure her. It is ſufficient then to obſerve that the patient is his wife; and if they will uſe the word chariſſima, tenerrima, it ſhould be brought in after the term uxor, or conjux, is employed. From whence I conclude, that that author, having wrote with eloquence and judgment, would not have expreſſed himſelf as he has done, if he had deſigned to ſpeak of a diſtemper of the dauphineſs. Add to this another reaſon. It would have been an additional glory to John Fernelius, if the lady he cured had been the dauphineſs: why then ſhould his hiſtorian, who ſeeks to load him with honour and encomium, have concealed the principal title of that lady? ſo much for the firſt point: the ſecond is ſtill clearer. Catherine de Medicis was very healthy while ſhe was barren; ſhe tired her horſe, ſhe rode a hunting with the the king (14), and neither her life nor health ſeemed to be in any danger from her continuing without having children. Therefore ſhe was not cured of a mortal diſtemper, when he gave her medicines againſt barrenneſs; ſo that it cannot be meant of her, ſince the queſtion here is of a morbus calamitoſus, of mors impendens, of profligata ſalus, of an ex inferorum faucibus revocatio.

I do not inſiſt on all theſe obſervations without reaſon; it is to draw from thence a ſtrong proof againſt thoſe who ſay Fernelius cured the barrenneſs of the dauphineſs. This is a fact which appears very dubious to me, ſince his beloved diſciple ſays nothing of it, and yet ſpeaks of another cure leſs important than this would have been. It is not at all probable that he ſhould be ignorant of ſo ſhining a circumſtance in Fernelius's life, or that knowing it he ſhould paſs it by in ſilence in the hiſtory of that phyſician. Who ſhould know this adventure, if Plantius was ignorant of it? Plantius, I ſay, bred up ſo long at the feet of this Gamaliel, and admitted to his greateſt confidence? and who was fitter to publiſh a thing ſo glorious to the memory of his good maſter than this diſciple? he forgot it, may ſome ſay, when he reſolved to write the hiſtory of John Fernelius: but would he not have recollected it when he was giving an account of his maſter's firſt journey to court? could this lady, abandoned by her Phyſicians, ſo dear to the dauphin Henry, come into his mind without exciting the idea of a dauphineſs, rendered fruitful by Fernelius's remedies? Credat Judæus Apella.

[E] He made uſe of ſome artifice to get leave to return to Paris.] They were not ſatisfied with the reaſons he alledged that he was not skillful enough to be truſted with the health of princes, but if they would let him return to Paris, he would uſe the utmoſt diligence to make himſelf more fit and worthy to ſerve the dauphin. When he found theſe arguments would not ſerve his turn, he pretended to be ſick, and got a ſurgeon who could ſpeak familiarly to the prince, to tell him that he had a pleuriſy, which grief would infallibly render mortal, and that his grief proceeded from ſeeing himſelf ſeparated from his books, lectures, and family and engaged in a life of hurry and tumult. ‘Simulata pleuritide & conficta ementitaque à Chirurgo qui principi familiaris erat periculi magnitudine, per eum nuntiari jubet tanti mali cauſam ab animi ægritudine & mœrore proficiſci, quod à ſtudiis eſſet abductus, &c (15). The prince believing this lye gave Fernelius leave to retire. Muſt not a man be ſtrangely in love with ſtudy, and a philoſophic life, to employ ſo many machines not to be a court phyſician, that is, to avoid an employment that others endeavour to obtain by all manner of ways? when Henry II ſucceeded to the throne, he renewed his inſtances; but Fernelius repreſented that the honour offered him was due upon many accounts, and as an hereditary right, to the late king's phyſician, and alſo that he wanted ſome time to make experiments on ſeveral things which he had diſcovered in phyſic. A time was granted him acordingly; but when the phyſician of Francis I was dead, Fernelius was obliged to go and ſupply his place to Henry II.

[F] He treated of medicines.] He had finiſhed his book of compound remedies, and was working upon ſimple remedies, of which he had diſcovered ſome virtues unknown to the ancients. He communicated them to no body; he deſired the world might know to whom the honour of the diſcovery was due; he therefore deſigned not to make them known till the publication of his book. The neceſſity he was under of following

(10) Ibid.

(11) Ibid.

(12) No regard ought to be had to this ſummary in the margin, reginam curavit, for probably the bookſellers cauſed it to be put there.

(13) Henrico Galliarum regi deſignato cui illa chariſſima erat.

(14) Brantome's diſcourſe on that queen.

(15) Plantius, in vita Fernelii.

it not been for the journies that prince was obliged to take by the breaking out again of the war, his phyſician could have looked upon the court as a pleaſant retreat. Returning from the Calais expedition, he ſent his wife to Fontainbleau; the good woman was ſo grieved to be ſeparated from her family, that ſhe fell ſick and died of a phrenzy ſhortly after. This afflicted him ſo deeply, that twelve days after his wife's funeral he fell ſick, and died the eighteenth day of his illneſs (b) [G]. I ſhall make a remark upon the number of his years [H]. He got a great deal of money ing the court, hindered him from ſetting his laſt hand to this work. The greateſt concern he had upon his death-bed, was, that he could not finiſh it. 'Hic dolor hominem præcipue angebat, hæc cura ſollicitabat quod therapeuticæ poſtremæ Medicinæ parti in qua multum diuque verſatus erat, quamque ſuis inventis plurimum locupletare poterat, extremam manum non addidiſſet (16). —— His greateſt concern was, that he could not put the laſt hand to the laſt part of his diſcourſes on Phyſic, namely the Therapeutic, about which he had been a long time employed, and which he could have greatly enriched with diſcoveries of his own.' This is the reaſon that in his works there is an excellent pathology to be found, and but little therapeutic. See the Journal des Savans for the month of April 1666.

[G] He was ſo grieved at the death of his wife ..... that he died the eighteenth day of his diſtemper.] Conſidering Plantius's narrative, it may be ſaid that divers cauſes concurred to Fernelius's death. His ſpleen was diſtempered: and grief coming on made it worſe, from whence iſſued a continual fever. He would not have died ſo ſoon, neither with his diſtemper of the ſpleen without his grief, nor of grief without the diſtemper of the ſpleen. It is true his grief did not ariſe wholly from the loſs of his wife, many other things before that having extreamly afflicted him. 'Quum cauſæ quædam externæ hæque graves admodum acerbiſſimum mœrorem attuliſſent, ſuperveniente uxoris obitu quo omnia exaſperata ſunt, humor in liene collectus tandem incaleſcens atque putreſcens, inflammationem ejus viſceris peperit, unde & febris accenſa eſt continua (17). —— Some external cauſes of a very bad nature having thrown him into a ſtate of melancholy, his condition was rendered ſtill worſe by the death of his wife. A humour being collected in his ſpleen, which fermented at length and putrified cauſed an inflammation in his bowels, which ended in a continual fever.' But tho' no notice ſhould be taken of theſe circumſtances, yet it would plainly appear that the abbot Des Landes is ſtrangely miſtaken. 'John Fernelius, ſays he (18), having been called to court by a princeſs who was diſconſolate at her barrenneſs, and hearing of his Wife's death, fell down at the princeſs's feet, from whence they carrried him to his grave in the church of St James de la Boucherie.' This princeſs no doubt is Catherine de Medicis who was rid of her barrenneſs in the year 1543. Now Fernelius and his wife did not die till the year 1558, and beſides it is not true that this phyſician died a ſudden death. He did not fall ſick till ten or twelve days after he had buried his wife, and did not die till the eighteenth day of his diſtemper.

[H] I ſhall make a remark upon the number of his years] If we believe Plantius, his hiſtorian, he died in the ſeventy ſecond year of his life, in 1557, a little after the taking of Calais. That city was ſubdued by Henry II, in the month of January 1557, according to the way of reckoning at that time, that is if the year is not begun in the month of January; but if it begun as we begin it, it was in 1558 that the town of Calais was taken. Plantius obſerves, that it had been a hundred years in the hands of the Engliſh. He ſhould have ſaid two hundred and eleven years. Fernelius's epitaph places his death on the twenty ſixth of April. If the day is right in the epitaph, it muſt be concluded that Plantius is wrong in the year; for the twenty ſixth of April, which follows the reduction of Calais, belongs to the year 1558, even according to the old way of reckoning. If Thuanus places the day right on the twenty ſeventh of March (19), then Plantius may be right in the year. But this is not the chief point. The epitaph gives Fernelius only a life of fifty two years. Plantius gives him ſeventy two. It muſt not be thought that the printers have put 72 inſtead of 52; for we find in that ſame life of Fernelius: 1. That he was about ſixty years of age when he was made firſt phyſician to the King. 2. That he practiſed phyſic at Paris thirty years. 3. That he did ſeveral things before he applied himſelf to viſit the ſick; ſo that we may be very ſure that Plantius aſſigned him ſeventy two years; and yet the epitaph, which is drawn up by the ſon-in-law of Fernelius, gives him but fifty two years. Let us ſet down a paſſage of Guy Patin (20): 'Since you are printing Fernelius's works, I would deſire you to correct a fault which thoſe of Utrecht made in their impreſſion (21), when they ſay, in his life, that he died in the ſeventy ſecond year of his age; which is falſe, for I can aſſure you that it was only in the fifty ſecond. I had it from the late Mr de Villeray, maſter of the requeſts, ſon to a daughter of Fernelius, who died but in 1642. I had it alſo from other relations of his, and it is a conſtant tradition in his family. But, without taking notice of tradition, which is not always to be depended upon, I have two poſitive proofs of it. One is taken from the regiſter of our Faculty, which I had when I was dean; where it is expreſsly ſaid, that Fernelius died the twenty ſixth of April, 1558, anno ætatis 52. The other argument is taken from his epitaph at St James de la Boucherie, which I have ſhewed to a great many: where it is alſo ſaid, that he died at the age of fifty two years. The author of this epitaph is there called Philippus (22) Barjotius, Fernelii gener, who was maſter of the requeſts, and preſident of the great council, and married his eldeſt daughter; Mr Giles de Riant, preſident au Mortier, married the ſecond, and died in the year 1597; his widow lived forty five years after him.' Theſe arguments of Guy Patin can hardly be anſwered. Had he alledged only the epitaph, his argument had not been ſo deciſive as he pretended: for who is ſure that the engraver did not omit two XX, which would reduce ſeventy two to fifty two? He might more eaſily be miſtaken, if he made uſe of figures inſtead of letters, for a 5 is ſoon put for a 7. Thoſe that know that an author, when he corrects his proofs, doth not ſometimes perceive that his printers have prodigiouſly altered his figures and numerical letters (23), will not find it ſtrange that Fernelius's ſon-in-law did not perceive the engraver's miſtake. But, as I have already ſaid, Guy Patin's arguments do not wholly depend on the epitaph. However, I will object two things againſt him: 1. I cannot well conceive, that one of Fernelius's diſciples, who was ten years his confident, ſhould be ſo ſtrangely miſtaken in his maſter's age; what, could he be miſtaken twenty years, and would he compoſe his life without informing himſelf a little better of the age he was to aſſign him? 2. If this diſciple errs with reſpect to the age, he muſt needs err in many other particulars. He is wrong when he relates, that Fernelius began his ſtudies late (24); and it is not true, that Fernelius ſtudied two years in St Barbe's college, and afterwards with ſo much application in private, that he contracted a quartan-ague, which obliged him to go into the country. 'Febre quartana TANDEM corripitur, qua crudeliter ac DIU conflictatus cœptum ſtudiorum curſum interrumpere, utque ſalubriore aëre frueretur ſolum vertere cogitur (25). —— He was at length ſeized with a quartan-ague, which having afflicted him a long time very cruelly, he was obliged to break off the courſe of his ſtudies, and retire into the country, in order to enjoy the benefit of a more wholeſome air.' How is it poſſible, that after his recovery, being returned to Paris, and having deliberated what profeſſion to chooſe, he could have been two years regent in St Barbe's college? How can, I ſay, theſe things be, ſince we know that he printed ſome books of mathematics in 1526 (26): now taking things at worſt, it cannot be ſuppoſed that thoſe books appeared at any other time but while he was regent. Where ſhall we then find the time that he publiſhed them in, according to Plantius's relation, if it be true that Fernelius died at the age of fifty two years? He muſt then have been author of a book of aſtronomy

---

(b) Taken from his life, written by William Plantius, his diſciple, native of Mans. It is prefixed to Fernelius's works in all the editions.

(i) See the remark [I].

(16) Id. ibid.

(17) Id. ibid. See Thevet. Tom. VII, pag. 331.

(18) In a letter inſerted in the Mercure Galant, of November, 1693, pag. 197. See, above, remark [C], of the article CHARNACE.

(19) Thuanus, Hiſt. lib. xxi, pag. 431.

(20) Patin, letter cxvii, of the firſt tome.

(21) Patin is in the wrong to impute this to the authors of the edition of Utrecht; for they only printed the life of Fernelius writ by William Plantius.

(22) It ſhould have been Philibertus.

(23) I know it by experience.

(24) Jam natu grandis quum ſub triviali magiſtro grammaticam didiciſſet, etiamſi mater rebus eum curiſque domeſticis potius quam literis TAM SERO deſtinandum contenderet. - - - Being now grown up, he had learned grammar from a petty maſter, tho' his mother, at that advanced age, had rather intended him for buſineſs than for books. Plantius, in vita Fernelii, init.

(25) Id. ibid.

(26) Geſner. in Biblioth.

money [I], and married his two daughters very advantageouſly (i). It is a common opinion that he cured Catherine de Medicis of her barrenneſs [K], and was magnificently rewarded by her for it [L]. We ſhall collect together in one remark the faults at the age of twenty (27). But how doth this ſuit with his beginning late his grammar and rhetoric? We muſt take notice, that, in Fernelius's time, a ſcholar, that learned philoſophy before he was twenty, was thought very forward. A country youth, who was ſent to Paris at fifteen or ſixteen years of age, to go through his ſchool-learning, was not reckoned to begin his ſtudies too late. I lay no ſtreſs on Thevet's authority (28), becauſe he only copied Plantius both with reſpect to the ſeventy two years, he aſcribes to Fernelius, and every thing elſe.

[I] He got a great deal of money.] Plantius (29) ſays, that for the ſpace of ten years that he was with Fernelius, this phyſician often got above twelve thouſand livres, and rarely or never under ten thouſand livres a year. Here is a paſſage of an author, whom I have already quoted: 'They found thirty thouſand crowns of gold in his ſtudy, for he died very rich: he left, beſides that, thirty ſix thouſand livres a year to be divided between his two only daughters (30).' If we believe his hiſtory, he was kind to his family, but a lover of gain: Attentus quidem ad rem familiarem, ſed in ſuos beneficus & liberalis (31). Scaliger ſays on this account, and on another more tender point, ſome things very offenſive. Fernelius Get-penny, who came in repute for having facilitated the queen-mother's delivery. 'Habuit ſalaciſſimam filiam, cui dedit decem millia aureorum pro dote (32). —— He had a moſt leud daughter with whom he gave ten thouſand crowns in marriage.' Thoſe who will know ſomething of Fernelius's Poſterity, may read this paſſage of Guy Patin (33).' In the nunnery of The Viſitation at Lyons, there is a gentlewoman, daughter to Mr de Riant counſellor of ſtate. Her mother is Mary des Prez, niece to Mr Narbonne. This pretty nun, who hath not as yet taken the veil, among other good qualities, is conſiderable for her birth, being deſcended from our great Fernelius, who was truly an incomparable phyſician. He left two daughters: the firſt was married to Mr Barjot, preſident of the great council, and maſter of the requeſts; from whom is deſcended Mr d' Annœuil, now ſteward to the king. Annœuil is a country-ſeat of twelve thouſand livres a year in our province of Picardy, near Beauvais, two leagues from my native country. Fernelius's youngeſt daughter was married to Giles de Riant, preſident au Mortier, who died in the year 1597. Her name was Magdalen, and ſhe died in the year 1642, in the month of March, aged ninety four. Et generatio rectorum benedicetur. I am ſorry that I did not go formerly to Villeray au Perche (where ſhe died), on purpoſe to have the honour of ſeeing her, and kiſſing her hands. They make us kiſs relics which do not ſo well deſerve it; ſo that your pretty nun may boaſt, that ſhe is ſprung from the greateſt man in our profeſſion ſince Galen, Fernelius being her great-great-grandfather.'

[K] It is a common opinion, that he cured Catherine de Medicis of her barrenneſs.] They pretend, that Henry II propoſed this affair to him in very odd terms: Mr Doctor, can you get my wife with child? And they will have, that Fernelius anſwered, very prudently, It is GOD, Sir, who muſt give you children by his bleſſing: It is your buſineſs to beget them, and mine to apply thoſe remedies of phyſic, which GOD hath ordained for human infirmities (34). Mr Varillas tells us what expedient Fernelius made uſe of: 'The people, ſays he (35), were perſuaded, that the queen-mother, after ten years barrenneſs, had conceived the king, only becauſe the firſt phyſician (36) Fernelius had adviſed Henry II to lie with her during her courſes; and that thoſe, that were got ſo, were liable to this ſhameful diſeaſe (37).' According to Mezerai (38), Francis II was from his infancy very ſickly, being the firſt child of a mother who had her courſes but late. And indeed ſeveral pretend that Catherine de Medicis became fruitful, meerly becauſe a remedy was found againſt the ſuppreſſion of her flowers (39). This expedient is very different from that which Varillas relates. We have ſeen, that Scaliger talks of another ſervice performed by Fernelius: He inſinuates, that this phyſician was called whilſt the queen was in labour, and gave ſome proper remedies for her eaſy delivery. This would better agree with the cure of a great lady mentioned by Plantius. But as there ſeems to be no reaſon that could induce him to conceal from the public, that Fernelius procured a happy delivery to the dauphineſs, who was in danger of dying; I perſiſt in my opinion, that he did not mean Catherine de Medicis, and to draw from his ſilence a very cogent argument to doubt of what is contained in the text of this remark. According to Brantome, They ſaid at court, that it was not ſo much the fault of the dauphineſs, as of the dauphin, that he had no children (40). And upon that, he relates the jeſt of a lady. Here was a fine opportunity to relate what is ſaid of Fernelius, and yet he ſays nothing of it. Doth his ſilence ſignify but little? Had Thuanus in Fernelius's encomium forgot ſo conſiderable an event, if he had known or believed it? I believe then that it is a fact, of which we ought to ſay non liquet, notwithſtanding this Affirmation of Scœvola Sammarthanus. 'Ab Henrico ſecundo in regiam accerſitus, principem inter ejus archiatros locum tenuit. Eo felicis operæ proventu ut quod à natura negatum eſſe videbatur, artis beneficio conſecutus inviſam ſterilitatem à domo regia repelleret (41). —— Being called to court by Henry II, he was made his firſt phyſician, where he happily, by art, effected what nature ſeemed to have denied, and delivered the royal houſe from the miſery of barrenneſs.' I believe that all theſe doubts might be eaſily cleared, had we the diſſertation which Varillas hath quoted. 'Dr Fernelius, ſays he (42), having obſerved the conſtitution of the dauphineſs, reſolved to relieve her; and whether the medicines which he preſcribed had any operation, or whether all his ſecret was to inform the dauphin at what time his wife was capable of conceiving, the court obſerved ſome months after, that the dauphineſs was big with child.' You will find this place, word for word, in The Gallantries of the Kings of France (43). Mr Menjot, a learned phyſician of Paris, hath thought, that Fernelius conjectured that Catherine de Medicis was barren, by reaſon of the too great drineſs of the uterus, or becauſe it was too much contracted. In the firſt caſe, the ſeed, finding too dry a ſoil, could not fructify: In the ſecond, it did not reach as far as it ought to do. Now becauſe in her courſes the part was moiſtened and dilated more than ordinary, Fernelius thought that the dauphin ought to make uſe of that time, and that it was the happy minute for him to get his ſpouſe with child. Mr Menjot adds, that Hippocrates might give very good hints for this advice. This author expreſſes himſelf with ſo much energy, that I ſhould do him wrong did not I relate all that he ſays upon it: 'Referunt Catharinam Medicæam Galliarum reginam ætate licet integra, cum velut quinta luna nata progeniem deſperaret, importunam alvi ſterilitatem votiva fœcunditate commutaſſe, dulcique liberorum propagine ditatam fuiſſe, quòd contra Moſis edictum ἐν τῇ καθόδῳ τῶν καταμηνίων quibus ſemen alias eluitur, à rege ſubagitata eſſet, ex conſilio Fernelii ſagaciter conjicientis exuperantem uteri ariditatem benigni ſanguinis aſpergine rigandam eſſe, vel etiam ſtomachum matricis naturaliter, perinde ac ex eventu in gravidis, arctiſſimum nonniſi menſium tranſitu reſerari. Idque edoctus fuerat Fernelius ab Hippocrate * jubente mulierem ἱμερȣ̃σθαι τȣ̃ ἀνδρὸς inchoante menſtruo profluvio, ſed maximè eo deſinente, verùm profluente adhuc potiùs quàm areſacto (44).'

[L] She rewarded him largely.] Let us hear Mr Patin (45): 'Some ſpeak of the king of England, who hath married the princeſs of Portugal: he would willingly have divorced her, becauſe ſhe is barren; as Henry II would have done to his wife Catherine de Medicis, if Fernelius had not happily prevented it; from whom, out of an unparallelled liberality, he received every time that ſhe was delivered of a child ten thouſand crowns, as Lewis d'Orleans ſays in his Human Plant (46).' The as of this Author is truer than he thought; for what he ſays of Charles II king of England's deſign, is a whim of newſmongers without any ground: And we learn from Brantome, that Catherine de Medicis 'ingratiated herſelf ſo much into the king her father-in-law's and king Henry her huſband's affections, that remaining ten years without children

---

(i) See the remark [I].

(27) The book which, according to Geſner, was printed at Paris in the year 1526, was intituled, Monaloſpharium.

(28) In Fernelius's elegy, Tom. VII, pag. 325, edit. of 1671, in 12mo.

(29) Plantius, in vita Fernelii, in fine.

(30) St Romauld, ubi ſupra.

(31) Plantius, ubi ſupra, ſub fin.

(32) Scaligerana prima, pag. 82.

(33) Letter 100, pag. 394, of the firſt tome. This letter is dated the 25th of September, 1655.

(34) Bullart, Academy of Sciences, Tom. II, pag. 84. He quotes Dupleix.

(35) Varill. Hiſtory of Francis II, lib. i, pag. m. 76.

(36) Fernelius was firſt phyſician only after the death of Francis I. Francis II, eldeſt ſon to Catherine de Medicis, was born four years before the death of Francis I.

(37) He ſpeaks of the Leproſy.

(38) Mezerai, Hiſt. of France, Tom. III, pag. 42.

(39) See the remark [M], citat. (53).

(40) Brantome, Dames illuſtres, pag. m. 42.

(41) Sammarth. in elogiis, lib. i, pag. m. 33.

(42) Hiſt. of Francis I, lib. xi, pag. m. 99. He puts in the margin, In the Latin diſſertation preſented to the king on that ſubject.

(43) Tom. I, pag. 225, of the edition of 1694; and pag. 207, of the edition of 1695.

* Lib. i, de Morb. Mul.

(44) Antonius Menjotius, diſſertat. Pathologicar. Part. III, pag. m. 23.

(45) Patin, letter 515, pag. 520, of the third tome.

(46) Naudé de antiquitate Scholæ Medicæ Pariſienſis, pag. 75, quoting the ſame book of Lewis d' Orleans, ſays, that this preſent was made four times: Fernelius ab Henrico ſecundo qui quater illi decem aureorum millia pro quatuor filiis ejus ope & conſilio ſuſceptis obtulit. It is certain that Catherine de Medicis's ten children were all born before Fernelius's death.

faults of ſome authors [M].

‘ children, abundance of people perſuaded the king and ‘ the dauphin to put her away, becauſe France wanted ‘ an offspring from them; but that they loved her ‘ ſo much, that neither of them would conſent to ‘ it (47).’ See in the margin what I have obſerved on the paſſage of Gabriel Naudé: It ſhews that Lewis d’Orleans ſpoke of a thing whereof he was not well informed. This is what I ſaid in the firſt edition: I ſhall now add two amendments; the one is, that there are ſome books which make mention of this deſign of Charles II. The other, that Catherine de Medicis was ſometimes in terrible frights: from whence we may conclude, that her father-in-law and her husband were not always very far from thinking of a divorce (48). See the remark [O] of the article MAROT.

[M] We will gather the faults of ſome authors.] There are but few of Moreri. He ſays, that Fernelius ſaw, ‘ that the books which he had publiſhed ‘ were the only books that were expounded to the ‘ ſtudents of phyſic in all univerſities, and preferred to ‘ all others.’ This is one of the greateſt lies that hath ever appeared in a book. What Sammarthanus affirms hardly deſerves credit: what muſt we judge then of thoſe monſtrous hyperboles which Moreri hath beſtowed upon him. Theſe are Sammarthanus’s words (49): ‘ Cujus (Fernelii) admirabili genio id contigit, quod à ‘ multis ſeculis nulli quamlibet erudito contigiſſe me‘ mini, ut ipſo vivo atque vidente opera quæ de uni‘ verſa medicina ſcripſit in ſcholis publice legerentur: ‘ ejuſque auctoritas veterum ſcriptorum inſtar apud op‘ timum quemque rei medicæ magiſtrum graviſſimi ‘ eſſet ponderis & momenti.’ —— To Fernelius’s ad‘ mirable genius that honour was paid, which I do not ‘ remember to have happened to any other learned man ‘ for many ages paſt, that in his life-time and in his ‘ preſence, the treatiſes which he wrote on all the parts ‘ of phyſic were publickly read in the ſchools, and his ‘ authority, like that of the ancients, was allowed by ‘ all eminent profeſſors of that ſcience to be of the ‘ greateſt weight and moment.’ Mr Bullart’s faults are in greater number: he ſays, that Fernelius reſolved but late to put himſelf under the diſcipline of James Strebæus, to learn the principles of the Sciences (50). This ſignifies two things: one, that Fernelius began his ſtudies late; the other, that he begun them under James Strebæus. The firſt is very true, according to Plantius in his life of Fernelius; but the ſecond is very falſe, becauſe Fernelius had already taught philoſophy in the college of St Barbe, and was received doctor of phyſic when he became acquainted with Strebæus. Their acquaintance was a reciprocal inſtruction; for they taught one another. Fernelius taught Strebæus the mathematics, and learned of him to write good Latin. ‘ Dum Strebæus ‘ à Fernelio mathematicarum diſciplinarum, Ferne‘ lius viciſſim à Strebæo politioris literaturæ cogni‘ tionem & gravem plenumque orationis ſtylum acci‘ pit, integrum biennium exigitur (51).’ Mr Bullart is in the wrong, to believe that Henry II, was king of France whilſt his wife was barren. Had he conſulted Brantome, he had not ſaid, that this prince had ſome thoughts of putting her away: neither, if he had conſulted Lewis d’Orleans, had he ſaid, that the queen gave ten times to Fernelius a preſent of ten thouſand crowns (52). Let us quote Mr Bullart’s words (53). This French Æſculapius made ſo happy an uſe of the knowledge of her diſtemper, and of a proper remedy, that he made the queen fruitful by removing the ſuppreſſion of her monthly courſes: after which ſhe had five ſons, and five daughters; and at the birth of every one of them, ſhe preſented this learned man with ten thouſand crowns. He falſely ſuppoſes (54), that Henry II, after he had kept him near his perſon, as his firſt phyſician, and carried him every where with him, as the preſerver of his health . . . . gave him time to put in order thoſe works of phyſic which he had writ, and means to get them printed. Read the life of this learned man, and you will find that he compoſed but a treatiſe of fevers after he was Henry the ſecond’s firſt phyſician, and even that he died before he had finiſhed it.

(47) Brantome, ubi ſupra, p. 41.

(48) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, Febr. 1700, pag. 196.

(49) In Elogiis, lib. i, p. m. 32.

(50) Bullart’s Academy of Sciences, Tom. II, pag. 83.

(51) Plantius, in vita Fernelii.

(52) See, above, the remark [L], citat. (46).

(53) Bullart, ubi ſupra.

(54) Ibid.

FERON (John le) Advocate in the parliament of Paris, was of Compiegne: he was above ſixty years of age in the year 1564, and died in the reign of Charles IX. He was one of the moſt diligent and moſt curious men in France, in ſearching and diſcovering noble houſes and coats of arms (a), as he ſhewed by many volumes; ſome of which were printed [A]. Perſons of a good taſte deſpiſed them, becauſe of an infinite number of fictions and puerilities they were filled with [B]. Mr le Feron, antient prevoſt of the merchants at Paris, and preſident of the court of inqueſts in the XVIIth century, was of this family (b).

(a) Taken from La Croix du Maine, pag. 221, 222.

(b) Mercure Galant, Febr. 1703, pag. 38.

[A] Many volumes, ſome of which were printed.] He publiſhed at Paris, in 1555, by Vaſcoſan, a catalogue of the conſtables, chancellors, great maſters, admirals, and marſhals of France, and prevoſts of Paris, containing their inſtitutions and eſtabliſhments, the time and exerciſe of their offices, the changes and alterations in them, their names, ſirnames, lordſhips, and coats blazoned: alſo an abridgment of their actions; in folio (1). The ſame year he publiſhed his treatiſe of the primitive inſtitution of kings, heralds, and purſuivants at arms, at Paris, with Maurice Menier, in 4to. As to his hiſtory of heraldry in two volumes, containing the eſcutcheons, blazons, names, ſirnames, titles, and perpetual memorials, of kings, princes, lords, gentlemen, and nobles of ſeveral kingdoms, chriſtian and infidel, and particularly of the kingdom of France; and many other collections of the ſame nature; la Croix du Maine obſerves, that they were never printed (2).

[B] Perſons of good taſte deſpiſed them, becauſe of an infinite number of fictions they were filled with.] We have ſhewed in another place (3) what Mr le Laboureur thought of them, and I ſhall now quote a paſſage of Stephen Paſquier, out of a letter he wrote to an advocate (4), who was about a work of arms and eſcutcheons. ‘ I muſt tell you, that among thoſe who ‘ have pretended to meddle with it, le Feron, whom ‘ you write about, ſet himſelf above all others. I ‘ ſhall mention him as a man I was formerly acquaint‘ ted with in my middle age. He was an antient ad‘ vocate in our court, but never made much of his ‘ buſineſs (5), only employing himſelf in blazoning ‘ arms and eſcutcheons, as you may have ſeen by ‘ ſome books he hath publiſhed upon that ſubject; ‘ and yet he was more unconfined than ſome that have ‘ ſucceeded him: for to tell you the truth, he derived ‘ the uſe of arms, and war, and nobility, from the ‘ beginning of the world, aſſigning even to our father ‘ Adam his eſcutcheon. If you ask me what he bore? ‘ I anſwer, three fig-leaves. And upon my asking ‘ of him why he did ſo; he replied, becauſe after ‘ eating of the forbidden fruit, Adam covered his pu‘ denda with a fig-leaf: and upon this foot he compo‘ ſed four or five large volumes, drawn up according ‘ to his own fancy; an inexcuſable, as well as inexhau‘ ſtible curioſity (6).’

(1) Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 690.

(2) La Croix du Maine, Biblioth. Françoiſe, pag. 222.

(3) In remark [C] of the article PINET.

(4) Mr Moreaux, advocate in the parliament of Bourdeaux.

(5) See the Opuſcules de Loiſel, pag. 525.

(6) Paſquier Lettres, liv. xix, pag. 455, of the ſecond tome.

FERRAND (James), doctor of phyſic, born at Agen, compoſed a book, of the Diſeaſe of Love, printed at Paris in the year 1622. The hiſtorians of the phyſicians have as yet made no mention of it: It deſerved however to be taken notice of better than many others which they have mentioned [A].

[A] It deſerved however to be taken notice of better than many others which they have mentioned.] Although James Ferrand’s deſign be only to conſider love, as it ſometimes degenerates into a bodily diſeaſe, as fury and melancholy, nevertheleſs he ſays many things which may be referred to love in general. I take here the word love in that ſenſe which is given to it by way of excellency, I mean that paſſion which one of the ſexes hath for the other; a paſſion which hath been honoured by the heathens with a divine worſhip, under the name of Venus, and is one of the moſt profound myſteries of nature. The epiſtle dedicatory of James Ferrand's book is full of learning, and ſhews, that the heathen poets philoſophized upon nothing ſo profoundly as upon love. The verſes of Lucretius, which I have quoted in another place (1), were forgotten there. I ſaid, then, that if this paſſion came into the world by ſin, we muſt conſider it as a plank after a ſhipwreck, and as a ſecond principle of life granted to mankind; it was a new ſpring very neceſſary to give motion to nature. But I ſhould have ſaid, that this ſecond liberality of the author of all things was marked with the general ſtamp of this maxim, that the preſents of fortune are always attended with ſome inconveniency: Fortuna nunquam ſimpliciter indulget (2). Thoſe that do not know by experience what bitterneſs is mixed with the pleaſures of love (3) need but read Ferrand's book, and they will learn what to think of this paſſion from the ſentences of ſeveral grave authors: for, according to the method of thoſe times, this phyſician is full of quotations: and he ſcarce ſays any thing, but what is ſtrengthened with the authority of ſome Greek or Latin poet, or ſome antient or modern philoſopher. This method is now laid aſide: however, thoſe authors who have followed it are not the leſs inſtructive; and after all, I am ſurprized that Lindenius Renovatus (4) hath ſaid nothing of the author who is the ſubject of this article. This is not the only ſin of omiſſion that he is guilty of. See the remark [B], of the article VANDERLINDEN.

(1) In the remark [F], of the article EVE.

(2) Q. Curtius, lib. iv, cap. xiv.

(3) See the article SELEMNUS. Was there nothing elſe but jealouſy, it would be enough to make at leaſt the miſery that attends love equal to the ſatisfaction of it.

(4) Thus the Bibliotheque de Scriptis Medicis is called in the laſt edition, which is that of 1686, in 4to.

FERRARA (RENATA OF FRANCE, DUCHESSE OF) celebrated for her virtue and attachment to the reformed church, was daughter to Lewis XII, and of Anne of Bretagne [A]. She was born at Blois (a) the 25th of October 1510 (b), and was engaged to Charles of Auſtria (c) in the year 1513, and in the year 1515, and afterwards was alſo promiſed to Joachim Marquis of Brandenburg; but in 1527 ſhe was married to Hercules d'Eſt, the ſecond of that name, duke of Ferrara and Modena (d). Others reckon the 28th of June 1528 to be her wedding-day (e). A modern hiſtorian affirms, that ſhe was very learned [B]. He relates ſeveral things, whereof ſome are abominably falſe, others doubtful, concerning Calvin's journey to this princeſs's court [C]. What (a) Father Anſelm's Genealog. Hiſtory, p. 132.

(b) See the remark [A].

(c) Who was afterwards the Emperor Charles V.

(d) Anſelm, ubi ſupra.

(e) Father du Londel's Faſti of the Kings, &c. pag. 32.

[A] She was daughter of Lewis XII, and Anne of Bretagne.] I ſhall relate here a particular which deſerves to be more known: ‘This queen was brought to bed, in the year 1510, of a ſecond daughter, whom ſhe named Renata, as if by this birth ſhe had ſeen her hopes revive of having children, which ſhe had almoſt wholly loſt: but the ignorant midwives uſed her then ſo ill, that ſhe was afterwards incapable of having any more; and ſhe remained ſo infirm, that ſhe died three years after, in the caſtle of Blois, the thirteenth day of February, 1513 . . (1).’ The author of the notes on Rabelais's letters, is probably miſtaken, when he ſaid (2), that Renata was born the fifteenth of October 1509, &c.

[B] A modern hiſtorian affirms that ſhe was very learned.] Mr Varillas is the hiſtorian I mean. Theſe are his words: ‘Renata of France, daughter to Lewis XII, was married to Hercules d'Eſte, duke of Ferrara, and made him father of five of the handſomeſt children in Chriſtendom, tho' ſhe had the moſt disfigured body of any princeſs of her age. It is true, that what was wanting in her ſtature and Beauty, was ſo abundantly ſupplied by her mind, that, all things conſidered, ſhe had more reaſon to be thankful, than to complain of nature. She had a more refined and delicate wit than had been obſerved in any woman, even in the Italian ladies, who pretended moſt to it; and it was but a diverſion to her, to learn what was moſt difficult in the moſt ſublime ſciences. She had dived with eaſe into the moſt abſtruſe points of philoſophy and divinity; and no woman ſpoke more gracefully of them, or rather with more eaſe. She excelled in all the parts of the mathematics, but eſpecially in aſtronomy. Although ſhe contemned judicial aſtrology, yet ſhe would have the famous Luke Gauric ſhew her all the ſecrets of it (3).’ He ſays in another place (4), in ſtronger terms, ‘That none exceeded her in the knowledge of the moſt abſtruſe points of philoſophy, mathematics, and aſtrology.’ This is romantic. Mr Varillas, inſtead of mollifying the expreſſions of Brantome, a Gaſcon author, who gave but too often way to hyperbole, eſpecially when he ſpoke of princeſſes, refines upon him. We may be convinced of it by what follows: ‘Madam Renata had as fine and piercing a wit as can be imagined; ſhe had ſtudied much: and I have ſeen her very learned, plainly, and gravely, talk of all ſciences, even of aſtrology, and the knowledge of the ſtars; wherewith I ſaw her once entertain the queen-mother, who hearing her ſpeak ſo well, ſaid, that the greateſt philoſopher in the world could not talk more pertinently (5).’ Obſerve the abatement. According to Varillas, the equality of knowledge between this princeſs, and all learned men, relates to the knowledge of the moſt abſtruſe points of philoſophy, mathematics, and aſtrology: But according to Brantome, it only relates to ſome diſcourſes of aſtrology, and this only in the judgment of Catherine de Medicis. It is of more importance than is imagined, to give the readers a parallel of the original with the copy, as I do here. Conſult the margin (6).

[C] He tells ſeveral things, whereof ſome are abominably falſe, others very doubtful, concerning Calvin's journey to the court of that princeſs.] Mr Varillas relates (7) in the year 1535, that Calvin, having pitched upon Strasburg for the place of his abode, drew there thoſe of his ſect, who had voluntarily baniſhed themſelves out of France. ‘Calvin, continues he, having gathered a great number of diſciples to form a congregation, by Bucer's advice preſented a petition to the magiſtrates of Strasburg to obtain the ſpiritual direction of thoſe Frenchmen, who, on account of religion, had tranſplanted themſelves from France into Alſatia . . . . . The magiſtrates, perſuaded by Stunius (8), ... granted his requeſt; and thus Calvin had the opportunity to found a church after his own way. . . . . As his deſign was to make the college of Strasburg famous, he was not ſatisfied to draw thither the fineſt wits, and the moſt learned men of the univerſities of France, whom he had corrupted, but he alſo endeavoured that this college ſhould chiefly be obliged to him for it's reputation, and he taught there with a more conſtant application, than either Luther or Melancthon had done in the college of Wittemberg: and truly the number of his auditors became, without compariſon, greater than theirs had been, although no ſovereign prince was concerned in it. He taught divinity in that college, and none of the profeſſors aſſiſted more readily than he at the public diſputations. He reviſed his Inſtitution alſo, and added a fourth and laſt book to it. He ſpent two years in this painful employ; and nothing had been capable to have drawn him thence, had he not hoped to make a greater progreſs ſomewhere elſe: but he was deceived by the vain hope, which was given him, of ſpreading his doctrine in Italy; and he fancied it ſo glorious and pleaſing an attempt, to penetrate into a climate which had been inacceſſible to Luther and Zuinglius, and to withdraw from the pope's obedience a people that was neareſt to the holy ſee, that he could not withſtand the temptation.’ Mr Varillas makes here a digreſſion, in praiſe of the ducheſs of Ferrara (9), after which he ſays (10), that Calvin, knowing the diſpoſition of this princeſs, went diſguiſed from Strasburg to Ferrara. He ſuppoſes, that Calvin, having acquired by his Parts the friendſhip of Renata, diſpoſed her to the doctrine of Luther, Zuinglius, and Melancthon; and that the princeſs, who (11) had only a mind to change her religion to be revenged of the court of Rome, rejected Calvin's maxims at firſt, but that it was not long before ſhe became a Calviniſt . . . . ‘He preached in her chamber

(1) Mezerai's Hiſt. of France, Tom. II, pag. 890.

(2) Pag. 83.

(3) Varil. Hiſt. of Hereſy, lib. x, pag. 354. Dutch Edit.

(4) Hiſt. of Charles IX, Tom. I, p. 176. Dutch edit.

(5) Brantome's Lives of Illuſtrious Ladies, pag. m. 300.

(6) Frantome, ubi ſupra, ſays, That tho' Renata was ugly, yet ſhe brought a very handſome offſpring: And pag. 306, That although ſhe ſeemed to make no great figure, by reaſon of the deformity of her body, yet ſhe had a great deal of majeſty. Whereas Varillas ſays, That, as for her body, ſhe was the moſt disfigured princeſs of her time.

(7) Varill. Hiſt. of Hereſy, lib. x, pag. 352, & ſeq.

(8) It ſhould be Sturmius.

(9) We have ſeen it in the preceding remark.

(10) Varillas, ubi ſupra, pag. 355.

(11) Ibid. pag. 356.

What he ſays of the motives, which engaged her to embrace the new religion, has very little probability [D]. As ſoon as her huſband was dead, ſhe left Italy on the account of 'chamber, that it might be more private, becauſe her 'ſervants, out of reſpect, were not to enquire too 'curiouſly what was done there. But it is not ſo 'eaſy for ladies of quality, as for others, to hide their 'religion from their huſbands. The duke of Ferrara 'came to know his ducheſs's religion; and this prince 'was the more exaſperated, becauſe nothing was more 'contrary to his temporal intereſt. He held of the 'holy ſee; and he knew that the popes would not 'want forces to diſpoſſeſs him, if they had any pre-'tence for it. His fear encreaſed, when he conſi-'dered that duke Alphonſus his father had been a 'long time an exile, vagabond, poor, and a ſoldier 'in the pay of a foreign nation, only becauſe he 'had diſobliged the pope; and that, to make his 'peace, he had been obliged to beg pardon of pope 'Alexander VI, and to marry Lucretia Borgia. Theſe 'conſiderations immediately altered the duke, who had 'hitherto been very complaiſant to the ducheſs: he 'forced her to return to the exerciſe of the new re-'ligion (12), and all that ſhe could obtain of him, in 'favour of Calvin, was, that he ſhould return as he 'came.'

There are abundance of lyes in this narrative. I. When Calvin, in 1534, went out of France, he choſe the city of Baſil (13), and not that of Straſburg, for the place of his retreat; and he remained in Baſil as obſcure as poſſible (14), till he undertook his journey into Italy, after he had publiſhed his Chriſtian inſtitution (15). II. It is falſe then, that he erected at that time a church at Straſburg, and made the college of that city more famous than that of Wittemberg. III. Let us rectify this as well as we can, by referring it to it's true time, and yet we ſhall find it full of lyes. Calvin, being expelled out of Geneva in the year 1538, went into Swiſſerland, whence he was called by the magiſtrates of Straſburg to be profeſſor in divinity. He accepted of the employ, and acquitted himſelf with the applauſe of the learned (16): But, IV. he drew not into this college the fineſt wits and the moſt learned men of the univerſities of France: And, V. the number of his auditors became not, without compariſon, greater than that of Luther and Melancthon at Wittemberg, I cannot imagine where Varillas could find a foundation for theſe romantic hyperboles. It is true, that Calvin, with the conſent of the magiſtrates, founded a French church at Straſburg, and that he ſubmitted it to the formulary of his diſcipline (17): But, VI. it is not true, that he began by that his labours in that city. Seeing himſelf called by the magiſtrates, he went thither to teach divinity, and afterwards deſired leave of them to erect a French church. VII. He left not this painful employment in hopes of making a greater progreſs in Italy; for he took his leave of thoſe of Straſburg, only to return to Geneva (18), where he was recalled with great earneſtneſs. It is abſurd to ſuppoſe, as Mr Varillas doth, that Calvin went to ſee the ducheſs of Ferrara in the year 1535, after he had for two years performed at Straſburg the office of profeſſor in divinity, and of miniſter; and after he had there reviſed his Inſtitution, and had augmented it with a fourth and laſt book: for, VIII. he left France in the year 1534, and went to Ferrara towards the end of the year 1535: and, IX. when he undertook that journey, his Chriſtian Inſtitution had but once been publiſhed. He only reviſed and augmented it after his return from Italy (19). X. It was not divided into books, till the edition of one thouſand five hundred and fifty nine. XI. I acknowledge that the ducheſs of Ferrara was mother of five children, but they were not all born when Calvin went to her. When ſhe was delivered of a daughter in the year 1536, Rabelais obſerves that ſhe had already a daughter and a ſon (20).

An hiſtorian, who is guilty of ſo many falſhoods in things ſo eaſy to be told with certainty, doth not deſerve much credit in what he ſays of the private converſations which he ſuppoſes between the ducheſs of Ferrara and Calvin. This is what I call doubtful; for I have no good proofs to aver, whether Calvin inſinuated, or did not inſinuate, to the ducheſs ſuch and ſuch things againſt Zuinglius, Luther, and Melancthon. I might eaſily be perſuaded, that Calvin contributed but little to the converſion of this princeſs. I believe he found her pretty well cured of the Romiſh belief; and that Marot, who was a refugee before him in that court, had a greater ſhare than he in Renata's changing her religion (21).

[D] That which Varillas ſays of the motives, which engaged her to embrace the new religion, has very little probability.] 'The injuries which ſhe pretended that 'the king her father had received from pope Julius II, 'had inſpired in her an averſion for the court of Rome '(22).' This is, according to Mr Varillas, the motive 'that diſpoſed her to lend a favourable attention to the new ſectaries. 'She did not change her religion, but 'to revenge herſelf: ſhe fancied for that purpoſe, that 'it was enough to attack the ſpiritual and temporal 'authority of the popes, without meddling with the 'ſacraments, and eſpecially with religious orders, which 'would infallibly cauſe a great deal of diſorder in the 'beſt eſtabliſhed ſtates (23).' It muſt be confeſſed, that, generally ſpeaking, a deſire of revenge may produce in mens minds a ſtrong inclination for a ſect. If a party appears againſt thoſe who have done us a conſiderable prejudice, we are very much diſpoſed to maintain that party: we wiſh it may have juſtice on it's ſide; and, eagerly wiſhing, we at laſt believe it to be in the right. This is ſeen, not only in ſtate and academical cabals, but alſo in religious diſputes: ſo that we muſt not doubt, but a perſonal hatred againſt a pope may induce a prince to favour thoſe divines who preach againſt that pope. But was this the caſe of the ducheſs? She was ſcarce out of her ſwaddling-cloaths when Julius II died. The court of Rome was reconciled with Lewis XII, when this prince went out of the world: ſo that our Renata was more like to hear of the peace between her father and Leo X, than of the outrages of Julius II. It is not probable that ſhe conceived againſt this pope's memory a hatred that included all his ſucceſſors. When we are informed of a quarrel, after it is ended, thoſe paſſions which it excites are not ſo lively: for it is the ſight of thoſe evils, wherein it involves us, that kindles in our minds a violent hatred againſt the author of them. I do not deny, but thoſe who at the time of the troubles, and even of the pacification, were as yet in the cradle, may harbour a very deep reſentment againſt the author of thoſe troubles when they come of age, and feel the fatal conſequences of his turbulent temper. But was this the ducheſs of Ferrara's caſe? By the Salic law ſhe was excluded from ſucceeding her father; and ſo the miſchiefs which Julius II had done to Lewis XII had not affected her, even though they had continued in the reign of Francis I.

It is certain that true matters of fact are ſometimes deſtitute of probability; and thus, without determining whether the princeſs had, or had not, any reſentment, I only ſay, that it is not likely that the remembrance of Julius the ſecond's injuſtice ſhould breed in her a ſtrong deſire to be revenged of the court of Rome, by adopting the Lutheran religion. Nevertheleſs I ought not to conceal what I have read in Brantome. 'Perhaps, ſays he (24,) reſenting the ill offices which 'the popes had on ſo many occaſions done to the 'king her father, ſhe withdrew from their obedience; 'not being able to do them more miſchief, becauſe 'ſhe was a woman. I have it from good hands, that 'ſhe often ſaid as much.' Mr le Laboureur (25) quotes an elegy of Clement Marot on her being with child the third time, wherein the child is congratulated for his being conceived in ſo happy a time. Marot promiſes him the pope's and the holy ſee's ruin, whom he uſes injuriouſly, and ſays, that he was an enemy to his family. That ſhews that this poet brought domeſtic quarrels upon the ſtage, to alienate the ducheſs of Ferrara from the court of Rome. Obſerve, that he alſo employed good omens and favourable predictions, whereof poets are ſo laviſh, and which ſo often convict them that they are falſe prophets (26) He of her religion [E], and went into France, where ſhe had leave to profeſs the doctrine of Calvin. She reſided at Montargis, and there protected many that were perſecuted, till ſhe was forced to deſiſt. Mezerai, I am afraid, doth not ſet down the exact time that this happened [F]. She complied with this hardſhip with much reluctancy. She ſhewed in that juncture both her courage and charity [G]. This virtuous Lady had always expreſſed a ſtrong Inclination to relieve the diſtreſſed [H]. She interceded ſtrong-

---

(12) The Printers have blundered here: we muſt read either renounce inſtead of return to, or ancient inſtead of new.

THIS paſſage of Varillas cenſured.

(13) See, above, remark [F] of the article CALVIN.

(14) Ubi ſupra, remark [U].

(15) He publiſhed it at Baſil, in 1535. See, above, remark [U] of the article CALVIN.

(16) Theologiam ibi docuit magno cum doctorum omnium applauſu. Beza in vita Calvini ad ann. 1538.

(17) Ex ſenatus conſenſu Gallicam eccleſiam conſtituta etiam eccleſiaſtica diſciplina plantavit. Id. ibid.

(18) He returned thither in the year 1541. See his life by Beza.

(19) Mr Varillas, Hiſt. of Charles IX, Tom. I, ſays, That Calvin had compoſed, at the ducheſs of Ferrara's court, the books of his Inſtitution. In the tenth book of his Hiſtory of Hereſy, pag. 350, he ſays, That Calvin being gone to Nerac, to confer with le Fevre and Roſſel, read to them his Inſtitution. You muſt take notice, that Calvin conferred with le Fevre at Nerac in the year 1533, or thereabouts.

(20) Rabelais, Epiſt. xiv, p. 59.

(21) See le Laboureur, Addit. to Caſtelnau, Tom. I, pag. 746, 747.

(22) Varillas, Hiſt. of Hereſy, lib. x, pag. 355.

(23) Id. ibid. pag. 356.

(24) Brantome, vie des Dames illuſtres, pag. 300.

(25) Addit. to Caſtelnau's Memoires, Tom. I, pag. 747: he obſerves that this elegy was ſuppreſſed.

(26) See remark [C] of the article FONTARABIA.

ly

He proved ſo in this particular; but bluſhed no more for it than his brethren are uſed to do in the like caſes.

[E] She left Italy on account of her religion.] I have this from Thuanus. ‘ Sub idem tempus, ſays he (27), Renata Ferrarienſis Guiſii ſocrus, quæ ex Italia in Galliam ob religionis cauſſam migraverat, Aurelianum Regis ſalutandi gratia venit. —— Renata ducheſs of Ferrara, and mother-in-law to the duke of Guiſe, who, on account of religion, had retired from Italy into France, came to Orleans to pay her compliments to the king.’ He ſays this under the year 1560. The duke of Ferrara, this princeſs's huſband, died in 1559.

[F] Mezerai, I am afraid, doth not ſet down the exact time that this happened.] Giving an account of the cruel hardſhips which the reformed ſuffered in divers places in 1562, he ſays (28), ‘ That the ducheſs of Ferrara's authority ſaved a great many, who came from all parts to Montargis for her protection. The duke of Guiſe, her ſon in-law (29), not able to bring her into the right way, ſent thither John de Sourches-Milicorne with four troops of horſe, who, having ſummoned her to deliver him the chiefs of the factious who had to fled her caſtle, threatning withal to bring cannon before the place to get them out by force, received an anſwer worthy of ſuch a princeſs. Have a care of what you do (ſays ſhe to him); know that no body hath a right to command me but the king himſelf; and that if you puſh things to this extremity, I will put my ſelf at the breach, where I will try whether you will have the inſolence to murder a king's daughter, whoſe death heaven and earth would be obliged to revenge upon you, and all your poſterity, even upon babes in the cradle. Theſe reſolute words a little cooled his heat; and the duke of Guiſe's death happening at that time, he wholly left off his deſign.’ Mr Varillas telling the ſame ſtory, and according to his uſual cuſtom amplifying it, applies it to the year 1562 (30). But I ſhould be mightily miſtaken, if the proteſtant authors, who apply it to 1569, deſerved not more credit. We are going to ſee Mr d'Aubigné's words.

[G] She ſhewed in that juncture both her courage and charity.] Her anſwer to Malicorne was not ſo nobly expreſſed by d'Aubigné as by Mezerai; but I doubt the phraſes muſt rather be aſcribed to the hiſtorian, than to the princeſs. Be it how it will, let us quote d'Aubigné. ‘ This (31) was the cauſe, that from the towns and villages of the flat country all fled to Montargis, where many had been preſerved the firſt war, under the protection of the ducheſs, who being of the royal blood, and related to the Guiſes, had a particular privilege allowed her. She and her miniſters blamed thoſe, that took up arms, in ſuch a manner, as ſet her and the prince of Condé at variance, and this quarrel was a cloak to the civilities which were ſhewed her. But this laſt crowding of the proteſtants into her houſe, ſtirred up the preachers of Paris, and they the king, to force her to turn out 460 perſons, two thirds women and young children in the cradle. This princeſs, all in tears, told Malicorne, who had brought her this harſh news, that if ſhe had on her chin what he had on his (32), ſhe would kill him with her own hands, as a meſſenger of death. She furniſhed this diſtreſſed multitude with one hundred and fifty carts, eight travelling coaches, and a great many horſes (33).’ There is ſomething very particular in theſe poor peoples eſcape, whom Malicorne endeavoured to deſtroy upon the road. D'Aubigné relates it. Another Huguenot hiſtorian (34) gives us alſo an account of it, but without mentioning Malicorne; and as for the ducheſs, this he ſays of her under the year 1569 (35). ‘ At that time the duke of Alençon gave the ducheſs of Ferrara to underſtand, that Montargis (her place of abode) was a harbour for proteſtants, and where plots were daily contrived againſt his majeſty. Therefore he deſired her to drive them and their miniſters out, to leave off the exerciſe of the proteſtant religion which ſhe profeſſed, or to remove ſomewhere elſe. She anſwered, that ſhe was too near related to the crown to have ſo little regard for it: beſides, that there was in the town but a poor harmleſs people, who meddled with nothing that might in the leaſt prejudice the king. In a word, that ſhe could not go out of a place that belonged to her, and wherein ſhe was reſolved to live and die, and even in the exerciſe of that religion which the king had permitted her to profeſs, and in which ſhe had been hitherto brought up. However, about the end of September ſhe was forced, for fear of having immediately a garriſon in her town, to diſmiſs moſt of thoſe who had retired thither: and becauſe there were ſeveral families, many women, and a great number of young and old people, who were not able to go thoſe long journies, which they were obliged either to go, or to be at the mercy of thoſe who only waited for an opportunity to deſtroy them, ſhe lent them her coaches, carts, and waggons to aſſiſt them, anſwering for the waggoners, who took care of the reſt of their baggage.’

When I conſider, that Thuanus (36) hath ſupplied Mezerai, and Varillas, with what they ſay of Malicorne's fooliſh attempt in the year 1562, and of the brave anſwer of that princeſs, and that he puts the ſame event in the ſame year, I cannot tell which way to turn myſelf; and perhaps it muſt be ſaid, that the ducheſs was diſturbed twice at Montargis, in the year 1562, and in the year 1569. Malicorne was not perhaps ſent thither the ſecond time, although d'Aubigné ſays it.

[H] This virtuous lady had always expreſſed a ſtrong inclination to relieve the diſtreſſed.] I will make uſe of Brantome's words. ‘ This princeſs, ſays he (37), was not only ingenious, wiſe, witty, and virtuous, but alſo full of goodneſs, which ſhe expreſſed ſo well to her huſband's ſubjects, that I never ſaw any one in Ferrara but was ſatisfied with, and extolled her to the skies: for they had chiefly a deep ſenſe of her charity which ſhe ſhewed, eſpecially to the French; for ſhe had this good Quality, that ſhe never forgot her country; and altho' ſhe was very far from it, yet ſhe always loved it. Never a Frenchman going through Ferrara, if he was in want, and made it known to her, went away without a large relief, and money to carry him to his country and houſe; and if he was ſick and could not travel, ſhe ordered him to be taken care of and cured, and then gave him money to return into France. Brantome had heard, that when the duke of Guiſe went into Italy, ſhe ſaved after his return above ten thouſand poor French ſouls, as well ſoldiers as others, who had died of hunger and want, had not ſhe aſſiſted them; for when they went through Ferrara, ſhe ſupplied them all with phyſic and money as much as ſhe was capable to do; and when her ſtewards repreſented to her her exorbitant expences, ſhe only anſwered, what will you have me do, they are my poor country-men, whom, if God had given me a beard, and I was a man, would now be all my ſubjects, and even ſhould be ſo, was not that wicked Salic law ſo hard upon me (38).’ Brantome was not unacquainted with her charity at Montargis. Let us hear him further (39). ‘ I have heard ſome of her ſervants ſay, that being returned in France, and retired into her city, and houſe of Montargis, as long as ſhe lived, ſhe received there in the civil-wars a great number of people, and eſpecially the proteſtants, who were driven and baniſhed from their eſtates and houſes, and aſſiſted, helped, and entertained them as well as ſhe could. I my ſelf ſaw, in the time of the ſecond troubles, when the forces of Gaſcogne, headed by Meſſieurs de Terrides and de Monſales, conſiſting of about eight thouſand

---

(27) Thuan. lib. xxvi, pag. 521.

(28) Hiſt. of France, Tom. III, pag. 86.

(29) Ann d'Eſt, Renata's daughter, married firſt Francis of Lorrain duke of Guiſe, and afterwards the duke of Nemours. She was Mother to the duke of Guiſe killed at Blois, and who did ſo much miſchief in favour of the League againſt Henry III and Henry IV. She was then called the ducheſs of Nemours. See the laſt remark, towards the end.

(30) Varill. Hiſt. of Charles IX, Tom. I, p. 175.

(31) That is to ſay, the maſſacre of the proteſtants at Orleans, in the year 1569.

(32) See, hereafter, Brantome's words, remark [H], citat. (38).

(33) D'Aubigné, Hiſt Univerſelle, Tom, I, lib. v, cap. xiii.

(34) His book is intituled, The true and compleat Hiſtory of the Troubles and remarkable Accidents that happened in France, Flanders, and the neighbouring countries, ſince the year 1562. It was printed at Rochel, 1573, in 8*vo*.

(35) Lib. viii, fol. 253.

(36) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. xxx, pag. 608.

(37) Brantome's Lives of Illuſtrious Ladies, pag. 302.

(38) Ib. p. 303.

(39) Ib. p. 305.

ly for the prince of Condé, when he was put in priſon [I]; but ſhe afterwards fell out with him, becauſe neither ſhe nor her miniſters approved of the proteſtants taking arms (f). We cannot too much admire with what ſteadineſs ſhe oppoſed the machines made uſe of by Henry II, and her huſband, to draw her from what they call hereſy [K]. She died at Montargis the 12th of June 1575 (g), in the profeſſion of the reformed religion. It is therefore through groſs ignorance that a jeſuit . . . . (h) hath put her into the liſt of thoſe who abjured the errors of the proteſtants. Her bearing with her huſband's galantries ſhewed her miſtreſs of a great deal of temper. It is pretended, that after ſhe had brought him three ſons and three daughters, ſhe voluntarily retired to a private houſe, that ſhe might not ſee, nor thwart thoſe Diverſions which he took with other ladies. Nay, they add, that this good princeſs expreſſed ſome kindneſs for her huſband's miſtreſſes (i).

‘ſand men were marching towards the king, and we the chiefs and principal captains and gentlemen paſſed by Montargis, as we were in duty bound, to pay our reſpects to her; I believe that we ſaw in the caſtle above three hundred proteſtants, who had fled thither from all the parts of the country. An old ſteward of her's, a very honeſt gentleman, whom I had known at Ferrara and in France, proteſted to me, that ſhe fed every day above three hundred of thoſe poor perſons who had retired thither.

[I] She interceded ſtrongly for the prince of Condé.] I will ſtill draw my proof from the ſame author. ‘I have heard ſay, and have it from good hands, that when the prince of Condé was put in priſon at Orleans, in young king Francis's time, ſhe came from Ferrara two days after, and I ſaw her arrive: the king and all the court went to meet her, and ſhe was received with all the honour that ſhe deſerved. She was mightily concerned at his impriſonment, and repreſented to the duke of Guiſe, her ſon-in-law, that whoſoever had adviſed the king to do this, was mightily in the wrong, and that it was not a ſmall matter to uſe a prince of the blood after this manner (40).’ Thuanus makes her yet ſpeak in a more lofty ſtile. ‘Aurelianum regis ſalutandi gratia venit, deploratoque præſenti rerum ſtatu generum acerbè increpuit, & ſiquidem ante captum Condæum adveniſſet id ſe impedituram teſtata monuit, ut ab injuria erga regiæ ſtirpis principes in poſterum temperaret, nam plagam eam diu ſanguinem miſſuram, nec cuiquam unquam bene vertiſſe qui regis conſanguineos principes prior laceſſiviſſet (41). —— She came to Orleans to pay her compliments to the king, and having deplored the miſerable ſtate of affairs, ſhe very warmly reprimanded her ſon-in-law, and declared that had ſhe arrived before the prince of Condé had been made priſoner, ſhe would have prevented it. She adviſed him for the future to uſe more moderation towards princes of royal blood, ſince this wound would bleed a long time, and no man had been crowned with happineſs that, unprovoked, had offered violence to princes allied to the king.’

[K] We cannot too much admire with what ſteadineſs ſhe oppoſed the machines made uſe of by Henry II, and her huſband, to draw her from . . . . . hereſy.] Mr le Laboureur hath publiſhed (42) a very curious piece. It is Henry the ſecond's inſtructions to Dr Oriz, when he went to Ferrara. This doctor was one of the pope's penitentiaries, and performed the office of inquiſitor in France. He was ſent to Ferrara on purpoſe to convert the ducheſs. He was ordered to tell her, I. That the king had, to his inexpreſſible grief, been informed, that ſhe had ſuffered herſelf to be entangled in the labyrinth of thoſe wicked and damnable opinions, which are contrary and repugnant to our holy faith. II. That when he ſhall hear that ſhe is reconciled with, and reduced to the true obedience of the church, that it will give him as much joy and ſatisfaction as if he was to ſee her raiſed from death to life. III. That if inſtead of treading in the ſteps of her progenitors, who, by an exemplary zeal, have always protected our holy catholic faith, the ſaid lady would remain ſtubborn and obſtinate, nothing in the world could more diſpleaſe the king, and would oblige him to forget wholly the reſpect, friendſhip, and duties of a good nephew; nothing being ſo odious to him as thoſe reprobate ſects, whereof he is a mortal enemy. If theſe remonſtrances produced nothing, then Dr Oriz was to preach ſome polemical ſermons which the ducheſs ſhould be obliged to hear, with all her houſhould, though ſhe ſhould obſtinately refuſe it. After he had done this for ſome days, and ſaw that he made no impreſſion on the ſaid lady, he was to declare, before the duke her huſband, that his majeſty wills and underſtands, and actually deſires and exhorts, with earneſtneſs, the ſaid lord duke, to cauſe the ſaid lady to be put in a place ſeparated from all company and converſation, and where ſhe may no more ſpoil any body but herſelf; taking wholly away from her, her own children, and all her ſervants, of what nation ſoever they may be, who are accuſed, or ſtrongly ſuſpected of the ſaid errors and falſe doctrines, to have them brought to juſtice. . . . And after ſentence paſſed againſt them, that the delinquents may receive exemplary puniſhments. All this was to no purpoſe. Read Mr le Laboureur's words (43). The duke of Ferrara had not ſkill enough to prevent Anne d'Eſt, his daughter, from being imbued with the new opinions. Her mother, who cauſed her to be inſtructed in the ſciences, gave her, for a fellow ſtudent, Olympia Fulvia Morata, a young woman of great parts, and who was afterwards a good Lutheran. ‘Cum Anna Herculis Eſtenſis Ferrarienſium Principis filia iiſdem literis à Joanne Sinapio, viro ſummo, inſtitueretur, ut haberet quicum honeſta æmulatione certaret, viſum matri eſt . . . ut Olympia in aulam, in qua aliquot annos magna cum laude fuit, advocaretur (44). ——— Whilſt Anne daughter of Hercules d'Eſt, duke of Ferrara, was under the tuition of John Sinapius a very eminent man, her mother, to excite an honourable emulation, cauſed Olympia to be ſent for to court, where ſhe lived for ſeveral years in the higheſt eſteem.’ This young lady's converſation gave the princeſs Anne a great inſight into religion: Therefore it is reported, that ſhe was ſenſibly grieved at the puniſhments which were inflicted on the reformed after the buſineſs of Amboiſe, and that ſhe exhorted Catherine de Medicis not to ſpill innocent blood. It is Thuanus who reports it. ‘Sola Anna Ateſtina Guiſii uxor miti ingenio femina, & quæ à teneris annis Ferrariæ ſub Renata parente ei doctrinæ quæ tunc exagitabatur inutrita fuerat, Olympiæ Moratæ lectiſſimæ & eruditiſſimæ feminæ conſuetudine ad id uſa lacrimas non tenuiſſe dicitur, ultroque Catharinam monuiſſe ut ſi regem ac regnum ſalvum vellet, ab innocentum ſuppliciis abſtineri juberet (45). —— Anne d'Eſt, wife to the duke of Guiſe, a woman of a mild temper, who from her infancy had been trained up by her mother at Ferrara in that religion, which then lay under perſecution, and had enjoyed the inſtructive converſation of Olympia Morata, a lady of diſtinguiſhed merit and abilities, is ſaid to have burſt into tears, and begged of Catharine, as ſhe tendered the welfare of his majeſty, and the kingdom, to divert him from the ſhedding of innocent blood.’ At the time of the league, ſhe was very zealous againſt the proteſtants. Family intereſt, and the remembrance of Poltrot (46), perhaps altered her opinion. For the reſt, the duke of Ferrara was at variance with Renata before the reign of Henry II: for Rabelais wrote this from Rome in the year 1536. ‘Madam Renata is in danger of ſuffering for it: the ſaid duke hath taken Madam de Soubiſe her governante from her, and allows but Italian women to wait upon her, which is no good ſign (47).’

(f) See remark [G].

(g) Le Laboureur, Additions to Caſtelnau, Tom. I, pag. 749.

(h) Joannes Franciſcus Hacki, in libro cui titulus Via Regia, &c.

(i) See Lewis Guyon's Various Readings, Tom. III, pag. 136.

(40) Ib. p. 306.

(41) Thuan. lib. xxvi, pag. 521, 522, ad ann. 1560.

(42) In the additions to Caſtelnau, Tom. I, pag. 747.

(43) She obſtinately endured the effects of theſe threats, for which Brantome obſerves, that there was for ſome time a miſunderſtanding between her and her huſband, who could do no more than take from her the education of her children. Le Laboureur, ubi ſupra, pag. 749.

(44) Cœlius Secundus Curio in Epiſtola ad Betuleium inter Epiſtolas Olympiæ Fulviæ Moratæ, pag. m. 97.

(45) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. xxiv, pag. 496, 497, ad ann. 1560.

(46) Who aſſaſſinated the duke of Guiſe, her huſband.

(47) Rabelais, Epiſt. pag. 18.

FERRARIENSIS, a ſcholaſtic philoſopher, who is commonly quoted by this name, tho' his true Name was Francis Sylveſter [A]. He was a native of Ferrara, and made himſelf ſo much conſidered in his order (a), that he was choſen their general in a chapter held at Rome in the year 1525. His corpulence did not hinder him from viſiting the provinces of his order, to reſtore it's diſcipline as much as could be (b). He died at Rennes in Bretagne the twenty fourth of September 1528. Father Ives Mayeuc, a Dominican, who was biſhop of Rennes ever ſince the twenty ninth of January 1506, and had been confeſſor to queen Anne of Bretagne, to Charles VIII, and Lewis XII, attended him at his death, and adminiſtred the ſacraments to him (c).

I add, that, according to Leander Alberti (d), he died the ninteenth of September 1528, aged fifty four years. This hiſtorian agrees with Altamura as to the place of his death; but his Latin tranſlator hath not well rendered theſe words, Nella città di Renes; for he ſays, in urbe Reneſiâ, whereas he ſhould have ſaid, Redonibus, or in civitate Redonenſi. D'Argentré aſſerts (e), that Franciſco Sylveſtro, general of the Jacobins, died at Rennes the twentieth of October 1528. He was very much miſtaken, when he thought that he was called Prieras; confounding him with Sylveſter Prieras, maſter of the ſacred palace under Leo X.

(a) It was the order of the Dominicans.

(b) Licet corpore gravis Provincias tamen Ordinis viſitando luſtravit ex officio, reſtituendæ vitæ regulari . . . pro viribus intendens. Altamura, ubi infra.

(c) Taken from Altamura's Bibliotheque of the Dominicans, pag 253.

(d) In Deſcript. Italiæ, fol. 350, verſo, of the Italian edition of Venice 1561, and pag. 540, of the Latin edition of Colen, 1567.

(e) D'Argentré, Hiſt. de Bretagne, lib. xii, cap. lxix, pag. m. 718.

[A] Who is commonly quoted by this name, though his true name was Francis Silveſter.] His commentary on the four books of Thomas Aquinas againſt the heathens, is chiefly quoted. He hath alſo wrote ſome commentaries on Ariſtotle's philoſophy and the life of bleſſed Oſanna, in ſix volumes. This is a ſaint, whoſe confeſſor he had been, and who is held in great veneration at Mantua, by reaſon of her holineſs and miracles (1).

(1) Ex Altamura, in Biblioth. Dominic. pag. 253.

FERRETUS (ÆMILIUS) [A], one of the ableſt civilians of the XVIth century, was born at Caſtello Franco in Tuſcany [B] the fourteenth of November 1489. As ſoon as he was twelve years of age, he was ſent to Piſa, where he ſtudied the canon and civil laws for three years: After that, he ſpent two more in the univerſity of Siena, and then went to Rome, and was ſecretary to Cardinal Salviata. He was received Advocate at the age of nineteen, having defended ſome Theſes before a numerous aſſembly of cardinals and biſhops. He then left off his chriſtian name of Dominic, to take that of Æmilius. Having accepted the profeſſorſhip in the civil law, he explained ſo learnedly the title De rebus creditis, that he was for that promoted to be ſecretary to Leo X. He was ſome years in that office, which he voluntarily left, and retired into his own country. Two years after he came from thence, where his father had been killed, and went to Tridino in the Montferrat. He married there [C]; and after four years ſtay, he followed to Rome and Naples the marquis of Montferrat, who commanded part of the French army. This expedition of the French proving very unhappy, he endeavoured to return again into his own country; but he fell into the hands of the Spaniards, who made him pay his ranſom for his liberty. He went into France, and taught the civil law at Valence with ſo much reputation, that Francis I made him a counſellor in the parliament of Paris [D], and ſent him with a public character to the Venetians and Florentines. He acquitted himſelf in theſe employs with ſo much ſkill, that the marquis of Montferrat, having obtained Francis the firſt's leave, ſent him to Charles the fifth's court. Ferretus followed the emperor in his African expedition; and after his return into France, the king ſent him to the Florentines during the war which they had with the emperor. After they were conquered, he went back into France, and

[A] Æmilius Ferretus.] Mr Graverol the advocate is miſtaken, to think that this profeſſor of the civil-law was called Æmilius Perrotus. He will not enquire whether ſome have erroneouſly called him Æmilius Ferretus (1); however, he affirms, that Æmilius Perrotus, to whom Bunel wrote ſome letters, is the ſame civilian as Æmilius Ferretus. It is a miſtake. This was an Italian, the other a Frenchman, as Mr Graverol might have been informed by Bunel (2). I do not diſtinguiſh him from that counſellor of the parliament, honourably mentioned by Thuanus, and whoſe ſon was killed at the maſſacre on St Bartholomew's day. 'Dionyſius item Perrotus 'Æmilii Senatoris Pariſienſis non minus integritate 'quam juris ſcientia clari F. tanto patre digniſſimus 'eandem fortunam ſubiit (3). —— Dionyſius Perrotus, 'ſon to Æmilius, a counſellor of the parliament of Pa'ris, a man no leſs famed for his integrity, than for 'his knowledge in law; who, as he inherited his great 'father's virtues, ſo he likewiſe underwent the ſame 'fate.' The epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheca hath deceived Mr Graverol; wherein are theſe words, Æmilius Ferretus ſeu Perrotus juriſconſultus ſcripſit, &c. (4). The author aſcribes to him the commentary in legem Gallus, which belongs to none but Perrotus.

[B] Was born at Caſtello Franco in Tuſcany.] His anceſtors, who were originally of Ravenna, ſettled in that town of Tuſcany (5). Obſerve here one or two miſtakes of Mr Allard. Æmilius Ferretus, ſays he (6), was at Languedoc, but he taught with applauſe in the univerſity of Valence in Henry the ſecond's reign. He ſhould have ſaid Francis I. It might have been ſaid after Panzirolus (7), that he was appointed counſellor in the parliament of Grenoble; by that, he would have had a new relation to Mr Allard's work.

[C] He married there.] His wife was of a very good family, ex ſplendida familia (8). He had by her ſix ſons and one daughter (9), and yet he died without children, and his nephew became his heir (10); which is another proof, that Æmilius Perrotus, father to a ſon who was killed in the year 1572, is not the ſame Æmilius Ferretus who died without children in the year 1552.

[D] Francis I made him a counſellor in the parliament of Paris.] It was in 1536, if we believe Panzirolus; but if he be in the right in that, he is ſoon after groſsly miſtaken, when he ſuppoſes that Ferretus, ſince his promotion to that office, was ſent by Francis I to Venice and Florence, and by the marquis of Montferrat into Spain, about the time that Charles the firſt was preparing himſelf for his expedition into Africa. This expedition was in the year 1535.

(1) Æmilius Perrotus, qui & aliis Æmilius Ferretus dicitur (an errore id factum non eſt hic diſquirendi locus) juriſconſultus fuit magni nominis. Franciſcus Graverol, notis in Epiſt. ii, Bunelli, pag. 7.

(2) See the 7th letter of Bunel, pag. 33.

(3) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. lii, pag. 1077, ad. ann. 1572.

(4) Epit. Bibl. Geſn. p. m. 12.

(5) Panzirolus de claris legum interpret. lib. ii, cap. clxvii, pag. m. 348.

(6) Allard, Bibl. de Dauphiné, pag. 103.

(7) Panzir. ubi ſupra, pag. 350.

(8) Ib. pag. 349.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Uxore ac liberis amiſſis Marcum Nicolai fratris filium hæredem ſcripſit. Id. ib. pag. 350.

and followed the court to Nice, at the time of the Pope's, and Charles the fifth's, and the King's enterview ; then, having parted with his place of counſellor in the parliament, he retired to Lyons, whence he went to Florence, and obtained the freedom of that city. He was called to teach the civil law at Avignon. His ſtipend immediately roſe to 550 crowns, then to 800, and at laſt to 1000 per annum, a ſum which had never been given to any profeſſor in that univerſity. He gained the love both of the inhabitants and ſtudents, as it appeared after his death [E], as may be ſeen in the remarks. He died at Avignon the 15th of July 1552. He wrote ſeveral books (a) [F]. One of his letters is ſeen before the old French tranſlation of Boccace's Decameron [G].

[E] He gained the love both of the inhabitants and ſtudents, as it appeared after his death.] Simon Craveta, his ſucceſſor in the chair of the civil law, daring to blame him in his firſt lecture, was hiſſed by all his auditory, and expelled out of the city. 'Unicè tam 'à civibus, quam auditoribus dilectus (Ferrettus) in'gens ſui deſiderium reliquit, quod Simonis Cravetæ 'exemplum oſtendit, qui Æmilii Cathedræ ſubroga'tus, cum in prima oratione eum perſtrinxiſſet, ab 'omnibus exploſus, & urbe ejectus, coactus eſt diſce'dere (11). ——— He was beloved in ſo ſingular a 'manner, both by the citizens and ſtudents, that his 'loſs was extremely regretted, and his memory had in 'the higheſt eſteem, which is manifeſt in the caſe of Simon Craveta, who, ſucceeding him in the chair, cenſu'red him in his firſt harangue, which ſo exaſperated 'the whole audience, that they turned him out of the 'city, and obliged him to retire.'

[F] He wrote ſeveral books.] Panzirolus ſays this (12). 'Plura in jus civile ſcripſit, & librum de Signo, '& Ratione inſcriptum, in quo multas leges interpre'tatus eſt, & alterum Bartoli Everriculum nuncupa'tum, in quo ejus errores congerit; notas in Inſtitu'tiones, opinionum volumen, reſponſa, nec paucas 'epiſtolas edidit. Opus etiam de armorum ratione 'lingua Hetruſca compoſuit. ——— He wrote ſeveral 'tracts on the civil-law, and a treatiſe intituled, de 'Signo & Ratione, wherein he explained a great num'ber of laws, and another intituled Bartoli Everricu'lum, in which he makes a collection of Bartolus's er'rors ; he publiſhed alſo annotations on the Inſtitutes, a 'volume of caſes, replies, and ſeveral letters. He com'poſed likewiſe in Italian a treatiſe upon the law of 'arms.' We muſt add to this a commentary on Tacitus.

[G] One of his letters is ſeen before the old French tranſlation of Boccace's Decameron.] This letter is in Italian, and dated from Lyons the firſt of May 1545. He wrote it to the queen of Navarre. It is a very good encomium on the Decameron, and on the French tranſlation, which Antony le Maçon had made by order of that princeſs. Emilio Ferretti (thus he ſubſcribes his name) declares, that he had not believed that the tranſlator, though a man of parts, a diligent and good writer, and ſkillful in the Italian tongue, could ſucceed well in tranſlating the Decameron ; but that he had been convinced of the contrary, by reading his tranſlation. Le Maçon's application to husbandry and building, and his diſtractions occaſioned by the cares of his family, being incumbered with a wife and a great number of children, made Ferrettus deſpair of ſeeing a good tranſlation from him. I am ſure that you will not be diſpleaſed to ſee here his own words. Per la moltitudine & varietà de le cure, ne lequali egli ha reſo ſingular conto di ſe, o per eſſer deditiſſimo à la agricoltura, & à l'edificare, ſecondo che dimoſtrano le ville & le caſe ſue, o per haver moglie & buon numero di figluoli & maſchi & femine, à quali è ſtato meſtieri di altro aiuto che di teſſer favole, à ogni altra coſa aſpettavo che mi riuſciſſi che à tradur novelle, almeno in ſi gran numero & di ſi gran varietà: ma la bellezza de l'ingegno ſuo, & il compartimento, per il quale egli ha ſaputo coſi ben diſpenſar il tempo, ha vinte & tante ſue difficultà, & l'imagination mia. Here is, by the by, a ſmall account of the character of the old tranſlator of the Decameron.

(a) Taken from Panzirolus, lib. ii, cap. clxvii, de claris legum Interpretibus.

(11) Id. ibid.

(12) Id. ibid.

FERRI (Paul) in Latin Ferrius, was a very learned divine in the XVIIth Century. He was born the twenty fourth of February 1591, at Metz, where his family made a good figure [A]. He improved himſelf ſo much at Montauban, where he had been to ſtudy divinity, that he was received miniſter at Metz in the year 1610, at the age of nineteen. He had already publiſhed a book [B]. The quality of ſtudent of divinity, and that of author, were found united in him at the ſame time. Thoſe which he afterwards publiſhed at ſeveral times, acquired him great reputation [C]. He had excellent talents for [A] He was born .... at Metz (1), where his family made a good figure.] James Ferri's father was forty one years ſucceſſively going through all the degrees of the ancient magiſtracy of this city, and was not out of employment till the ſuppreſſion, which was made in the year 1643, of the juriſdiction of the judges which were called the thirteen. Elizabeth Jolli, his wife, our Paul Ferri's mother, was ſiſter to the famous Peter Jolli the king's attorney at Metz, Toul, and Verdun, to whom Mr le Bey-de-Batilli, and Mr Boiſſard, addreſſed ſeveral epigrams in their Latin poems.

[B] At nineteen years of age, he had publiſhed a book.] This is the title of it : Les premieres Oeuvres poëtiques de Paul Ferri Meſſin, où ſous la douce diverſité de ſes conceptions ſe rencontrent les honeſtes libertez d'une jeuneſſe. He got it printed at Montauban in 1610. He was as yet but a ſtudent of divinity ; but as he prepared himſelf to be ſhortly promoted to the miniſtry, he ended his advertiſement to the reader with theſe words, Sat ludo nugiſque datum. —— Thus much for mirth and trifles. If this collection of poems was in Latin, it would be called, Juvenilia Pauli Ferrii. Here is a new author to be added to the famous youths, if Mr Baillet prints that book again. The firſt piece that is found among his poems, is a paſtoral, intituled, Iſabelle ou le dedain de l'amour. The next pieces are ſeveral ſonnets and ſtanza's, under the title of Les gloires d'Iſabelle ; and laſtly, many ſtanza's and ſonnets for ſome miniſters and other perſons of Montauban, Metz, and Rochelle.

[C] Thoſe that he afterwards publiſhed at ſeveral times, acquired him great reputation.] That which he publiſhed in 1616, under the title of Scholaſtici orthodoxi ſpecimen (2), ſhews that the doctrine of the Proteſtants, upon the ſubject of grace, hath been taught by the ſchoolmen. This treatiſe got him the eſteem of the illuſtrious Mr du Pleſſis Mornai, who writ him a letter (3), wherein he gave his thoughts on another work which he had heard Ferri was about. That other performance was printed at Sedan by John Jannon in the year 1618, and is intituled, Le dernier deſeſpoir de la tradition contre l'Ecriture, ou Refutation du livre de François Veron. Here is the title of a book publiſhed at Leyden in 1630. Pauli Ferrii Vindiciæ pro Scholaſtico orthodoxo adverſus Leonardum Perinum Jeſuitam, doctorem theologum, & univerſitatis Muſſipontanæ Cancellarium, juſtæ, plenæ, amicæ, in quibus agitur de prædeſtinatione & annexis, de gratia & libero arbitrio, de cauſa peccati, & juſtificatione. This jeſuit had put out a book in 1619. intituled, Thraſonica Pauli Ferrii Calviniſtæ (4). Mr Ferri made a general catechiſm in 1654, to ſhew that it was neceſſary to reform the Romiſh church. He publiſhed it the ſame year, under the title of Catéchiſme général de la réformation. Mr Boſſuet, who was then canon and arch-deacon of Metz, and who hath been ſo famous, under the name of biſhop of Condom and Meaux, writ againſt this treatiſe

(1) The Oxford Catalogue ſhould have called him Metenſis, and not Metrenſis.

(2) It is an octavo of 569 pages. The title ſays, that is was printed at Gotſtad, Gotſtadii. It is in all likelihood a ſuppoſed name which ſignifies in High Dutch God's Town, meaning by that Geneva.

(3) Dated June 10, 1617. It is found in the third tome of Du Pleſſis's Memoirs, p. 1158.

(4) Alegambe, Biblioth. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 305. His Continuator hath ſaid Verrii inſtead of Ferii.

for the pulpit. He was the moſt eloquent man of his province, and whoſe diſcourſes were the moſt moving. His tall ſtature, his venerable face, and his graceful geſture, added much to his eloquence. His enemies ſpread a falſe report, that he was one of thoſe miniſters, whom cardinal Richelieu had prevailed upon to attempt the union of both religions. Guy Patin's Letters contain this falſity [D]. What is certain is, that he lamented the diviſion of the Proteſtants, and that he hoped to be able to contribute ſomething towards an union among them. It was, no doubt, for that reaſon, that he kept a great correſpondence by letters with Mr Dury (a) [E], who negotiated in Germany the agreement of the Proteſtants, and who was a good man, full of piety and zeal; but at laſt he became a ſort of viſionary [F]. Paul Ferri died the 27th of December 1669. He continued treatiſe of Mr Ferri. I muſt not forget, that this miniſter was choſen to preach Lewis the thirteenth's, and the queen mother Anne of Auſtria's funeral ſermons. Theſe two ſermons are printed. He made alſo, on certain occaſions, ſome prayers for their majeſties recovery. Theſe prayers were printed, and are very good.

(a) See his article.

Let us add to all this a paſſage of Mr Ancillon (5). ‘Mr Ferri hath alſo writ another book (6), intituled, Le dernier deſeſpoir de la tradition, which is an excellent book in it's kind. He writ alſo, in 1624, a ſmall book, intituled, Remarques d'Hiſtoires ſur le diſcours de la vie & de la mort de St Livier, & le reçit de ſes miracles nouvellement publiés par le Sieur de Ramberviller lieutenant-général au bailliage de l'evêche de Metz, avec diverſes approbations des docteurs. Mr Ferri would not be known to be the author of this ſmall piece, becauſe he had writ it againſt a perſon of note, and his countryman, with whom he would have no difference; but he hath made me a preſent of this ſmall book ſince I have been his colleague, and I actually have it by me, under whoſe title he writ with his own hand, by Paul Ferri.’

[D] Guy Patin's letters contain this falſity.] Theſe are his words (7). ‘Mr Ferri, miniſter of Metz, died there a month ago. He was one of the moſt learned of his rank. If cardinal Richelieu had not died ſo ſoon, he had reconciled both religions. Several miniſters were gained over to this project. This Mr Ferri was of that number, and had for it a penſion of five hundred crowns every year. Thus the Huguenots ſpeak of it here.’ His enemies renewed this falſe report on account of his general catechiſm, wherein they pretended he gave his adverſary a great advantage; I mean, the abbot Boſſuet, archdeacon of Metz, who writ againſt him.

[E] He kept a great correſpondence by letters with Mr Dury.] This correſpondence laſted above five and twenty or ſix and twenty years. I will relate on this ſubject a ſtory that has been communicated to me. Dury, being at the fair of Francfort in April 1662, expreſſed to ſome gentlemen of Metz a ſtrong deſire to ſee Mr Ferri. When they were ready to go home, they asked him whether or no he would go along with them; they preſſed him to undertake the journey, and offered to ſtay for him till the next day. He could have wiſhed to have had more time to reſolve upon this journey; but he was obliged to determine immediately. He then reſolved to go to Metz; but met with two obſtacles in his way: the firſt, that he muſt dreſs himſelf in the habit of a French peaſant, and to cut off a large white and ſquare beard which he then wore. He had an averſion to the firſt of theſe two things; and could not, without mortification, comply with the ſecond. But the deſire to ſee Mr Ferri overcame theſe difficulties. They arrived at Metz ſo late, that Dury was obliged to delay his viſit till the next day. But one of thoſe that came along with him, very early in the morning, told Mr Ferri, that Mr Dury was arrived the day before, and that it was reaſonable that he ſhould prevent his viſit. Mr Ferri beſtirred himſelf ſo much at this news, and was tranſported with ſo much joy, upon his going to embrace this good doctor, that he forgot to tie the ſtrings of his drawers, and went out half dreſſed. Their interview was attended with a thouſand edifying marks of zeal and reciprocal eſteem. It is thought that, as a conſequence of their conferences, Mr Ferri writ a paper, which he addreſſed to the divines of Strasburg. One of them, who in all probability did not like Syncretiſm, writ againſt Mr Ferri. Obſerve, by the by, that Mr Amyraut was miſtaken, when, in 1647, he ſpoke of Mr Dury, as of a man that was already dead (8).

Let us place here what Mr Ancillon, Mr Ferri's colleague, hath ſaid of Dury (9). ‘He came to Metz, and conferred at a gentleman's houſe with Mr Ferri and me upon this ſubject. He told us as a ſecret whatever he had hitherto done, and what he deſigned to do for the future, and asked our opinion. We obſerved him to be a good man, learned, and every way capable to negotiate a buſineſs of that importance: he had then put it on a good foot; for he had already a promiſe of all the princes of Germany, and the northern kings: he told us, that he found no oppoſition from the princes, but only from ſome miniſters who oppoſed this great and deſired work. He was well ſatisfied with the charity of the gentlemen of Zurich, who had ſupplyed him with conſiderable ſums of money to defray the expences of his journies, and to ſupply what he wanted over and above what the protector (10) did give him. We earneſtly exhorted him not to leave off his deſign till he had executed it.’

In the firſt edition of this work, I gave an account what the memoir contained that was communicated to me; which is, that after Dury and Ferri's conferences, the latter compoſed a diſcourſe, which obliged a divine of Strasburg to write againſt him. This divine cannot be Dorſcheus, becauſe he died in 1659, and ſo his book, De gratiâ adverſus Calviniſtam Ferrium, cannot be referred to any thing that followed this conference of the peace-maker Dury, and the miniſter of Metz. What Dury ſaid, that he found no obſtacle but from ſome miniſters who oppoſed the re-union of the parties, is worth our notice, and confirms what ſhall be ſaid hereafter (11). Hulſeman, a profeſſor of divinity, publiſhed at Wittemberg, in 1644, a book againſt this project of Dury, and intituled it, Calviniſmus irreconciliabilis.

[F] Dury at laſt became a ſort of viſionary.] This appears from what I have ſaid in another place (12) concerning his apocalyptical deſigns, and much more from the great hopes which he had conceived of his new explanation of the apocalypſe. I could not join this laſt fact with the preceeding, becauſe I was then at the laſt page of the firſt volume of this Dictionary. I therefore referred it to this place. Pray obſerve Dury's plan. It is a ‘method of meditation to obtain the true ſenſe of the holy ſcriptures by one's ſelf, and to prevent all occaſions of diſpute concerning what may be doubtful; for in every doubtful caſe, we ſhall have nothing to do, but immediately to have recourſe to one or ſeveral texts, which ſpeak of the ſubject in hand, and having found the true ſenſe of the ſcripture by the rule of common interpretation, the deciſion will be found, if people are previouſly agreed to acquieſce in the ſenſe of the holy ſcripture (13)’. He adds, that to give an eſſay of his method, ‘he hath pitched upon the book of the Revelation, which, without doubt, he looked upon as the moſt obſcure book of all the whole Bible; that by the deſcription of the means whereby we come to underſtand it, we may be convinced that the ſame rule may diſcover the ſenſe, and lead us to the underſtanding of other leſs obſcure books and texts of holy writ (14).’ He believes, that, with God's help, this battery againſt the powers of darkneſs will be ſo raiſed, that the Lord's hand ſhall be lifted up according to Iſaiah's prophecy, chap. xxvi. ver. 9, 10, 11, 12. which begins to be now fullfilled. We muſt therefore ſurround them with ſuch a light, that they ſhall have no place where to hide themſelves any more (15). What dreams! what chimeras! how weak muſt a man be, to fancy that he can draw from ſuch a method ſo great an evidence

(5) Ancillon, Mêlange Critique Tom. II, p. 269.

(6) He had juſt before ſpoken of the Scholaſticus Orthodoxus.

(7) Patin, Letter DIX, dated the 19th of March 1670, Tom. III, pag. 499, Edit. Genev. 1691.

(8) Andrew Rivetus obſerved this miſtake: Scripſit in ſua præfatione (that is to ſay, in his preface Speciminis Animadverſionum againſt Mr Spanheim) Rever. Duræum piæ memoriæ non depoſuiſſe niſi cum vita ſtudium concordiæ inter Reformatos & Lutheranos ſarciendæ, qui etiamnum vivit Dei gratia & valet. Andr. Rivetus, Epiſt. Apologet. ad Guill. Fratrem, dated July 14, 1648, Oper. Tom. III, pag. 886, 887.

(9) Ancillon, Mêlange Critique Tom. II, pag. 244, 245.

(10) Oliver Cromwell.

(11) In Remark [D] of the article HOTTINGER.

(12) In Remark [C] of the article DURY.

(13) Dury, Intelligence de l'Apocalypſe, p. 24.

(14) Ibid. p. 25.

(15) Idem, Epiſt. dedicat. p. 9, 10.

continued his preaching. Above eighty ſtones were found in his bladder, which was the cauſe of his death. He had a very fine library, and to the laſt took a pleaſure in writing ſeveral remarks on the blank-paper, which is commonly at the beginning and end of books; and becauſe he writ ſmall and plain, he ſet down upon theſe leaves abundance of things, which may eaſily be read. We ſee in the inſcription of his picture in print the words Verbi divini miniſter [G]; which dence, that it will be able to clear all the doubts which are raiſed on ſuch and ſuch places of ſcripture? This great pacificator ſounded the horn in Sion; for he joined to his book, a Latin piece, of four pages in 4to, with this title Celeuſma ad pios Evangelii Miniſtros. An exhortation to the devout miniſters of the goſpel.

> Vos qui per vada ſancta navigantes
> Lentos figitis ad mandata remos
> Audite hoc monitum, ut celeuſma miſſum
> Nomine CHRISTI.
>
> Attend ye ſailors on the ſacred deep,
> Whoſe oars the meaſures of God's mandates keep,
> The chearful ſignal catch, aud think it came
> From heav'n itſelf, with your great maſter's name.

The owner of the copy, which came to my hands, faſtened to it the original of the letter, which Dury wrote to the conſiſtories of the province of Groningen, when he ſent them his new project and his Celeuſma. This letter is dated from Caſſel the 22d of June 1674, and ſhews, that he was concerned for nothing ſo much as for his new method.

Obſerve, that to excuſe him, and to ſhew that he fed not on whims, one would think it might be ſaid, that one of his chief deſigns was to attack the conſciences of thoſe who foment diviſion. This appears by his words: What perplexes the minds, and ſeparates the affections of chriſtians, is nothing elſe but a deſign that men have to maintain the principles and method of their particular faction, againſt the intereſt of the common edification, which is taught and recommended to us by the apoſtle St Paul, 1 Cor. ix. 19, ... I have therefore in view an enquiry after a truly evangelical and ſpiritual remedy, which may be applied to the conſcience of thoſe who foment a ſpirit of Party among chriſtians, for a temporal intereſt: this is the foundation and aim of my new deſign (16). It may be ſaid, that this was to go to the ſpring of the evil, and of the remedy; and ſo it ought not to ſeem ſtrange that he appeared ſo confident of ſucceſs. 'He had a mind to 'ſhew by what means thoſe obſtacles might be removed, which hinder the Proteſtants from proceeding 'to a more perfect reformation, which ought to be 'introduced both in the ſchools and in the church, and 'from whence, by the bleſſing of God, the fruit will 'redound to the government of the ſtate (17).' People may ſay what they pleaſe; his chimeras will ſtill ſubſiſt; for the attacks, which he deſigned to give to the conſcience of the chiefs, were not leſs unlikely to ſucceed, than thoſe which he levelled againſt their underſtanding.

[G] We ſee in the inſcription of his picture in print the words Verbi Divini Miniſter.] It will be a ſatisfaction for many to find here the diſtich which is at the bottom of that picture:

> Tales ſi multos ferrent hæc ſæcula Ferri,
> In Ferri ſæclis aurea ſæcla forent.

The firſt print of a miniſter, which the Proteſtants of Metz publiſhed after his, was that of Mr Ancillon. Wherein was put Verbi divini Miniſter, but they were obliged to blot it out (18).

A COMPLAINT of Mr Ancillon the Son.

This Mr Ancillon was miniſter of Metz, and a man of great merit. See his article (19). His ſon was mightily offended at what hath been ſaid in this remark [G]; and he hath publiſhed his complaints of it. I. He pretends (20), that to ſhew the value that people had for Mr Ferri, I have ſaid, that it was allowed that he ſhould be called miniſter of the R. R. * and that thoſe who engraved Mr Ancillon's copper-plate, having given him alſo the ſame quality, the magiſtrates oppoſed it, and had it razed out, becauſe they had not the ſame regard for the one as they had for the other. What, continues he (21), was there no way to make the illuſtrious Mr Ferri as great as he was, without leſſening Mr Ancillon? Or could not he be raiſed but on the ruins of his colleague? This diſtinction ſeems to him (22) odious and affected: he ſays, that I prepoſterouſly endeavour to blacken Mr Ancillon's memory (23). II. He is angry (24) with the perſon who furniſhed me with ſome memoirs, and he hath been ſurprized (25) at my credulity, and at the manner of my making uſe of them. He ſuppoſes, that having been a long while in the neighbourhood of Metz, I muſt be pretty well acquainted with the tranſactions there, and that I could not but know the univerſal eſteem, and unexpreſſible affection, which people had for Mr Ancillon. III. He ſpeaks (26) of the correſpondence by letters that had been between Mr Ancillon and me for ſeveral years. IV. He doth not believe (27) that his father, or any of his family, hath ever diſobliged me. V. But he finds (28), that I ſhould have done well for my credit to forbear ..... placing with ſo much care the name of Ancillon, in the body and index of my book, ſince I would afford him but a rank unworthy of ſo great a man. VI. Coming to the fact, he pretends, that what I ſay is falſe; and informs the world (29), that Mr Philippe engraved Mr Ferri's picture ſome time after his death, and named him miniſter of the R. R. that the king's attorney took fire immediately at this title, and proceeded againſt the Engraver; That Mr Ferri's heirs unwilling to meddle in that affair, the Engraver (30) was diſpleaſed with his work, and that if ſome perſons of note had not hindered him, he would have broke his plate to pieces, being vexed that no perſon appeared for him, who, by his work, had had no other aim, than to honour the memory of Mr Ferri; that therefore he was contented to correct the title, and, to ſtop the king's attorney's and the Roman Catholics mouths, he put a P. between the two R. to ſignify pretended reformed; That (13) the ſame Philippe engraved afterwards Mr Ancillon's picture; and that, to avoid the ſame inconveniency that had happened to him on account of Mr Ferri's picture, he put theſe words, David Ancillon, Miniſtrorum Metenſium Decanus. That no body ever found fault with them; that they remained without contradiction; that the world hath always ſeen them in this print; that he hath actually the plate in his hands, and (32) that he is ready to ſhew it to whoſoever will deſire to be convinced that there is at leaſt one miſtake in my large work.

I never was more ſurprized, than when I read this part of Mr Ancillon's ſon's book. I immediately did two things: one was to write to him, that he might be in the right as to the fact, but that he could not be ſo with reference to the deſign which he accuſes me of. I gave him ſome explanations, and begged of him to rectify theſe things in the firſt work that he ſhould publiſh; and I told him, that, on my ſide, I would clear this buſineſs in my ſecond edition. He returned a very obliging anſwer, and aſſured me, that he hoped to print ſhortly a book, wherein all this ſhould be reviſed and corrected. The other thing that I did was to write to the perſon who had furniſhed me with the memoirs concerning Mr Ferri: I deſired him to tell me, whether the two facts which I had related, and received from him, could be well proved? or whether I muſt confeſs myſelf in the wrong, ſince the public had ſeen a book, wherein Mr Ancillon the ſon maintained, that Mr Ferri's print was called in queſtion, but that of his father had never been ſo? We ſhall ſee hereunder what anſwer I received. But before that, let us make ſome notes on the five heads of this complaint.

REFUTATION of this Complaint.

I. I can proteſt, with all the ſincerity in the world, that I have had no deſign of giving my readers an idea of ſuperiority or inferiority, with reference to theſe two miniſters of Metz, Mr Ferri and Mr Ancillon; neither do I believe, that the gentleman, who ſent me theſe memoirs, had any ſuch deſign. I have read them over ſince I have known the complaint, and I have found in them no ground to ſuſpect it. The thing is told in a plain manner, as I have related it; and it plainly appears, that he only deſigned to ſhew the which were not allowed to be uſed ſince for his colleagues. He left ſome children

---

(16) Ibid. p. 17.

(17) Ibid. pag. 25, 26.

(18) This hath been found to be falſe. See, below, num. VI.

(19) Article ANCILLON (DAVID).

(20) Diſcourſe on the late Mr Ancillon's Life, pag. 307.

* Reformed Religion.

(21) Ibid. p. 308.

(22) Ibid.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Ibid. pag. 312.

(25) Ibid. pag. 313.

(26) Ibid.

(27) Ibid. pag. 314.

(28) Ibid.

(29) Ibid. pag. 308.

(30) Ibid. pag. 309.

(31) Ibid. pag. 310.

(32) Ibid. pag. 311.

the epocha of one of the chicaneries of the miſſionaries againſt the Proteſtants. There was a time when only thoſe miniſters, who took upon them the title of paſtors, were put to ſome trouble for it, but were not diſturbed for ſtyling themſelves miniſters of the word of GOD; but at laſt it was thought fit to vex them on this account. This is all that I believed, that the perſon who ſent me thoſe memoirs, deſigned to ſhew with reference to the affairs of Metz; and it was wholly with that view that I made that remark which concerned Mr Ferri's picture. Had I been told, that any body would have pretended, that I deſigned, by that, to have put Mr Ferri above Mr Ancillon; I had anſwered, that it had been impoſſible. I at leaſt remember, that it never then came into my mind that any one would underſtand me ſo; and had I ſuſpected it, I would have poſitively ſet down the deſign of my remark. Judge then what was my ſurprize, when I ſaw that there was a public complaint againſt me, that I had aimed to villify and blacken Mr Ancillon; and that I ſaid, that the title of miniſter of GOD's word was blotted out of his picture, becauſe they had not the ſame regard for him as for the other. This is not only to impute to me a deſign which I never had, but alſo ſome words which can never be found in my dictionary. I have ſeveral times obſerved, that thoſe who write either the life, or encomium of great men, are pleaſed to ſay, that ſuch or ſuch a cuſtom hath begun, or ceaſed, by ſuch or ſuch a profeſſor, &c. Theſe are epocha's or particulars which are thought remarkable; and therefore the author of the memoirs ought to have informed me when the permiſſion to put verbi divini miniſter to the copper-plates of the miniſters ended, and when it began to be forbidden. But had he had a deſign to have heightened Mr Ferri's character, he ſhould have entered into particulars, and ſhewed how they warranted ſuch a diſtinction; otherwiſe he could not have made it appear that Mr Ferri was preferred to his colleague. To explain myſelf: Thoſe who ſay in general, That ſuch a one was the laſt who had that permiſſion, ſuch a one was the firſt that had it not allowed him, ſhew plainly and preciſely a period of time; but they ſay nothing which proves that the firſt was more deſerving than the laſt: the event, which they relate, is a very equivocal ſign. Some factions may ſpring up, which may endeavour to aboliſh a cuſtom, and for the firſt three or four years have not authority enough to aboliſh it: in the mean time a profeſſor is promoted to the chair, and of courſe enjoys the privileges of that cuſtom. If in the fifth year the faction is potent enough, another profeſſor, that happens to be elected at that time, ſhall be debarred this privilege. Doth this prove him leſs deſerving than the other? not at all. It proves only, that the cabal was more able to carry their point the fifth year than they had been before. It may even happen, that a faction will not employ their whole ſtrength, becauſe they deſpiſe certain perſons; and that they wait to eſtabliſh their innovation, till a profeſſor of extraordinary worth is choſen, becauſe the alteration of a cuſtom is of much more weight when it begins by a very eminent perſon. There are a thouſand caſes wherein the epochas, which the author of the memoir pointed out to me, would be a proof of Mr Ancillon's ſuperiority over Mr Ferri: but the truth of it is, that there was no deſign in this buſineſs to decide who was the greateſt man of the two. It was only intended to ſhew by what ſteps miniſters were wronged and vexed. Obſerve, that the judges, exaſperated by the miſſionaries, or carried on by their own ambition (33), did ſooner vex a miniſter of great parts and learning, than one of leſs note. They imagined, that by perſecuting one, who was reckoned as a pillar of a Calviniſtical church, they could better carry on the ruin of the whole party, than if they perſecuted a miniſter of an inferior rank. So that, inſtead of pretending, as Mr Ancillon, the ſon, hath done, that there was a deſign to leſſen his father, it had been more excuſable to have fancied, that there was rather a deſign to extol him: for what can be more honourable for a miniſter, not only according to the opinion of the refugees, but alſo of all the Proteſtants, to have been the firſt example of the perſecutions of the miſſionaries (34)? Did not ſuch a choice of the perſecutors imply, that they did deſpiſe thoſe upon whom they had not begun their attacks, and that they thought it a maſter-piece to affront thoſe upon whom they begun them? you may remember, that the agents of the clergy, who took no notice that ſome country miniſters, or ſome indifferent writers, ſtiled themſelves paſtors, made a great buſtle when they ſaw the Paris miniſters take upon them that title in an excellent book compoſed by Aubertin, one of the miniſters of that church (35). After all, it will appear, that if the author of the memoir and I had had the odd deſign which is fathered upon us, we ſhould have been the moſt unſkillful of all men: we ſhould have ſo concealed our deſign, that we ſhould have made it inviſible to all unprejudiced readers, and that many might eaſily have concluded from our words juſt the contrary to our intention. This is what concerns the firſt part of the complaint: I will not enlarge ſo much on the others.

II. The credit that I gave to the memoir is not an unlawful credulity. I was obliged to believe, that a man that had lately taken the pains to inform himſelf upon the ſpot, as exactly as he could, of all the particulars of that ſtory of the prints of Mr Ferri and Mr Ancillon, could not be miſtaken: and as I had lived ſome years in the neighbourhood of Metz, and had never heard any thing of what concerns theſe prints, it induced me the more to think ſo. I came to Sedan about the end of Auguſt, 1675, and I found that the Proteſtants there enjoyed a greater liberty than the other churches: but I found that things grew worſe with them every day, and I ſaw the cavil that aroſe concerning the verbi divini miniſter. A ſtudent (36) of divinity was to maintain ſome theſes which he had dedicated to ſome of the miniſters of that place. He gave them the title of verbi divini miniſter, according to the cuſtom that had been always practiſed, and never oppoſed; but the prieſts of Sedan made a buſtle about it, and got this title ſtruck out. When I remembered this, could I doubt but ſuch another innovation had happened ſome time after Mr Ferri's death? The particular eſteem which the magiſtrates might have for a miniſter (37) did not hinder them to give way to the peeviſh temper of the miſſionaries who applied to them. It was the bent of the court, and conſequently the ſpring that gave motion to all. III. I was very well pleaſed, and thought myſelf honoured, to have an intercourſe of letters with Mr Ancillon. We writ to one another what we knew concerning the news of the republic of learning. I had a deſign to ſpeak of him in my book, and to boaſt of his friendſhip; but I expected ſome memoirs, or at leaſt till the article of Farel, whoſe life he has written, ſhould give me occaſion to do it: but this article was referred to the Supplement to the two volumes of my Dictionary, as I have referred to it ſeveral important articles. IV. None that knows me will ever do me ſo much injuſtice as to ſuſpect, that, under pretence I had been diſobliged by any one's relations, I would revenge myſelf on his memory (38). I freely here confeſs, that I have no reaſon to complain of the late Mr Ancillon, or of any of his family. V. If I thought it not fit to go from my memoir concerning Mr Ferri, to ſpeak of the worth of his colleague, it was becauſe I was very ſure that I ſhould not want a more proper opportunity to do it. I gave the public notice, that I did not make the Index to my Dictionary: It was done by a miniſter, and a refugee, who no doubt put there Mr Ancillon, becauſe he had a mind to ſhew the epocha of the particular quarrel againſt the title verbi divini miniſter, it being a remarkable thing.

VI. Let us at laſt come to the chief point. The author of the memoir hath acquainted me, that he was miſtaken in one thing; that it is not true that Verbi divini Miniſter was put in Mr Ancillon's print, and therefore that they were not obliged to raze out this clauſe. However he was in the right to ſay, that this clauſe was allowed in Mr Ferri's print. He has ſent me a copy, where I read theſe words: PAULUS FERRI V. D. MINISTER ECCLES. P. R. METENSIS OBIIT ANNO 1669. ÆTAT. ANNO 79. The inſcription was at firſt MINISTER ECCLES. REF. METENSIS; but they were obliged to raze out REF. as repugnant to the edicts of pacification, and to put in the room of thoſe three letters P. R. which are ſeen in all the prints.

---

(33) It was in France a ſhort and ſure way to pleaſe the court, and to obtain from thence ſome favour and preferment, to ſhew a great zeal to harraſs the miniſters, &c.

(34) It is a glory to be the firſt victim of a perſecution: It is the brighteſt gem in St Stephen's crown. Proteſilaus's death became famous on that account in the renowned Trojan war. Hectorea PRIMUS fataliter haſta Proteſilaë cadis. Ovid. Metam. lib. xii, ver. 67.

(35) See remark [B] of the article AUBERTIN.

(36) Born at Sedan. He is miniſter of the Walloon church at Dort. He is yet alive, and may witneſs to what I advance here.

(37) The author of the complaint ought to acknowledge it, ſince he confeſſes that the engraver of Mr Ferri's picture was ſued, and that this miniſter was very much eſteemed.

(38) See in it's place the article ANCILLON. It was compoſed ſince the unkind complaint of this miniſter's ſon; and notwithſtanding that, I have ſpoken very advantageouſly of the miniſter, without minding this unjuſt and ill grounded complaint.

children [H], and ſome manuſcripts (b) [I]. I know not whether we ſhall ever ſee his poſthumous works.

(b) This, and moſt of the things which you will find in the remarks, have been taken from a memorial which the kind, learned, and curious author of the Remarks on the Catholic Confeſſion of Sancy, printed at Amſterdam in the year 1693, hath imparted to me.

prints. Mr Ancillon is miſtaken when he ſays, that Mr Ferri's plate had originally R. R. in whoſe room, when they came to correct it, they were only obliged to put a P between thoſe two letters. The concluſion of all this will be, I. That it is ſtrictly true, that the title of V. D. Miniſter appeared at firſt on Mr Ferri's print, and that it remained there even after the Engraver was ſued for it. II. That it was never ſeen, after that, on the print of any miniſter of Metz, and that the Engraver durſt not put it on that of Mr Ancillon. This is what the author of the memoir anſwered me. I omit ſeveral conſiderations which tend to diſtinguiſh the pretence from the true cauſe of the affront that was put upon him and me: there is no neceſſity to trouble the world with it.

[H] He left ſome children.] He was twice married, and had by his firſt wiſe one ſon and one daughter. The daughter is at Metz, with all her family. The ſon's family conſiſts of one ſon and ſeveral daughters: theſe, except the eldeſt, have taken ſanctuary in Berlin, and the ſon is in England. The eldeſt daughter is at the Hague with Mr du Vivier her huſband, who is miniſter there. He had by his ſecond wife one daughter, married to Mr Bancelin, heretofore miniſter of Metz, and now of Berlin.

[I] And ſome manuſcripts.] As, the anſwer to The hiſtory of the birth and decay of hereſy in the city of Metz. Mr de Madaure, ſuffragan of the biſhopric of Metz, is the author of that hiſtory. Mr Ferri, by his laſt will, deſired his heirs to print his anſwer to this book, yet it hath not as yet appeared (39). They keep ſome other treatiſes of the deceaſed, beſides a vaſt number of ſermons, and among them eleven hundred only on the Epiſtle to the Hebrews.

(39) Compare with this the Mélange Critique of Mr Ancillon, Tom. II, pag. 271.

FERRIER (Arnaud, or Arnoul du) preſident of the parliament of Paris in Henry II's reign, was employed by Charles IX in ſeveral embaſſies. See upon this Mr Moreri; for my deſign is only to inſiſt on a thing which he hath taken no notice of, which is, that du Ferrier was along while a good Huguenot in his heart, and that at laſt he publickly owned himſelf one [A]. Had not he made his eſcape, he had been put in priſon, (as being ſuſpected of hereſy) after the famous Mercuriale of the year 1559 (a). This ſtorm againſt him ceaſed ſome time after; and he was choſen for an embaſſy, which gave him occaſion, in ſome meaſure, to ſpeak his mind. He harangued (b) in the council of Trent, as ambaſſador of the moſt chriſtian king; and expreſſed himſelf with ſo much vigour, that he offended the ſtanch Papiſts. After that, he went to Venice in the ſame quality of ambaſſador, and remained there ſeveral years without having an opportunity to diſcover his ſentiments. At laſt Mr du Pleſſis Mornai, who was not ignorant of them, preſſed him ſo warmly, at his return from his embaſſy, to give glory to truth, that he obliged him to declare himſelf publickly (c). The king of Navarre made him his chancellor [B]. The Ultramontanes have accuſed du Ferrier of a certain plot,

(a) Mezerai, Epitom. Chron. Tom. IV, pag. m. 721.

(b) In the year 1562.

(c) See the rem. [A].

[A] At laſt he publickly owned himſelf a good Huguenot.] This circumſtance, which many learned men have not known (1), deſerves to be proved here. The place that I will quote is ſomething long; but I quote it intire, becauſe I found in it nothing but what is uſeful to give us an inſight into the hiſtory of this famous man. Mr du Pleſſis Mornai going to Guienne (2), ‘meets with Mr Ferrier, at Artenay, as he returned from his embaſſy at Venice, where he had been particularly acquainted with him in the year 1570. After they had embraced one another, they retired into a private place, and talking of the good diſpoſition which God gave him at his age, he happened to ſay, that it bordered on the ſeventy ſixth year: Whereupon Mr du Pleſſis took occaſion to tell him, Is it not then high time to look to your conſcience, and to remember thoſe edifying diſcourſes which we have had together formerly at Venice, and that reſolution which you have ſo many times repeated to me, both by word of mouth and by letters, of making an open profeſſion of the truth, which you have known ſo long, and ſo long concealed? And he preſſed him ſo warmly, that he got a promiſe from him, that he would declare himſelf; not without ſaying however, that he would be glad to be firſt paid off fourteen thouſand crowns, which were due to him for his embaſſy. Mr du Pleſſis wrote to his friends at Paris, to keep him in this good reſolution; and, to take off all manner of excuſe, as ſoon as he was with the king of Navarre, he perſuaded him to make du Ferrier his chancellor. Whereupon laying aſide all other buſineſs, he went to meet him, and then made a public profeſſion of the reformed religion. He was a great man, acquainted with all the parts of ſound learning; an excellent civilian, honoured with ſeveral embaſſies, and even with that to the council of Trent, and who in his old age confined his ſtudies to the ſcriptures and the holy tongue: and for that reaſon, Mr du Pleſſis, as may be ſeen by ſeveral of his letters, exhorted him to make a more ſolemn declaration (3); whereby the ſtates, wherein he had lived, might know, why a man, ſo much valued, had forſaken the Romiſh religion at that age. But he could not obtain that of a man who had grown old in the reſpect for the court, and in the fear of the world. Truly Mr Montagne could not forbear ſaying often to Mr du Pleſſis, You have gained a victory over us by getting this man, and honouring in him a virtue which we ſlighted.’

(1) See the remark [C].

(2) Du Pleſſis Mornai's Life, pag. 65, ad ann. 1582.

(3) See, in Du Pleſſis's Memoirs, Tom. I, pag. 104 and 106, the model of the abjuration which was propoſed to him. They would have had him publiſh the motives that induced him to change his religion, and they would take care to diſperſe them every where in different languages.

[B] The king of Navarre made him his chancellor.] Believing that the affairs, du Ferrier negociated at the court of France, would not give him leave to reſide near his perſon, he was pleaſed to give him an employment, which ſhould oblige him to ſtay at Paris: he deſigned Pibrac's place for him, that is to ſay, the ſuperintendance of the affairs which he had in that city (4). This prince had a council at Paris at Toulouſe, and at Bourdeaux. The law-ſuits which he had in every one of thoſe parliaments required it. But let us make uſe of Mr du Pleſſis's own words (5). Becauſe the ſaid eſtates are under three parliaments, namely, Paris, Toulouſe, and Bourdeaux, to whoſe cognizance ſeveral affairs and law-ſuits ariſing concerning them belong, he retains and pays in every one of theſe parliaments a council, over which one of the chief of the parliament preſides. As for that of Paris, he hath choſen Mr du Ferrier, lately embaſſador for the king at Venice, one of the greateſt men of Europe, and whom the late chancellor de l'Hôpital had judged the only man worthy to ſucceed him in the place of chancellor for his integrity and capacity. We are afraid that he dares not accept of it, becauſe he deſires hereafter to make an open profeſſion of the Proteſtant religion, and therefore he would live in a more ſecure and free place for the exerciſe it. Indeed I believe that he did not accept of that poſt. He went to the king of Navarre to be his chancellor; for here is what I find in du Pleſſis's memoirs (6): ‘I have not known all this while but two chancellors of the king of Navarre; the late Mr Ferrier, a very great man, the ſecond Cato of France, who died a year

(4) Du Pleſſis's Memoirs, Tom. I, pag. 158, & 165.

(5) Ibid. pag. 187, in a writing dated in May, 1583.

(6) Ibid. pag. 644.

plot, that might have been either wholly or partly true [C]. This learned man died in the year 1585, aged about ſeventy nine years [D]. Brantome ſays a remarkable thing of him [E]. I ſhall mention it, and will not forget cardinal Palavicini [F].

I lengthen a little this article in the ſecond edition; to obſerve that du Ferrier took his degree of doctor of the civil law at Padua; and that from a profeſſor in the univerſity of Toulouſe, he was promoted to be counſellor of the parliament of that city (d). Read on this ſubject a letter of Bunel (e), where he obſerves, that cardinal de Tournon had contributed very much to this honourable recompence of the merit of this learned civilian; and that the liberality of Francis I appeared on that occaſion. This letter is without date; but we find in it, that Caſtellanus was then biſhop of Mâcon. We muſt thence conclude that du Ferrier got that employ between 1543, and 1548. He had been one of the learned men whom cardinal de Tournon carried along with him, and with whom he familiarly converſed (f). Thuanus ſays on this head what redounds much to this cardinal's glory (g). Du Ferrier's elogium is found among thoſe of Sammarthanus [G]. Beſides that, conſult the notes on the Catholic confeſſion of Sanci (h).

'a year ago of grief for the war of the league; and Mr de Glateins, Mr Pibrac's eldeſt brother, who fills up that place with ſo much applauſe.' The writing, where theſe words are ſeen, is dated in the month of October, 1586.

[C] The Ultramontanes have accuſed him of a certain plot, that might have been either wholly or partly true.] The author of the Journal des Savans is angry with Raynaldus the annaliſt, who attributes this plot to chancellor de l'Hôpital, and to preſident Ferrier. A certain project of the pope's legates, 'occaſioned the remonſtrances made by the emperor, the king of Spain, and other princes, and the famous proteſtation pronounced by preſident du Ferrier, Charles the ninth's embaſſador, which was ſo diſpleaſing to the court of Rome. Nothing could be invented more injurious to the memory of this famous magiſtrate, than what Raynaldus raſhly advances, that he had conſpired with the chancellor de l'Hôpital to withdraw the moſt chriſtian king from the holy ſee, to aſſemble a national council, where the French king, in imitation of the king of England, ſhould have been declared head of the Gallican church, and to uſurp all the church lands of France (7).' If preſident Couſin had remembred that du Ferrier was a good Proteſtant at that time, and that he died in an open profeſſion of the reformed religion, would he have denied what Raynaldus ſuppoſes? can any thing be more probable than ſuch a project (8). And was it poſſible to have the ability of thoſe two excellent perſons, to be ſo convinced of the abuſes in vogue, ſo zealous for the true grandeur of the French monarchy, and not think of a reformation, which would render France formidable to all it's neighbours, and free it from a dependance which to this day is ſo prejudicial to it?

Authors who knew not that du Ferrier died a Proteſtant.

A great many other learned men have not known that du Ferrier died a Proteſtant. Here is what Davila ſays of a conference that the duke of Eſpernon had with the king of Navarre, whereupon Roquelaure, one of this prince's favourites, adviſed him to comply with Henry the third's intentions. Contendeva in contrario Arnoldo Monſignore di Ferrier ſuo Cancelliere, il quale huomo di finiſſimo ingegno, e di eccellente dottrina dopò la legatione di Venetia, nella quale era ſtato molti anni, tornato in Francia, e poco riconoſciuto alla corte, s'era ritirato appreſſo il Rè di Navarra. Queſto temendo, ſe il Padrone ſi riduceſſe alla concordia, & alla ubbidienza del Rè di rimanere abjetto, & abbandonato, s'era BENCHE CATTOLICO accoſtato all' opinione di Filippo di Mornè Signore di Pleſſis (9). Mr de Beauvais-Nangis (10) hath taken notice of this Miſtake of Davila. I believe that cardinal Palavicini would have thanked any one that had informed him of what I relate in the remark [A]. This would have given great weight, among thoſe of his party, to the reaſon he alledges (11) againſt Fra-Paolo, taken from the great intimacy which was between that friar and the embaſſador du Ferrier. It is moſt certain that the converſion of the latter was not known to this cardinal, ſince it is not alledged in the place which I have quoted. See the remark [F].

[D] He died in the year 1585, aged about ſeventy nine years.] Two places of Mr du Pleſſis Mornai, above quoted, are a proof of this. One ſays, that in 1582, preſident du Ferrier bordered on his ſeventy ſixth year (12), and the other, that he died in the year 1585 (13).

[E] Brantome ſays a remarkable thing of him.] 'I ſhould as well like preſident du Ferrier, ſo long kept embaſſador at Venice, who ſometimes would go and read public lectures at Padua; which was a thing unbecoming his employ and the king's authority, who took it ill of him, and gave him no kind reception at his return, as well on that account, as for the religion he profeſſed. He was afterwards chancellor to the king of Navarre (14).'

[F] I will not forget cardinal Palavicini.] He quotes (15) the life of father Paul, wherein is ſeen that this father had been very intimate with du Ferrier, and that du Ferrier had made a large collection of memoirs and letters. Hence the cardinal concludes, that father Paul had taken his materials from ill hands: for you muſt know, ſays he, that du Ferrier was one of thoſe embaſſadors which the court of France ſent to Trent (16), when, in the time of king Charles's infancy, moſt of thoſe that governed the royal council were imbued with new hereſies. Du Ferrier ſhewed himſelf ſo plainly, that three perſons of note (17) teſtified, by their writings, that he paſſed for a Huguenot. The third of theſe witneſſes is the embaſſador of Venice, who affirms, in the account which he gave the ſenate, that du Ferrier, ſuſpected of being a Huguenot, read Lucian as he was at maſs. The cardinal adds, that du Ferrier, deſigned to enrich himſelf by a traffic of religion, and that he treated ſecretly for that purpoſe with the Pope, by the means of Baſtian Gualtieri biſhop of Viterbo. He endeavoured to perſuade his holineſs to diſſolve the council, and call a particular aſſembly of the Gallican church; whereof the Pope was to be the head, and where he hoped to aſſiſt on the king's behalf. As he expected wonders from the Pope's favour, he promiſed all manner of good offices to the court of Rome, and proteſted that he was perſuaded of the Pope's authority on thoſe points upon which the Sorbonne were conteſting. Seeing that the Pope would not follow this project, he changed his ambition into rage; and taking advantage of the abſence of the cardinals of Lorrain, and of Lanſac, chief of the embaſſy, as alſo of the conditional power which the court of France had given it's miniſters to proteſt, and knowing that his colleague would applaud him (18), he made, before all the council, a ſatirical harangue againſt the Popes, and againſt the members of the aſſembly, and aſcribed to the king his maſter the ſame authority over the Gallican church that the ſchiſmatic kings of England aſcribe to themſelves over the church of that kingdom. He appeared no more at the council, becauſe he knew that he had made himſelf odious there, but he went ſome time after to Venice, from whence he wrote to the king as maliciouſly as he could, and ſhewed, by the moſt cunning reaſons of ſtate that he could deviſe, that his majeſty ought not to ſend any more embaſſadors to Trent, nor receive the decrees of that council, ſince they were ſo prejudicial to the royal authority. From hence father Paul hath drawn his droſs, which he vends for pure gold. Thus Palavicini concludes this ſubject.

[G] Du Ferrier's panegyric is found among thoſe of Sammarthanus.] This elogiſt hath very well expreſſed what he hath ſaid, but he hath not enlarged enough on the liſe of this great man. For the reſt he hath been hitherto quoted (19) in Moreri's dictionary in Annal. Which will make many believe, that Sammarthanus hath written annals, and may oblige them to ſeek for this pretended book. This gives me occaſion to obſerve an error

of

(d) Sammarth. In Elogior. lib. i, pag. pag. m. 90.

(e) It is the 42d.

(f) Thuan. de vita ſua, lib. ii, pag. m. 1185.

(g) Id. ibid.

(h) At page 391 of the edition of 1699.

(7) Couſin, Journal des Sçav. Febr. 28, 1680, pag. m. 118.

(8) Confer. quæ infra, Rem. [F].

(9) Davila, delle guerre civili di Francia, lib. vii, ad ann. 1585, pag. m. 377.

(10) In the remarks on Davila, at the end of his Hiſtory of Favourites.

(11) Palavic. Iſtoria del Concilio di Trento, Introduzione, cap. iv.

(12) Life of du Pleſſis, pag. 65.

(13) Memoirs of the ſame, Tom. I, pag. 644.

(14) Brantome, Memoirs, Tom. I, in the Elogy on Francis I, pag. 248.

(15) Palavic. ubi ſupra, cap. 4.

(16) Three were ſent; Lanſac, Ferrier, and Pibrac.

(17) Conſalvo di Mendoza, biſhop of Salamanca: Muzio Callino, archbiſhop of Zara: Nicolo da Ponte, ambaſſador of Venice at the council of Trent, and afterward doge of the republic.

(18) Eſſendo rimaſto per Collega al Ferrier ſolo Guido Fabri paleſe Ugonotto in quel tempo, come il nomina la mentovata Relazione dell' Orator Veneziano. Palavic. ubi ſupra.

(19) That is to ſay, till the edition of Paris, 1699, incluſively.

of this nature, which hath not been corrected, even in the Paris edition of 1699. In Moreri, at the end of the article of Eugene IV, is quoted Eneas Silvius, Eutrop. c. 58. This is enough to perſuade ſeveral readers, that this Eneas Silvius, who was Pope under the name of Pius II, had wrote a Book intituled, Eutropius, or a Commentary on the Hiſtorian Eutropius. Theſe faults, and many more of this nature, have been made not by Mr Moreri himſelf, but by his printers. I do not queſtion but that he had wrote Ste. Marthe, in Elogiis. Eneas Silvius in Europa. At leaſt ſo he ought to have written.

FERRIER (JEREMIAH) (a) was a miniſter and profeſſor in divinity at Niſmes, about the beginning of the XVIIth century: He afterwards changed his religion, and was made counſellor of ſtate. He had maintained, in a public diſputation in the year 1602, that Pope Clement VIII was properly Antichriſt (b). This cauſed a great diſturbance [A]. Who would have thought that a man, who made ſo bold a ſtep, would not always continue a hot man, and an enemy to moderate divines? Yet, he was one of the firſt that grew faint and ſlack [B] in the political aſſemblies of the Proteſtants: For he did not ſecond thoſe who were for appearing bold and daring; on the contrary, he oppoſed, as much as he could, all the vigorous and couragious reſolutions which ſeveral zealous perſons propoſed. This made him ſo ſuſpected, that they looked upon him as a court penſioner, a falſe brother, and a betrayer of the church (c). The national ſynod of Privas in 1612, forbad him to preach at Niſmes (d) [C]. Whereupon Ferrier got a place of counſellor in the preſidial of that city; but a popular tumult was raiſed againſt him, which occaſioned his change of religion [D]. After which he ſettled at Paris, where he endeavoured

[A] This cauſed a great deal of diſturbance.] The parliament of Toulouſe ordered, that he ſhould be taken into cuſtody for this theſis. At Caſtres the chamber was divided about the form of proceeding. At laſt Henry IV made an arrêt, forbidding all manner of perſons to diſturb this miniſter for that propoſition (1). The provincial and national ſynods uſed all their intereſt for Ferrier (2), who had induſtriouſly concerned the whole body in this affair; inſomuch that the national ſynod of Gap, where he was aſſiſtant to the moderator (3), ordered, in the year 1603, that a new article ſhould be inſerted in the confeſſion of faith, importing, that the Pope is properly Antichriſt, and the ſon of perdition, foretold in God's word. See in Mr du Pleſſis Mornai's life (4), how ill Henry IV. took this innovation; and obſerve how the intrigues and intereſt of a private member may influence the whole body.

[B] Yet he was one of the firſt that that grew faint and ſlack.] We are told, in the hiſtory of the edict of Nantes (5), that he was corrupted by the cajoling of the court; and that the Jeſuits boaſt, that in the year 1600, their father Cotton being at Niſmes . . . got Ferrier's acquaintance, whom he diſpoſed at that time to betray his brethren. Let the matter be how it will, continues this hiſtorian, he embroiled every thing in the political aſſemblies, where he was preſent, which obliged the ſynods to forbid him appearing there any more. The French Mercury (6) informs us, that ſome jealouſies aroſe between the deputies of the aſſembly of Saumur in the year 1611; and that alſo Ferrier the miniſter took occaſion to go home upon his ſon and wife's ſickneſs. There were two opinions in this aſſembly (7): Some maintaining, that they ought to enjoy the edict of pacification as it was drawn up; and others, (among whom Ferrier was) that they ought to acquieſce (conformably to the king's pleaſure) to the terms of the edict, as it had been verified in the parliaments.

[C] The ſynod of Privas forbad him to preach at Niſmes.] The hiſtorian of the edict of Nantes gives a large account of this affair: ‘It was on Ferrier's account, ſays he (8), that in the ſynod of Privas an act was made, whereby the divinity-profeſſors were excluded out of the political aſſemblies; but, with relation to him, they were not contented with general terms, for he was arraigned after a very mortifying manner. The means which he had deviſed to ward off the blow, ſeemed only to draw it upon him: he took ſome ſuſpected journies to court, without acquainting his church. He at firſt accepted the place that was offered him in the church of Paris, and even ſhewed a great deal of ſorrow when he was upbraided with his faults: but after he had promiſed not to abandon his profeſſion, and to exerciſe it at Paris, he very diſhonourably broke his word, and returned into his province without taking his leave of the miniſters of Paris. All this was conſidered at Privas; and du Moulin, who gave there an account of what had paſſed at Paris, where Ferrier had ſhewed himſelf of a temper equally haughty, inconſtant, and unſincere, proved his deportment very irregular. Several accuſations concerning his former behaviour, which was rigorouſly ſearched into, were added to this. He was charged with neglect of his duty as divinity-profeſſor; with preaching ſome doctrines not very orthodox; with meddling with the management of money; with having kept a conſiderable ſum which he would not account for; with having forged, or conſented to the forging of, certain letters, which had engaged him in ſome ſhameful broils and diſhoneſt diſguiſes. He was ſeverely cenſured on all theſe heads: but beſides the verbal cenſure, the ſynod ordered him to write to the church of Paris, and to make them ſatisfaction: forbad him appearing in the political aſſemblies for ten years; and enjoined him to exerciſe his miniſtry out of the province of Languedoc. The church and city of Niſmes ſent ſome deputies to the ſynod, who omitted nothing to get this decree cancelled, but to no purpoſe. The ſynod even declared to them that they took it ill, to ſee ſo conſiderable a deputation in the behalf of a man who betrayed the common cauſe. The miniſters, who had ſided with him, were cenſured for their complaiſance; and the memorials, which they had taken along with them to juſtify him, were voted ſlanderous. But becauſe they ſaw that Ferrier would not ſtop there, and that having the magiſtrates for him, he would continue the exerciſe of his miniſtry, whereof he was not ſuſpended; they declared, that he was already ſuſpended, if he did not obey.’ Neverthleſs, becauſe they would not carry things to the utmoſt extremity againſt him, the ſynod ſent him to Montelimar, in the room of Chamier, who was going to be divinity-profeſſor at Montauban. Ferrier then took other meaſures (9): he got a place of counſellor of the preſidial of Niſmes, and was there inſtalled, notwitſtanding the oppoſitions of the conſiſtory, which, after many proceedings, excommunicated him on the fourteenth of July, 1613. We ſhall ſee, in the following remark, the diſorders that happened by a popular commotion.

[D] But a popular tumult was raiſed againſt him which occaſioned his change of religion.] The author of the French Mercury has deſcribed the circumſtances of this tumult. Ferrier's adverſaries, ſays he (10), ſeeing him a counſellor of the preſidial, excommunicated him after their way, and incited the populace to fall upon him as he went to the preſidial, or returned from it. Though Ferrier was informed of this deſign, yet he went with the provoſt to the preſidial the fourteenth of July, 1613. As he went thither, he met with no body; but as he came out, deſigning to go home, he found his adverſaries with the populace, who, pointing at him with their hands, ſaid to one another, ſee, ſee, that traitor Judas! then they begun to throw ſtones at him, and to purſue him, with a deſign to ſeize him; but he eſcaped into Lieutenant Rozel's houſe. Mad that he had made his eſcape, they went to his houſe, ranſacked it, and burned before his door a great deal of his goods and books, The

---

(a) And not Benjamin, as St Romauld calls him, apud David l'Enfant, month of Septemb. pag. 174.

(b) Ferrier's preface to the treatiſe of Antichriſt.

(c) See the remarks [D] and [L].

(d) French Mercury, Tom. III, pag. 156.

(1) Ferrier's preface to the Treatiſe of Antichriſt.

(2) Ibid.

(3) Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantz, Tom. I, pag. 396.

(4) Pag. 296, & ſeq.

(5) Tom. I, pag. pag. 395.

(6) French Mercury, Tom. II, pag. 203. Cologne Edit.

(7) Ibid. Tom. III, pag. 156. See alſo Tom. XII, pag. 406, where it is ſaid, That Chamier was head of the firſt opinion, which was that of the Party-huguenots; and Ferrier head of the ſecond opinion, which was that of the State-huguenots.

(8) Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantz, Tom. II, pag. 84, & ſeq.

(9) Ibid. pag. 122.

(10) French Mercury, Tom. II, pag. 156, 157.

endeavoured to raiſe himſelf. He publiſhed, in 1614 (e), a book of controverſy, concerning Antichriſt. The king employed him in many affairs of importance; and in the year 1626, he commanded him to follow his majeſty in his progreſs to Bretagne, and there honoured him with the place of privy-counſellor of ſtate (f). Cardinal Richelieu honoured him with a particular eſteem (g). At his return from this journey he was attacked with a lingering fever, which grew worſe every day. He died of it the 26th of September 1626 [E], and was buried in St Sulpice's church, which was his pariſh-church (h). He gave great proofs of his catholiciſm on his death-bed [F], and made all his children promiſe that they would live and die in the ſame faith [G]. I cannot well

The fifteenth and fixteenth of July, they went alſo to ranſack what he had in the country, and to pluck up his vines; which having performed, they returned to Niſmes, every one of them having in their hands vines and young trees out of Ferrier's incloſure. He found means to eſcape to Beaucaire, after he had been ſhut up for three days in a tomb (11). Ferrier ſays, (12) that 'he was half killed with ſtones; and that he eſcaped by a miracle out of the hands of thirty of the conſiſtory's partiſans, who had bound themſelves by an oath to kill him: that his mother, aged ſixty years, widow and daughter of a miniſter, died with horror at this ſad ſpectacle; and that ſhe was ſeveral times threatened by theſe murderers to be burned alive: that two little children were miraculouſly ſnatched from the flames by the prudent management of the magiſtrates, whom theſe enraged zealots threatened to kill: that his poor wife, nine months gone with child, was ſtruck with a halbard: that his mother-in-law, being almoſt eighty years old, was treated with the ſame cruelty: that all his houſhold-ſtuff was burned before their temple; the greateſt part of his books and papers pillaged or burned; all the beſt of his goods carried away, or ſpoiled: that the ſentence of the chamber of the edict of Caſtres, and the opinion of all the judges of the pretended reformed religion, condemned to the gallows ſeventeen of theſe wretches, whom they (13) had perſuaded to kill him on account of religion, by promiſing them heaven for ſo deteſtable an action.' This laſt circumſtance hath all the air of an impoſture and black calumny. By this means the reſt may be ſuſpected (14): but, at worſt, this cannot be brought as a conſequence of the doctrine and temper of the whole party. It is well known, that in all countries, and in all religions, the mobile, when in a mutiny, knows no bounds. Ferrier himſelf acknowledges, that the Proteſtant judges voted ſeventeen of theſe mutineers to be puniſhed. All that I have to do, to make an end of the commentary of my text, is only to ſay, that Ferrier pretends that all theſe outrages conquered the obſtinacy wherewith he reſiſted the light: It is, ſays he (15), the common reproach of the enemies of my ſalvation, That I am a catholic by force. It is true; I confeſs it. God granted me this favour againſt my will, when I oppoſed him, when I fled from him, and abhorred the ſalvation which he offered me. My calling was violent, becauſe my obſtinacy in hereſy was very great. Thus, to ſave the greateſt perſecutors, and the moſt virulent enemies of the church, God hath been obliged to thunder and lighten, to pull them down to the ground, and blind them by his powerful hand. He therefore pretends, that the injuries he received broke the tyes by which he was attached to hereſy, and conducted him to another Ananias, that is to ſay, cardinal du Perron, who introduced him into the boſom of the church: for this cardinal was the great converter of that time.

REFLEXION on the maxim, Compelle intrare, —— compel them to come in.

I ſhall obſerve here, without having any particular event in view, that as there is a compelle intrare, COMPEL THEM TO COME IN, there is alſo a compelle exire, COMPEL THEM TO GO OUT. Suppoſe a clergyman, who hath a potent enemy among his brethren. It may happen, that in ſpite of himſelf he may be made a heretic, and forced to fly to another communion: firſt, he ſhall ſee himſelf accuſed of heterodoxy; after that, it ſhall be objected, that he keeps a ſecret correſpondence with the enemy; that he is a penſioner, ill affected to the government, and capable to infect the church: he ſhall be made ſo odious, that even his relations dare not ſee him: he ſhall be forced, ſeeing his miniſtry can no more edify, to ſeek imployment elſewhere. But where ſhall he go? his adverſaries letters move faſter than a family; he can go no where, but he ſhall find himſelf already defamed (16). Thus, after he hath removed his tents into ſeveral places, without being able to remove prepoſſeſſing and raſh judgments, almoſt reduced to the laſt penny, and not knowing how to ſubſiſt, and beſides full of indignation, that it is ſo eaſy for two or three bawlers to prepoſſeſs ſo many againſt him, and conceiving an ill opinion of a party which can ſo eaſily be ſtartled, he flies into the arms of another church. And this is what his enemies wanted; they are arrived to the height of their deſires. Nothing torments them more, than to ſee that thoſe, whom they have accuſed and calumniated, do not confirm their ſuggeſtions by their deſertion (17). This is a kind of dragooning, not to compel to come in, but to compel to go out.

[E] He died the twenty ſixth of September, 1626.] Thoſe who ſay (18), that he died the twenty ſeventh of September, 1626, are but little miſtaken; thoſe (19) who place it in the year 1625, are a little further from truth.

[F] He gave very great proofs of his catholiciſm on his death bed.] A book was publiſhed intituled, The happy death of the Sieur Ferrier; wherein is related what he ſaid when the prieſt brought him the ſacrament and extream unction, &c. The French Mercury (20) mentions a great many things contained in this little book; I refer the reader to it. But I will here take notice of two of them, becauſe they are of uſe to rectify ſome miſtakes. 'The holy ſacrament coming into his houſe, Mrs du Ferrier his wife being on her knees, pretty near his bed, cryed out, Ah, Lord, I am not worthy that you ſhould come into my houſe: he, being ſenſibly affected with theſe words, ſaid to her, Alas, my dear, I wiſh that he who put theſe words in your mouth, will ever hereafter imprint his love and belief in your heart (21).' This ſhews plainly, that this ex-miniſter's Wife was no more a Proteſtant; and therefore, that St Romuald the Feüillant, and after him David l'Enfant the Dominican, are miſtaken, when they ſay (22), That du Ferrier could not perſuade his wife to follow his ſteps, which did not hinder them from living lovingly together. A little before his death, he dictated his epitaph in theſe words (23): 'Hic jacet Hieremias Ferrier, qui anno Domini 1613. Catholicam Apoſtolicam & Romanam fidem firmiter amplexus ad extremum uſque vitæ ſpiritum firmiter retinuit. —— Here lies Jeremia Ferrier, who, in the year of our lord 1613, embraced the Catholic, Apoſtolic, and Roman faith, which he ſtedfaſtly retained to his lateſt breath.' This will ſerve to confute Mr Moreri.

[G] He made all his children promiſe that they . . . . . would die in the ſame faith.] As he ſays in the preface to the treatiſe of Antichriſt, that he hath a great family upon his hands; we muſt believe that he had many children: among them, he had but one daughter. And this is what he ſaid to her, when he exhorted them all to perſevere in the Romiſh faith; And you, my daughter, who have had this great privilege over your brothers, to have been baptized in the church, do you not promiſe it me alſo (24)? Mr Patin alſo mentions this daughter: The lieutenant-criminal is here very ſick. His wife, who is a ſhrew, hath beaten and ſhut him in the cellar. She is a devil, worſe than Pilate's wife; ſhe is the daughter of Jeremiah Ferrier, formerly miniſter of Niſmes, who abjured. Thus he ſpeaks in a letter dated the twenty fifth of Auguſt, 1660 (25). In all likelihood he ſpeaks alſo of her, when he ſays in another place (26), 'There is here no other talk, but of the murther of Mr Tardieu lieutenant-criminal, and his wife: the two aſſaſſins were immediately taken . . . . . All the people go as it were in proceſſion to St Bartholomew's Church,

' to

(e) The epiſtle dedicatory to the king is dated from Paris, the firſt of September 1614.

(f) French Mercury, Tom. XII, pag. 496, 497.

(g) Ibid.

(h) Ib. pag 499. His houſe was in the ſuburbs of St Germain.

(11) Ibid. Tom. XII, pag. 495, 496. Ferrier ſays it alſo in his preface to his Treatiſe of Antichriſt: I have been buried three whole days, and truly put in the grave.

(12) Ferrier, ibid.

(13) He means the miniſters and their abettors.

(14) The hiſtorian of the Edict of Nantz, Tom. II, pag. 123, 124, acknowledges that the populace, without any regard to the conſuls, judges, or paſtors, broke open Ferrier's houſe, embezzelled or burned all his goods, and forgot no outrage, which an exaſperated crowd can do; ravaged every thing in his country-houſe, and broke open the goals, to ſet at liberty ſome mutineers whom the judges had committed.

(15) Ferrier, ubi ſupra.

(16) See, above, remark [E] of the article ALCIAT (JOHN PAUL).

(17) See, above, remark [K] of the article ARNAULD (ANTONY) doctor of Sorbonne.

(18) Peter de St Romuald, Father l'Enfant, Mr Moreri, &c.

(19) Father Jacob, Biblioth. Pontificia, pag. 349. Konig, Biblioth. vet. & nova. Henninges Witte, in Diario biographico.

(20) French Mercury, Tom. XII, pag. 496, & ſeq.

(21) Ibid pag. 497.

(22) See the General Hiſtory of all Ages. by Father David l' Enfant, in the month of September, pag. 174.

(23) French Mercury, ubi ſupra, pag. 498.

(24) Ibid. pag. 498.

(25) It is the cxcvith. at page 165, of Tom. II.

(26) Letter ccclxvi, pag. 95 of Tom. III, dated the 26th of Auguſt, 1665.

well ſay how old he was [H]. They gave him ſome hopes of being ſent ambaſſador to Holland, if we believe Mr Moreri [I]. I dare not poſitively ſay, that it was he, who writ the State Catholic [K], a book that was mightily valued in it's time. The Proteſtants have given a very bad character of Jeremiah Ferrier [L]. He could hardly avoid that. Cardinal

‘to pray to God for the ſoul of this unhappy lieutenant-criminal, and his wretched wife, who was ſo prodigiouſly covetous, that ſhe had neither footman, coachman, nor maid. She had rather be her own ſervant to ſave a penny. . . . ſolemn prayers were made, at St Bartholomew's, for the late lieutenent-criminal, and his wife: but if ſhe had no ſoul, what ſignify theſe prayers? As for the wax-tapers, they are burned and conſumed (27).’ A ſon of Jeremiah Ferrier was killed by ſome footmen, whom he would have hindered from ſtriking his ſervant. Dom Peter de St Romuald (28) ſays, that his death happened on the twenty third of February 1638. Here is a very unhappy Family. I do not doubt but Mr Tardieu's wife, who was ſo noted for her covetouſneſs (29), and who ſo tragically ended her days with her huſband, was daughter to Ferrier the ex-miniſter.

[H] I cannot well ſay how old he was.] He doth not explain himſelf conſiſtently on that ſubject; for in a place of his preface, he acknowledges, That he is mighty afflicted that he had not employed for the Catholic church twenty whole years, which, he ſays, he hath wretchedly loſt to ſerve a bad and ungrateful cauſe. This ſhews, that he was received a miniſter about the year 1593, ſince he changed his religion in 1613; but he had ſaid two pages before, that he was but twenty four years of age, when he maintained, that Clement VIII was Antichriſt. This I find in the words which I am going to quote, and which ſerve for an anſwer to the reproaches caſt upon him, that he had impudently engaged in this hypotheſis to diſturb the ſtate, and to enrich himſelf by the war. ‘He therefore, that is to ſay Mr du Pleſſis, is more concerned than I am in their accuſations, that I deſigned by this means to raiſe a war. I had then never gone out of my ſtudy, being only twenty four years of age; had never been verſed in buſineſs, nor in martial cabals, and thought of nothing elſe but my books, and to further the religion wherein I was born.’ Let us remember, that he maintained his theſis in the year 1602. Now if he was then but twenty four years of age, he could not have been received miniſter in 1593. The miniſtry is not conferred on a ſcholar of fifteen years of age: we cannot therefore depend upon what he ſays. According to the French Mercury (30), he had preached for ſixteen years the Proteſtant religion. Taking it then for granted, that he was twenty four years of age when he maintained, in 1602, the theſis of Antichriſt, he had been received miniſter at the age of nineteen in 1597, and had died at the age of forty eight years. But who will rather believe the French Mercury, than Jeremiah Ferrier himſelf, on the duration of his miniſtry? The beſt way then is to decide nothing.

[I] They gave him ſome hopes of being ſent embaſſador to Holland, if we believe Mr Moreri.] I think he is not here to be relied on; for he did not know that Jeremiah Ferrier lived thirteen years after his journey to Paris; he thought that this ex-miniſter died a little while after he arrived in that city. He did not know, that his book of antichriſt was in French; for had he known it, he had not noted it in Latin, de Antichriſto. He believed, without reaſon, that Ferrier was the author of a book, intituled, Reſponſio ad lib. admonitio ad Beg. Lugd. XIII. &c. The printers have horribly diſfigured this title: it ſhould be Reſponſio ad libellum cui titulus, admonitio ad Reg. Ludovicum XIII. Thoſe who have aſcribed ſuch a book to our Ferrier, are undoubtedly ſome Latin authors, who have thus deſcribed a French book which is fathered upon him. I am going to ſpeak of it.

[K] I dare not poſitively ſay, that Ferrier writ the State-Catholic.] There are ſome arguments pro and con. This book appeared in print in the year 1625, under the name of the Sieur du Ferrier (31). It was immediately aſcribed to Jeremiah Ferrier; for the author of a little book, intituled, The happy death of the Sieur du Ferrier, obſerves (32) that two things may be inferred from this death; one againſt the Proteſtants, the other againſt the publiſhers of libels in Flanders. The Proteſtants or party Huguenots had given out, that his converſion was feigned . . . . . and that his end would make it appear. They were anſwered, that the declaration, which he had made at his death, could not be called in queſtion, or thought forced, or the effect of a delirium, ſince ſeveral Proteſtants themſelves had viſited him in his ſickneſs, who might teſtify, that he continued in his ſenſes, and that he kept a ſound judgment to the laſt. As to the foreign writers, who ſaid in their libels, that Simia ſit ſemper Simia, it was replied, that this declaration of faith made by the Sieur du Ferrier at his death, and the relation of his happy deceaſe, ought to have ſtopped their mouths, and expoſed their ſcandalous writings. We muſt know, that the State Catholic was an anſwer to ſome libels, which ſome ſticklers for the king of Spain had publiſhed againſt France (33), becauſe it made an alliance with the Proteſtants to the prejudice of Catholiciſm. The author of the State-Catholic could not anſwer without venting many things againſt the houſe of Auſtria. The writers of the Spaniſh party replied (34), and reproached him, that he always acted the part of an ape; which ſhews plainly, that they took him for the ex-miniſter and ex-profeſſor of Niſmes; and this is the reaſon why, in the account of his death, the reflexion I have related is made. Several famous authors, and very well verſed in books, have thought Jeremiah Ferrier to be the author of the State-Catholic (35). I would not ſtick to do it, did not I know that Mr Baillet (36) aſcribes this work to John Sirmond (37), who was one of thoſe writers, whom cardinal Richelieu employed to anſwer the libels that came out by ſhoals againſt him in the Spaniſh Netherlands. John Sirmond was uſed to give himſelf a falſe name in the pieces which he publiſhed againſt theſe libels; but it would be very odd, had he taken upon him the name of a living author, and ſo well known as Mr Jeremiah Ferrier was: beſides, Mr Pelliſſon (38), who mentions many anonymous or pſeudonymous pieces of this writer, doth not aſcribe the State-Catholic to him, which is one of the beſt pieces in Mr Chatelet's collection. Notwithſtanding all theſe reaſons, I will not decide it, till I have ſeen what proofs Mr Baillet will alledge to maintain his opinion.

[L] The Proteſtants have given a very bad character of Jeremiah Ferrier.] He himſelf tells us that he ſuffered two violent perſecutions; one before he was a Catholic, and the other after (39). The firſt when he was ſtoned, and had his houſe ſacked, &c. and the ſecond was a ſhower of invectives that were publiſhed againſt him (40). He was accuſed of having been the king's penſioner, a traytor to the churches, and of having ſown diſſention in the aſſemblies, and diſputes among the nobility; of deſigning to ſtay at Niſmes, to ruin all the churches; of having been gratifyed by their majeſties for ſecret ſervites, and ſecured ſeveral ways to ruin and exterminate the churches; of being an atheiſt, and of having maintained many execrable propoſitions againſt the myſtery of the incarnation; and of having deſerved to be caſt out of the ſynagogue as a ſon of Belial. See in the hiſtory of the edict of Nantes, at the 124th page of the ſecond tome, the ſubſtance of the accuſations againſt Ferrier; and here is what is found concerning him, page 395, of the firſt volume of the ſame hiſtory. ‘He confounded every thing in the political aſſemblies where he was preſent, which obliged the ſynods to forbid him to appear there. He created to himſelf ſome trouble in his church and province, which occaſioned his expulſion from thence; and being weary of being a miniſter, he got a place of counſellor of the preſidial of Niſmes, though he had promiſed at Paris to continue ſomewhere elſe the exerciſe of his function. He was afterwards depoſed as a deſerter. At laſt he turned Papiſt, and died ſome few years after (41), as hated by the people as he had been beloved in his youth. He was ſelfiſh, deceitful, ambitious, fickle, turbulent, void of judgment, and unfit for thoſe intrigues wherein he had the imprudence to engage. But he was pretty bold, of quick parts, of a fiery temper, and a fluent tongue, having an imperious tone, and vehemence of action and diſcourſe; which impoſed on his hearers, and did not allow them the liberty of contradicting him. Wherefore the multitude,

---

(27) Letter ccclxvii, pag. 99, dated the tenth of September, 1665.

(28) Chronological and Hiſtorical Journal.

(29) See the tenth ſatire of Boileau, where this marriage, and the ſequel of it, makes a curious epiſode.

(30) Tom. III, pag. 158.

(31) It was afterwards inſerted in the collection of ſeveral pieces uſeful to hiſtory.

(32) French Mercury, Tom. XII, pag. 499.

(33) See, above, remark [B], of the article CARTHAGENA.

(34) The French Mercury, Tom. XII, pag. 500, 501, gives a liſt of ſeveral libels, written by the Spaniards, among which is one intituled, Scopa Ferreriana.

(35) Voëtius, Polit. Eccleſ. Tom. II, pag. 531. Spizelius, Scrut. Atheiſmi, pag. 32.

(36) See the table of his Authors diſguiſed.

(37) He was of the French academy, and nephew to Father Sirmond the Jeſuit. See the Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. m. 304.

(38) Hiſtory of the French Academy, pag. 306, 307.

(39) Preface to his Treatiſe of Antichriſt.

(40) He ſays, that of all the books that were publiſhed againſt him, he never read but two, one writ by S. Ceſari, the other compoſed by the ſynod of the Lower Languedoc.

(41) I have already ſaid, above, againſt Moreri, that he lived thirteen years after his abjuration. The author, whom I quote, hath acknowleged it in his ſecond Tome, pag. 125. Ferrier lived yet a great while, ſays he, after the Commotion of Niſmes.

Cardinal du Perron has ſaid a very invidious thing of the excuſes which he pretended the Proteſtants made for the commotion at Niſmes [M].

'tude, which is eaſily dazzled by theſe qualities, was always for him: and he often carried it, even in ſynods, againſt Chauve his competitor. This Chauve had a great deal more integrity and judgment, and eſpecially an agreeable gravity; which made him very conſiderable in the aſſemblies. But the heat of the one did prevail over the moderation of the other; and Ferrier's vivacity obſcured Chauve's ſolidity.' I have no reaſon to doubt of the truth of this character. But I will ſay in general, without making any application, that it is eaſy at ſome certain times to paſs for a falſe brother, though one be not ſo. It is enough to have other notions of things, than ſome men of a hot temper, and of a great and contagious imagination. Theſe men have but little knowledge of others, or even of themſelves. For the moſt part, they imagine that they act for the advancement of religion, when they are only acted by heat and pride. Their temper makes them averſe to all counſels of moderation and patience; nothing pleaſes them but vigorous proceedings, and which they think fit to preſerve the credit and worldly intereſt of the party; and this they call a zeal for God's cauſe. But this is no great matter; for they ſometimes unaccountably injure their neighbour; they believe that he cannot be of another opinion than theirs, but out of treachery. However, there are ſome caſes wherein a man may be fully convinced, that even for temporal intereſt we ought not to be ſo ſtiff. But what do theſe fiery men? They earneſtly ſtrive to get moderate men ſuſpected; and then thoſe, who will not be ſuſpected, give way to the greater number; and thoſe, who continue to oppoſe them, run the riſk to draw upon themſelves all the miſchiefs of the compelle exire. Thus two or three powerful men, in a pretty numerous aſſembly, are enough to obtain a decree. It is only terrifying thoſe that are of a quiet diſpoſition, that they will be made odious to the party, and ſuſpected of a baſe prevarication. What would not one do to avoid a thing which renders his pains and parts uſeleſs?

How apt hot-headed men are to judge raſhly.

As this reflexion may diſpleaſe ſome perſons, I will ſtrengthen it with the opinion of a very zealous writer. He acknowledges, 'that there have been ſome very honeſt men, who loved their religion, and thought it purely evangelical, who nevertheleſs made no ſcruple to receive penſions, becauſe they looked upon them rather as rewards for their affection for the public tranquility, than as a tie to engage them to attempt any thing to the prejudice of their churches. To tell the truth, continues he, in thoſe places, where the people, who were hot and overhaſty, might eaſily be engaged in raſh and ſeditious attempts, it was requiſite that the miniſters ſhould be diſcreet and moderate, that by their diſcourſes and examples they might beget in their flocks a peaceable diſpoſition; but it had been better to have done it for the reaſonableneſs of the thing, without taking the gratifications of the court, than to receive theſe ſuſpected rewards, which might call in queſtion their innocence and integrity. Du Moulin hath ſeveral times been tempted by the court emiſſaries, who offered him a very large penſion, without requiring any thing elſe of him but to engage his people to peace and obedience. He always proteſted, that it was a duty that he would diſcharge as long as he lived; but that he would have the honour to do it of himſelf, and for conſcience ſake, and not as if he was hired to do it: ſo that he would not accept of any thing that was offered him. It had been glorious, if all thoſe, who were expoſed to the ſame temptation, had repelled it with as much courage (42).' Nothing can be ſaid more judicious and reaſonable. Du Moulin's behaviour ought to have been a pattern for all his brethren: none of them ſhould have received a reward for what they did purſuant to their duty. But let the thing be how it will, we ſee here the condemnation of thoſe raſh perſons, who, carried away by the impetuoſity of their temper, were always ready to diſgrace all thoſe who preached patience, as falſe brethren, traytors, and prevaricators. The author acknowledges, that ſome very honeſt men were penſioners to the court of France, without any deſign to do any thing to the prejudice of the churches, and without propoſing any thing elſe to themſelves but receiving a gratification, which they believed due to the care which they took to oppoſe warlike ſpirits: but he hath indeed more reaſon to acknowledge, that thoſe, who preached patience gratis, might be honeſt men. As for the miſſionaries, who upon account of theſe penſions would malicioſly and odiouſly ſay, that the religious wars had put the French monarchy in the ſame condition whence Lewis XI had reſcued it (43), they deſerve no notice. Henry IV, and Lewis XIII, had no need to buy any mediators of peace between them and their proteſtant ſubjects, in order to avoid religious wars. Had they obſerved the edict, it had not coſt them one farthing to maintain the public tranquillity. Mr Jurieu will, I hope, forgive me, if I do not acquieſce in his conceſſion, that the Huguenots, in Lewis the thirteenth's time, undermined the ſupream authority. 'Cardinal Richelieu, ſays he (44), took from them their towns of ſecurity, but it was rather out of policy, than a zeal for religion. He ſaw that it was a ſtate within a ſtate, and that theſe cities were only harbours for rebels and malecontents.'

[M] Cardinal du Perron ſaid a very invidious thing upon the excuſes concerning the commotion at Niſmes.] 'The Proteſtants have writ a book to palliate their outrages againſt Ferrier, and make uſe of ſome places of the fathers, and among the reſt of St Bernard, to prove that they were in the right to uſe him ſo, ſince he was excommunicated; and that a judge excommunicated was ſuſpended from his office. Afterwards he ſays in jeſt, St Bernard ſpeaks of excommunication as he ought to do, but St Bernard ſaid maſs every day; they will make uſe of our laws when they think it for their turn, otherwiſe they will not regard them, which is an unjuſt proceeding; did they believe themſelves ſtrong enough, and by excommunication think that they could be maſters of the realm, and diſpoſſeſs the king, I cannot tell what they would not do (45).' Here is an inſtance of the injuſtice commonly done to thoſe ſects which are tolerated: their affection to the government is ſuſpected, and they are looked upon as a ſort of people that would alter the conſtitution, if it was in their power, and who only condemn the furious maxims of perſecution, and the power of excommunication, whilſt they cannot uſe them at their pleaſure.

(42) Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantz, Tom. II, pag. 101.

(43) It hath been ſaid of him, that he ſet the French kings free; and ſome miſſionaries ſay, that Cardinal Richelieu, finding they were relapſed into their former ſtate, freed them by the taking of Rochel.

(44) Politique du Clergé, pag. m. 20.

(45) Perroniana, at the word Ferrier, pag. m. 141.

FERRIER (JOHN) a French Jeſuit, born at Roüergue, ſucceeded father Annat in the poſt of confeſſor to the king of France in 1670. He was born in the year 1614, and became a Jeſuit in 1632. He taught philoſophy four years, divinity twelve years, and ethics two years. He had been Rector of the college of Thoulouſe, and had behaved himſelf well in that employment (a). Without doubt he paſſed among the Jeſuits for a conſiderable perſon, ſince they appointed him to ſupply the place of confeſſor to his majeſty. It was thought by many that he was much fitter for buſineſs and intrigues than father Annat. He died in the houſe of his order at Paris the twenty ninth of October 1674 (b). He publiſhed ſeveral books [A], and was one of the beſt antagoniſts chiefly relate to Janſeniſm. He wrote againſt Mr Arnauld's two letters, and made a narrative of all that had paſſed in the year 1663 upon the affair of Janſeniſm (1). I muſt not forget, that, according to the Jeſuit's hiſtorian, he wrote a book upon the immortality of the ſoul, in 1668, and another concerning the beauty of JESUS CHRIST, in the year 1657; but theſe two books are wrongfully aſcribed to him: they ſhould he attributed to John Fevrier, a Jeſuit of Guienne, known to Mr Balſac (2).

(a) Southwell, Biblioth. Script. Soc. Jeſu, pag. 449.

(b) Id. ibid.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] An anſwer in Latin to father Baron's objections againſt the Scientia media. This book is intituled, Reſponſio ad objectiones Vincentianas, and was printed at Toulouſe in 1668, in 8vo. Father Ferrier deſigned to publiſh a courſe of divinity; but the firſt volume has only appeared, which treats de Deo uno juxta ſancti Auguſtini & ſancti Thomæ principia. His other works are in French, and chiefly antagoniſts of the followers of Janſenius. His Theſis upon Probability made a great noiſe. He defended it at Toulouſe the eighth and eleventh of June 1659. See Thomas Anglus at page 51, and 52, of the Monumetham excantatus. See alſo the remark [B] of the Article MAIMBOURG.

(1) Taken from Father Southwell, Bibl. Script. Soc. Jeſu, pag. 449.

(2) See the Journal of Trevoux, November, 1704, pag. 1860, French Edit.

FERVAUX (JOHN) is the true author of the Annals of Bavaria, which were publiſhed under the name of John Adlſreitterus [A]. He was of Lorrain. This is all I can ſay of him for the preſent.

[A] He is the true author of the Annals of Bavaria, which were publiſhed under the name of John Adlſreitterus.] Here is my warrant. 'Joh. Adlſreitterus (vel 'ſi mavis, P. Joh. Fervaux, Lotharingus, in cujus no'mine ob certas cauſſas annales illos prudentiores ap'parere noluerunt) in præfatione ad lectorem tomi 'primi annalium Boicæ gentis minime ſibi ait, &c (1). '—— John Adlſreitterus (or rather John Fervaux, 'a native of Lorrain, in whoſe name, for certain rea'ſons, men of judgment thought it improper thoſe Annals 'ſhould appear) in his preface to the reader before the 'firſt volume of his annals of Bavaria, ſays, &c.'

(1) Chriſtoph. Arnoldus, de vita Marci Velſeri, pag. 46.

FERUS (a) (JOHN) warden of the Franciſcans of Mentz, was one of the greateſt preachers of the XVIth century. He is author of ſeveral commentaries upon the ſcripture, which ſhew not only that he was learned, but alſo that he was not one of thoſe opinionated Monks who will yield nothing, nor will conſent to the reforming of any abuſes. There are few writers of the Romiſh communion more eſteemed by the Proteſtants than Ferus [A]. The reaſon of which is, that he wrote with a great deal of moderation upon the controverſies that divided Germany in his time, and becauſe in ſome things he favoured the tenets of the reformers (b) [B]. He was attacked upon this ſubject by a Spaniſh Jacobine [C]; but his cauſe found apologiſts, even in that country. They could

(a) This is a name latinized. This monk was named Wild, a German word ſignifying ſavage. Therefore Moreri ſpeaks of Ferus under the word Sauvage.

(b) See Thuan. lib xiii, pag. 271.

[A] There are few writers of the Romiſh communion more eſteemed than Ferus by the Proteſtants.] Bucholcer ſays of him (1). 'Fuit vir doctiſſimus, ejuſque 'ſcripta non ſolum apud Catholicos, ſed etiam apud 'Evangelicos quoſdam in ſummo habentur pretio. —— 'He was a man of great learning, and his writings 'were held in the higheſt eſteem, not only by the Ca'tholics, but alſo by ſome Proteſtants.' Quenſtedt, a Lutheran author, quotes theſe words without finding fault with them. He alſo cites another paſſage which I ſhall ſet down for the reader's information. 'Johan'nes Ferus, aliàs Wild, Franciſcanus, eccleſiaſtes Mo'guntinus, vir doctus & eloquentia ſingulari præditus. 'Scripſit latino & culto ſermone pias & eruditas lucu'brationes, (ſcil. annotationes in Pentateuchum, in Job, 'Eccleſiaſten, Threnos, Jonam, Matthæum, Johan'nem, Acta Apoſtolorum, Epiſtolam ad Romanos) in 'quibus tam veterum, quam recentium expoſitorum 'labores veluti in compendium redegit, teſte Sixto 'Senenſe lib. iv. Bibl. S. (2). —— John Ferus, or 'Wild, a Franciſcan, an eccleſiaſtic of Mentz, a 'man of great learning, and uncommon eloquence, 'wrote, in pure and elegant Latin, his pious and 'elaborate lucubrations, viz. Annotations on the Pen'tateuch, Job, Eccleſiaſtes, the Lamentations, Jo'nah, St Matthew, John, the Acts of the Apoſtles, 'and the Epiſtle to the Romans,) wherein he has given 'us an ingenious compendium of the labours both of an'tient and modern expoſitors, as Sixtus Senenſis ſhews 'in the fourth book of his Bibliotheca ſacra.' It muſt not be thought that Quenſtedt has given an exact liſt of all Ferus's works. They conſiſt of ſeveral other books. Conſult the Oxford catalogue, and Mr Teiſſier, at page 85 of the firſt volume of additions to the elogies taken from Thuanus.

[B] In certain things he favoured the tenets of the reformers.] They deſigned to ſhew the corruption of mankind, and the neceſſity of having recourſe to the divine mercy, without relying on good works. Their forms of prayer are full of this ſpirit; and this is ſo little conſiſtent with the maxims of the Romiſh church, that the French miſſionaries have a hundred and a hundred times cavilled at the proteſtant ritual on this account. But in anſwer to this Mr Drelincourt, among other things, ſhewed them (3) that John Ferus had compoſed prayers full of the ſentiments they condemned. There are innumerable quotations out of this Franciſcan in the books of that miniſter. Mr Colomiés (4) cites a paſſage of Ferus (5) which I ſhall quote after him. 'How many things are there which 'were inſtituted by the ſaints with a good intention, 'which we now ſee changed partly into abuſes, and 'partly into ſuperſtition? As for inſtance, ſaints days, 'ceremonies, images, the maſs, monaſteries, &c. 'none of which were inſtituted as they are held now'a-days. And nevertheleſs our Gideons are ſilent; 'they do not remove the abuſe, or reform the ſuper'ſtition.' He ſays in another place (6) that thoſe who would have in their libraries a good edition of Ferus's commentary upon St John, ought to get that of Louvain 1559, which is preferable to all others: for beſides that it is in folio, it has the epiſtle dedicatory of that pious and eloquent Franciſcan to Sebaſtian, archbiſhop of Mentz, which the other editions have not. In that epiſtle Ferus ingenuouſly confeſſes, that he has made uſe in ſome places of the commentaries of Brentius, and Oecolampadius, Proteſtants; but, he adds, Ea tantum tranſtuli quæ bona, Eccleſiaſticæque doctrinæ conſona videbantur, & quæ viri illi non in ſchiſmate, ſed in Catholica Eccleſia didicerant. —— I only (ſays he), took from them the things that were good, and ſeemed agreeable to the doctrine of the church. and which thoſe men had learned, not in their ſchiſm, but in the Catholic church.

[C] He was attacked ..... by a Spaniſh Jacobine.] The famous Dominicus à Soto publiſhed a book (7) which he called, Annotationes in commentarios Joannis Feri Moguntinenſis ſuper evangelium Joannis, and dedicated it to Ferdinand Valdes inquiſitor general. He charges Ferus with having taught Lutheraniſm in ſixty ſeven places of his commentary upon St John. If Ferus did not defend himſelf, it was not for the reaſon which Nicholas Antonio inſinuates (8): it was becauſe he was dead, and not becauſe that he either in his conſcience knew the charge to be true, or would pretend not to know what Soto had publiſhed. But he found an advocate in the very ſame country where he was attacked. Michael Medina, a learned monk of the order of St Francis, publiſhed a book intituled (9), 'Apologia Joannis Feri in qua ſeptem & ſexaginta loca 'commentariorum in Joannem, quæ antea Dominicus 'Soto Segovienſis Lutherana traduxerat, ex ſancta 'ſcriptura, ſanctorumque doctrina, reſtituuntur. —— 'A defence of John Ferus, wherein the ſixty ſeven paſ'ſages in his commentaries on St John, which have 'been reflected upon by Dominicus à Soto, as favouring 'Lutheraniſm, are explained and vindicated from the 'holy ſcriptures and doctrine of the Apoſtles.' This apology

(1) In Indice Chronolog. ad ann. 1554.

(2) Quenſtedt de Patr. Viror. illuſtr. pag. 244, 245.

(3) See the firſt of the nine dialogues againſt the miſſionaries upon the ſervice of the reformed churches, pag. 12, & ſeq.

(4) Colomiés, Rome Proteſtante, pag. 59.

(5) He takes it from the Commentary upon the book of Judges, chap. viii.

(6) Bibl. Choiſie, pag. 78.

(7) At Salamanca, in 1554.

(8) Fero ipſo ſeu perſuaſo, ſeu diſſimulante. Nic. Ant. Bibliot. Script. Hiſpan. Tom. I, pag. 257.

(9) At Compluтum, in 1558.

could find no better expedient to ſave Ferus's Catholiciſm, than by ſuppoſing that the heretics had added ſeveral things to his writings which were not in the original [D]. This honeſt Franciſcan died the eighth of September 1554 (c). He was very near of the ſame opinion as the Anabaptiſts, with reſpect to going to war [E]. Salmeron has been his plagiary [F].

(c) Id. ibid.

pology was condemned by the congregation of the index (10), and the author was obliged to give an account of his faith. 'Aliquando quod Joannem Ferum ſuæ ſectæ Franciſcanæ ſodalem ab impetu Dominici Soti apologetico libro defendiſſet, cauſam religionis dixit, in qua tamen ſuam innocentiam probavit (11). —— Having wrote a defence of John Ferus, a brother of the Franciſcan order, in anſwer to Dominicus à Soto, he was obliged to give an account of his faith, wherein however he proved his innocence.' From whence we may conclude that Ferus's orthodoxy was a point much doubted of by the inquiſitors, to ſay no worſe of it.

(10) Nic. Antonio, Biblioth. Hiſpan. Tom. II, pag. 112.

(11) Ibid. pag. 111.

[D] They ſuppoſed that the heretics had added to his writings many things which were not in the original.] The ſame Medina, aſſiſted by ſome others, retrenched what they thought proper from Ferus's commentary upon St Matthew's goſpel; and reprinted it at Complutum in 1562. He ſuppoſed that the places which were ſuppreſſed had crept into that work by the artifice of the ſectaries, after the author's death. 'Purgavit etiam, ne id ignores, lector, Michaël noſter ejuſdem Feri ſermones, ſeu commentaria in Matthæum, quæ inedita ab eo relicta hæreticorum inter manus tabis quidquam contraxerant: quod & agnovit Sixtus Senenſis lib. vi. Bibliothecæ ſanctæ annotatione LXXII. Operas autem cum Medina Rodericus Vadillus Benedictinus, & Petrus Carolus Prior Ucleſienſis Ordinis Sancti Jacobi reſtituendi his mancipaverunt, Complutique edi correctiora curaverunt anno 1562, in 4to. —— The reader ought likewiſe to be informed that our own countryman, Michael Medina, lopped off ſeveral ſurreptitious branches from Ferus's diſcourſes or commentaries on St Matthew, which being left by him unpubliſhed had been corrupted by heretics, as Sixtus Senenſis has acknowledged. In the execution of this work, Medina was aſſiſted by Rodericus Vadillus, a Benedictin, and Peter Charles, prior of Ucleſia, of the order of St James, who cauſed a more correct edition to be publiſhed at Complutum, in the year 1562, in 4to.' The Oxford catalogue makes mention, 1. of Ferus's commentary upon the goſpel of St John, and upon the firſt epiſtle of the ſame Apoſtle; that commentary, I ſay, corrected by Michael Medina, and printed at Complutum (12): 2. of an Engliſh book (13) wherein complaint is made that thoſe of the Romiſh church falſify authors; and for an inſtance they give the commentary of Ferus upon the firſt epiſtle of St John.

(12) In 1569, and 1578.

(13) Printed at London in 1606, compoſed by W. Craſhaw.

[E] He was almoſt an Anabaptiſt .... with reſpect to going to war.] This I have read in Grotius, in the place wherein he obſerves that a great number of good men, conſidering the barbarities that are committed in war, have been of opinion that a chriſtian ought never to liſt himſelf a ſoldier. 'Cujus immanitatis conſpectu multi homines minime mali eo venerunt, ut Chriſtiano, cujus diſciplina in omnibus hominibus diligendis præcipue conſiſtit, omnia arma interdicerent: ad quos accedere interdum videntur & Joannes Ferus & Eraſmus noſtras (14), viri pacis & eccleſiaſticæ & civilis amantiſſimi (15). —— In regard to the enormities which are incident to war, many valuable men have proceeded ſo far as to pronounce all war repugnant to the diſtinguiſhing principle of chriſtianity, namely, univerſal benevolence, of which number we ſometimes find Ferus, and our countryman Eraſmus, men who pay the greateſt regard to peace both civil and eccleſiaſtical.'

(14) See the remark [U] of the article ERASMUS.

(15) Grotius, in Prolegomenis de Jure Belli & Pacis, n. 29.

[F] Salmeron has been his plagiary.] At leaſt he is charged with this by John Gerhard a famous Lutheran doctor. 'Salmeron, ſays he (16), ex fontibus Feri areolas ſuas ita irrigavit, ut pagellas integras in commentarios ſuos ex eo tranſtulerit. —— Salmeron, ſays he, has ſo far made free with the treaſures of Ferus to enrich his little ſtock, as to transfer whole pages from him into his commentaries.' I wonder Thomaſius makes no mention of it; but another collector of plagiariſms (17) has not omitted this.

(16) Confeſ. Cathol. Parte I, general. pag. 23, apud Quenſtedt, de Patr. Viror. illuſtr. pag. 245.

(17) Joh. Albert. Faber, in Decade Decadum, n. 70.

FEUARDENT (FRANCIS) a famous Franciſcan, was born at Coutance in lower Normandy (a) in the year 1541 (b), and might have inherited a great eſtate if he had not preferred a Monk's habit to the ſword (c). He took the Franciſcan habit in the monaſtery of Baieux (d), and obtained infinitely more fame in that dreſs than he would have done in that of a cavalier. He became doctor of the Sorbonne, preacher, and controverſiſt. His temper was ſo agreeable to his name [A], that never was the old maxim, Conveniunt rebus nomina ſæpe ſuis. —— Oft does the name the thing exactly fit, more true than in his perſon. He was one of the moſt furious adverſaries, and cruelleſt perſecutors the Proteſtants ever had to deal with, if we only reckon churchmen. And yet he boaſts of having been ill uſed by the heretics [B]. He wrote commentaries upon ſome books of the ſcripture, and tranſlated into French ſome works of the fathers. He publiſhed an edition of Irenæus with notes [C], and ſome books of controverſy in which the

(a) Feuardent Epiſt. Dedicat. Theomach.

(b) Konig, pag. 302.

(c) Botereius, Commentarior. de Rebus in Gallia geſtis, lib. xvii, pag. 590.

(d) Idem. ibid.

[A] His temper was agreeable to his name.] Mr Daillé makes this remark. 'Feuardentius, ſays he (1), homo nomine ſuo digniſſimus, quem cœci irarum, odiorum ac furiarum ignes ſic exagitabant ut raro apud ſe eſſet. —— Feuardent (a raging fire) a man whoſe morals perfectly anſwered his name, was ſo tranſported with paſſion, malice, and fury, that he was ſeldom maſter of himſelf.' I have always very much wondered that families, who have an odious or ridiculous name, do not quit it (2). Why, for inſtance, do they not leave that burleſque, or ſavage name, of Feuardent? One might inſtance a hundred more.

(1) De Pœn. & Satisfact. pag. 462, apud Konig. Bibl. vet. & nova, pag. 302.

(2) Some of theſe families have quitted their names. See the Origines Françoiſes, of Mr Menage, at the word Hauteclair. See the laſt remark of the article REGIUS.

[B] He boaſted of having been ill uſed by the heretics.] If one will believe him (3), one day he received a box on the ear; he was often abuſed in the ſtreets, accuſed before the magiſtrates, and ſued for his life. They ſtole from him the horſe he made uſe of in his old age, to go from place to place and preach the goſpel. One of his brothers received a ſhot from a gun. He forgot not what his brother monks ſuffered: but he ought alſo to tell what they made others ſuffer. But this is the conſtant fraud of theſe paſſionate people. They tire the patience of all mankind, and at laſt they meet with impatient enemies who handle them ſeverely. Have they not upon this the face to complain of ill treatment? Do they not make catalogues of the hardſhips they have endured, and paſs over in ſilence the injuries they had before committed? thus Mr Moreri has been deceived in favour of this perſon. 'Perkius, Cocus, Rivet, and ſome other Calviniſts, ſays he (4), exclaim againſt father Francis Feuardent in an unchriſtian manner: but theſe authors are not commonly conſulted by honeſt men.' Did that Franciſcan treat the miniſters in a chriſtian manner? Let any one anſwer for Mr Moreri.

(3) Theomachia Calviniſt. lib. xiii, pag. m. 160.

(4) In the article FEUARDENT.

[C] He publiſhed an edition of Irenæus with notes.] Mr du Pin has made the following judgment of it (5). 'At laſt Feuardent, a Franciſcan doctor of divinity of the faculty of Paris, a learned man for his time, ſet himſelf about this work, and printed at Paris, by Nivelle, in the years 1575 and 1576, the five books of Irenæus, reviſed and corrected in many places from an ancient manuſcript, and enlarged with five whole chapters which were found in his manuſcript, at the end of the fifth book. He has added annotations to the end of each chapter, which he thought neceſſary for the underſtanding

(5) Biblioth. des Auteurs Eccleſ. Tom. I, pag. 73, 74. Edit. Amſterdam.

of

the Catholics themſelves confeſs he has been too virulent [D]. The Jeſuits have had reaſon to complain of his proceedings towards Suarés [E]. I forgot to obſerve that he was one of the moſt ſeditious preachers who taught in Paris Buchanan's principles againſt Henry III, and Henry IV (e). He did not even ſpare the head of the League himſelf, when he thought him the author of ſomething which might prejudice the intereſt

‘of his author. They are for the moſt part uſeful and learned, but ſome of them exceed the bounds of a commentator, who ought not to aim at being thought learned, or treat of matters of controverſy, but meerly to explain his author. Feuardent's ſecond edition, printed at Cologn, in 1596, and afterwards in 1630, and at Paris in 1639, is better than the firſt, becauſe it contains the Greek paſſages of Irenæus, which are found in St Epiphanius, and ſome other ancient authors.' This is very moderate. Father Labbe, exaſperated by ſome hard things which he found a Proteſtant had publiſhed againſt the edition of Feuardent, is not ſo reſerved. ‘Plura nos quoque, ſays he (6), adverſus Centuriatores Magdeburgenſes, Nicolaum Gallaſium . . . . . ſed præcipue Rivetum bipedum nequiſſimum, qui priſtinæ Apoſtolorum Patrumque doctrinæ retinentiſſimos Baronium & Poſſevinum hæreticos appellare, & de Catholicæ fidei fortiſſimo vindice hæc auſus eſt effutire, Caveant (7) ab illis editionibus, quas impudentiſſimus ille Monachus Feuardentius homo projectæ audaciæ & nullius fidei, fœde in multis corrupit & annotationibus impiis & mendacibus (ſic Chriſtianas & Catholicas vocant deſperatiſſimæ cauſæ infelices patroni) conſpurcavit. Verum quid facias homini impudentiam ubique profeſſo, nec Deum nec homines reverito, κυνώπῃ καὶ κυνογλώσσῳ, cui totidem hærent infixæ cordi ſagittæ, quot pro veritate Euchariſtiæ, hujus oblatione à Chriſto Domino inſtituta, libero arbitrio, fide & operibus, principalitate Romanæ eccleſiæ, ac ſimilibus Catholicæ religionis aſſertis, ex Irenæi lucubrationibus depromuntur apertiſſima teſtimonia, quæ allegatis aliorum patrum locis firmavit, & diſcuſſa Novatorum caligine illuſtravit Feuardentius, nunquam non à laudatis viris laudandus. —— We might, ſays he, object many other things to the centuriators of Magdeburg, to Nicolas Gallaſius . . . . . . but in a more particular manner to that infamous Rivet, who had the aſſurance to call Baronius and Poſſevin, who moſt religiouſly maintained the ancient doctrine of the apoſtles and fathers, heretics, and thus to defame the greateſt champion of the Catholic faith. Beware, ſays he, of thoſe editions which that moſt impudent monk Feuardent, a fellow of a moſt profligate aſſurance, and no credit, has, in many places, notoriouſly corrupted, and with impious and lying annotations (for ſo theſe wretched patrons of a deſperate cauſe call thoſe which are truly chriſtian and catholic) beſpattered. But what is to be done with a perſon, who ſeems to pride himſelf in his impudence, who reveres neither GOD nor man, but ſhews his teeth, and barks at all, and whoſe heart is tranſfixed with as many arrows, as there are convincing teſtimonies for the truth of the euchariſt, it's inſtitution by our Lord CHRIST, free-will, faith, and works, the ſupremacy of the church of Rome, and ſuch like doctrines of the Catholic religion, which Feuardent has drawn from the labours of Iræneus, confirmed with the authorities of other fathers, illuſtrated by diſpelling thoſe clouds which noveliſts would ſpread over them, and muſt command the admiration of all men of merit.'

[D] He wrote ſome books of controverſy in which the Catholics themſelves confeſs he has been too virulent.] Moreri will furniſh me with the proofs of this. ‘Perhaps, ſays he (8), Father Gautier exaggerates matters in the hundred hereſies he charges upon the Calviniſts in his chronology, and that they might be reduced to a leſs number. We may alſo paſs the ſame judgment upon what is written by Father Francis Feuardent a Franciſcan, a doctor of Paris, who has mentioned a thouſand four hundred errors of the Calviniſts, in the work he calls Theomachia Calviniſtica.' Theſe are Moreri's words. This book of Feuardent was reprinted at Cologn, in 1629 (9). He has intituled one of his books Les Entre-mangeries & Guerres miniſtrales (10), the moſt conſiderable part whereof, in every reſpect, is what he has pillaged from other authors.

Some days ago I caſt my eyes upon his Examination of the Confeſſions, Prayers, Sacraments and Catechiſms of the Calviniſts: with the refutation of a miniſter's anſwer, wherein they are convicted of ſix hundred and ſixty ſix contradictions, errors, and blaſphemies, contained in them. The ſecond edition reviſed and enlarged by the author. This book was printed at Paris in 8vo, in 1601. Feuardent's uſual fury appears in this book, and in ſome places (11) he relates in a prophane and impudent manner I know not what ſtories of miniſters wives and Maids. There is no gravity in his ſtile: it is full of puns and burleſque phraſes. An anonymous author anſwered the firſt edition of this book. This anſwer, printed by Nicholas Froit-d'eau, at Rochel (12), was ſent to Feuardent at Nantes, towards the end of the year 1599 (13). He obſerves that it was thought to be the work of Anthony de la Faye (14). Here are his boaſts. ‘Feuardent, in the beſt cities and moſt famous churches of France, Brabant, Flanders, and Lorrain, where he has preached by GOD's grace, has reclaimed above ſix hundred ſouls from thy errors to the true faith and Catholic religion: and has confirmed above a hundred thouſand good chriſtians (15).'

[E] The Jeſuits had reaſon to complain of his proceeding with Suarés.] The caſe is this. Feuardent had cited, as a paſſage of St Cyril, the words of Maſter Joſſe Clichthou, to prove the immaculate conception of the Bleſſed Virgin. This Maſter Joſſe, finding St Cyril's work upon the goſpel of St John imperfect, ſupplied the four books that were wanting, and publiſhed them with thoſe of St Cyril. There is one place in the ſupplements which is as clear as noonday, and perfectly deciſive for the immaculate conception. Feuardent cited it with an air of triumph, and attributed it to St Cyril. He was informed of this miſtake by Suarés, who obſerves that the paſſage ought to be reſtored to Joſſe Clichthou, inſtead of being aſcribed to St Cyril. Feuardent was not at all pleaſed with this advice: he was ſo provoked that he collected together all the faults he could find in Suarés, concerning the miſtakes in figures, and pretended to convict him of a like error. But thoſe things are by no means the ſame. To put one figure for another is no great matter. Moſt commonly it is the fault of the preſs, which ought not to be charged upon the author; but to aſcribe to St Cyril what comes from a man of our own age, and to do this in order to have an unexceptionable man to produce againſt his adverſary in a cauſe of importance, is no ſlight miſtake in a writer. Theophilus Raynaud determines poſitively that Feuardent did not do this out of ignorance but with a premeditated deſign. ‘Feuardentius ad lib. 3. S. Irenæi cap. 23. intentus in aſtruendum nitorem conceptionis prædictæ, allegavit locum pro ea, ipſis Solis radiis ſcriptum, ex lib. 6. S. Cyrilli in Joannem cap. 15. At non eſſe eum librum S. Cyrilli, ſed Clichtovei, qui lacunam quatuor intermediorum librorum in eo Cyrilli opere ſupplere voluit, in confeſſo eſt. Neque id ignoraſſe Feuardentium, comperta ejus eruditio dubitare non ſinit. Sed (ut dixi) ſerviens cauſæ quam tractabat, locum ex lucubratione nuperi ſcriptoris, operi S. Cyrilli intexta, meditatò ſuppoſuit S. Cyrillo, & tanquam tanti Patris dictum, protulit. Monuit de hoc loco per Feuardentium minùs aptè citato, & ad Clichtoveum, non ad S. Cyrillum referendo, Suarez tom. 2, 3. part. d. 3. ſ. 5. qui eam à Feuardentio gratiam retulit in poſteriore editione commentariorum in Irenæum, ut quotquot congerere potuit menda, in numeros typographicos illapſa in Suaris operibus, ad eum ſimilis lapſus inſimulandum intorſerit. Sed eſt profectò ſumma diſparitas. Nam autorum allegationes quoad numerum arithmeticum, quo à typographo exhibentur, nullus author præſtare queat indemnes à multis mendis, in tanta operarum oſcitantia, & emaculatorum indiligentia. At plagulæ Clitchtovei prolatio nomine S. Cyrilli, ad conciliandam majorem fidem placito pro quo pugnes, non eſt erratum, vel mendum typographicum, quod in oſcitantes operas, vel in dormitantem emaculatorem poſſit referri (16).' —— Feuardent, in his Annotations upon Irenæus, lib. 3. cap. 23. paſſio-

(e) Maimbourg, Hiſt. de la Ligue, pag. 295.

(6) Diſſert. de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. I, p. 630.

(7) Rivetus ſays this in Critico Sacro, lib. ii, cap. vi, Oper. Tom. III, pag. 1091.

(8) In the article CALVIN.

(9) I uſe the quarto edition.

(10) I have ſeen the third edition, which is of Paris, by Sebaſtian Nivelle, 1604, in 8vo.

(11) Pag. 180, verſo, & ſeq.

(12) It was not printed there.

(13) Feuardent, Examen des Confeſſions, folio 1, verſo.

(14) Idem, folio 3, verſo.

(15) Id. fol. 63.

(16) Theoph. Raynaud. Erotemat. X de bonis ac malis Libris, n. 289.

tereſt of the rebels [F]. He died at Paris the firſt of January 1610 (f). See in Moreri the title of ſeveral of his works, and add thereto L'Hiſtoire de la fondation de l'Egliſe & Abbaye du Mont Saint Michel, au peril de la Mer, & des Miracles, Reliques, & Indulgences données en icelle (g).

(f) Boterelus, ubi ſupra.

(g) Du Cheſne, Biblioth. des Hiſt. de France, pag. m. 141, quotes the Edition of Conſtance, 1611, in 24.

nately labouring to give a gloſs to the ſaid notion, quoted a very clear paſſage to that purpoſe, from the ſixth book of St Cyril, upon the fifteenth chapter of St John. But it is owned on all hands that that book is not St Cyril's, but Clichthou's, who propoſed to ſupply the deficiency of four intermediate books in the works of St Cyril. Nor will Feuardent's known great reading permit us to call his knowlege of this matter in queſtion. But to ſerve, as I ſaid, the cauſe wherein he had engaged, he induſtriouſly quotes a paſſage in a modern writer's works, interwoven with thoſe of St Cyril, and would put it off for the authority of ſo eminent a father. Suarez took notice of this paſſage being improperly alledged by Feuardent, as belonging to Clichthou, and not to St Cyril. Feuardent returned Suarez the favour of this information, in the ſecond edition of his Commentaries on Irenæus, by collecting all the errors which the printers had made in the figures in the works of Suarez, to convict him of an offence of the ſame nature. But the difference is certainly very wide. For ſuch is the ſupine negligence of compoſitors, and the overſight of correctors, that no author can warrant his quotations entirely free from errors in the figures; but the producing a paſſage of Clichthou under the name of St Cyril, in order to give the greater credit to the cauſe in which you are enliſted, is not a ſlip or error of the preſs, that ought to be aſcribed to a ſluggiſh compoſitor, or a ſleepy corrector.’

[F] He did not ſpare even the head of the League when he thought him the author of ſomething which might prejudice the rebels.] The duke of Nemours, a great leaguer, having made himſelf unacceptable to the duke of Maienne, his brother by the mother's ſide, was arreſted, and people were perſuaded that this was done by the intrigues of the duke of Maienne. Paſquier having related this, adds, ‘Feuardent, a Franciſcan, one of the moſt ſeditious preachers in Paris, did not ſtick to charge the duke with it in the pulpit. He ſent for him with a reſolution to puniſh him, to teach him to govern his tongue. But hearing he was a Savoyard by nation, he excuſed him immediately as one he ſaw favoured a prince of Savoy (17).’ Paſquier is miſtaken concerning that Franciſcan's native country.

(17) Paſquier, Lett. lib. xvi, pag. 234.

FEUILLANT (THE LITTLE) a preacher of the League. Look for MONGAILLARD.

FEVRE of Etaples (a) (JAMES) in Latin, Faber Stapulenſis, was one of thoſe who began to expel the groſs ignorance that prevailed in the univerſity of Paris. He was a very little man and of mean extraction (b); but of great learning and parts. He made himſelf ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm, and was forced to give way to the perſecutions of certain ignorant and enraged zealots, who gave him no reſt (c). He quitted the field to them and retired from Paris to Meaux, were there was a biſhop (d), who loved the Sciences and men of true learning. The perſecution raiſed at Meaux by the Franciſcans obliged the biſhop to be a good Catholic (e). Le Fevre was then forced to retire firſt to Blois, and from thence into Guienne. Margaret, queen of Navarre, ſiſter to Francis I, honoured him with her protection, ſo that he enjoyed full liberty at Nerac, even to his death, which happened in 1537 (f). They tell very remarkable particulars of his laſt moments [A]. The parliament of Paris received an order from Francis I to come to no reſolution againſt le Fevre; but to wait for his majeſty's reſolution

(a) Etaples in Picardy is the name of his country.

(b) Verheiden. in Effig. & Elog. pag. 104, Jovius, Elog. cap. cxxi.

(c) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. liv. i, pag. 2.

(d) Named William Briçonnet.

(e) Beza, ubi ſupra.

(f) Id. pag. 14.

[A] They tell ſome very remarkable circumſtances concerning his laſt moments.] Thomas Hubert, counſellor of the elector Palatine, Frederic II, whom he accompanied in his journey to Spain, wrote an account of that journey, which was printed at Franckfort, in 1624. He relates (1), that the elector, his maſter, returning from Spain, paſſed through France, in 1358, and fell ſick at Paris, where Francis I, and the queen of Navarre, often viſited him. It was at one of theſe viſits that this princeſs gave an account in what manner le Fevre of Etaples ended his life. He and ſome other learned men, with whoſe converſation the queen was greatly pleaſed, dined one day with her (2). In the midſt of the entertainment, le Fevre fell a weeping, and when the queen asked him the reaſon of it, he anſwered that the heinouſneſs of his crimes occaſioned that pungent ſorrow. That it was not the remembrance of a lewd life that afflicted him, ſince at the age of one hundred and one years (§ α) he had been utterly a ſtranger to women. That with reſpect to other paſſions, which precipitate men into vice, he felt his conſcience eaſy enough, but he reckoned it as a very great crime, that, having known the truth and taught it to ſeveral perſons who had ſealed it with their blood, he ſhould have the weakneſs to keep in a place of ſecurity, far from the places where the crowns of martyrdom were diſtributed. The queen, who was very eloquent, endeavoured to comfort him. He made his will by word of mouth, then laid himſelf down upon a bed, and ſome few hours after was found dead there. The queen cauſed him to be honourably buried in the ſame tomb ſhe deſigned for herſelf: Honorifice tumulari fecit & marmore quod pro ſe exſcindi fecerat contegi voluit. He bequeathed his books to Gerard Rouſſel, and his other goods to the poor.

It is hard to doubt of this ſtory, and yet hard to believe it. If the fact had been falſe, would the queen have told it to the elector? If ſhe did not tell it him, would Thomas Hubert have dared to have put it into his hiſtory? Theſe are the motives not to doubt of it. But, on the other hand, how can it be thought that a thing of this nature, moſt glorious to James le Fevre in particular, and to the whole body in general, ſhould be ſuppreſſed by all the miniſters if it had been true? How comes it to paſs that Theodore Beza ſays nothing of it, neither in his Hiſtory of the Churches, where he mentions the death of James le Fevre, nor in the particular elogy he has made of that doctor (3), nor in any other place in his books, where he had frequently an opportunity to have told this wonder? Whence comes the ſilence of Sleidan, the ſilence of Verheiden, and a million other authors, who ought, if they had had common ſenſe, to have told this particular, if they had any knowlege of it? One cannot anſwer theſe difficulties but by ſuppoſing this adventure was entirely unknown to them. But this is removing one difficulty by another. The court of the king of Navarre was the ſcene where this fact happened: ſeveral learned men, who dined with the queen, were witneſſes to it, the moſt part of whom were Proteſtants: by what ſtrange combination were they engaged not to ſpeak of it all their lives? By what fatality ſhould the tongues of a whole court be tied up for more than fifty years, upon ſo public an accident, and of ſuch a nature? It has been known, that when the good man was dying, he ſaid he left his goods to the poor, and they have not failed to record this circumſtance in verſe (4). How then ſhould it happen, that the reſt, more worthy to be declared, ſhould not have been known alſo? Add to this, that it is by no means probable that le Fevre lived a whole century; for if he had been one hundred and one years old when he died, he muſt have been born in the year 1436. He would have been above eighty ſix years old,

(1) Mr Rivet has inſerted this account in his letter de Senectute bona, Oper. Tom. II, pag. 1266. Mr Colomiés relates it in his Mêlanges Hiſtoriq. pag. 2, & ſeq. Mr Jurieu mentions it alſo, Apol. pour les Reform. chap. ii, pag. 70, & 71. I only give the ſubſtance of it.

(2) Mr Colomiés pretends that the queen went to dine with him. Thomas Hubert's Latin will not bear that meaning. Quadam autem die miſit ad eum regina, & ſe velle cum eo prandere dixit, convocatis aliquot doctis, quorum confabulationibus mirum in modum delectaretur.

(§ α) James le Fevre was not quite one hundred years old, when he died, but he did not want much of it, witneſs theſe verſes of Macrinus, Ævi peracto jam prope ſeculo, &c. quoted Tom. I, pag. 362, of the new Menagiana, Paris Edit. 1715.
REM. CRIT.]

(3) In Iconibus.

(4) Corpus humo, mentemque Deo, bona cuncta relinquo Pauperibus: Faber hæc cum moreretur, ait. Verheiden, pag. 105. We ſhall ſay below, in citat. (27), that that was his epitaph.

ſolution. That prince was then priſoner: the ſubſtance of his letter may be ſeen in Sleidan [B]. This was probably at the time when the Sorbonne degraded le Fevre from his doctor's degree; but he did not go out of France, as Sleidan affirms. I confeſs he made a journey to Straſburg; but it was by the queen of Navarre's order, to confer with Bucer about the reformation of the church [C]. His natural moderation left him when he wrote againſt Eraſmus, his old friend [D]. This conteſt did not turn in his favour.

We have ſaid elſewhere (g), that he was expoſed to the clamours of the monks, for+ having maintained that St Anne was but once married. He was no leſs oppoſed in the opinion he advanced, that the woman who was a ſinner, of whom St Luke ſpeaks in his ſeventh chapter, and Mary Magdalen, mentioned in the eighth chapter of the ſame Evangeliſt, and Mary, the ſiſter of Lazarus, ſpoken of in the eleventh chapter of St John, are three different women. This diſpute was lately revived [E]. We muſt not forget that he tranſlated the four goſpels into French, and St Paul's epiſtles into

+ in the 7th Chapr of St Luk she is distinguished by the Appellation of a Wo
& a Sinner—not Mary in ye 8th Chapr of St Luke & is wrote Mary called Magdalene out of whom went seven Devils, tho donot in any wise se to be the same person
St John in ye 11th Chapt. say plainly of the woman was a Sinner mention in ye 7th of St Luke & sa
she is Sister to Lazaru & Martha—

old, when he fled from Meaux, and almoſt ninety ſix when Calvin made him a viſit at Nerac. Could ſuch a circumſtance be forgot? Are they contented to uſe for ſuch very aged men the term of old age, which Beza, Verheiden, and other writers of that party, make uſe of, with reſpect to that doctor? In a word, there is no inſtance, in theſe latter ages, that a celebrated man ſhould live above a hundred years, and yet no author, that ſpeaks of him, ſhould take any notice of it.

[B] The ſubſtance of that letter may be ſeen in Sleidan.] It is, according to his cuſtom, very elegantly written (5): but he did not know that le Fevre was retired to Nerac (6). Spondanus (7) ſpeaks but in very few words of this doctor, and of his degradation.

[C] He took a journey to Strasburg . . . . to confer with Bucer.] I learned this particular in the life of Capito. 'Tanta ſtatim Capitonis & Buceri fama 'fuit, ut Jacobus Faber Stapulenſis, & Gerardus Rufus 'clam è Gallia profecti, Capitonem & Bucerum audierint, atque de omnibus doctrinæ præcipuis locis 'cum ipſis diſſeruerint, miſſi à Margaretha Franciſci 'Regis ſorore Navarræ regina (8). —— Such immediately was the fame of Capito and Bucer, that 'James Faber of Etaples, and Gerard Rufus, went 'privately from France to hear them, and held conferences with them upon all the principal points of 'learning, being ſent by Margaret, queen of Navarre, 'ſiſter to king Francis.' Eraſmus, who did not know this laſt circumſtance, imagined that le Fevre was at Strasburg as a refugee. 'Faber Stapulenſis Gallia 'profugus, ſays he (9), agit Argentorati, ſed mutato 'nomine quemadmodum Comicus ille ſenex, Athenis 'Chremes erat, in Lemno Stilpho. —— Faber Stapulenſis, who did fly from France, is, ſays he, at Straſburg, but under a borrowed name, like the old man 'in the play, At Athens Chremes, in Lemnos Stilpho.' In another letter, dated from Baſil, the ſeventeenth of May 1527, he ſays, that le Fevre had been honourably recalled into France. 'Hinc honorifice revocatus eſt in Galliam, ceſſerat enim metu & eſt regi 'chariſſimus (10). —— He was honourably recalled 'into France, whence he had retired out of fear, and is 'highly careſſed by the king.' This is ſtill the conſequence of the falſe ſuppoſition, that that doctor had fled towards the Rhine. Every body did not know the true cauſe of that journey, the ſecret deputation of the queen of Navarre.

[D] His natural moderation left him when he wrote againſt Eraſmus, his old friend.] He was the aggreſſor, without any other reaſon than that Eraſmus, when he publiſhed his notes upon the New Teſtament, did not adopt all his opinions upon certain paſſages of ſcripture (11). He rudely attacked Eraſmus, and charged him with advancing impieties (12). Eraſmus defended himſelf; but after having provided for his own honour, he intreated his adverſary to continue his friendſhip to him, aſſuring him he ſhould always continue to love and eſteem him (13). He was not pleaſed with the complements which were made him upon this victory, and deſired his Friends not to alter their opinion of le Fevre on account of this difference. 'Quæ ſcribis 'de noſtra ad Fabrum apologia, quanquam ſcio animo 'abs te ſcribi amiciſſimo, mihi tamen bis moleſta 'fuerunt, vel quod veterem animi dolorem refricant, 'vel quod tu hac occaſione minus aliquanto quam vellem videris tribuere Fabro, viro quo vix in multis millibus reperias vel integriorem vel humaniorem. Hac 'una in re ſui diſſimulis fuit, quod amicum immerentem tam atrociter impetiit. Quis autem omnibus 'horis ſapuit unquam? Atque utinam mihi licuiſſet 'adverſario parcere. Nunc duobus crucior nominibus, '& quod cum tali amico coactus ſim manus conſerere, & quod intelligam quoſdam de Fabro minus candide ſentire, de quo cupiam omnes quam optime ſentire (14). —— Though I am convinced that what you 'have wrote to me concerning my anſwer to Faber proceeds from the ſincere reſpect of a friend, yet to me 'it was doubly unwelcome, as it revives in my breaſt 'an old pain, and as you on this occaſion ſeem to aſcribe 'leſs than I could wiſh to Faber, a man who, for his 'integrity and humanity, has not his equal amongſt 'thouſands. In this one inſtance he has not acted like 'himſelf, in attacking, without provocation, a friend 'with ſo much violence. But what man was ever always wiſe? And I wiſh I might ſpare my adverſary, 'but I labour under a double anxiety; I am reduced to 'a neceſſity to enter the liſts with a valuable friend; 'and find likewiſe, that ſome have conceived a leſs 'favourable opinion of Faber, of whom I wiſh that 'all mankind would conceive the moſt favourable ſentiments.' Can any ſentiments be more heroic than theſe? Le Fevre repented of his attack (15), and made no reply.

[E] He maintained that the woman who was a ſinner, ... Mary Magdalen . . . and Mary the ſiſter of Lazarus, are three differeut women: this diſpute was lately revived.] When James le Fevre publiſhed a book upon this ſubject about the beginning of the XVIth century, the unlearned and the learned, the populace and the doctors, agreed in ſaying that Mary, the ſiſter to Martha and Lazarus, did not differ from the woman which was a ſinner, mentioned in the 7th chapter of St Luke, nor from her out of whom JESUS CHRIST caſt ſeven devils. The hymns and office of St Mary Magdalen, in the Roman breviary, are agreable to this opinion. This did not hinder our le Fevre from combating it. His book was reprinted in 1518 and 1519, by the care of Joſſe Clichthou, who embraced his opinion, and defended it twice againſt the attacks of Mark Grandival, canon of St Victor. The book that John Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, wrote againſt le Fevre in defence of the common opinion concerning the unity of thoſe three women, was printed at Paris in 1519. This diſpute cauſed a great deal of heat, both becauſe the leaſt innovations alarmed the Catholics in the beginning of Lutheraniſm, and becauſe they were but little ſatisfied of James le Fevre's orthodoxy. But when theſe perſonal animoſities ceaſed, they began to reliſh his ſentiment, ſo that at the end of the XVIth century, and long after, it was looked upon as conſiſtent with reaſon and faith. It was allowed to be publickly maintained in the Sorbonne, provided a ſmall diſtinction was added to it, which really deſtroyed the whole decree in favour of which it was invented. They were obliged to ſay, that they did not acknowledge a triple woman, which would have been to affirm, what the decree of the Faculty had condemned; but three different women, one of whom was named Magdalen (16). The thing went ſo far that the moſt learned men would have been aſhamed to have continued in the common opinion, and the correctors of the breviaries of Paris, Orleans, and Vienne, put a diſtinction between Lazarus's ſiſter, the ſinner, and Mary Magdalen. Things being in this ſtate, ſome doctors took pity of the doctrine they ſaw forſaken, and which had been led in triumph by what appeared ſo falſe, when James le Fevre ventured to

---

(g) See citat. (o) of the article AGRIPPA.

(5) Sleid. lib. v, ſub fin.

(6) Per abſentiam quoque regis captivi Pariſienſes Theologi Jacobum Fabrum Stapulenſem . . . exagitabant, ita quidem ut ille deſerta Gallia migraret alio. —— During the captive king's abſence, the divines of Paris perſecuted Faber of Etaples, ſo that he left France, and retired elſewhere. Id. ibid.

(7) Ad ann. 1523 (and not 1525, as Moreri has it) n. 15.

(8) Melch. Adam in vita Capitonis, pag. 90. He quotes Johannes Sturmius, Antipapo 4, pag. 8.

(9) In a letter dated in March, 1526: it is the xxvith of the xviiith book.

(10) Eraſm. Epiſt. xiii, lib. xix, pag. 830.

(11) Eraſm. Epiſt. li, lib. iii, pag. 213, & 216.

(12) Eraſm. Epiſt. xxxiii, lib. iii.

(13) See the letter he wrote to him in April 1517. It is the ninth of the third book. He wrote him another in September following: it is the xxxiiid of the ſame book.

(14) Eraſm. Epiſt. iii, lib. iii, pag. 174. He writ it to Tonſtal, the Engliſh embaſſador at Paris, in 1517. There are many like paſſages in his letters.

(15) Eraſm. Epiſt. xxviii, lib. vii, pag. 398.

(16) Negabant à ſe agnoſci triplicem ſed tres diverſas mulieres quarum una diceretur Magdalena Lami. ubi infra.

into latin, with critical notes and a commentary in which he often cenſures the vulgar tranſlation [F]. He made a like commentary and notes upon the goſpels and the epiſtles of the other apoſtles. All this ſerved only to increaſe the ill humour of the Sorbonne againſt him, and he ſaw himſelf alſo attacked by the formidable Noel Beda. He did not externally ſeparate from the church of Rome, and he diſapproved in certain points of the too warm conduct of thoſe who ſettled the reformation in Germany [G]; but in the bottom ſwim againſt the ſtream (17). Father Alexander, who afterwards publiſhed the reformation of the office of Paris, after having weighed . . . the authorities and reaſons of both parties, has concluded * in favour of the opinion which makes them but one ſingle perſon. After this, father Lamy, prieſt of the Oratory, not content with having endeavoured to re-eſtabliſh this opinion in his new Evangelical Concord, which he wrote in Latin in 1689, has publiſhed a particular diſſertation upon it in a French treatiſe, by way of letter, printed in 1691. . . . . Since which, father Mauduit †, alſo a prieſt of the Oratory, and Dom Pezron ‡ . . . . have each of them wrote a diſſertation in a work they publiſhed in French upon the goſpel, wherein they defend the common opinion . . . . . Mr du Hamel † of the Academy of Sciences retains the ſame opinion. I borrow this from a book printed at Roan, in 1699, by Mr Anquetin, curate of Lyons, under the title of a Diſſertation upon St Mary Magdalen, to prove that Mary Magdalen, Mary the ſiſter of Lazarus, and the woman who was a ſinner, are three different women. Note, that Eraſmus wrote to the biſhop of Rocheſter, that all the world gave him the victory; but that there were ſome people who were ſorry he had treated ſo ſeverely a perſon, who had done ſo much ſervice to the ſciences as James le Fevre (18). We find in the ſame letter of Eraſmus, that Stephen Poncher, biſhop of Paris, had excited the Engliſh biſhop to write againſt that doctor.

[F] He tranſlated the four Goſpels into French, and St Paul's Epiſtles into Latin, with notes . . . . in which he cenſures . . . . the vulgar tranſlation.] This French tranſlation was printed with the royal licence, in 1523, by Simon de Colines. The author did not put his name to it; but ‘we learn from a letter of Eraſmus, written to Billibaldus in 1526, that it is James le Fevre's, who was obliged to fly for having publiſhed it, as if it had then been a crime at Paris to tranſlate the ſacred books into French, on account of the troubles, thoſe new tranſlations cauſed in Europe. James le Fevre (ſays Eraſmus * in that place) who had fled for fear, for no other reaſon but that he had tranſlated the Goſpels into French, was recalled to court. Jacobus Faber qui metu profugerat non ob aliud niſi quòd verterat Evangelia Gallicè, revocatus eſt in aulam (19).’ Mr Simon, from whom I borrow theſe words, cites ſeveral places of this verſion and gives his judgment of it. What he takes from the life of Capito, compiled by Melchior Adam (20), is not at all proper to confirm what Eraſmus ſays, that James le Fevre fled from Paris on account of his new French tranſlation; for it appears by that paſſage of Melchior Adam, that this doctor was at Baſil, as the deputy of Queen Margaret. See, above, remark [C].

‘(21) He publiſhed in the year 1512 a tranſlation of St Paul's Epiſtles with a commentary. This firſt edition is in the king's library written upon a fine vellom. He durſt not totally reject the vulgar, which he has inſerted intire in his work, ſetting over againſt it his new verſion, where he does not much vary from the ancient: but he has added critical obſervations to his commentary, intituled, Examinatio nonnullorum circa literam; and it is chiefly in theſe obſervations that he has taken the liberty to examine and correct the ancient Latin interpreter. Tho' he ſhews a great deal of learning in this work, and keeps as far as poſſible from the barbariſms of the divines of his time, yet he diſcovers throughout the whole great ſigns of weakneſs, both in the interpretation and in the Latin. Eraſmus and Stunica have learnedly obſerved ſome of his miſtakes, having proved by many inſtances that he was but a half Grammarian, and had but an indifferent knowledge of the Greek tongue. Natalis Bedda, a divine of Paris, cenſured his divinity as well as that of Eraſmus. Laſtly, the inquiſitors of Rome under Clement VIII have placed his commentary on all the new teſtament among the number of prohibited books, till it was reviſed, and purged of it's errors . . . . Bedda charged him with many errors, and among others with having wrote, upon the ninth chapter of the Epiſtle to the Romans, that it did not depend upon the will of man to ſave himſelf †, poſſe ſalvari non eſt in hominis voluntate, poteſtate, aut operibus. . . . The learned father Taumaſſin (22) of the Oratory has inſerted, in his memoirs concerning grace, this cenſure of Bedda, adding that the doctrine of that divine was in ſome meaſure the doctrine of the faculty of divinity at Paris, ſince it had approved of that cenſure. Be that as it will, Bedda preſſes him warmly upon this head, as if he had denied univerſal grace . . . . . (23). I have ſeen but one edition of his commentary upon the goſpels, which did not appear till 1522, having been printed at Meaux at the charge of Simon de Colines . . . . (24). He has alſo wrote upon the canonical epiſtles. This laſt work he dedicated to Antony du Prat, chancellor of France, thanking him for the protection he had given to his explication of the goſpels; which might induce one to believe that the books of that author did not even at that time pleaſe ſome divines at Paris. . . . . He has followed the ſame method in that laſt commentary as upon the goſpels, only he has placed his corrections in the margin, over againſt the text, which is more convenient. He obſerves in a letter written from Meaux in 1525, which is placed in the beginning, that the original Greek of the goſpels, and St Paul's epiſtles is more exact than the old Latin edition: that on the contrary that edition is more exact than the Greek in ſome places of the canonical epiſtles.’ Mr Simon relates ſeveral other things to ſhew the character of that work, and concludes that James le Fevre ought to be ranked among the beſt commentators of his age. But Eraſmus, who wrote at the ſame time, and was much more polite, leſſened his reputation conſiderably. The works of that Paris divine are now ſcarcely read, whereas thoſe of Eraſmus . . . . are ſtill greatly valued (25).

[G] He did not externally ſeparate from the church of Rome, and diſapproved of the hot behaviour of thoſe who ſettled the reformation in Germany.] The ſecond of theſe two facts is contained in theſe words of Eraſmus: ‘De regno quod ſcripſi, plebem lingua temperare, magiſtratum nihil gerere, niſi ex ipſorum ſententia, ſenatu movere, qui à doctrina ipſorum diſſentiunt; conjicere in carcerem, qui verbo ipſos tetigerit, fœderibus ſeſe communire, an non hoc eſt regnare? Damnavit hoc in illis egregius ille vir Jacobus Faber, quum metu ceſſerat Galliis, & in Germaniam conceſſerat (26). —— As to what I wrote concerning their affecting a ſovereignty, what elſe can be the meaning of all this! to keep the common people in a ſtate of ſlavery, and the magiſtrates in ſuch ſubjection, as to determine nothing without their approbation, to expel from the ſenate all thoſe who differ from them in opinion, to impriſon thoſe who complain of their behaviour, and to ſtrengthen themſelves with alliances? This the great Faber condemned in them, when he left France out of fear, and retired into Germany.’ For the firſt particular I ſhall cite a paſſage of Florimond de Remond: ‘Le Fevre who took the ſirname of Etaples, the village of his birth, a poor boy, without friends, lived a long time in the territories of the king of Navarre, raiſing ſundry doubts and ſcruples in the conſciences of thoſe that would hearken to him, yet always appearing a Catholic. I remember to have ſeen formerly, when the church of Nerac was ſtanding, his tomb with this inſcription.

Corpus humo, mentemque Deo, bona cuncta relinquo
Pauperibus, Faber hæc dum moreretur, ait.

His duſt to duſt, his ſoul to him that lives,
To th' poor the reſt, the dying Faber gives.

---

(17) Taken from the Diſſertation of Father Lami, de unica Maria Magdalena. It is in the appendix of his Commentary in Harmoniam quatuor Evangeliſtarum, printed at Paris, 1699. See the Journal of Utrecht, for July and Auguſt, 1699, pag. 448, & ſeq.

* Natalis Alexander, Hiſtor. Eccleſ. . . . I Sæculi, Tom. II, fol. 120.

† Mauduit, Analiſe de l'Evangile, printed in 1696.

are but two differen wom
Mary the der of Lazarus sinner are Mag. another as Tom

‡ Dom Pezron, Hiſtoire Evangelique. . . . printed in 1696.

† Theol. Cleric. Fund. Tom. II, lib. iv.

(18) Eraſm. Epiſt. viii, lib. vi, dated from Antwerp, the ſecond of April, 1519.

* Eraſm. Epiſt. lib. xxx, Epiſt. xliv.

(19) Simon Nouvelles, Obſervat. ſur le Texte & ſur les Verſions du N. T, pag. 146.

(20) Simon, ibid. pag. 150.

(21) Simon, Hiſt. Critique des Commentateurs du N. T. chap. xxxiv, pag. 488.

† Jac. Fab. apud Bedd. in Cenſ. C. 9. Epiſt. ad Rom. Prop. 59. Edit. Pariſ. in fol. ann. 1525.

(22) He ſhould have ſaid Thomaſſin.

(23) Hiſt. Crit. des Comment. du N. Teſt. pag. 496.

(24) Ibid. pag. 502.

(25) Ibid. pag. 503.

(26) Eraſm. Epiſt. at Fratres Germaniæ infer. fol. m. Q 4, verſo.

bottom he was much a Papiſt.

> 'At that time no alterations were made in religion, or the church ceremonies. The king and queen of Navarre, though their devotion was obſerved to be cooled after their intimacy with theſe fugitives of Meaux, continued to live in the ſame manner as uſual (27).'

(27) Flor. de Remond, Hiſt. of the Birth of Hereſy, lib. vii, cap. iii, pag. 846, 847.

FEVRET (a). Mr Charles Fevret, ſon of Mr James Fevret, counſellor of the king in the parliament of Dijon, was born at Semur in Auxois in 1583.

(a) See the advertiſement to the ſecond edition of this Dictionary.

The famous Genebrard, archbiſhop of Aix and prior of our Lady of Semur, was an intimate friend of James Fevret, whom he calls in his works Patronum rebus omnibus ornatum. He deſired of him his ſon Charles to accompany him in his journey to Rome; but that prelate was found dead in his bed at Semur by his ſervants, who went to call him up the morning he deſigned to ſet out.

Bongars, ſo well known by men of learning, and by his works, was alſo the friend of James Fevret. He wrote to him for his ſon Charles, who went to meet him at Metz in 1602, and accompanied him in his journey to Germany, whither king Henry IV ſent him in quality of Reſident of France to the Electors and Princes of the Empire.

Charles left him to go and ſtudy the Civil-Law at Heidelberg, a famous univerſity of Germany. Godefroy * taught the Civil-Law there at that time. He took a particular care of Charles Fevret, who was recommended to him by a great many perſons of quality and merit, lodged him in his houſe, and made him maintain public theſes with applauſe.

* Gothofredus.

In the year 1607 Charles Fevret returned to Dijon, where he married Anne Brunet de Beaulne, by whom he had nineteen children. They brought up fourteen of them together for eight years. After the death of his wife which happened in 1637, he cut his bed in two and married no more.

He acquired a great reputation at the bar at Dijon, where he pleaded a long time with great eloquence and force, and did ſeveral public actions which procured him a general eſteem.

He was choſen counſel to the three eſtates of the province.

In the year 1629, Lewis XIII coming to Dijon to puniſh the authors of a popular ſedition, he was pitched upon to implore his majeſty's pardon for the guilty: he ſpoke for all the ſeveral bodies, and made ſo eloquent a ſpeech, that the king ordered him to print it, and ſend it to him to Lyons. His majeſty pardoned the authors of the tumult, and made Charles Fevret a counſellor in the parliament of Dijon by a new creation; but the execution of the wills of princes often depending upon their miniſters, Charles Fevret was given to underſtand that the king expected he ſhould exerciſe himſelf the office of counſellor, which his majeſty had beſtowed upon him. This he refuſed, not caring to part with his profeſſion of advocate, which he managed with ſo much eſteem and reputation. He was therefore forced to be contented with the poſt of the king's counſel, ſecretary of the court, with a penſion of 900 livres, which was granted him gratis.

His frequent deputations to court brought him acquainted with Mr de Marillac, keeper of the ſeals of France, who honoured him with his friendſhip.

In the years 1626, and 1627, the king's brother nominated him for his counſel in ordinary in all his affairs, and the prince of Condé made him Intendant of his houſe and buſineſs in Burgundy.

He was continued in the ſame poſt by Lewis de Bourbon, his ſon, prince of Condé, and honoured during the life of thoſe two princes in a particular manner with their favour. He was alſo nominated by Frederic Caſimir, prince palatine of the Rhine, and by his lady Amelia Antwerpia, born princeſs of Orange, for counſellor and intendant of their affairs in Burgundy.

Charles Fevret had an intimate acquaintance with all the learned Civilians of his time.

In 1654 he publiſhed a ſmall Latin treatiſe, de Claris Fori Burgundici Oratoribus.

The firſt impreſſion of this learned treatiſe, intituled de l'Abus & du vrai ſujet des Appellations qualifiées de ce nom d'Abus, appeared in 1653. He enlarged it one half, which gave birth to a ſecond edition in 1667, after his deceaſe. The ſame tract was printed a third time in 1677.

He alſo made an excellent tranſlation of Pybrac's ſtanzas into Latin verſe, printed at Lyons in 1667, with a commentary under the title De Officiis Vitæ Humanæ ſive in Pybraci Tetraſticha Commentarius.

Several authors have made honourable mention of him and his works.

His device was, Conſcientia virtuti ſatis amplum Theatrum eſt.

He died at Dijon in 1661, at the age of ſeventy ſeven years, and left two ſons counſellors in the parliament of Dijon, and two grandſons, one of which is a counſellor in the ſame parliament, and the other counſellor in the parliament of Metz.

FINÆUS (ORONTIUS) in French Oronce Finé, profeſſor of mathematics in the royal college of Paris, was a phyſician's ſon, and born at Briançon in Dauphiné in the year 1494 (a). Being very young when his father died, he went to Paris, where he applied himſelf with the utmoſt diligence to his ſtudies. Anthony Silveſter, who was

(a) Thevet, Eloges des Hommes Illuſtres, Tom. VII, pag. m. 313.

of Briançon (b), and taught the belles lettres in Montague college, was a kind patron to him, and had him entered in the college of Navarre. The young man went through his claſſical learning, and a courſe of philoſophy there (c). He carefully ſtudied all that the profeſſors taught him; but was particularly attached to the mathematics, for which he had naturally a ſtrong inclination (d). Nor was he diſcouraged by the conſideration of the contempt thoſe ſciences then lay under, or of the neceſſity he was in of maſtering them by himſelf, and without the aſſiſtance of another; but notwithſtanding theſe obſtacles he made a very great progreſs in them (e). He acquired great ſkill in mechanics, and as he had a head to invent inſtruments as well as a hand to make them (f) he got much reputation by the firſt eſſays of his induſtry. The firſt work that made him known was his correcting and publiſhing the arithmetic of John Martin Siliceus, and the Margareta Philoſophica [A]. Afterwards he read private lectures in the mathematics, and then taught that ſcience publickly in the college of Maſter Gervais (g). He performed it ſo excellently well, that he was propoſed to Francis I, as the fitteſt perſon to teach the mathematics in the new college that prince had founded at Paris (h). He forgot nothing that might give credit to his profeſſion, and notwithſtanding his conſtant application to the public lectures, yet he publiſhed ſeveral books (i) upon almoſt all the parts of the mathematics. He boaſted to have found out the ſquaring of the circle [B]. What they ſay concerning this, in his elogy, will furniſh matter for a remark. I am very much miſtaken if it is not he that is mentioned in Agrippa's letters, as a man that was a long time impriſoned for having foretold ſome diſagreeable things to the court of France [C]; for at that time there were few Aſtronomers or Geometricians who did not pretend to judicial Aſtrology. The clock he invented in 1553, the deſcription of which may be ſeen in the Amſterdam journal of the twenty ninth of March 1694, is a proof his capacity in mechanics; but neither his genius, his labour, his inventions, nor the eſteem which an infinite number of perſons expreſſed for him, could ſecure him from the fate ſo common to men of letters. He was forced all his life to ſtruggle with grievous poverty [D], and, when he died, left a numerous family loaded with debts. It is true, the remembrance of his merit did for his children what it could not

(b) Launoius, Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navarr. pag. 646.

(c) Id. ibid. pag. 678.

(d) Thevet, Eloges, Tom. VII, pag. 314.

(e) Idem.

(f) Ib. pag. 315.

(g) Launoi, ubi ſupra, pag. 679.

(h) Thevet, Eloges, pag. 314, 315. Launoius, Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navarr. pag. 679.

(i) See the liſt of them in Mr Teiſſier's Addit. to Thuanus's Elogies, Tom. I, pag. 110.

[A] The firſt work that made him known was his correcting . . . . the Margareta Philoſophica.] Dr de Launoi informs me of this. ‘Et primo quidem, ſays he (1), nomen ſuum ab edendis corrigendiſque aliorum operibus illuſtre fecit. Nam anno 1519 è Navarra ſua Joannis Martini Silicei Hiſpani Arithmeticam typis commiſit, mendiſque pluribus expurgavit, & anno 1523 dum adhuc in Navarra cum Antonio Silveſtro degeret, Philoſophicam Margaretam quæ rationalis ac Moralis Philoſophiæ principia duodecim libris complectitur, recognovit & prælo mandari curavit. —— He firſt made his name famous by publiſhing and correcting the works of other men. For in the year 1519 he publiſhed, during his reſidence in the college of Navarre, the arithmetic of John Martin Siliceus, which he rendered much more correct; and in the year 1523, whilſt he ſtill lived in the college of Navarre, with Antony Sylveſter, he reviſed and publiſhed the Margareta Philoſophica, which contains the principles of rational and moral philoſophy in twelve books.

[B] He boaſted that he had found out the ſquaring of the circle.] Sammarthanus aſſures us that Orontius Finæus was in the wrong to boaſt that he had found it out, and that providence had reſerved that honour for Joſeph Scaliger: ‘Cum . . . inter cætera volumina peculiari quodam libro quadraturam illam circuli à multis fruſtra quæſitam ſe tandem aliquando reperiſſe gloriaretur. Hoc enim de ſe facile credebat homo ſummæ doctrinæ ſibi conſci[illegible] cùm tamen verum hujus admirabilis inventi gloriam uni Joſepho Scaligero faciliora numina reſervarent (2). —— He boaſted in a particular treatiſe, that he had at laſt found the method of ſquaring the circle which multitudes had ſo long in vain ſought for. This a man, conſcious of his own great learning, might eaſily believe of himſelf, tho' the true glory of this admirable invention was reſerved by the favour of heaven for Joſeph Scaliger.’ He juſtly ſays that Orontius Finæus wrongfully aſſumed to himſelf the invention of the quadrature of the circle; but he is ſtrangely miſtaken in making Scaliger the only one that diſcovered this myſtery; for this honour was ſo far from being reſerved for Scaliger alone, that it may be affirmed that great man came not ſo near to it as many others.

[C] I believe that, according to Agrippa, he was a long time impriſoned for having foretold ſome diſagreeable things to the court of France.] The words of Agrippa which I ſhall quote are taken from a letter, wherein he complains of his diſgrace, which he attributes to a ſcheme of a nativity, wherein he found that the conſtable of Bourbon would be ſtill victorious in the year 1526. The Queen-regent was incenſed againſt the Aſtrologer on this account, who thereupon ſaid his deſign was not to proſtitute his art to lies, and that he had not timely remembered the fate of a great mathematician. I ſuppoſe he means Orontius Finæus. ‘Sed & neſciebam me prædario Aſtrologum conductum, quodque mihi, quod ars illa dictat, monendi dicendique jus relictum non eſſet, occurritque extemplò Orintius Parrhiſiorum inſignis Mathematicus & Aſtrologus, qui dum veriora, quàm poterat, vaticinaverat, iniquiſſima captivitate diutinè vexatus eſt (3).’ I believe this particular is but little known.

[D] He was forced to ſtruggle all his life with grievous poverty.] He had gone through his ſtudies without receiving thoſe ſupplies from his family, which are neceſſary to ſtudents: his father was dead, and his relations neglected him (4). It may be eaſily imagined what ſtraits he was in. Thevet (5) aſſures us that Orontius Finæus ‘had ſo well freed himſelf from covetouſneſs, that by philoſophizing he ſatisfied his mind, but he did not fill his purſe. I cannot ſay this was his fault, for he often complained to ſeveral lords of the great neceſſities, he was under, which they took ſo little notice of, that honeſt Oronce's eſtate at his death was only a great load of debts, which, to his ſorrow, he left his dear ſpouſe Deniſe Blanche incumbered with, and five ſons and a daughter to provide for. Some orators, philoſophers, and learned men, have been highly valued, whereof ſome were rich, others threw their riches into the ſea, as if they had been only a hindrance to philoſophy. The learned Finé was among none of theſe (6), unleſs it were partaking with the laſt in this, that, after they had thrown away their eſtates, they found themſelves poor, with reſpect to wealth.’ Let us add to this what the ſame Thevet obſerves in the elogy of Peter Danes. ‘I cannot forbear ſaying that I complain of the ingratitude and unthankfulneſs of many cardinals, abbots, and other prelates, who have ſeen, heard, and been informed, of the miſery of ſeveral poor, but virtuous and learned men, ſuch as were Iodelle, Orontius Finæus, Poſtel, Regius, Belle Foreſt, and a great many more, who after their death left not enough to bury them; and yet they would not vouchſafe to open their bowels of compaſſion to offer them one farthing (7).’

(1) Laun. Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navarr. pag. 678, 679.

(2) Sammarth. Elog. lib. i, pag. m. 28.

(3) Agrippa, Epiſt. lxii, lib. iv, pag. 881. The letter is dated from Lyons the third of November, 1526.

(4) I take no notice of the honours he received from his anceſtors, but of what he acquired himſelf, without any help, or aſſiſtance, from his relations, which the good man complains of ſomewhere in his works. Thevet, Eloges, Tom. VII, pag. 314.

(5) Ib. pag. 319.

(6) This is the third time that Thevet confutes in this paſſage what he had ſaid, that Orontius had wonderfully freed himſelf from covetouſneſs. A man does not free himſelf from it by being poor when he cannot help it.

(7) Thevet. Tom. VIII, pag. 22.

not do for himſelf. Some generous Mecænas's were found, who, for his ſake, relieved his indigent family [E]. I ſhall cite an author who charges him with being a plagiary [F]. According to Moreri he died the ſixth of October 1555. The abbot de Brianville, who invented the heraldry cards, and was the author of certain books for the uſe of the dauphin of France in the reign of Lewis XIV, was of the ſame country and family with Orontius Finæus (k).

(k) Allard, Bibl. de Dauphiné, pag. 106.

[E] Mecænas's were found, who . . . . relieved his indigent family.] Let us ſtill hear Thevet. ‘ He had ‘ a great many children, who, tho' without father or ‘ eſtate, yet were not deſtitute of all aſſiſtance; for after his death, ſeveral good lords extended their charity to maintain and protect the children of a man ‘ they had ſo much valued during his life. Two of ‘ them not only followed the ſtudy of the mathematics, but alſo one of them divinity, and the other the ‘ civil-law, and were graduates in their reſpective ‘ faculties (8).’ Thevet in page 312 ſpeaks of Maſter John Finæus, doctor of divinity, the ſon of Orontius: ‘ I have been aſſiſted, ſays he, with ſome memoirs by ‘ his ſon Maſter John Finæus, doctor of divinity, who, ‘ having been informed that I was writing an abridgment of the lives of illuſtrious men, earneſtly deſired ‘ that his father ſhould be put among them.’ In another place he ſays: ‘ Although his ſons have compoſed ‘ excellents epitaphs, I durſt not inſert them here, ‘ fearing, however exact and true they may be, they ‘ ſhould be leſſened by this conſideration, that they ‘ are not ſufficient evidences of their father's merit ‘ (9).’ Dr de Launoi informs me (10) that this John Finæus ſtudied in the college of Navarre, that he taught philoſophy ſome years in the college of Harcour, that he was made doctor of divinity in 1565, that he was afterwards canon of Meaux, and in the year 1608 was dean of the faculty of divinity.

(8) Idem, Tom. VII, pag. 320.

(9) Id. pag. 321.

(10) Laun. Hiſt. Gymnaſ. Navarr. pag. 679.

[E] I ſhall cite an author that charges him with being a plagiary.] John Baptiſta Benedictus in the preface of his book of dialling declares, that he has touched upon nothing which others had well explained, and that he has confined himſelf to that, that he might not appropriate to himſelf the labours of another, or hinder any body from reading other books. He adds, that all authors are not ſo ſcrupulous, and names Munſter and Finæus. ‘ Quis enim Sebaſtiani Munſteri, & ‘ Orontii Phinei horologiographias legit qui non animadverterit quam multa præter neceſſitatem de verbo ‘ ad verbum in poſterioris opere ſint tranſlata quæ ‘ poterant majori cum utriuſque laude apud priorem ‘ videnda relinqui, aut potius ab utroque prætermitti, ‘ cum alter alterius imprudens calcaverit veſtigia, & ‘ quandoque eodem errore ambo ducti cœcutientes in ‘ eandem foveam ſeſe præcipites egerint, ut factum eſt ‘ præcipue ubi agunt de deſcriptione horarii ſuper globo aut ſphærica ſuperficie convexa (11). —— For ‘ who that has read Sebaſtian Munſter's, and Orontius ‘ Finæus's treatiſes of Dialling, has not obſerved what ‘ a multitude of things there are unneceſſarily inſerted ‘ word for word in the works of the latter, which ‘ might with more honour to both have continued in the ‘ former, or rather might have been omitted by both; ‘ whilſt the one imprudently followed the ſteps of the ‘ other, and both, miſled by the ſame error, blindly fell ‘ down the ſame precipice; and more partitularly where ‘ they treat of projecting a dial upon a globe, or convex ‘ ſpherical ſuperficies.’ Here are two things to be conſidered: one is a matter of fact, viz. that Finæus's book contains word for word ſeveral of Munſter's obſervations, the other is the reaſoning of Benedictus. He ſuppoſes that if Finæus had not ſtolen them from Munſter, the honour of both of them had been greater. He is right in ſome reſpects; but in others his reaſoning is falſe, and upon the whole he ought to have explained himſelf better. He ſuppoſes afterwards that one of them copied the other without knowing it. Therefore he ſhould have ſaid that Munſter was a plagiary of the ſame authors who were afterwards pillaged by Finæus: and he ought to have told us who thoſe authors were.

(11) Joannes Baptiſta Benedictus, Patricius Venetus, in Præfatione Libri de Gnomonum Umbratumque ſolatium Uſu. This book was printed at Turin, 1574, in folio.

FLACIUS (MATTHIAS). Look for ILLYRICUS.

FLAMINIUS (MARC ANTHONY) was one of the beſt Latin poets of the XVIth century, and alſo a good humaniſt. He was born at Imola in Italy, the ſon and grandſon of learned men (a). See the account of him in Mr Teiſſier (b), and more at large in Moreri. I ſhall only obſerve one thing which they have omitted. The Pope choſe him for ſecretary to the council in 1545 (c); but Flaminius refuſed that great office, becauſe, finding himſelf imbued with the new opinions, he would not employ his pen in the ſervice of an aſſembly that would anathematize them. This is cardinal Palavicini's conjecture. That cardinal, ſpeaking of the honour the Pope deſigned for Flaminius, has not forgot to criticiſe Fra-Paolo [A]. He adds, that after that, Flaminius had the happineſs to acknowledge his errors by his acquaintance with cardinal Pole, and to write and die a good Catholic. Thuanus was not ignorant, that in ſome points Flaminius inclined to the party of the reformers. But among other articles he excepts that of the Lord's-Supper, and I do not find that Simler contradicts him in this reſpect [B]. Longolius has ſpoken very honourably

(a) See the remark [C].

(b) Elogies, taken from Thuanus, Vol. I, pag. 36, & ſeq.

(c) See the remark [A].

[A] Cardinal Palavicini . . . . ſpeaking of Flaminius, has not forgot to criticize Fra-Paolo.] He charges him (1) with falſely giving out that the Pope let his legates know, that it was not neceſſary to diſpatch letters in the name of the council, and that thoſe which he ſhould write himſelf, or which the legates ſhould write in their own names, would be ſufficient. To prove that this is falſe, cardinal Palavicini obſerves that the Pope preſcribed diſtinctly to the legates the form of ſigning, and directing the letters that ſhould be writ in the name of the council. He adds, that it belonged to the ſecretary of the council, to draw up thoſe letters, and the decrees of the council, and that the Pope deſigned Marc Antony Flaminius for that employment (2). ‘ Adunque il papa fè proporre al concilio per Segretario Marcantonio Flaminio, chiarò ‘ frà gli Scrittori Latini di quell' età, come dimoſtrano ‘ i ſuoi verſi. Ma egli ſeuſoſſi dal peſo, forſe perche ‘ gia covava (3) nella mente l'affezione à quelle dottrine in condannazion delle quali gli ſarebbe convenuto d'eſercitar quivi la penna; auvenga che * in ‘ fine de gli anni ſuoi la ſalutevol converſazione del ‘ cardinal Polo in Viterbo lo faceſſe rauvedere, e ſcriver' e morir cattolicamente.’ But what makes moſt againſt father Paul, in this chapter of the cardinal, is, that the fathers of the council complaining that the Pope choſe himſelf the officers of the aſſembly, he gave them full liberty to chuſe their own ſecretary: upon which they made choice of Angelo Maſſarelli proviſionally (4), and afterwards abſolutely (5).

(1) Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, lib. vi, cap. i, n. 4.

(2) Ibid. n. 5.

(3) This expreſſion ſeems to me to be falſe; for Flaminius rather declined than advanced in Lutheraniſm, from 1545, to his death, in 1551.

* Sta nella vita del Polo ſcritta dal Beccatello.

[B] I do not find that Simler contradicts him in this reſpect.] In the manner that Thuanus ſpeaks of Flaminius, he makes him rather a Janſeniſt, than a Proteſtant. He ſays that, among thoſe in Italy who thought a reformation was neceſſary, there aroſe private diſputes concerning faith, good works, grace, free-will, election, vocation, and glorification; and that the greateſt part of them formed a judgment of theſe matters very different from the then received opinion, and fortified themſelves with the authority of St Auguſtin. For this reaſon, adds Thuanus, Auguſtin Fregoſa Soſteneo printed at Venice in 1545 ſome ſmall pieces

(4) That is to ſay, 'till Priuli, choſen perpetual ſecretary, ſhould take poſſeſſion of that office; but he refuſed it.

(5) Palavicini's Hiſtory of the Council of Trent, lib. vi, cap. i, n. 6.

nourably of Flaminius [C]. The piety of the latter did not hinder him, though a clergyman, from making a great number of amorous and paſſionate Verſes (d).

The ill ſtate of his health obliged him to ſuch a regular way of living that he refuſed to ſup with Corradus, out of fear that others alſo were invited (e).

pieces taken from the works of that father. Flaminius embraced this opinion, and as to other things he did not follow the doctrines that were diſperſed in Germany: he plainly declares in a letter, that with reſpect to the euchariſt, his opinion was the ſame with that of the church, and he did not leave his country as ſome others did, with whom he had lived in a ſtrict friendſhip, on account of religion. Galeazzo Carraccioli marquis of Vico was one of this number (6). Mr Teiſſier contradicts this narrative. ‘ If we believe Joſiah Simler, ſays he (7), Thuanus was miſtaken when he wrote that Flaminius did not approve of the doctrine which Luther taught in Germany; for Simler (8) places Flaminius among thoſe who, having embraced the Proteſtant religion, forced Peter Martyr Vermilio, who was afterwards miniſter at Zurich, to follow their example, and renounce the communion of the church of Rome.’ I have run over Peter Martyr's life in Melchior Adam's volume (9), and I find nothing in it concerning Flaminius; but that Peter Martyr, being ſuperior of a monaſtery at Naples, came to the knowledge of the truth by reading certain books, and conferring often upon religious points with perſons of piety and zeal for the true religion. Martyr chiefly conferred with Marc Anthony Flaminius upon theſe things. I ſee nothing in all this contrary to Thuanus's account, and at moſt Simler would be more to blame than that great hiſtorian, ſince the letter of Flaminius is authentic, and his abode and death in Italy are inconteſtable matters of fact. I have ſaid it a thouſand times: a man might diſcover a thouſand abuſes and diſorders in the Romiſh communion, and many excellent truths in Luther's books, without thinking himſelf neceſſarily obliged to take a journey into Germany, and without pretending that the Romiſh church was wrong in all that the Lutherans found fault with (10). Mr Teiſſier oppoſes to Thuanus, Flaminius's epigram upon the death of Savanarola: but that proves nothing; an infinite number of Dominicans who were good Papiſts would not ſcruple publickly to put their names to that epigram. The letter inſerted in the life of Galeazzo Caraccioli ſhews a great deal of piety, but there is nothing in it particularly declaring the profeſſion or approbation of Lutheraniſm.

[C] Longolius has ſpoken very honourably of Flaminius.] Mr Teiſſier has quoted the following words of Longolius (11): ‘ Know that for many ages none has equalled Flaminius for parts, learning, virtue, and probity. Truly I am uſed to ſay, ſpeaking of him, that at this day I know no body that has more merit, or who is more unhappy than he.’ In other places (12) Longolius expreſſes a very particular eſteem and friendſhip for Flaminius. Here is a paſſage which has ſome relation to that of Mr Teiſſier. ‘ Ego nihil ad Flaminium ſcripſi, quod neque ſcirem ut cum ipſo ageretur, neque certi quicquam haberem, ad quod literas meas accommodarem. Quin ingenio, induſtria, virtute æquales ſuos omneis longe ſuperarit, plane non dubito: ne fortuna tantæ indoli maligne reſponderit, etiam atque etiam timeo. Sed tamen velim ut animo maximo ſit, optetque ſemper ſecunda, cogitet adverſa, ferat qualiacunque acciderint, neque ſibi præſtandum quicquam præter culpam exiſtimet: à qua ſane tam longe abeſt quam ab ea ætate quæ vel culpam adhuc præſtare debeat (13). ——— I have never wrote to Flaminius, as being a ſtranger to his circumſtances, and having no particular occurrence on which I might communicate my ſentiments. But I queſtion not his having far ſurpaſſed all his equals in genius, application and virtue, and am much afraid that fortune has but ill rewarded ſuch ſuperior qualifications. I wiſh however that he would keep up a greatneſs of ſoul, and ſtill hope for happier days, and bear with reſolution whatever may happen, and not to think he is to anſwer for more than his faults: from which he is as free, as he is remote from that age which ought to be anſwerable for them.’ Flaminius was yet but a young ſtudent, and conſequently could not be ſaid to be the moſt unhappy of all men. A man ought to have tried every thing, and ſtill have had an ill fate, before this could be properly ſaid of him. However this paſſage diſcovers the unlucky circumſtances of Flaminius, a young man under ſuch hardſhips, that his friends were forced to contribute to his relief, and endeavoured by letters of recommendation to procure him cloaths. ‘ De Flaminio quod benigne polliceris, reſpondes illi omnino, quam de prolixa iſta tua atque benefica in ſtudioſos omnes natura ſemper habui, opinioni: ſed nihil eo quod oſtendis etiam nunc eſt opus. Inita eſt enim à nobis ratio, quemadmodum hic adoleſcentem tueamur. In veſtiario tantum laboramus: in quo ſi adjutus à te fuerit, ocium ejus liberalitate tua conſtitutum eſſe judicabo (14). —— The generous promiſes which you made concerning Flaminius, you perfectly anſwer from that open beneficent nature, with which I have obſerved you conſtantly treat all lovers of learning. But there is now no occaſion for what you propoſe, we have contrived a method to maintain the young man amongſt us. We want only to equip him with cloaths, wherein if he ſhould meet with aſſiſtance from you, he will by your liberality be made eaſy.’ By a certain letter he wrote, he made himſelf an enemy, who, ſpeaking to Longolius, reviled him extremely, and in the ſame converſation affirmed, that as Flaminius was the ſon and grandſon of a pedant, and a pedant himſelf, he could find in him neither virtue or wit. ‘ Erras, inquit, Longoli, erras, ſi quod te vel ingenii vel virtutis lumen in eo perſpèxiſſe putas qui & ipſe pædagogus ſit, & pædagogo patre avoque natus (15). ——— You are miſtaken, Longolius, you are ſtrangely miſtaken, if you imagine to have diſcovered in him either abilities or virtue; he is a pedant himſelf, and ſuch were both his father and grandfather.’ As to the father of our Flaminius, he is not unknown to me: his name was JOHN ANTHONY FLAMINIUS. He taught polite literature at Bologna for many years (16), and died there in the year 1536, after having publiſhed ſome books (17). Moreri has ſpoken of him. As to his grandfather, I do not know him, and perhaps he is the ſame with one SEBASTIAN FLAMINIUS, a native of Imola (18), author of the life of Ambroſe of Sienna, a beatified Jacobine.

FLAMMINIUS (ANTHONY) a learned profeſſor of polite literature in the college of Rome about the beinning of the XVIth century, was a Sicilian by birth. He was ſo fond of ſolitude, that he took no pleaſure in converſing either with the learned or unlearned. He never invited any body to eat with him, nor would accept of any invitation from others. He had neither man nor maid ſervant. He uſed to buy every day his proviſions at an inn in the neighbourhood; but the landlord, obſerving that for three days paſt he had not come for any thing, nor had ſhewed himſelf as uſual, entered his chamber through the garden window, and found him dead among his books. He ſtudied, lying along upon the ground (a) [A].

[A] He ſtudied lying along upon the ground.] This was not the leaſt ſign of his fantaſtical temper. ‘ Is inopinata præventus morte à caupone viciniæ qui quotidiana edulia homini venditabat, contentionem admirante quod jam triduum non apparuiſſet, & per hortuli feneſtellam quandam ingreſſo inter libros quos ſtratos, ſtratus & ipſe lectitare conſuerat, ſempiterno oppreſſus ſomno repertus eſt (1).’ He had taught a long time in Rome with profound learning. ‘ Cujus prælectionibus Roma longa annorum ſerie nihil habuit eruditius (2).

(d) Menage, Anti-Baillet, Tom. II, pag. 337.

(e) Sebaſt. Corradus in Brutum Ciceronis, pag. 43

(6) Cui ſententiæ accedebat Flaminius, cum in ceteris fidei capitibus doctrinæ per Germaniam tunc diſſeminatæ minime adſtipularetur. Nam & luculentum ipſius exſtat inter vulgareis clarorum virorum epiſtolas de ſacroſancto Euchariſtiæ myſterio ex eccleſiæ ſenſu ſcriptis mandatum teſtimonium, itaque cum aliis, quibuſcum religionis cauſa amicitiam coluerat, atque in primis Galeacius Caraciolus Vici Marchio patriam reliquiſſent, &c. Thuan. lib ix, pag. m. 177.

(7) Elogies taken from Thuanus, Tom. I, pag. 39.

(8) In vita P. Martyr.

(9) He makes uſe of that compoſed by Simler.

(10) See among other places the remark [Q] of the article CASTELLAN.

(11) He cites Longolius, Epiſt. lib. iii. See his Additions, Tom. II, pag. 395.

(12) See lib. ii, folio 190, and lib. iii, folio 240.

(13) Ibid. lib. ii, folio 183.

(14) Ibid. lib. iv, folio 271.

(15) Ibid. lib. ii, fol. 202, verſo.

(16) Leandr. Albert. Deſcript. Italiæ, pag. m. 493.

(17) See Voſſius de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 682.

(18) Id. ibid. pag. 678.

(a) Taken from Pierius Valerianus, de Litteratorum Infelicitate, lib. i, pag. m. 23.

(1) Pierius Valerianus, ubi ſupra.

(2) Id. ibid.

FLAVIGNY (Valerian de) doctor of divinity of the houſe and ſociety of the Sorbonne, counſellor and king's profeſſor of the Hebrew tongue in the univerſity of Paris, and dean of the king's profeſſors in the royal college of France (a). Add to what has been ſaid of him in Moreri, and elſewhere (b), that he had a great diſpute with ſome divines of the faculty of Paris, for having proved the Theſis which Lewis de Cleves, bachelor in divinity, had maintained concerning epiſcopacy in his public act, the fourth of November 1667. Complaint was made of two propoſitions in this Theſis [A], and they hindered that bachelor, 'who had gone through his licentiate's de'gree, who had been preſented to the chancellor of the church and univerſity of Paris by 'the faculty of divinity, who had been harangued and aſſigned, by the ſaid chancellor,
'to the place, rank, and apoſtolical benediction of the degrees, the third of February
'laſt, as well as others of the ſame degree, from receiving the ſaid benediction, which 'is a reward for ſtudy, and a proof of capacity (c).' Flavigny adviſed him, meerly for the ſake of peace, and to avoid the ſcandal which might ariſe from ſuch a diſſention, to ſign the declaration and explication of the ſaid two propoſitions which were required of him [B]. And he compiled a long apology, which was printed at Tournay in 1668, under the title of Ad Theſim Cleveſianam ubi de Epiſcopatu expectatæ Vindiciæ. It is a quarto of 128 pages, wherein he cites an infinite number of authors who have advanced the ſame doctrine with Lewis de Cleves, viz. that epiſcopacy, as diſtinct from the prieſthood, is no ſacrament. Some letters were prefixed to this apology, in one of which it is ſaid, that Valerian de Flavigny, Preſbyter Laudunenſis, had been reader of the Sorbonne for forty years.

[A] Complaint was made of two propoſitions in that theſis.] The firſt propoſition was, 'Presbyteratum
'veſtiri ratione ſacramenti certum: Epiſcopatum ea
'decorari quicunque negat, probabiliorem tenet ſen-
'tentiam. II. Ad Epiſcopatum præviuſne Preſ-
'byteratus? Aliquando negatum videtur. —— I. That 'prieſthood is a ſacrament, is certain; that epiſcopacy is 'not, is probable. II. Whether prieſthood be previous
'to epiſcopacy? It appears to have been ſometimes
'denied.'

[B] Flavigny adviſed de Cleves to ſign the declaration, and explanation . . . . . they required of him.] This clauſe is added to the act from whence I take theſe words, 'reſerving to himſelf the liberty to ſay,
'and cauſe to be regiſtered in the office of the ſaid
'faculty in the aſſembly of the firſt of March follow'ing,' that the ſaid explanation ſhould be no prejudice to the probability or ſeeming truth of the doctrine contained in them; as alſo to remonſtrate, &c. The declaration they extorted from that bachelor was this:
'Non intendo negare abſolutè epiſcopatum eſſe ſa-
'cramentum; imò agnoſco in collatione epiſcopatus
'dari gratiam ſanctificantem. Ad ſecundam propoſitio-
'nem. Cum dixi, Aliquandò negatum videri presby-
'teratum prævium eſſe debere ad epiſcopatum, non in-
'tendi, epiſcopatum conferri poſſe per ſaltum; imo exi-
'ſtimo non poſſe epiſcopum conſecrari, niſi ſit presbyter.
'—— I do not intend to deny abſolutely that epiſcopacy
'is a ſacrament, nay, I acknowledge that a ſanctifying
'grace is conveyed to the perſon inaugurated. As to
'the ſecond propoſition. When I ſaid, that it appears 'to have been denied that prieſthood ought to be
'previous to epiſcopacy, I did not mean, that epiſco-
'pacy could be conferred all at once; nay I think
'that no biſhop can be conſecrated unleſs he be a
'prieſt.'

FLORA, if we believe Lactantius, was a courtezan [A], who, having got large ſums of money by proſtituting herſelf, made the Roman people her heirs, and ordered that the income of a certain fund, which ſhe ſpecified, ſhould be employed in celebrating her birth-day. She would have that day remarkable by the games that were to be exhibited to the people, and were to be named Floral. They were celebrated in a very ſcandalous manner [B], and were in ſome ſort the courtezans feaſt

[A] If we believe Lactantius, ſhe was a courtezan.] Reproaching the Pagans with the enormous abuſes of their deification, he ſays: 'Jam quanta iſta immor-
'talitas putanda ſit, quam etiam meretrices aſſequan-
'tur? Flora (cum magnas opes ex arte meretricia
'quæſiviſſet) populum ſcripſit hæredem, certamque
'pecuniam reliquit, cujus ex annuo fœnore ſuus nata-
'lis dies celebraretur editione ludorum, quos appellant
'Floralia (1). —— How great then muſt that immor-
'tality be imagined, which the leudeſt women have ob- 'tained? Flora, having raiſed an immenſe fortune by 'her leud arts, left the people her heir, and ſet apart
'a certain ſum, out of the yearly produce of which her
'birth-day might be ſolemnized with public games,
'which they call Floralia.' Neither Arnobius (2), nor St Auguſtin (3), ſay any thing like this of Flora, though they reproach the heathens with the impurities of the Floral games: but ſhe is treated as a courtezan in the dialogue of Minutius Felix (4). No doubt St Auguſtin was ſenſible this ſtory of Lactantius was without foundation. I have read in the ſcholiaſt upon Juvenal (5), that the Floral games were inſtituted in honour of the goddeſs Flora, by Flora the courtezan. This makes nothing for Lactantius. We ſhall ſee in the following article, that there was a famous proſtitute named Flora; but it is not true that ſhe was the founder of thoſe games. The ſcholiaſt upon Juvenal is miſtaken, and at moſt he does not ſay, as Lactantius, that Flora the courtezan founded the Floral games for herſelf.

[B] The Floral games . . . . were celebrated in a very ſcandalous manner.] Here Lactantius is in the right.
'Celebrantur ergo illi ludi cum omni laſcivia conve-
'nientes memoriæ meretricis. Nam præter verborum
'licentiam, quibus obſcœnitas omnis effunditur, exu-
'untur etiam veſtibus populo flagitante Meretrices,
'quæ tunc mimorum funguntur officio, & in conſpe-
'ctu populi uſque ad ſatietatem impudicorum lumi-
'num cum pudendis motibus detinentur (6). ——
'Theſe games are therefore celebrated with all the 'leudneſs imaginable, and in a manner that perfectly an-
'ſwers the memory of a proſtitute. For beſides the extra- 'vagant licence whereby obſcene talking is encouraged,
'the courtezans, at the inſtance of the people, are
'ſtripped naked, and play their monkey gambols in the
'ſight of the people, 'till the eyes of the moſt abandoned
'ſpectators are tired with their abominable behaviour.'
St Auguſtin thunders, as he ought to do, in divers places, againſt this impudence. I ſhall only relate the following paſſage (7): 'Horum planè florum non 'terra fertilis, non aliqua opulens virtus; ſed illa dea
'Flora digna mater inventa eſt, cujus ludi ſcenici tam
'effuſiore & licentiore turpitudine celebrantur, ut qui-
'vis intelligat, quale dæmonium ſit, quod placari ali-
'ter non poteſt; niſi illic, non aves, non quadrupe-
'des, non denique ſanguis humanus; ſed multo ſcele-
'ſtius pudor humanus tanquam immolatus intereat.
'—— Of theſe flowers neither is the earth produ-
'ctive, nor any fertile virtue; but Flora, the goddeſs
'Flora, muſt be made the worthy parent of them, whoſe
'games

(a) Theſe are his titles in an inſtrument by a Public Notary, ſigned by him the thirteenth of Auguſt, 1668, and which is printed before the Vindiciæ ad Theſim Cleveſianam.

(b) In the remark [F] of the article ECCHELLENSIS.

(c) See the ſame act.

(1) Lactant. Divin. Inſtit. lib. i, cap. xx, pag. m. 60.

(20) Arnob. lib. iii, pag. m. 113, & lib. vii, pag. 238.

(3) Auguſt. de Civitate Dei, lib. ii, cap. xxvii, & alibi paſſim. See Coquæus's notes in hunc locum.

(4) Pag. m. 233, 234.

(5) In Sat. vi, ver. 249.

(6) Lactant. Div. Inſtitut. lib. i, cap. xx, pag m. 60.

(7) Auguſt Epiſt. ccii, pag. m. 865.

feaſt [C]. Lactantius adds, that the ſenate found a way to hide from the public the original of ſo infamous an inſtitution [D]; but, taking the advantage of the courtezan's name, they made them believe that Flora was the goddeſs preſiding over flowers; and that, in order to have a good harveſt, it was neceſſary to honour that goddeſs every year, and render her propitious to them. It may be queſtioned whether Lactantius affirmed that upon good authority; for ſince the worſhip of Flora was inſtituted in Rome by Tatius, king of the Sabins (a), and colleague with Romulus, that goddeſs muſt have been worſhipped by the Sabins before the building of Rome: therefore it was not a courtezan who had choſen the Roman people for her heirs. They did not begin to celebrate the Floral games till the year of Rome 513 [E]. The way of paying the charges of them is a new proof againſt Lactantius

(a) Varro affirms this, lib. iv, de Lingua Latina. See Voſſius, de Orig. Idolol. lib. i, cap. xii, pag. m. 93.

' games are celebrated with ſuch profligate licence and ' obſcenity, that any one may underſtand, what dæmon ' it is that cannot be otherwiſe appeaſed. There no ' birds, no beaſts, nor even human blood, but human ' modeſty is butchered, and moſt impiouſly ſacrificed.' Pagan authors do not deny that naked women appeared before all the people at the Floral games, and they ſay that once Cato aſſiſting at thoſe games, and perceiving that his preſence hindered the people from demanding thoſe naked ſpectacles as uſual, retired that he might not interrupt the feaſt: the people, at the ſight of this condeſcenſion, followed him with repeated acclamations, and afterwards they did according to cuſtom. ' Eodem (Marco Catone) Ludos Florales, quos Meſſius ' ædilis faciebat, ſpectante, populus, ut Mimæ nudarentur, poſtulare erubuit: quod cum ex Favonio, ' amiciſſimo ſibi, una ſedente, cognoviſſet, diſceſſit è ' theatro, ne præſentia ſua ſpectaculi conſuetudinem ' impediret. Quem abeuntem ingenti plauſu populus ' proſecutus, priſcum morem jocorum in ſcenam revocavit; confeſſus, plus ſe majeſtatis uni tribuere, ' quàm univerſo ſibi vindicare (8). ——— The ſame ' Cato, being preſent at the Floral games, which Meſſius the edile exhibited, the people had ſo much modeſty as not to require that the courtezans ſhould be ſtripped: which when he underſtood from Favonius, his intimate friend who ſat by him, he left the theatre, leſt ' his preſence might be a hindrance to the uſual ſpectacle. ' The people followed him with loud acclamations, and ' then proceeded according to cuſtom, declaring they had ' a greater regard for the majeſty of that one man, than ' for that of the whole aſſembly.' Martial juſtly laughs at this behaviour of Cato. Why did he go to thoſe games, ſince he knew what was practiſed there? Did he go there only to go out again? This is what the poet reproaches him with. But he forgot the moſt material part, which is, that Cato ought not to have withdrawn, ſince he obſerved that his preſence was ſo neceſſary to correct an ill cuſtom.

Noſſes jocoſæ dulce cum ſacrum Floræ
Feſtoſque luſus & licentiam vulgi,
Cur in theatrum Cato ſevere veniſti?
An ideo tantum veneras ut exires (9)?

Why cam'ſt thou, Cato, 'midſt that gameſome crowd,
No ſtranger to the revels there allow'd?
Thou knew'ſt 'twas Flora's feaſt; why cam'ſt thou then?
Was it for this — ſay — to go out again?

Juvenal in a few words gives a frightful idea of the leudneſs of the Floral games,

- - - - - digniſſima prorſus
Florali matrona tuba (10).

For Flora's ſcenes a dame exactly form'd.

[C] They were . . . the courtezans feaſt.] Though this is clear enough from the paſſages I have cited in the preceding remark, yet I ſhall add the following verſes out of Ovid:

Turba quidem cur hos celebrent meretricia ludos,
  Non ex difficili cauſſa petenda ſubeſt.
Non eſt de tetricis, non eſt de magna profeſſis,
  Vult ſua plebeio ſacra patere choro.
Et monet ætatis ſpecie, dum floreat, uti,
  Contemni ſpinam cum cecidere roſæ (11).

But why ſhould Flora chuſe that motley train
Her ſacred ſcenes to tread? the reaſon's plain.
No ſtiffneſs ſhe, no rigid rules admires,
But calls her vot'ries to plebeian choirs.
Their charms ſhe bids them uſe, e'er they decay:
The roſe once fall'n, the ſtalk is caſt away.

Fine morality this! The goddeſs Flora would have courtezans celebrate her feſtival, becauſe it is fit to let women know they are to make the moſt of their beauty while it is in the bloom; for if they ſuffer their prime to ſlip away, they will be deſpiſed like a roſe which has nothing left but it's thorns: but how abominable ſoever this morality is, it is publickly taught among chriſtians in aſſemblies that are honoured with the protection of the ſupream power (12).

[D] The ſenate found a way to hide from the public the knowledge of ſo infamous an inſtitution.] I ſhall cite Lactantius's words (13): ' Quod quia Senatui flagitioſum videbatur, ab ipſo nomine argumentum ſumi placuit, ut pudendæ rei quædam dignitas adderetur. Deam finxerunt eſſe, quæ floribus præſit, eamque oportere placari, ut fruges cum arboribus, aut vitibus benè, proſpereque floreſcerent. Eum colorem ' ſecutus in Faſtis poëta non ignobilem Nympham fuiſſe narravit, quæ ſit Chloris vocitata, eamque Zephyro ' nuptam quaſi dotis loco id accepiſſe muneris à marito, ut haberet omnium florum poteſtatem. —— And ' becauſe it ſeemed ſhameful to the ſenate, to give an ' appearance of dignity to that infamous practice, they ' took advantage of the name, and pretended ſhe was ' goddeſs of flowers, that ſhe ought to be appeaſed, that ' the fruits, trees, and vines, might flouriſh and proſper. The poet, following this fiction in his Faſti, ſays ' ſhe was a celebrated nymph, named Chloris, who married Zephyrus, by whom ſhe was preſented with a ' ſovereign power over all flowers.'

[E] They did not begin to celebrate the Floral games till the year of Rome 513.] This is Voſſius's opinion (14): Pliny, corrected by father Hardouin, confirms the ſame. Before that Jeſuit's edition, we read in Pliny, ' Floralia quarto Kalendas ejuſdem (Maii) inſtituerunt ' urbis anno DXVI. ex oraculis Sibyllæ, ut omnia bene defloreſcerent (15). —— The Floral games were ' inſtituted by direction of the Sibylline oracles, the ' twenty eighth of April in the year of Rome 516, that ' all things might flouriſh and proſper.' But father Hardouin, either by the help of manuſcripts, or for chronological reaſons, hath reſtored in this paſſage the year 514 (16). The following place in Velleius Paterculus was very ſerviceable to him: ' Proximo ' anno Torquato Sempronioque Coſſ. Brundiſium (colonis occupatum) & poſt triennium Spoletium: quo ' anno Floralium ludorum factum eſt initium (17). ' —— The next year, Torquatus and Sempronius being ' conſuls, a colony was ſent to Brundiſium; and three ' years after another to Spoletium, in which year the Floral games were inſtituted.' According to Titus Livius and Pliny's chronology, the conſulſhip of Torquatus and Sempronius falls out in the year of Rome 510. ' Incidit prior ille conſulatus in annum Urbis DX. ex ' Liviana Plinianaque Chronologia, quo fit ut triennio ' interjecto Floralium celebritas ludorum incurrat in ' annum DXIV (18). ——— The firſt conſulate was ' in the year of the city 510, as appears from the chronology of Livy and Pliny; whence it follows, that the ' inſtitution of the Floral games, which happened three ' years after, falls upon the year 514.' Since therefore the Floral games began three years after, the beginning of them muſt be placed in the year 513. Father Hardouin chuſes rather to put it to the year 514, becauſe no doubt he imagines there were three whole years from the end of that conſulſhip to the founding of the colony of Spoletium. According to this account, it would be true that the Floral games began the

---

(8) Val. Maxim. lib. ii, cap. x, n. 8. Senec. Epiſt. xlvii, mentions the ſame thing. Catonem illum quo ſedente negatur populus permiſiſſe ſibi poſtulare florales jocos nudandarum meretricum.

(9) Mart. Epigr. iii, lib. i.

(16) Juven. Sat. vi, ver. 249.

(11) Ovid. Faſtor. lib. v, ver. 349.

(12) Comedies and Operas are full of ſuch doctrine.

(13) Lactant. Divin. Inſtitut. lib. i. cap. xx, pag. 60.

(14) Voſſius, de Orig. Idolol. lib. i, cap. xii, pag. 93.

(15) Plin. lib. xviii, cap. xxix, pag. m. 527.

(16) Prius DXVI permutatis annorum numeris legebatur: nos tum ex veſtigiis veterum codicum, tum ex indubitata temporum ratione locum eum ſanavimus. Harduin. in Emendat. lib. xviii. Plin. n. 40.

(17) Paterc. lib. i, cap. xiv.

(18) Harduinus, in Emendat. Lib. xviii Plinii, n. 40.

…lo as a Heathen might think it a
…y in him to attend the Ceremony
…d when he found the People
…d so great a respect to his modesty, it was likewise a
…y incumbent on him not …prevent the whole of the ceremony from being perform'd
…his presence [illegible] when
…[illegible] not think it
…him to break
…of his Modesty, &c.
…fore I must beg Martial's
…on I do not see so much
…[illegible]
…laugh [illegible]
…[illegible] be said on
…of Cato.

Lactantius [F]. From that time to the year 580 they were not annually celebrated, but only in caſe the intemperature of the ſeaſons required it, or the books of the Sybils appointed it (b). This is another proof againſt Lactantius. At laſt, in the year of Rome 580, it was found proper to make an edict, ordering that thoſe games ſhould be annually celebrated [G.] This decree was cauſed by the irregularity of the ſpring, which had often produced pernicious effects. Voſſius's reflection upon Lactantius's objection is not reliſhed by every body [H]. He did not underſtand a paſſage of this father [I]. Moreri's miſtakes may be ſeen below, [K].

the fourth year after that conſulſhip, that is to ſay, in the year 514. In my opinion, it is more natural to ſay that a thing, which happened three years after the year 510, fell out in the year 513. Note, that according to Pliny the Floral games began by order of the Sybil. Therefore it was not in execution of a courtezan's laſt will. Father Hardouin ſaw medals of the Servilian family with this inſcription, FLORA. PRIMUS, that is, according to him, Floralia primus edidit (19): from whence he concludes, that the firſt that exhibited thoſe games was one of that family. But if the leaſt credit is given to Ovid (20), it is certain the firſt that celebrated them were two ediles of the Publician family. This is confirmed by the medals (21), and Tacitus gives no little weight to the ſame, when he ſays that Lucius and Marcus Publicius cauſed the temple of Flora to be built in their edileſhip (22).

[F] The way they paid the charges of them is a new proof againſt Lactantius.] They fined thoſe who had appropriated to their own uſe any lands belonging to the common-wealth, and out of thoſe fines they defrayed the expences of the Floral games. ‘ Non ex ‘ Floræ vel meretricis cujuſquam hæreditate, ſed ex pe‘ cunia multaticia eorum qui peculatus damnati forent ‘ quia publicum populi Romani agrum occupaſſent ‘ (23). —— Not out of the inheritance of Flora, or of ‘ any courtezan, but out of the fines of thoſe who had ‘ been condemned for male-adminiſtration as having ‘ appropriated to themſelves the lands of the public.’

[G] In the year of Rome 580, a decree was made for celebrating thoſe games annually.] Ovid proves this; for he introduces the goddeſs Flora, who relates that having ſuffered the bloſſoms of the trees and vines to periſh, to be revenged of the Romans for not celebrating the Floral games every year, ſhe forced the ſenate to make a decree concerning that anniverſary, if there was a good harveſt. It proved good, and thus the decree began to be put in execution under the conſulſhip of Poſthumius and Lænas.

Convenere Patres, & ſi bene floreat annus,
  Numinibus noſtris annua feſta vovent.
Annuimus voto. Conſul cum conſule ludos
  Poſtumio Lænas perſoluëre mihi (24).

To me the fathers annual feaſts decreed,
If the year flouriſh, and the crops ſucceed.
Their vows I heard ; thanks for the friendly aid,
The conſuls, Lænas and Poſthumius, paid.

[H] Voſſius's reflexion upon the objection of Lactantius is not liked by every body.] After having diſplayed the proofs which overthrow that objection, he adds, that truth has no need to beg the aſſiſtance of falſehood, and therefore all that the fathers have written againſt the Gentiles is not to be depended upon. Cum veritas falſi minime ſit indiga, non omnia alba ſignari linea oportere quæ veteres adverſus pago deditos ediſſerunt (25). Blondel has freely inlarged upon this thought. ‘ We ought not, ſays he (26), to defend a ‘ good cauſe by ill choſen arguments, nor take up ‘ whatever ſeems to make for us, wherever it comes ‘ from. Yet this has been the practice of the fathers: ‘ for the deſire of making an advantage of every thing, ‘ of forcing truth even from the mouth itſelf of falſe‘ hood, and of being like torrents which impetu‘ ouſly drive down their ſtream whatever comes in ‘ their way, has been the cauſe that many among ‘ them, that they might ſeem to let nothing eſcape ‘ their memory, have loſt the beſt opportunities of ‘ giving proofs of their judgment, and have not on‘ ly endeavoured to make all the thoughts of the ‘ Pagans, both ſolid and groundleſs, ſubſervient to ‘ them, like great rivers that roll in their beds ſands ‘ of gold mixed with mire, but have alſo gloried in ‘ this conduct, which has ſometimes been fraudulent ‘ enough, as if they were allowed to ſay with Æneas ‘ in Virgil, Dolus an virtus quis in hoſte requirat?

In war, or ſtrength or ſtratagem's allow'd.

‘ From hence it was that St Jerome * giving way to ‘ this ſtrange prejudice, has made no ſcruple to alledge ‘ in his own vindication, that the fathers have been ‘ forced to ſay, not what was their own opinion, ‘ but what was neceſſary to refute what the Pagans ‘ believe. Nay he endeavours to juſtify them by ×St Paul's example, but without reaſon, ſince the a‘ poſtle never authorized this abuſe by his own example, ‘ nor believed all methods indifferent, nay praiſe worthy, ‘ provided they ſerved to the overthrow of error, &c.

× but the Papists do thi any method justifiable t make Converts Sword or fire — if that be Xtianit it contradicts St Pauls Doct who was of the first Xtian

[I] Voſſius did not underſtand a paſſage of this father.] This father (27) upbraids the Romans with the apotheoſis of a courtezan, whoſe feſtival was called Larentinalia. He adds that they paid divine honours to another proſtitute, viz. to Faula, who, according to Verrius, was Hercules's whore. Afterwards he ſpeaks of Flora in the terms above mentioned. Voſſius pretends that Lactantius has not diſtinguiſhed Faula from Flora, but that inſtead of Faula it ſhould be read Flaura. Now Flaura was the ancient way of writing Flora: thus caudex was changed into codex, and many other words in like manner (28). All this comes to nothing, when it is conſidered that the Faula of Lactantius was Hercules's concubine, and that the Flora, he ſpeaks of, left all her eſtate to the Roman people. Thus the moſt celebrated authors for want of attention fall into groſs miſtakes.

[K] Moreri's miſtakes may be ſeen below.] I. He ſays they made feaſts to Flora the beginning of May. This is to underſtand the 4 Kalendas Maii in another ſenſe than any body elſe, that knows the elements of learning. The fourth of the Kalends of May is the twenty eighth of April. It muſt not be ſaid theſe feaſts extended to the beginning of May; for the laws of a narration do not allow that the time of a feſtival ſhould be deſcribed by the laſt days of it rather than the firſt. Good Roſinus (29) fancied that at firſt the Floral games were celebrated in the month of April, and afterwards transferred to the following month. The verſes of Ovid, which he alledges, were beyond his reach, and yet they clearly ſignify, that thoſe games took in the laſt days of April, and the firſt days of May.

Incipis Aprili, tranſis in tempora Maii,
  Alter te fugiens, cum venit alter, habet.
Cum tua ſint cedantque tibi confinia menſum,
  Convenit in laudes ille vel iſte tuas (30).

In April you commence, thence paſs to May,
And changing thus enjoy a double ſway;
To you the confines of both months belong,
And either this or that may ſuit your ſong.

II. None of the authors, cited by Moreri, ſay that during the Floral games, the ediles ſtrowed the way with bloſſoms of peas and beans. He has got this from ſome modern, perhaps from the Jeſuit Pomey, who ſays that during that ſolemnity the ediles diſtributed to the people peas and beans and ſuch like pulſe (31). He cites Valerius Maximus l. 2. c. 5. But look for it there as long you pleaſe, you will find no ſuch thing. No doubt Pomey truſted to Tiraqueau's commentary upon Alexander ab Alexandro (32), where this falſe quotation is to be found. I believe he has not been more lucky in citing Plutarch: he ſays, by a ſtrange and unpardonable way of quoting (33), that that author informs us that the image of the goddeſs Flora, in the temple of Caſtor and Pollux, was dreſſed in a tunic, and carried bloſſoms of beans and peas in her right hand (34). I am very much miſtaken if Plutarch has ſaid any thing more, than that Cecilius Metellus conſecrated in the temple of Caſtor and Pollux the picture of Flora, the miſtreſs of Pompey the great, who was one of the fineſt women in Rome. III. All the authors Moreri cites are wrong cited (35).

(b) Voſſius, ibid.

(19) Id. p. 557.

(20) Faſtor. lib. v.

(21) See Voſſius, de Orig. Idolol. lib. i, cap. xii, pag. 93.

(22) Tacit. Ann. lib. ii, cap. xlix.

(23) Voſſius, de Orig. Idolol. lib. i, cap. xii, ex Ovidio, Faſt. lib. v.

(24) Ovid. Faſt. lib. v, ver. 327.

(25) Voſſius, de Orig. Idolol. lib. i, cap. xii, pag. 94.

(26) Blondel of the Sybils, lib. i, cap. xxvi.

* Apolog. ad Pammachium pro libris adv. Jovinian.

(27) Lactant. lib. i, cap. xx.

(28) Suſpicor priſco more Flauram ſcripſiſſe (Lactantium) id eſt Floram, quod ex altero factum. Voſſius, de Orig. Idolol. lib. i, cap. xii, pag. 92.

(29) Roſin. Antiquit. Rom. lib. v, cap. xv.

(30) Ovid. Faſt. lib. v, ver. 185. Roſinus has not quoted the two laſt.

(31) Pomey, Panth. Mythic. pag. 218, 219.

(32) Libro vi, cap. viii, pag. m. 513.

(33) I mean without citing any volume, or book, or any thing.

(34) Pomey, ubi ſupra, pag. 218, 219.

(35) He cites Lactantius, without mentioning the book, and Valerius Maximus, lib. ii, cap. v, where he ſays nothing of the Floral Games; and Ovid in the fourth Faſto inſtead of the fifth.

F L O R A.

FLORA, a famous courtezan of Rome, was paſſionately loved by Pompey, and had ſo great value for him, that ſhe would never ſubmit to the preſſing ſolicitations of another gallant (a), till Pompey himſelf interceded for him. Pompey did this, becauſe that other gallant, who was one of his intimate friends, begged a word of recommendation from him to Flora (b). From that time Pompey, vexed no doubt at his great intereſt with her, and that he had found ſo much complaiſance, went no more to viſit that miſtreſs, which threw her into ſo deep a melancholly, that ſhe continued a long time ſick of it (c). When ſhe grew old, ſhe took a particular pleaſure in telling of the happy hours ſhe had ſpent with Pompey, and even would obſerve that ſhe never left his arms without being bit by him [A]. Plutarch obſerves, that Pompey had (a) His name was Geminius.

(b) Plutarch. in Pompeio, init. pag. 619.

(c) Τοῦτο δὲ αὐτὴν οὐχ ἑταιρικῶς ἐνεγκεῖν ἀλλὰ πολὺν ὑπὸ λύπης καὶ πόθου χρόνον νοσῆσαι. Id ſe non meretricia levitate tuliſſe, verum ex mœrore & deſiderio perdiu ægrotaſſe. Plutarch. in Pomp. pag. 619.

[A] Without being bit by him.] Girac affirms that Amiot did not underſtand this Greek of Plutarch, Φλώραν δὲ τὴν ἑταίραν ἔφασαν ἤδη πρεσβυτέραν οὖσαν ἐπιεικῶς ἀεὶ μνημονεύειν τῆς γενομένης αὐτῇ πρὸς τὸν Πομπήϊον ὁμιλίας, λέγουσαν ὡς οὐκ ἦν ἐκείνῳ συναναπαυσαμένην, ἀδήκτως ἀπελθεῖν. Amiot's tranſlation amounts to this: It is alſo reported that Flora the courtezan, when ſhe grew old, took a great deal of pleaſure to ſpeak frequently of the familiarity ſhe had in her younger days with Pompey, ſaying it was impoſſible when ſhe lay with him to leave him without biting him. This is not the ſenſe of the original. The Latin tranſlator has not been more exact. Floram meretricem ajunt natu jam grandiorem fere ſemper commemorantem ſuam cum Pompejo conſuetudinem, dicere ſolitam non potuiſſe ſe ab illius concubitu ſine aculeo diſcedere. I am not the firſt who made this remark againſt Amiot; I have read the ſame in Girac's reply, where he cenſures his antagoniſt for having compared his teeth to thoſe of the fair Roman lady, who loved Pompey, and who never left him without fondly biting of him. He cenſures Coſtar in the following manner. ‘This application betrays a great deal of ignorance; for it was not Flora who bit Pompey, but Pompey who bit Flora, as the Greek text has it in very preciſe and intelligible words. If Mr Coſtar does not underſtand that language, and if his Amiot has deceived him, ſhould not the ſequel of the diſcourſe have ſet him right; for what reaſon would ſo judicious an author as Plutarch have obſerved, in the perſon of Flora, a laſciviouſneſs common to women of her profeſſion? his buſineſs was only to draw Pompey's charecter, to enter into his private life, and give poſterity an account of the moſt ſecret motions of ſo illuſtrious a commander (1).’ Mr de Girac was not ſatisfied with this criticiſm only, and he was in the right of it; it was more neceſſary to ſhew the moral fault his adverſary was guilty of. Therefore he ſharply reproaches him with not being aſhamed to compare himſelf with a courtezan ſo famous in the Roman hiſtory for her proſtitutions. He thinks it ſtrange that an archdeacon and prieſt ſhould have learned from that leud woman, the fine art of biting gallantly. As for him he congratulates himſelf, that he was not under the ſlavery of love, ſince he is a maſter full of rage and fury (2). Which rage, continues he, as Lucretius ſays, never appears with more tranſport than in the enjoyment of the vileſt pleaſures; it urges them on to wound, and bite thoſe they love moſt. The poets often mention theſe bitings.

Quod petiere premunt arcte, faciuntque dolorem
Corporis, & dentes inlidunt ſæpe labellis,
Oſculaque adfigunt, quia non eſt pura voluptas:
Et ſtimuli ſubſunt, qui inſtigant lædere id ipſum
Quodcumque eſt, rabies unde illæ hæc germina ſurgunt. *

He ſtrains at all, and faſt'ning where he ſtrains,
Too cloſely preſſes with his frantic pains:
With biting kiſſes hurts the twining fair,
Which ſhews his joys imperfect, unſincere;
For ſtung with inward rage he flings around,
And ſtrives to avenge the ſmart on that which gave the wound.

Immediately after he ſpeaks of Flora and Pompey.

The poets are not the only perſons who mention theſe bitings. Cicero entertained the court with them in one of his pleadings againſt Verres. He affirmed that, if the accuſed would ſhow his breaſt, there would appear, not thoſe glorious ſcars which brave men receive in the wars, but ſuch as leud perſons get in the exerciſe of infamous pleaſures. ‘Hic ſcilicet eſt metuendum ne ad exitum defenſionis tuæ (3), vetus illa Antoniana dicendi ratio atque autoritas proferatur, ne excitetur Verres, ne denudetur à pectore, ne cicatrices populus Romanus aſpiciat ex mulierum morſu veſtigia libidinis atque nequitiæ (4). —— Here it is to be dreaded, leſt, at the cloſe of your defence, the Antonian method and authority of ſpeaking ſhould be introduced, leſt his breaſt ſhould be laid bare, leſt the Roman people ſhould behold thoſe ſcars, the marks of female teeth, received in leud embraces, and the war of luſt.’ Thoſe who have a mind to ſee ſeveral paſſages of the poets concerning theſe bitings, may conſult Dionyſius Lambinus's commentary upon the following words in the XIIIth ode of the firſt book of Horace.

Sive puer furens
Impreſſit memorem dente labris notam.
Non, ſi me ſatis audias,
Speres perpetuum, dulcia barbarè
Lædentem oſcula, quæ Venus
Quinta parte ſui nectaris imbuit.

When on thoſe paſſive lips the marks I find
Of frantic boiling kiſſes left behind,
How fond's the hope, how fooliſh and how vain,
Of laſting love from the ungrateful ſwain!
Who that ſoft lip ſo roughly can invade,
And hurt with cruel joy the tender maid.
Quickly they 're glutted who ſo fierce devour;
They ſuck the nectar, and throw by the flower.

GLANVILLE.

Not that this author has collected together all that the poets have ſaid of this matter: perhaps he has omitted more than he has quoted. I have obſerved that among other paſſages he forgot that of Auſonius, concerning the amorous fury of certain Eunuchs. The Jeſuit Theophilus Raynaud remembered it well (5): ‘S. Baſilius l. de vera virgin. ſub finem diſtinguit duplicem eunuchiſmum factitium. Unum quo exſcinditur tota virilitas . . . . alium quo ſoli didymi auferuntur. Priores Eunuchos negat S. Baſilius (6) . . De poſterioribus ait, eos acrius atque ardentius inflammari libidine, & impatientiſſimè ferri ad complexum. Et cum obſtructis per exciſionem ſuperioribus meatibus, non poſſint humorem in lumbis inflammatum emittere: non alleviantur per complexum, ut ii quibus vaſa ſunt integra & expedita; & emiſſione concupiſcentiæ flagrantis remittunt ardorem; ſed pruritu aſſiduo ſtimulati, aguntur in rabiem, nec deſiſtunt donec fatigatio caſſos conatus diſturbet. Probat hoc S. Baſilius, gemino ſuæ ætatis exemplo, quorum alterum eſt de faſſa ingenuè Virgine ſacra, ſpurcum Eunuchum totum toti affuſum, cum non haberet, qui œſtrum concupiſcentiæ ſedaret, ardentem rabiem morſibus ac infixis dentibus indicaſſe. Annuit Auſonius epigr. 160 (7) ſic canens.

Deſectos ſic fama viros, ubi caſſa libido
Fœmineos cœtus, & non ſua bella laceſcit
Irrita vexato conſumere gaudia lecto;
Titillata brevi cum jam ſub fine voluptas
Fervet, & ingeſto peragit ludibria morſu.

See what is ſaid upon this ſubject in the remark [D] of the article ADONIS; and the remark [A] of the article LAMIA the courtezan.

---

(1) Girac, Replique, Sect. viii, pag. m. 73.

(2) Id. pag. 72.

* Lucret. lib. iv, ver. 1072.

(3) Cicero directs his ſpeech to Hortenſius, the advocate of Verres.

(4) Cicero, in Verrem, lib. v, cap. xiii.

(5) In Tractatu de Eunuchis, cap. v, paragr. ii, n. 12, pag. m. 143.

(6) You may find matter wherewith to fill up this chaſm in citat. (14 of the article COMBABUS.

(7) In my edition of Auſonius, which is that of Amſterdam, 1671, theſe verſes are in the 108th Epigram.

had a particular talent of obtaining the love of women [B], and that Flora was ſo beautiful, that Cecilius Metellus got her picture drawn, in order to conſecrate it with ſome others in the temple of Caſtor and Pollux (d). This was neither the firſt nor the laſt time that the picture of a courtezan has had the like honour [C]. I know not whether this action of Cecilius Metellus did not contribute to the error mentioned in the preceeding article, in which I ſhewed that Lactantius was in the wrong to ſay the Floral games were celebrated in honour of a courtezan. A modern author, who no doubt was not ignorant of Lactantius's error, has not however totally avoided the ſame [D]. I ſhall obſerve whence Montagne had been informed that Flora the courtezan yielded herſelf to none leſs than a Dictator, or Conſul, or Cenſor, and that her pleaſure aroſe

A phyſician of Paris, much better ſkilled in the Greek tongue than Coſtar, is miſtaken no leſs than he in the paſſage in Plutarch. ' Sic Flora, ſays he (8), ' nobile apud Romanos ſcortum, & forma egregia, ' cum ardentius Pompeium Magnum tum adoleſcentem deperiret, dicere ſolebat (ut quidem refert Plutarchus) nunquam ſe ab ejus amplexibus diſcedere potuiſſe niſi corpore ejuſdem demorſo. —— So Flora, ' ſays he, a renowned courtezan of Rome of exquiſite ' beauty, and paſſionately enamoured of Pompey, who ' was then young, uſed, as Plutarch informs us, to ſay, ' that ſhe did never quit his embraces without leaving ' the mark of her teeth upon his body.' Note, he obſerves ſome very curious things upon the brutality of love, and inſinuates that it urges not only to bite the beloved object, but alſo to deſire to eat it. He applies to this a paſſage in Plato, where love is compared to hunger, and to the eagerneſs wherewith wolves hunt after lambs. Τὴν ἐραςȣ̃ φιλίαν, ὅτι ȣ̓ μετ' εὐνοίας γίγνεται, ἀλλὰ σιτίȣ τρόπον, χάριν ϖλησμονῆς, &c. Amatoris amicitiam, non benevolentia ulla, ſed aviditate quadam expletionis velut cibi conſtare, &c (9). —— The affection of a lover conſiſts not in benevolence, but, like hunger, in the gratification of the ſenſes.

[B] Pompey had a particular talent of obtaining the love of Women.] He proves it both by the teſtimony of Flora, and the behaviour of his wife Julia. She was a young woman married to a Man, not young, and yet loved him paſſionately. Pompey ſecured this affection both by his ſtrict adherence to his conjugal faith and by his engaging manner towards the fair ſex. Καὶ γὰρ καὶ τȣ̃το λέγεται, καὶ περιϐόητον ἦν τῆς κόρης τὸ φίλανδρον, ȣ̓ καθ' ὥραν ϖοθȣ́σης τὸν Πομπήϊον. ἀλλ' αἴτιον ἔοικεν ἥτε σωφροσύνη τȣ̃ ἀνδρὸς εἶναι, μόνην γινώσκοντος τὴν γεγαμημένην, ἥτε σεμνότης, ȣ̓κ ἄκριτον ἀλλ' εὔχαριν ἔχȣσα τὴν ὁμιλίαν καὶ μάλιςα γυναικῶν ἀγωγὸν, εἰ δεῖ μηδὲ Φλῶραν ἁλῶναι τὴν ἑταίραν ψευδομαρτυριῶν. Nam ea quoque fama eſt, celebratuſque fuit illius in virum amor: non quòd propter ætatis florem Pompeji deſiderio flagraret, verùm in cauſa videtur illius continentia fuiſſe unam cognoſcentis uxorem: & ſeveritas non cum auſtera ſed jucunda conjuncta converſatione, quæ duceret imprimis mulieres: niſi meretrix damnanda Flora falſi teſtimonii ſit (10). —— Her affection for her huſband was greatly extolled, not that ſhe was captivated by his youth; the cauſe appears to be his conjugal fidelity, and the winning complaiſance of his converſation, which had a mixture of majeſty and ſweetneſs, if the teſtimony of Flora, his miſtreſs, may be credited.

[C] This was not the only time that the picture of a courtezan has had the like honour.] Venus riſing out of the ſea was the picture of Campaſpe, miſtreſs to Alexander the great (11), or elſe that of the courtezan Phryné (12). See the article APELLES (13). Whilſt Phryné was young, ſhe ſerved for an original to all thoſe who drew the goddeſs Venus (14). The Venus of Cnidus was copied from the face of a courtezan, whom Praxiteles was paſſionately fond of (15). Pliny mentions a painter, who always drew the goddeſſes after ſome or other of his miſtreſſes. ' Fuit ' Arellius, ſays he (16), Romæ celeber, paulo ante divum Auguſtum, niſi flagitio inſigni corrupiſſet artem ' ſemper alicujus fœminæ amore flagrans, & ob id ' Deas pingens, ſed dilectarum imagine. —— Arellius, ſays he, was eminent at Rome, a little before ' the time of Auguſtus Cæſar; but he baſely proſtituted ' his art, being always mad after one woman or other, ' and for that reaſon painting goddeſſes in the form ' of his favourites.' Nor are the chriſtians free from this licentiouſneſs. See the theſis of Voetius (17), where you have theſe words. ' Quid factum ſit aperit Molanus (18) in libro de Picturis ſacris, cap. ' 29. . . . . Viſæ inquit quandoque in locis ubi non ' decuit divorum imagines viventium adhuc hominum ' ora vultuſque referre, ut hoc umbratico velamento ' illorum quos amabant effigie paſcerent oculos. Ad quas ' ſelectas & procaciter venuſtas formas pingi ſolere ' imagines deïparæ Virginis probe norunt pictores. ' —— Molanus, in his Treatiſe of holy Paintings, ſhews ' what practices have been uſed. Pictures, ſays he, ' have been ſeen in very improper places, repreſenting ' ſaints, whoſe features have exactly anſwered to thoſe ' of perſons ſtill living, that under this ſymbolical dreſs ' they might feed their eyes with the effigies of thoſe ' they loved. From what ſelect and beautiful, but diſhoneſt originals, the pictures of the virgin mother have ' been drawn, painters well know.' I ſhall conclude with a paſſage out of the News from the Republic of Letters. ' The author (19) . . . . explains a medal of ' Julian the apoſtate, upon which on one ſide is ſeen ' Serapis, perfectly reſembling Julian, and on the other ' the figure of an Hermanubis. It was no unuſual ' thing to ſee ſtatues of men altogether like thoſe of ' ſome God. Flattery or vanity has often been the ' cauſe of this diſorder. Pliny mentions a painter ' who always drew the goddeſſes like the miſtreſſes, ' he was in love with. This might give Juſtin Martyr occaſion to ſay, laughing at the pagans, that ' they worſhipped their painters miſtreſſes. But I ' know not whether it is very fair to make the heathens ' reſponſable for the fancies of a Zeuxis, or a Lyſippus. What would be ſaid of a man that ſhould pretend, that thoſe, who believe they worſhip the image ' of St Charles Borromeo, worſhip nothing but a ' picture made at pleaſure, and the caprice of a painter? I ſay this becauſe, tho' that ſaint was very homely, he is painted very handſome †. This is an unavoidable thing in all religions where images are uſed: ' you muſt ſubmit to the licence of workmen, and ' muſt depend upon them for the air and ſhape of the ' objects of devotion ‡. Deos ea facie novimus quâ ' pictores & fictores voluerunt. We know the gods ' only by ſuch faces as the painters and ſculptors pleaſe ' to give them, ſaid the men of ſenſe among the pagans. Yet this ought not to encourage ſuch abuſes: ' for inſtance, it was not to be born, that the image ' of the Virgin ſhould be made at Rome from the ' picture and reſemblance of a ſiſter to Pope Alexander VI ‡, who was indeed very beautiful, but ' not very virtuous (20).' See the remark [E] of the article DURER.

[D] A modern author . . . . has not wholly avoided Lactantius's error.] This modern is la Mothe le Vayer. Theſe are his words which tend to ſhow, that all things are but opinion, and that it is by this, and not by a natural and immutable law, that vice differs from virtue. ' None, ſays he (21), but common ' whores and Hortacio's wenches are infamous among ' us; a Laïs, a Rhodope, an Acca Laurentia, who ' leaves money enough to make the Roman people her ' heirs, a Flora, a Fauſtina, deſerve temples and altars. ' The moſt celebrated of the Egyptian pyramids was ' built in honour of a king's daughter, who deſired ' only one ſtone of each of thoſe who lay with her, ' with which notwithſtanding ſhe built that prodigious ' edifice, after ſhe had inriched her father Ethiops by ' that pretty paſtime,' It is plain he did not believe, that the courtezan Flora made the Roman people her heirs, for he aſcribes this action only to Laurentia. Yet he ſuppoſes that Flora, one of the goddeſſes of Rome, had been a famous courtezan: but this is a miſtake: This is endeavouring to ſupport the building when the foundation is ruined. There is no other courtezan Flora, but that mentioned by Lactantius, and ſhe who loved

---

(d) Plutarch. ibid.

(8) Petrus Petitus, de Natura & Morib. Anthropophag. pag. 107.

(19) Plato, in Phædro, apud Petitum, ibid. pag. 108.

(10) Plutarch. in Pompeio, pag. 647. B.

(11) Plin. lib. xxxv, cap. x.

(12) Athen. lib. xiii.

(13) Remarks [C] and [G].

(14) Arnob. lib. vi, pag. 199.

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 198.

(16) Lib. xxxv, cap. x.

(17) Vol. IV, pag 429. I know not whether this whole paſſage is Molanus's, but I ſuſpect that all that is after paſcerent oculos is Voetius's.

(18) He cites in the margin, as Voëtius ſays, Fredericus Scenckius à Tautenburch ultimus Epiſcopus Ultrajectinus libro de Imaginibus, cap. xii, xiii.

(19) Viz. Dr Spon. See his Miſcellanea Erudita Antiquitatis, pag. 13.

† Vavaſſor, de Forma Chriſti, pag. 200.

‡ Cicero, de Nat. Deor. I.

‡ Rabelais, Epitre xv.

(20) Nouvelles de la République des Lettres, Septemb. 1685, art. x, pag. 1028.

(21) Dialog. I, of Oraſius Tubero, pag. m. 46, 47.

aroſe from the dignity of her lovers (e) [E]. Brantome has refined upon Montagne, and ſaid many things without foundation [F].

loved Pompey. The latter did not come into the world till after the inſtitution of the Floral games, and we have ſeen (22) that the other did not inſtitute them. Our modern author did not pretend that ſhe left her eſtate to the Roman commonwealth. Where then did he find the apotheoſis of a courtezan named Flora?

[E] I ſhall obſerve whence Montagne had it .... that her pleaſure aroſe from the dignity of her lovers.] Horace cenſures certain debauchees for following the ſame maxims (23). See alſo Perſeus's Patriciæ immeiat vulvæ, towards the end of the laſt ſatire. We ſhall ſee, in the following remark, that a very late writer (24) furniſhed Montagne with this fine particular.

[F] Brantome has ..... ſaid many things without any foundation.] He ſays (25) that the courtezan Flora 'was of a good family and extraction, and in this 'was more commendable than Laïs, who, like a common ſtrumpet, abandoned herſelf to every body; 'but Flora only to the great, ſo that ſhe wrote over 'her door, let none but kings, princes, dictators, 'conſuls, cenſors, pontiffs, queſtors, embaſſadors, and 'other great lords come in. Laïs would always be paid 'before hand, but Flora not; ſaying ſhe behaved thus 'to great men, that they might alſo act by her as 'great and illuſtrious perſons; and that thus a woman 'of great beauty and high birth will always be eſteemed according to the value ſhe ſets upon herſelf. 'She took only what was freely given her, ſaying 'that a well bred lady ought to oblige her lovers out 'of pure love, and not avarice, becauſe every thing 'had a price upon it but love. In a word, ſhe 'made love genteely in her time, and was ſo gallantly ſerved, that when ſhe went abroad ſometimes to 'take a walk in the city, ſhe furniſhed diſcourſe for 'a month, both for her beauty, her fine and rich 'dreſs, her majeſtic air, her grace, and for the train 'of courtiers, admirers, and great lords, who were following her as true ſlaves, all which ſhe endured very 'patiently; and foreign embaſſadors, when they returned to their country, took more pleaſure in telling 'of the beauty and charms of the lovely Flora, than of 'the grandeur of the Roman commonwealth, and particularly of her great liberality, contrary to the common temper of ſuch ladies; but ſhe was ſomething 'extraordinary, being nobly deſcended. In fine, ſhe 'died ſo rich, that her eſtate in money, rich goods, 'and jewels, was enough to rebuild the walls of Rome, 'and pay the public debts. She made the Roman people her chief heirs, for which cauſe a ſtately temple 'was erected to her at Rome, which from Flora was 'called Florian.' Theſe are meer fictions, and come from the mint of Don Antonio de Guevara, an author more guilty this way than our new romance writers, how great ſoever their faults may be that way.

FLORIMONT (GALEACIUS) Diſciple of Auguſtin Niphus, lived a long time at Paris in the quality of agent to Anthony Colonna, and made himſelf known to the learned men, who at that time were formed in the ſchool of James Faber Stapulenſis. He publiſhed in Italian a treatiſe of morality, and was made biſhop of Seſſa (a). Fracaſtor dedicates one of his poetical pieces to Marc Antony Flaminius, and to Galeacius Florimont, and thereby ſhews that they applied themſelves to the ſtudy of divinity.

[A] Fracaſtor .... ſhews that M. A. Flaminius and Florimont applied themſelves to the ſtudy of divinity.] Thus the poem begins:

Dum vos fatidicos vates, arcanaque ſenſa
Volvitis, atque animum cœleſti nectare alentes,
Alloquiis, magnoque Dei conſueſcitis ori,
Fælices Duce Gibberto, Campenſe Magiſtro:
Quid dicam miſerum me agere, & quam ducere
vitam, &c. (1)

Whilſt you revolve each ſage by heaven inſpir'd,
And, their myſterious ſenſe exploring, feed
Your ſouls with Nectar, from the ſacred page:
Whilſt you, by Gibbert and Campenſis taught,
To heav'n aſpiring, with your God converſe,
What ſhall I ſay, I do? how paſs my days!

FONTARABIA, a city of Spain on the river of Bidaſſo, near the ſea, was built, they ſay, by king Suintilla [A]. Alphonſus IX, king of Caſtile, took it from Sanchez, king of Navarre (a), and granted the inhabitants the ſame privileges that king Sanchez his father had granted to the city of St Sebaſtian. Some pretend that Fontarabia was formerly a city of Guienne under the viſcount of Bayonne (b). It's ſituation on this ſide of the Pyrenean mountains favours their opinion: Beſides that, in eccleſiaſtical matters, it was under the biſhop of Bayonne till the year 1571 (c). See in Moreri an account of the taking this town by the French in the reign of Francis I, the ſuccours they threw into it, and the cowardice of the governor, who ſurrendered it to the Spaniards. Moreri ſhould not have omitted the diſgrace the French ſuffered before this place in the year 1638, two days after the birth of Lewis XIV [B]; which no doubt

[A] It was built they ſay by Suintilla.] Beuterus affirms this, but Oihenhart will not believe it. 'A 'Suintilla Rege Gotho conditam fuiſſe affirmat Beuterus lib. 3. cap. 27. Sed quis credat Beutero ſine 'teſte loquenti in re adeo antiqua, & à noſtro ævo 'remota? mihi certe nulla ſuppetunt argumenta quæ 'huic oppido tantæ vetuſtatis decus concilient (1). '——— Beuterus affirms, that this town was built 'by Suintilla king of the Goths. But who can 'give credit to Beuterus when he ſpeaks without any authority of a fact ſo remote from our times? at leaſt I 'can meet with no arguments which can induce me to 'believe it has that antiquity.'

[B] The diſgrace the French ſuffered before this place in 1638, two days after the birth of Lewis XIV.] This was one of the greateſt diſgraces of the reign of Lewis the juſt, and the miniſtry of cardinal Richlieu. Hear Balzac on this (2): 'Let us never ſpeak 'a word of * * * *. It is the ſhame and ignominy of the French name; it is a day which the Romans would have called Scelerata, and we ought to 'call curſed. Poſterity muſt abhor it, or rather ſhould 'be kept from the knowledge of it, and we ſhould 'if poſſible efface it from the year one thou'ſand. . . .

Que ce jour ſoit rayé des choſes avenuës
Jupiter le commande aux trois Filles chenuës
Qui tiennent Regiſtre des Temps.

Jove commands the fatal day to be razed out of the records of time.

(e) Montagne, Eſſais, liv iii, chap. iii, pag. m. 71.

(22) In the remarks of the preceding article.

(23) Huic ſi Mutonis verbis mala tanta videntis
Diceret hæc animus, quid vis tibi? nunquid ego à te Magno prognatum depoſco conſule cunnum,
Velatumque ſtola, mea cum conferbuit ira?
Hor. Sat. II, lib. i, ver. 68.

(24) Antoine de Guevara.

(25) Vie des Dames Galantes, Tom. I, pag. 313, & ſeq.

(a) Taken from Naudé, in Judicio de Auguſt. Nipho, pag. 41.

(1) Fracaſtor. pag. 68, Carmin. Edit. Genev. 1637.

(a) Oihenart, Notitia Vaſconiæ, pag. 168.

(b) Baudrand, Geograph. pag. 397.

(c) Id. ibid.

(1) Oihenart, Notitia Vaſconiæ, pag. 168.

(2) It is a letter he wrote to Chapelain, the eleventh of the third book. He has put aſteriſks in ſeveral places to leave the reader in the dark. I am confident, for the ſame reaſon, he has put a falſe date at the bottom of the letter. He has made it the 8th of May, inſtead of the 8th of October, 1638, becauſe he would not offend a prince of the blood: it was the prince of Condé, who commanded at the ſiege.

doubt was looked upon as a wonderful omen by the Spaniards [C]. Lewis the juſt, and cardinal Richlieu, were exceedingly exaſperated againſt the ſuppoſed authors of that diſgrace [D].

Joſeph Moret, a Spaniſh Jeſuit, has written a large account in Latin of this ſiege of Fontarabia. I do not find in the copy I make uſe of (d) the year of the impreſſion; but the epiſtle dedicatory being dated from Segovia the twelfth of April 1654, and the approbation of the provincial of the Jeſuits, bearing date the fifth of March 1655, it may be ſuppoſed this work was publiſhed ſoon after the defeat of the French.

‘ There are ſome people to whom fortune owes a grudge, and in whoſe hands the faireſt opportunities miſcarry. When the deſign is to raiſe ſieges and loſe armies, none are fitter to be employed: immediately, all places become Acro-corinths, and all enemies meer Alexanders.’ It is plain that by the people to whom fortune owes a grudge, he deſigns to hint at the prince of Condé (3). This was ſaying gravely and reſpectfully the jeſt of the ſong. He will take Fontarabia, Zeſt, juſt as he took Dole (4).

[C] Which no doubt was looked upon as a wonderful omen by the Spaniards.] Without doubt their poets and orators ſet off the circumſtance of the time with all poſſible pomp: a ſignal triumph, a compleat victory, two days after (5) the birth of a Dauphin, France had been ſo many years waiting for. What auſpicious omen this for Spain! what may ſhe not expect under the reign of a French prince, the firſt days of whoſe life are made memorable by a battle moſt glorious to the Spaniards, moſt ſhameful to France? perhaps the firſt courier that arrived at the court of France, after the Dauphin's birth, was he that brought the fatal news of the ſiege of Fontarabia being raiſed: what a horoſcope! O happy preſage for the Spaniſh monarchy! I am ſure that all the poetic ſallies of the Spaniſh writers on this ſubject might fill a volume, and after all what has been the iſſue of all theſe good omens? like the Sybilline oracles written upon leaves, the wind has carried them away (6). All poetical pens, whether they write in proſe or verſe, ſhould know that it is not their buſineſs to prophecy. The queen of France was delivered of a prince, juſt at the time when expreſs after expreſs brought an account of the progreſs of Lewis XIVth's arms in Holland in 1672. Upon which what did not the French poets ſay? what triumphs did they not promiſe a prince who was born in the midſt of ſo much good news? and yet he lived but a little while.

For the reſt, a certain Jeſuit (7) makes uſe of the thought of a heathen author to excuſe the ſiege of Fontarabia being raiſed. The king's good genius, ſays he (8), was ſo buſy at St Germain's that ſhe could not be at Fontarabia. He meant that that good genius was wholly employed upon the birth of the Dauphin. Plutarch ridicules this thought. ‘ Alexander, ſays he (9), was born the ſixth of June, the very day when Diana's temple at Epheſus was burnt, as Hegeſias, the Magneſian, relates, who makes an exclamation upon it, and a witticiſm cold enough to have quenched the conflagration of that temple. For no wonder, ſays he, Diana let her temple be burnt, being ſufficiently buſy to midwife Alexander into the world.’ Plutarch's taſte here is very different from Cicero's: ‘ Concinnè ut multa Timæus, qui cum in hiſtoria dixiſſet qua nocte natus Alexander eſſet eadem Dianæ Epheſiæ templum deflagraviſſe adjunxit, minimè id eſſe mirandum quod Diana cum in partu Olympiadis adeſſe voluiſſet, abfuiſſet domo (10) —— Timæus, on this occaſion as on many others, ſpeaks very pertinently, who having told us in his hiſtory, that Alexander was born the ſame night that the temple of Diana at Epheſus was burnt, adds, that it was no wonder the goddeſs ſhould be abſent from home, when the labour of Olympias called for her preſence.’

[D] Lewis XIII and Richlieu were extreamly exaſperated againſt the ſuppoſed authors of that diſgrace.] The duke de la Valette, eldeſt ſon to the duke d'Epernon, was looked upon as the chief author of that miſcarriage. He durſt not ſurrender himſelf whilſt his conduct was inquired into, but fled into England. The council of ſtate declared him ‘ convict of high treaſon for having baſely and perfidiouſly deſerted the king's ſervice at the ſiege of Fontarabia, and of felony, for going out of the kingdom contrary to the king's orders, and for this he was condemned to loſe his head at the Greve, if he could be taken, or in effigy if he could not, to loſe all his employments, and his eſtate to be confiſcated (11).’ I obſerve that the king cleared him from the charge of cowardice. ‘ The queſtion is not, ſaid he (12), either of the cowardice or unskillfulneſs of the duke de la Valette, for I know he wants neither bravery nor capacity, but he would not take Fontarabia.’ Every body was not of Lewis XIIIth's opinion. See the following words of the Menagiana (13). ‘ At the time that Mr d'Eſpernon retired into England, being charged with running away in a fight, Monſ. Peireſc wrote to the great Bignon, and asked him if a man could be condemned to death for want of courage. Monſ. Bignon anſwered that there was no law upon which ſuch a ſentence could be founded. The laws at moſt only condemn to death the firſt that flies, to make an example for the reſt.’ Mr Menage's memory, as good as it was, failed him here; for Mr Peireſc died fifteen months (14) before the defeat at Fontarabia more or leſs: and it is certain the duke de la Valette retired into England meerly on account of that defeat. After all, what the king ſaid is more probable, and it was not upon this occaſion alone, that hatred to the cardinal had coſt that monarch the loſs of a battle. There was no criminal attempt, the enemies of that prelate did not practiſe. They wiſhed ſucceſs to the Spaniards, and ſometimes procured it for them, purely with a view to ruin the cardinal, who could never have maintained his credit unleſs the king's arms had been ſucceſsful. But here is another fault. His creatures ſometimes loſt a battle out of complaiſance to him; at leaſt it was ſuſpected the marſhal de Grammont ſuffered himſelf to be routed at Honnecour, in order to do him ſervice (15). The cardinal was retired from court: what could be more for his intereſt, than to put the affairs of the kingdom into confuſion? was not this the way to have it ſaid, that as ſoon as he quitted the helm, every thing went ill? and was not this the means to have him recalled, that he might remedy what had happened amiſs in his abſence? thus the happineſs of a whole people, and even the honour of princes, are ſacrificed to the intereſt of a miniſter.

FONTE (MODERATA). Under this name a Venetian lady has publiſhed her works. Her true name was Modeſto Pozzo (a). She is author of a poem intituled il Floridoro, and of another Italian poem upon the paſſion and reſurrection of JESUS CHRIST. Beſides this poem, and divers others, ſhe publiſhed in proſe a book de Meriti delle Donne, in which ſhe maintains, that the female ſex is not inferior to the male ſex. I have taken this from a book intituled Le Coſe notabili & maraviglioſe della Città di Venetia, gia riformate & accommodate da Leonico Goldioni, & hora grandemente ampliate da Zuanne Zittio. See there page 311 of the Venice edition 1655. I was ſurprized that there is no mention of the year of the birth or death of this lady, nor any other circumſtance of her life; but I have found elſewhere ſomething to ſupply this defect [A]. See [A] There is no circumſtance of her life in the Coſe notabili . . . . di Venetia . . . . but this defect is ſupplied elſewhere.] Father Hilarion de Coſte informs me that this lady (1) was born at Venice in 1555;

(d) It is a book in 16mo, of 467 pages.

(3) He was grand father to the prince of Condé, living this preſent year, 1695.

(4) See Richelet's dictionary, at the word Zeſt.

(5) The ſeventh of September, 1638.

(6) Foliis tantum ne carmina manda
Ne turbata volent rapidis ludibria ventis.
Virgil. Æneid. lib. vi, ver. 74.

(7) Named Joſſet. See the letter Balzac wrote to him. It is the fifteenth of the third book, of the Lettres choiſies.

(8) Balzac mentions this in the ſaid letter. See Coſtar's Apology, pag. 92.

(9) In the life of Alexander, near the beginning.

(10) Cicero, de Nat. Deorum, lib. ii, cap. xxvii.

(11) Hiſtory of Cardinal Richelieu, printed at Amſterdam, 1694, Tom. II, pag. 364, 365.

(12) Id. p. 364.

(13) Pag. 259, of the firſt Dutch Edition.

(14) The 24th of June, 1637. See Gaſſendus, in his Life, pag. m. 347, 349.

(15) Whoever reads the Memoires de Puyſégur, where this battle of Honnecour is deſcribed (It is pag. m. 234, & ſeq.), cannot help thinking the marſhal Grammont had orders to loſe the day.

(a) She preſerved the ſenſe of her name under the word Fonte, which anſwers to Pozzo, and that of moderata, which anſwers to modeſta.

(1) He calls her Modeſta Pozzo di Zorzi.

See the remark. Mr Moreri, under the word Puy, relates ſomething concerning this illuſtrious woman.

1555; that ſhe loſt her father and mother, the firſt year of her life; that in her youth ſhe was put into the nunnery of St Martha of Venice; that ſhe learned with great eaſe poetry and the Latin tongue; that ſhe had ſo excellent a memory, that when ſhe had heard a ſermon ſhe could repeat it word by word; that her book of the merit of women was publiſhed preſently after her death; that ſhe was honourably married to Philip de Georgiis, and lived twenty years with him in great harmony, after which ſhe died in childbed the firſt of November 1592; that her husband erected a monument to her upon which was engraved this epitaph: ‘Modeſtæ à Puteo fœminæ doctiſſimæ, quæ varios virtutis partus Moderatæ Fontis nominæ rhytmis Etruſcis (quibus memoranda cecinit) & ſermone continuo feliciter enixa, naturæ partum dum ederet, puellæ vitam, ſibi verò mortem (proh dolor) aſcivit. Philippus de Georgiis Petri in officio ſuper aquis, pro ſereniſſ. Do. publici jura defendens, amantiſſimæ conjugi P. obiit anno Domini 1592 Kal. Novemb.’ That John Nicholas Doglioni has written the life of this lady in Italian in 1593; that father Peter Paul Ribera made a panegyric upon this learned heroine in his theatre of learned women; and that N. di Zorzi her daughter wrote a preface to her works (z).

FONTEVRAUD, or rather FRONTEVAUX [A], a famous abbey in the dioceſe of Poitiers and province of Anjou, acknowledges for it's founder ROBERT D'ARBRISSEL. We promiſed to ſay ſomething here of this perſon, and ſhall now perform it. He was born about the year 1047, in the village of Arbriſſel (a), ſeven leagues from Rennes. In 1074 he went to Paris, where he was made doctor of divinity. A certain biſhop of Rennes, who, though he was not learned, yet was a lover of learned men [B], and beſtowed upon them employments, called him back into Bretagny, about the year 1085, and conferred upon him the dignity of Arch-Prieſt and Official, and had the pleaſure to ſee him oppoſe the licentiouſneſs which infeſted his dioceſe. The quarrels, ſimony, and fornication of the clergy, had introduced ſtrange confuſion there. After labouring four years to extirpate theſe diſorders, Robert, finding himſelf expoſed by the death of his biſhop, to the ill will of the Canons, who were not at all pleaſed with his reforming ſpirit (b), bent his thoughts another way. He went to teach divinity at Angers; but he grew ſo weary of the world, on account of the corruption of manners, which he found prevailed every where, that he retired into a deſert (c). The auſtere life he led there was ſoon known, and many perſons reſorted to him, both to hear, and ſee a ſaint. Some of theſe he kept with him, and, about the year 1094, began to form a ſort of a college of regular canons. Urban II, being in France two years after, heard ſo good a character of him that he ſent for him, and, being deſirous to hear him preach, ordered him to pronounce a ſermon at the dedication of a church (d). He was ſo edified by it, that he created him apoſtolical preacher. The baron de Craon was ſo moved with the ſermon, that the next day he founded an abbey, and gave it to Robert (e). The new abbot diſcharged the functions of that office till the year 1098. Then he conſidered that his character of apoſtolical preacher did not allow him to be always confined to the ſame place with his regular canons; wherefore he renounced his abbey and travelled from place to place in order to exerciſe his talent of preaching. Having done this for two years, followed by a great multitude of men and women, he reſolved to reſt, and to fix his tabernacles in the foreſt of Frontevaux. In this place he wanted nothing; people from all ſides zealouſly ſupplying all manner of neceſſaries for the ſubſiſtance of the devout ſouls he had about him. So that he was very ſoon in a condition to give alms of what was over and above what he wanted. We muſt not forget that, at the ſame time, there were two other famous preachers who agreed with him to divide the two

ſexes

[A] Or rather FRONTEVAUX] The Latin name in all the ancient charters is Fons-Ebraldi (1). According to that original, it ſhould be called Fontevraux, and ſome call it ſo. But Mr Menage affirms it ſhould be called Frontevaux, as the inhabitants of Anjou and Poitou call it. The letter r has been inſerted here as in the word fronde derived from the Latin funda, and in the word fromage derived from formaticum. It is long ſince this letter was inſerted; for we find in Sivigni's chronicle, page 317: ‘Anno Domini 1189 obiit Henricus Rex Angliæ, octavis Apoſtolorum Petri & Pauli, & ſepultus eſt apud Fronteval (2). —— In the year 1189 died Henry king of England, on the octaves of St Peter and Paul, and was interred at Frontevaux.

[B] A biſhop of Rennes . . . . not learned, but a lover of learned men.] His name was Silveſter de la Guerche, and he had carried arms againſt Conan duke of Bretagny (3). Here is what is ſaid of him in the hiſtory of Robert d'Arbriſſel. ‘Licet non litteratus litteratos tamen inhianter complexabatur . . convocabat igitur aliunde ſi quos poterat litteratos, quod hominum genus Britannia tunc habebat rariſſimum (4). —— Tho' not a man of learning himſelf, he had a great affection for learned men: he therefore got together all the eminent men he could from all parts, which at that time were very ſcarce in Bretagne.’ Upon the report of this Robert's merit, he invited him into his dioceſe, and made this ingenuous confeſſion to him; ‘Evectione præparata, venerandus Pontifex dirigit Pariſius, & accerſitum taliter alloquitur. Vides inquit, Frater chariſſime, quomodo ſancta Redonenſis Eccleſia mater tua ſine regimine vacillat, hoc præſertim tempore cum me pene Laïcum ei contigerit præeſſe. Eſto igitur, quæſo in reſponſis Eccleſiaſticis noſter interpres, audiam te, & loqueris in me. Poteris procul dubio Dei populo prodeſſe, ſi zelum Dei habens, volueris nobiſcum aliquantulum militare. —— The venerable prelate having cauſed him to be ſent for, and brought from Paris, ſpoke to him in the following manner. You ſee, ſays he, my dear brother, how the holy church of Rennes, your mother, totters for want of regimen, and more eſpecially at this time when I, almoſt a layman, am placed at the head of it. Be therefore, I entreat you, my interpreter in eccleſiaſtic affairs: I will liſten to your directions, and you ſhall ſpeak by me; you are able, no doubt, to ſerve God's people, if, out of a zeal for his ſervice, you would enliſt for a while under his banner.’

[C] Two

(z) Taken from Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. II. pag. 717, & ſeq.

(a) It is now called Arbreſec.

(b) Baldricus, in vita Rob. Arbriſſ. cap i, n. 10, apud Joann. de la Mainferme, in Clypeo naſcentis Fontebraldenſis Ordinis, Tom. I, p. 317.

(c) Corruptiſſimi ſeculi faſtidioſus Robertus in Credonenſe deſertum abſcondit ſe. Mainferme, ibid. Tom. II, pag. 498.

(d) That of St Nicholas at Angers.

(e) Mirabili ejus facundia captus illius regionis princeps Baro Credonenſis Abbatiam beatiſſimæ Virgini conſtruxit, cui de Rota cognominatæ Robertum præfecit Abbatem. —— The baron of Craon, governour of the country, was ſo charmed with his wonderful eloquence, that he founded an abbey to the bleſſed Virgin, which he named de Rota, and made Robert abbot of it. Jo. de la Mainferme, Clypei, Tom. I, pag. 28.

(1) In St Bernard's 200th letter, this place is called Fons Eberandi. Menage, Orig de la Langue Françoiſe, pag. 336. Edit. 1694.

(2) Cited by Menage, ibid. See alſo his Hiſtory of Sablé, pag. 89, 90.

(3) Mainferme, in Clypeo naſcentis Fontebraldenſis Ordinis, Tom. II, pag. 47.

(4) Albricus, in vita Roberti Arbriſſ. cap, ii, n. 8, apud Joann. de la Mainferme, ibid. pag. 48.

ſexes, leaving him the care of the women, whilſt they undertook that of the men [C]. No ſooner had he eſtabliſhed good laws in his monaſtery of Frontevaux; but he reſumed his office of itinerant preacher. He ran over ſeveral provinces of France, and particularly Bretagny and Normandy. He did at Roan the greateſt exploit that any man of his profeſſion could poſſibly do; for, by one ſingle exhortation, he converted all the women of pleaſure who were in a place of proſtitution [D], where he entered on purpoſe to preach. In 1104 he aſſiſted at the council of Beaugenci, and ſate among the prelates. During the years 1107, and 1108, he went over the provinces of Anjou, Poitou, and Touraine, diſcharging his office of apoſtolical preacher. Theſe travels, at leaſt, produced this good effect, that the order of Frontevaux was ſpread in all thoſe provinces [E], and found how powerful Pope Paſchal IId's exhortations were. The biſhop of Poitiers went to Rome in 1106, to deſire of his holineſs the confirmation of that order. He obtained a bull of Paſchal II, by which that pontiff declared he would take a particular care of, and put it immediately under the juriſdiction of the holy ſee, and earneſtly exhorted all people to promote this new inſtitution. He confirmed all their privileges by a new bull in the year 1113. The order was already grown pretty numerous; for the founder, as he went preaching through the other provinces of France, did not fail to eſtabliſh convents there (f). He perſuaded queen Bertrade

[C] Two other preachers . . . . agreed . . . . to leave him the care of the women while they took the charge of the men.] This is an admirable partition, and not to be compared to that of the circumciſion and uncircumciſion, I mean that of St Peter and St Paul, when it was ſaid that St Peter ſhould apply himſelf to the converſion of the Jews, and St Paul to the converſion of the gentiles (5). The three preachers I mention here were Robert d'Arbriſſel, Bernard of Tiron, and Vitalis of Moriton. Let us hear the words of an ancient Hiſtorian. ‘ In tranſmarinis partibus, ſicut à majoribus accepi, tres memorabiles viri uno tempore fuere: ſcilicet Robertus cognominatus de Arbruſculo, Bernardus, & Vitalis. Hi non ignobiliter eruditi, & ſpiritu ferventes, circuibant per caſtella & vicos, ſeminanteſque ſecundum Iſaiam ſuper omnes aquas, de converſione multorum fructus colligebant, pio inter ſe placito conſtituto: quòd Robertus quidem fœminarum communi labore ad meliora converſarum ſollicitudinem gereret; Bernardus vero & Vitalis maribus propenſius providerent. Robertus igitur famoſiſſimum illud Monaſterium fœminarum de Fonte-Ebraldi conſtruxit, & regularibus diſciplinis informavit. Bernardus verò apud Tirocinum, & Vitalis apud Saviniacum Monachis regularitur inſtitutis, ſuos quiſque ab aliis per quaſdam præceptorum proprietates diſtinxit (6). —— In the tranſmarine parts, as I have been informed, there were at the ſame time three men of diſtinguiſhed characters, namely, Robert ſirnamed d'Arbriſſel, Bernard, and Vitalis, all perſons of great learning, and glowing with zeal; who traverſed the country, ſowing, according to Eſaias, upon all waters; and from the numerous converſions which they made, gathered fruit in abundance; having entered into this pious contract amongſt themſelves; that Robert ſhould take upon himſelf the charge of their female converts, that Bernard and Vitalis ſhould take care of the men. Whereupon Robert founded that famous nunnery at Frontevaux, in which he inſtituted the moſt regular diſcipline. Bernard and Vitalis each inſtituted a regular order of Monks, the firſt at Tiron, the other at Savigny, which they diſtinguiſhed from each other by ſome peculiarities in their precepts.’ In vain did they repreſent to our Robert the hazard he would run by his zeal to inſtruct the fair ſex: he rejected that advice as an artifice of the devil, and fortified himſelf with the example of St Jerome. ‘ Deſpexit ergo tentatorem, irriſit ejus fallaciam, nec fœminarum abjecit moderationem . . . . divum Hieronymum imitatus, cui inſulſi obloquebantur Ariſtarchi, quòd ſcriberet ad mulieres, eaſque viris anteponeret: quorum cavillationes venuſtiſſimâ & copioſiſſimâ retundit devoti ſexus celebratione ſacris ex literis deductâ (7). —— He deſpiſed the tempter, bad defiance to his cunning, and perſevered in his female charge . . . . imitating therein St Jerome, who was reviled by certain dealers in defamation, for writing to the women, and preferring them to men, whoſe cavils he refuted in a beautiful and copious encomium upon the fair ſex.’

[D] By a ſingle exhortation he converted all the women of pleaſure who were in a place of proſtitution.] They aſcribe to him a very particular talent for this; and ſince the direction of women was fallen to his lot, it was neceſſary he ſhould chiefly look after the ſcabby ſheep. He went barefoot into the ſtreets and ſquares to exhort women of ill repute to repentance, and he entered into the very ſtews to preſs his admonitions upon them. One day he went into one of thoſe houſes in Roan, and ſat down by the fire to warm his feet. He was preſently ſurrounded by women who imagined he came thither to ſatisfy his luſt; but he immediately began to talk with them of very different things: he preached the word of life to them, and the mercy of the ſon of God. The chiefeſt of them, ſurprized at ſuch language, told him that for five and twenty years that ſhe had frequented that houſe, ſhe had never ſeen any body come in there that had ſpoke of God, or given them any hope of mercy; but that if ſhe could depend upon what he ſaid, ſhe would certainly change her courſe of life; and upon his repeated aſſurances of mercy, ſhe and her companions threw themſelves at Robert's feet, and promiſed to repent. He laid hold of that happy moment, and led them all out of the city into his deſert (8). ‘ In Vita beati Roberti de Arbriſſello legitur, quod Ordinem Sanctimonialium Fontis-Ebraldi inſtituit: & quod nudipes per plateas & vicos ire conſueverat, ut fornicarias ac peccatrices ad medicamentum pœnitentiæ poſſet adducere. Quadam ergo die, cùm veniſſet Rotomagum, Lupanar eſt ingreſſus, ſedenſque ad focum pedes calefacturus, à meretricibus circumdatur, æſtimantes eum causâ fornicandi eſſe ingreſſum. Sed prædicante eo verba vitæ, ac miſericordiam Chriſti eis promittente, una ex meretricibus, quæ cæteris præerat, dixit ei: quis es tu, qui talia loqueris? Scias pro certo, quia per viginti quinque annos, quibus hanc domum ad perpetranda ſcelera ſum ingreſſa, nunquam aliquis huc advenit, qui de Deo loqueretur, vel de ejus miſericordia præſumere nos faceret: tamen ſi ſcirem vera eſſe, &c (9).’ It is obſerved in the hiſtory of the works of the learned (10): ‘ That ſeveral other women of this ſort being alſo converted, Robert was forced to make a particular cloiſter for them, which he dedicated to St Mary Magdalen, whilſt he aſſigned another, dedicated to the bleſſed Virgin, to women of virtue and reputation.’ This ſhews the particular talent he had to gain this ſort of creatures (11), and his attachment to the ancient diſpline; for there are ſome fathers who were of opinion that thoſe Nuns, which had been violated, ought to be ſeparated from thoſe who never had that miſfortune (12).

[E] The order of Frontevaux was ſpread in thoſe provinces.] During his travels through Anjou, Poitou, and Touraine, in 1107, and 1108, he founded the monaſteries of Chamſournois, Lapuie, Loges, Relai, Gaine, and Gironde. In the year 1110 he went through Berry, and Bretagny, and founded the monaſtery of Orſan, in the dioceſe of Bourges. In the year 1112 he founded three in the dioceſes of Orleans and Poitiers, la Lande en Beauchene, Turon, and la Madelaine d'Orleans. In the year 1114 he preached in the Limoſin, Angoumois, and Perigort, and in the dioceſe of Toulouſe, and founded four monaſteries, Bourbon, la Gaſconiere, Cadouin, and l'Epinaſſe. It was at this time

---

(f) See the remark [F].

(5) See the Epiſt. to the Galatians, chap. ii, ver. 7, 8.

(6) Guilelmus Neubrigenſis, lib. i, de Rebus Anglicis, cap. xv, apud Joan. de la Mainferme, Tom. I, pag. 117.

(7) Joan. de la Mainferme, Clypei, Tom. I, pag. 118.

(8) Statim eas de civitate eduxit, & ad eremum cum eis gaudens perrexit, ibique peracta pœnitentia Chriſto fœliciter tranſmiſit. —— He immediately lead them out of the city, and brought them with joy to his ſolitude, where having fully performed their penitence, he happ ly led them to CHRIST. Id. ibid pag. 133, ex Codice manuſcripto (anno 1210) Abbatiæ de Vallibus Cernaii (l'Abbaïe des Vaux de Cernai) Ordinis Ciſtercienſis Diœceſis Pariſienſis.

(9) Idem, ex eodem Codice.

(10) Month of Auguſt, 1690, pag. 527, in the extracts of the ſecond Tome of the Clypeus.

(11) Quæ quidem omnia liquido oſtendunt Robertum ardenti zelo æſtuaſſe, dono ſpeciali præditum fuiſſe ad convertendas mulieres impuras, meretrices, & publicæ libidinis victimas imo de facto plurimas convertiſſe. Jo. de la Mainferme. Clyp. Tom. I, pag. 133.

(12) See Pope Leo the Firſt's 85th Letter, cap. ii and v.

Bertrade to take the habit of the order [F]; but ſhe did not wear it long; the auſterity of the order ſoon coſt her her life [G]. In the year 1115 he found in himſelf a ſenſible decay, and by the advice of ſeveral prelates, abbots, and monks, whom he had aſſembled together, he conferred the generalſhip of the order upon a woman (g). This diſpoſition has been very much cenſured [H]. The following year he recovered his ſtrength, and went through the dioceſe of Chartres, performing his uſual office of a preacher. He put an end to a diſpute, which ſeveral other perſons had attempted in vain, between Ives, biſhop of Chartres, and Bernard, abbot of Bonneval. He was no leſs ſucceſsful in a difference which happened between the count de Chartres and the canons, concerning the choice of a biſhop after the death of Ives. He fell ſick as he was preaching in the dioceſe of Bourges in 1117, and cauſed himſelf to be carried to the monaſtery of Orſan, where he died a few days after. The archbiſhop of Bourges, attended by his clergy, and a great number of gentlemen and plebeians, accompanied the body to the monaſtery of Frontevaux, where he ſolemnized his funeral twelve days after his deceaſe. The earl of Anjou, the archbiſhop of Tours, the biſhop of Angers, ſeveral abbots, and an incredible number of clergy and people went to meet the body before it came out of the dioceſe of Tours (b). Father de la Mainferme (i), a monk of Frontevaux, has publiſhed three apolegetical volumes, in which time that having gone over Languedoc and Guienne, he went into Auvergne, where he had religious conferences with the bleſſed Raingarda the mother of Peter the venerable (13).

[F] He perſuaded queen Bertrade to take the habit of the order.] This BERTRADE was the daughter of Simon de Montfort, and ſiſter of Amauri de Montfort earl of Evreux, and of William de Montfort biſhop of Paris. She was brought up in Normandy with her aunt, the counteſs d'Evreux, where Fulk Rechin, earl of Anjou, ſaw her, and fell in love with her. He married her in 1089. In 1092 or 1093, ſhe left him, to marry Philip I, king of France, with whom ſhe had had a private interview upon Whitſunday eve in the church of St John de Tours, while the canons of St Martin were bleſſing the fonts of the church. She went to Orleans where the king received her (14), and afterwards married her at Paris. The Pope excommunicated him by his legate in 1094, at the council of Autun, and he himſelf excommunicated him the following year at the council of Clermont. Philip put away Bertrade in 1096, and took her again in 1100: he was excommunicated a-freſh; but both he and ſhe obtained abſolution in 1105, having ‘ ſworn upon the ‘ holy goſpels not to cohabit carnally together, and ‘ never to ſee or ſpeak to one another but in the pre- ‘ ſence of unſuſpected perſons (15).’ The regiſter book of St Nicholas of Angers ſays, ‘ that in 1106, the ‘ ſixth of the ides of October, Philip was at Angers ‘ with Bertrade, and that Rechin received him there ‘ magnificently. No doubt it was at this time that ‘ Bertrade reconciled her two husbands, and made ‘ them a great entertainment, at which ſhe ſerved at ta- ‘ ble, as Orderic writes, who adds that Bertrade con- ‘ tinued with Philip to his death (16).’ It is very probable the Pope approved of their marriage; for their two ſons ‘ were declared capable of ſucceeding to ‘ the crown, as we are informed by Suger in the life ‘ of Lewis the burly. Bertrade had a dowry upon ‘ the demeſnes of the crown . . . . which dowry was ‘ the eſtate of Hautbruiere in the neighbourhood of ‘ Montfort, and in the dioceſe of Chartres, which is ‘ the place where ſhe founded a priory, having been ‘ received a nun at Fronteveaux by R. d'Arbriſſel, and ‘ in this retirement ſhe led an exemplary life to her ‘ death.’ She lived in Anjou after the death of king Philip, which happened in 1108. Mr Menage, from whom I borrow this (17), has corrected a prodigious number of faults which he had obſerved in ſeveral hiſtorians concerning this Bertrade. He does not ſay whether or no ſhe lived long after ſhe entered into a religious life; but we learn from William of Malmſbury that ſhe died ſoon after. ‘ Philippus, ſays he (18), ‘ in extremo vitæ, tactus morbo monachicum apud ‘ Floriacum accepit habitum (19). Pulchrius & fortu- ‘ natius illa (Bertrada), quod ætate & ſanitate integra, ‘ nec ſpecie rugata apud Fontem Evraldi Sanctimonia- ‘ lium appetiit velum. Nec multò poſt præſenti vitæ ‘ vale fecit: Deo forſitan providente, non poſſe deli- ‘ catæ mulieris corpus religionis laboribus inſervire ‘ —— Philip, ſays he, being in a bad ſtate of health, ‘ and near his end, took the monk's habit at Fleury. ‘ Bertrade took the veil at Frontevaux with more ho- ‘ nour and better fortune, as ſhe did it in full health, ‘ and the flower of her age, e'er her charms were im- ‘ paired by age. She died ſoon after; the providence of ‘ GOD perhaps being mindful, that a woman of ſo de- ‘ licate a frame could not ſuſtain the auſterities of a reli- ‘ gious life.’ The converſion of this laſcivious queen did a great deal of honour to Robert. She was ſo artful a woman that ſhe did what ſhe would with the king, and her firſt husband was frequently ſeen at her feet after ſhe had left him, ſaying a thouſand ſubmiſſive things. A baſeneſs equal at leaſt to the abject behaviour of Menelaus. ‘ Amore ejus ita captus eſt ‘ (Philippus) ut illa ſibi in omnibus imperaret, cum ‘ ipſe omnibus imperare cuperet (20). Bertrada vira- ‘ go faceta, & eruditiſſima illius admirandi muliebris ‘ artificii, quo conſueverunt audaces ſuis etiam laceſ- ‘ ſitos injuriis maritos ſuppeditare, Andegavenſem prio- ‘ rem maritum, licet thoro omnino repudiatum, ita ‘ mollificaverat, ut eam tanquam Dominam venerare- ‘ tur, & ſcabello pedum ejus ſæpius reſidens, ac ſi ‘ præſtigio fieret, voluntati ejus omnino obſequeretur ‘ (21). —— Philip was ſo paſſionately enamoured of ‘ her, that ſhe enjoyed an abſolute power over him, tho' ‘ he affected an univerſal power over others. Bertrade ‘ was a woman of great wit, and ſo exquiſitely skilled in ‘ that ſpecies of female cunning, by which the bold are ‘ uſed to work upon their husbands when they have un- ‘ juſtly provoked them, that ſhe ſo far mollified the duke ‘ of Anjou, though ſhe had entirely abandoned his bed, ‘ that he revered her as his ſovereign, and often ſitting ‘ on her footſtool, as if conſtrained by magic force, en- ‘ tirely ſubmitted himſelf to her pleaſure.’ It is thought ſhe took the veil at Frontevaux about the year 1115.

[G] The auſterity of the order ſoon coſt her her life.] We have already ſeen (22) that William of Malmsbury conjectured that the providence of GOD ſo ordered it, that the delicate body of this queen was unable to undergo the toils of religion. It was better perhaps that ſhe ſhould ſoon ſink under them; for if they had only emaciated her body, it were to have been feared that a tedious languiſhing ſtate would have given her a diſtaſte for a monaſtic liſe, and made her regret the flattering pleaſures ſhe had forſaken. However that be, here is the proof of my text. ‘ Anno 1115 aut cir- ‘ citer Bertradam Reginam ad inſtitutum Font-Ebral- ‘ denſe tandem pellectam Robertus in monaſterio Al- ‘ ta-Brueria dicto collocavit. Victu cultuque in primis ‘ aſpero atque horrido utens, vita ſtatim privata eſt ‘ (23).’ Upon this occaſion was verified the maxim, Nullum violentum durabile.

[H] This diſpoſition has been very much cenſured.] There is nothing more ſingular in the monaſtic world (24), than to ſee a large order of monks and nuns acknowledge a woman for their head and general; as the monks and nuns of the order of Frontevaux are obliged by their inſtitution to do. Robert d'Arbriſſel their founder would have it ſo. He made a law diametrically oppoſite to the Salic law: he was not ſatisfied with allowing that the order might fall to the diſtaff, but appointed that a woman ſhould always ſucceed a woman in the dignity of head and general of the order. Father de la Mainferme ſets apart the third volume of his work to vindicate this conduct of the founder. He anſwers all the common objections that

(g) Abbatiſſam toti ſuo Ordini Petronillam de Camilliaco præpoſuit. Clyp. naſcentis Ord. Fontebraldenſis, Tom. II, p. 502.

(b) Taken from the ſecond Tome of the Clypeus naſcentis Fontebraldenſis Ordinis, at the end, where there is a chronological Abridgment of the life of Robert d'Arbriſſel, with references to the places where every thing is related more at large.

(i) The firſt volume of his Clypeus was printed in 1684, the ſecond in 1688, the third in 1692.

(13) Taken from the Clypeus naſcentis of Father Mainſerme, Tom. II, pag. 500, 501.

(14) Rex libidinoſus Philippus Turonis venit, & cum uxore Fulconis locutus eam fieri Reginam conſtituit. Peſſima illa, Conſule dimiſſo, nocte ſequenti Regem ſequitur, qui Mindraico prope pontem Bevronis milites dimiſerat, qui eam Aurelianis duxerunt. Menage, Hiſt. de Sablé, liv. iii, chap. xvi, pag. 85, 86, ex Geſtis Conſulum Andegavenſium.

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 89.

(16) Ibid.

(17) Ibid.

(18) Lib. v, de Geſtis Regum Anglorum, apud La Mainferme, Clyp. Tom. II, pag. 137.

(19) Father de la Mainferme, ibid. pag. 138, 139, ſhews this to be falſe.

(20) Vincentius Bellovacus, Spec. lib. xxvi, cap. lxxxviii, apud La Mainferme, Clyp. Tom. II, pag. 141.

(21) Sugerius, in vita Ludovici Groſſi, cap. xvii, apud eundem, ibid.

(22) Above, at the end of citat. (18).

(23) La Mainferme, Tom. II, pag. 502.

(24) See, in the remark [P], at citat. ‡, the words of Charles du Moulin.

which he takes abundance of pains to juſtify his patriarch, who had been charged by ſome with going to bed to his nuns [I], not indeed with a deſign to enjoy them, but in order to expoſe himſelf to greater temptations. This ſcene has been repreſented in the News from the republic of letters [K]. That monk's vivacity and zeal againſt the authors that are made, and inſiſts very much upon this, that the Bleſſed Virgin commanded GOD himſelf; for it is ſaid in ſcripture that JESUS CHRIST was ſubject to his mother. If GOD, the eternal being, the creator of all things, made no difficulty to obey a woman, ſhall we men, inconſiderable creatures as we are, dare to refuſe it? If ever the church of Rome did willfully what it is pretended ſhe did without knowing it under the reign of Pope Joan, ſhe would find her apology ready drawn up in father Mainferme's book; and I do not ſee, if the apology of Frontevaux paſſes muſter, why they ſhould make any ſcruple of creating a ſhe-Pope, Add to this, that, according to the hypotheſis of the votaries of the church of Rome, GOD has given the empire of the world to the holy Virgin: nothing is more common in the writings of thoſe men than the titles of queen of heaven, queen of the angels, when they ſpeak of the Virgin; and this is alſo the language of their public worſhip, I mean of the church hymns. A monk of Frontevaux one day made uſe of this reaſon: father Mainferme relates it without finding any fault with it (25). 'It happened once 'that a monk who ſhall be nameleſs, who could hard'ly digeſt that part of our inſtitution, ſpeaking of this 'matter, told me, that our kingdom was under petticoat 'government. In which indeed he ſpoke better than 'he thought, and did us a great deal of honour contra'ry to his intention. For it is true, it is under petti'coat government, as is alſo the whole kingdom of the 'univerſe of heaven and earth, under female govern'ment, in as much as it is governed by the power and 'ſovereign authority of her, who, like a virtuous wo'man, manum ſuam miſit ad fortia; & digiti ejus ap'prehenderant fuſum. Pr. 31. v. 19.'

[I] Some have charged him with going to bed to his nuns.] The accuſation is founded upon a letter of Geoffry abbot of Vendôme. That abbot's letters were publiſhed by father Sirmond, in 1610, from a manuſcript in the abbey of la Couture. One of thoſe letters was written to our Robert, to inform him of the ſcandalous report that was ſpread concerning his conduct, and of the inconveniences which might ariſe from it. Let us hear the words of the letter (26): 'Fœminarum quaſdam, ut dicitur, nimis fami'liariter tecum habitare permittis, & cum ipſis etiam, '& inter ipſas, noctu frequenter cubare non erube'ſcis. Hoc ſi modò agis, vel aliquando egiſti, no'vum, & inauditum ſed infructuoſum martyrii genus 'inveniſti . . . . . . Mulierum quibuſdam, ſicut fama 'ſparſit, & nos ante diximus, ſæpe privatim loqueris, '& earum accubitu novo martyrii genere cruciaris. '—— It is ſaid, you ſuffer ſome of the women to live 'with you in too great familiarity, and ſcruple not to 'lie with them and amongſt them frequently in the 'night. If this be or has been your practice, you have 'found indeed a new and unheard of, but a fruitleſs 'kind of martyrdom? It is reported, as I ſaid before, 'that you converſe in private with ſome of the women, 'and inflict upon yourſelf a new kind of martyrdom by 'lying with them.' There is another letter which is aſcribed to Marbodus biſhop of Rennes, containing the ſame informations (27): 'Mulierum cohabitatio'nem diceris plus amare. Has ergo non ſolum com'muni menſa per diem, ſed & communi accubitu per 'noctem dignaris, ut referunt. —— It is reported that 'you are too fond of living with women, and that you 'do not only admit them at your table by day, but into 'your bed at night.' He blames Robert for making young girls take the habit too raſhly, and repreſents to him the ill ſucceſs of ſuch a proceeding. Some of them, perceiving the ninth month draw on, had broke out of the cloiſter to lye-in elſewhere, and others had been brought to bed in the middle of their cells. 'Taceo 'de juvenculis, quas ſine examine religionem profeſ'ſas mutata veſte per diverſas cellulas protinus incluſi'ſti. Hujus igitur facti temeritatem miſerabilis exitus 'probat. Aliæ enim urgente partu, fractis ergaſtulis 'elapſæ ſunt, aliæ in ipſis ergaſtulis pepererunt (28).' Note, I. that in the letter to Geoffry of Vendôme, Robert d'Arbriſſel is accuſed with having a reſpect to perſons. There are ſome women, ſays he, with whom you are always in a good humour, briſk, active, free, ſo complaiſant, that you take all occaſions to expreſs your civility; but for others, if at any time you condeſcend to ſpeak to them, it is to reproach them; you treat them with great rigour, and leave them expoſed to hunger, thirſt, and cold. 'Illis ſiquidem te ſemper 'ſermone jocundum oſtendis, & alacrem actione, om'neque genus humanitatis exhibes, nulla ſervata par'citate. Et iterùm. Aliis verò, ſi quando cum ipſis 'loqueris, ſemper locutione nimis durus appares, ni'mis diſtrictus correctione: illas etiam fame, & ſiti ac 'nuditate crucias omni relicta pietate (29).' This is inſinuating what Theophilus Raynaud affirms (30), I mean that Robert choſe out the pretirieſt, when he had a mind to expoſe himſelf to temptation by lying with a woman. Note, in the ſecond place, that Father Mainferme does not quote the whole paſſage in Marbodus's pretended letter. I have ſeen it much more compleat in Mr Menage (31), and there I find that they put Robert in mind of his having formerly been faulty with reſpect to women. I find alſo another reflexion upon him, which I ſhall hereafter mention (32).

[K] This ſcene has been repreſented in the news from the commonwealth of letters.] See the ſecond article of the month of April 1686: it is an abſtract of the firſt volume of the Clypeus naſcentis Fontebraldenſis Ordinis. The author of the abſtract has compared to Tantalus a man that ſhould pitch upon ſuch a kind of mortification as that imputed to our Robert. But as there is no compariſon but what is lame, this of Tantalus in ſome reſpects would not agree to the director of theſe nuns. He would ſuffer hunger and thirſt in ſight of a remedy, but he could not be certain that the remedy would retire from him in proportion as he advanced towards it. The compariſon with thoſe curious phyſicians, who ſtudy ſo attentively the cauſes of phænomena, would only be true in ſome reſpects. Their meditations, their ſearches are only glancing upon nature; the ſecret they look for is in a veſſel which they can only touch the brim of; in vain do they turn and wind about, they find no more than the circumference of the circle, without ever arriving at the centre of it. This is an emblem of Robert, with this difference, that he was not deſirous as they are of penetrating to the bottom of the myſtery (33). I am far from affirming what they ſay of him; for I find a great ſtrength in his apologiſt's arguments; but it cannot be imagined how many heretics there have been, who, profeſſing to abſtain from marriage, and the full enjoyment of the fair ſex, yet would lie with women, embrace them, and omit no manner of præludia. See the proceedings of the inquiſition of Toulouſe (34) printed at Amſterdam 1692: I ſhall quote ſomething out of it in the article GUILLEMETE. See alſo what the biſhop of Meaux reports from St Bernard againſt the Henricians, at the ſixty ninth paragraph of the eleventh book of the hiſtory of Variations. It is a ſign that there is no deluſion or chimera, which does not enter into the heart of man. The greateſt danger they can fall into, who are under vows of continence, is to think upon the objects they have renounced, or to ſee them in certain circumſtances. Witneſs the Hermit who ſaw Brandimart in the arms of his dear Fleurdelis (35):

Hor ſtando inginochiato in oratione,
Vide far' à color quel gioco ſtrano:
E vennegli ſi fatta tentatione,
Ch'il Breviario gli cade di mano.

Whilſt the holy hermit is on his knees, he ſpies the ſtrange tranſaction between the two lovers, which raiſes ſuch a ferment in his breaſt, that he lets his breviary fall out of his hand.

What would have become of him in a preludium: Admiſſus circum præcordia ludens (36)? Would he have had the reſolution of St Aldhelme? But not to be too tedious, I ſhall ſpeak of this ſaint in the remark [C] of the article FRANCIS of ASSISE.

[L] That

---

(25) Tom. III, pag. 21. He cites brother E. Martin, author of a book intituled, Le Sejour du Verbe incarne dans les entrailles immaculées de la Vierge.

(26) See the Clypeus naſcentis, ubi ſupra, Tom. I, Diſſert. I, pag. 38.

(27) Id. pag. 41.

(28) Id. pag. 69.

(29) Id. pag. 66

(30) See. below, remark [L], citat. (42).

(31) See, the remark [P], at citat. †.

(32) Rem. [P].

(33) Ἡ θέμις ἀνθρώπων πέλει ἀνδρῶν ἠδὲ γυναικῶν Πώποτε τῆς εὐνῆς ἐπιβήμεναι ἠδὲ μιγῆναι.
To male and female juſtice this commands,
To fly the folds of love, and Hymen's luſtful bands.

(34) Pag. 380, & ſeq.

(35) See Marigni's letters.

(36) Apply here theſe two verſes:
Omne vafer vitium ridenti Flaccus amico
Tangit, & admiſſus circum præcordia ludit.
To touch the ſoul the way ſly Horace found,
And pleas'd the patient while he prob'd his wound.
Perſius, Sat. I, ver. 116.

authors of ſuch a charge is not to be wondered at [L]: He had a delicate point to manage [M], and the utmoſt art was neceſſary to vindicate his hero. He denies the fact, which was the only method to apologize for him; for nothing is more inconſiſtent either with internal or external purity, than the pretended mortification of reſiſting temptations raiſed by one's ſelf. The trueſt triumph is to keep as far as poſſible from [L] That monk's vivacity and zeal againſt the authors of ſuch a charge is not to be wondered at.] He takes ſeveral methods to do this: he denies the genuineneſs of the two letters; he maintains that Geoffry of Vendôme did not write that which goes under his name; and thinks it very ſtrange that the Jeſuit Sirmond ſhould publiſh it as genuine, and ſhould put in the index, mira Roberti ſimplicitas & confidentia. He diſputes againſt father Alexander, who maintained that it was Geoffry of Vendôme's letter, and lays hold of that Dominican's confeſſion that the letter aſcribed to Marbodus is ſuppoſititious (37). He pretends (38) that the heretic Roſcelin, condemned as a tritheiſt in a council, is the author of a letter that Sirmond has publiſhed among thoſe of Geoffry of Vendôme. This is the opinion of cardinal Bona, and of the jeſuits Bollandus and Henſchenius, as he does not forget to obſerve (39). He adds, that father Sirmond, having conſidered all things, came into the ſame ſentiment (40). He quotes Theophilus Raynaud, who was of the ſame opinion (41). He blames father Alexander for denying that Sirmond had retracted and deſigned to have left out this letter in a new edition. He complains that this Jeſuit did a great injury to the bleſſed Robert d'Arbriſſel, and he alledges a paſſage out of father Theophilus Raynaud (42), which is founded only upon the letter publiſhed by father Sirmond. Theſe are the words he quotes. 'Feciſſe hoc Robertum de Arbruſcellis legitur cum omni deteſtatione apud Goffridum Vindocinenſem; nec ſane poteſt ulla par eſſe deteſtatio inconſultiſſimi facti quo dicitur (43) cum ſpecioſiſſima quaque ſacrarum Virginum, cum nuda nudus in eodem lecto cubuiſſe, ut nequicquam frendentem & adhinnientem appetitum in tam illecebroſi objecti præſentia novo martyrii genere afficeret. —— We read with the utmoſt deteſtation in Geoffry of Vendôme that Robert d'Arbriſſel did it. Nor can any averſion be equal to that of a moſt unaccountable fact; for a man to lie naked with the moſt beautiful of the ſacred virgins naked likewiſe, in order to martyr his appetite by ſtifling his furious deſires, and luſtful emotions, ariſing from the preſence of ſo powerful a tempter.' He ſhews that the time cannot be aſſigned when Geoffry of Vendôme could write ſuch a letter, and he urges a great many reaſons to prove that that abbot never thought Robert deſerved ſuch a reproof. He maintains that the other is neither Marbodus's, biſhop of Rennes, nor Hilderbert's, biſhop of Mans (44), and afterwards archbiſhop of Tours; but that it was forged, either by Roſcelin, or ſome other wicked prieſt (45). I forgot to ſay that he cites (46) a certificate importing that the manuſcript of the works of Geoffry of Vendôme, which is kept as an original in the monaſtery of the holy Trinity at Vendôme does not contain the letter in diſpute. The prior (47) of that monaſtery gave this certificate the third of Febr. 1652. Laſtly, father Mainferme produces a great number of proofs, taken from the elogies and favours which Robert received from the moſt eminent perſons at that time, both ſecular and eccleſiaſtical, and he clears him from all aſperſions which might be laid to his charge. I ſhall only take notice of one which cometh up neareſt to the imputation in hand.

It is pretended that when he went abroad to preach, he carried a great many women with him. This, father de la Mainferme denies. He confeſſes only that this holy man ſometimes took with him in his travels Petronilla Abbeſs of the order, and Angardis prioreſs of Frontevaux, which was no ſcandal to pious ſouls: on the contrary, they were once received with the utmoſt hoſpitality in the abbey of Dol; the fathers of the monaſtery omitted nothing that might do honour to their gueſts. 'Cùm jam cœptum iter ageret conſociatâ ſibi Petronillâ, aliiſque nonnullis, quadam die apud Dolenſem Abbatiam hoſpitalitatis gratiâ pervenit. Quem monachi ejuſdem cœnobii læti ſuſcipientes, hoſpitalitatis jura ei honorificè præbuerunt, ut eorum animas prædicationis ſanctæ pabulo reficere dignaretur, humillimè poſtulaverunt (48). —— Having begun his progreſs, attended by Petronilla and ſome others, he came one day to the abbey of Dol. The monks of the convent received him with joy, and treated him with the greateſt honour and hoſpitality, moſt humbly intreating him to refreſh their ſouls with the food of his holy preaching.' The paſſage in Marbodus's letter, cited by Mr Menage, and which may be ſeen below in remark [P], citation †, teſtifies that Robert was reproached with taking a great many women with him in his travels, and diſperſing great numbers of them in divers provinces in the inns and hoſpitals promiſcuouſly with the men, under pretence of ſerving the poor and ſtrangers. It is added that this fine management had produced a ſufficient number of children, to put it beyond all doubt that Robert had expoſed the honour of his ſhe-followers to very great danger.

[M] It is certainly a delicate point.] Sins of uncleanneſs are not of the ſame nature with thoſe that are to be vanquiſhed by attacking, by preventing, and falling upon them. The ſureſt way to obtain the victory is by a running fight, or rather a downright flight. Is it not then ſtrange raſhneſs, and a criminal contempt of that wiſe advice, Quiſquis amat periculum peribit in illo, He that ſeeks danger will periſh in it, to go and provoke ſo dangerous an enemy, and to attack him even in his ſtrong holds. Arbriſſel ought ſcarce to have looked him in the face, and he was raſh enough to take him by the neck, as it is reported, in order to wreſtle with him:

Cervi, luporum præda rapacium,
  Sectamus ultro, quos opimus
    Fallere & effugere eſt triumphus (49).

We feeble ſtags the rav'nous wolf defy,
And madly follow what we ought to fly:
To ſcape from ſuch a foe is victory.

Thoſe who make a vow of chaſtity, if they are wiſe, ought ardently to ſeek the gift of forgetfulneſs, and expel the images of impurity at their very entrance, ſo far from being allowed to lie near the living objects. Though they were ſure of ſucceſs, yet are they obliged to avoid ſuch a combat like the plague: charity to one's neighbour enjoins ſuch a flight. Are they ſure of their ſhe-companion? Is it not morally certain that a woman, who ſuffers a man to lie by her, is very much inclined to refuſe him nothing? Is ſhe not fortified in this diſpoſition by the nearneſs of a man's body to her? and does not this neighbourhood raiſe thoughts and deſires in her, which ſhe would be free from if ſhe was left to ſleep alone (50)? See what Montagne ſays of women married to old men. 'They are, ſays he (51), in full wedlock in a worſe condition than maids and widows. We think them well provided, becauſe they have a man lying by them . . . But on the contrary, they are therefore the more diſtreſſed, becauſe the contact and company of a male excites that warmth which would be leſs moved if they were alone.' So that theſe devout adventurers, theſe ſeekers of alluring opportunities, theſe anchorites, who, to ſignalize the bravery of their continency, creep into bed with a young girl, only throw oil upon a fire hid under the aſhes. Are they not anſwerable for the laſcivious deſires they kindle there? It is very probable that moſt of them do not deſire a compleat victory. If they do not fully ſatisfy, at leaſt they amuſe their filthy luſt. They put themſelves upon the ſame foot with thoſe who ſay, Amare liceat, ſi potiri non licet. Eſt quodam prodire tenus, ſi non datur ultra. Let us have a little morſel: let us enjoy the foretaſtes. They do as thoſe husbands mentioned in Seneca's controverſies. 'Novimus, inquit, iſtam maritorum abſtinentiam, qui etiamſi primam virginibus timidis remiſere noctem, vicinis tamen locis ludunt (52). —— I know, ſays he, that ſome husbands have had ſo much abſtinence as to indulge the maid's fears the firſt night, yet they play about the confines.' It is therefore a nice point, and father de la Mainferme is to be commended for attempting the apology of the founder of his order.

[N] The

---

(37). See the eighth ſection of the firſt Diſſertation.

(38) Tom. I. Diſſert. I, pag. 4, 5.

(39) Id. pag. 14.

(40) Bollandus aſſures it upon a hearſay. Idem. pag. 15.

(41) In Triade fortium David. pag. 46.

(42) Taken from pag. 132, of his treatiſe de Sobria alterius ſexus frequentatione.

(43) Here Father Mainferme makes this note, Falſo ſcribit Theophilus id legi apud Gotfridum, Epiſt. xlvii, lib. iv. See upon this falſe quotation of Theoph. Raynaud, the News from the Common-wealth of Learning, for April, 1686, pag. 391.

(44) It is found among Hildebert's letters in the manuſcript of St Victor's library at Paris. See Clypeum, Diſſert. I, pag. 61.

(45) Ubi ſupra, pag. 91.

(46) Ib. pag. 59.

(47) Vincent Marſolle. He was general of the congregation of St Maur.

(48) De la Mainferme, Clyp. Diſſert. I, pag. 161.

(49) Horat. Ode iv, lib. iv, ver. 50.

(50) She might ſay, Qui me commôrit, melius non tangere clamo. Whoe're provokes me may his raſhneſs rue. Horat. Sat i, lib. ii, ver. 45.

(51) Montagne, Eſſais, liv. iii, chap. v, pag. m. 123, 124.

(52) Seneca, Controver II, lib. i, pag. m. 59.

from ſuch an enemy [N], and never to think on him, and it would be the groſſeſt folly, as well as the moſt intolerable impertinence, to ſay, that, as there have been ſecular

[N] The trueſt triumph is to keep as far as poſſible from ſuch an enemy.] I have already touched upon this in the beginning of the preceding remark; but I reaſſume it, in order to fortify this ſalutary advice with good authorities. Firſt let us ſee what Socrates adviſed his diſciples. ‘ Thinkeſt thou, fool! ſays he (53), that amorous kiſſes are not poiſoned, becauſe thou doſt not ſee the poiſon of them? know that a beautiful woman is a more dangerous animal than a ſcorpion, becauſe that cannot wound us unleſs it touch us, but beauty ſtrikes us at a diſtance; on what ſide ſoever we perceive it, it darts it's venom upon us, and overthrows our reaſon. It is perhaps for this cauſe that love is repreſented with a bow and arrows, becauſe a fine face wounds us from afar. Wherefore I adviſe thee, Xenophon, when thou ſpieſt a beauty, to fly from it without looking behind thee, and as for thee, Critobulus, I believe it will be proper thou ſhouldeſt be abſent a whole year, nor will that be too long a time to cure thee of thy wound.’ Add to this what Jerom ſaid to thoſe who did not approve of a retirement into the deſert, and who pretended that this was not to combat vice, but to fly from it, and that only thoſe who combated and overcame deſerved the crown. He anſwered among other things, that the ſafeſt way was always to be choſen, and that therefore it were better to fly than to remain in the field of battle, where, if on the one ſide we may be victorious, on the other we may alſo be overcome. We are not ſafe, added he, when we ſleep near a ſerpent: it may happen that he will not bite us, and it may happen that he will. He expreſſes himſelf ſo well upon this head that I cannot forbear tranſcribing his own words, which are ſo many thunder-bolts, with reſpect to the conduct attributed to d'Arbriſſel. ‘ Qui ſciens imbecillitatem ſuam, & vas fragile, quod portat, timet offendere, ne impingat, corruat, atque frangatur. Unde & mulierum, maximeque adoleſcentularum vitat aſpectum & in tantum caſtigator ſui eſt, ut etiam quæ tuta ſunt, pertimeſcat. Cur, inquies, pergis ad eremum? videlicet ut te non audiam, non videam, ut tuo furore non movear, ut tua bella non patiar, nè me capiat oculus meretricis; ne me forma pulcherrima ad illicitos ducat amplexus. Reſpondebis: hoc non eſt pugnare, ſed fugere; ſta in acie: adverſariis armatus obſiſte: ut poſtquam viceris, coroneris. Fateor imbecillitatem meam. Nolo ſpe pugnare victoriæ, nè perdam aliquando victoriam. Si fugero, gladium devitavi; ſi ſtetero, aut vincendum mihi, aut cadendum. Quid autem neceſſe eſt certa dimittere, & incerta ſectari? Aut ſcuto, aut pedibus mors vitanda eſt. Tu, qui pugnas, & ſuperari potes, & vincere; ego cùm fugero, non vinco in eo, quod fugio: ſed ideò fugio, nè vincar. Nulla ſecuritas eſt, vicino ſerpente, dormire. Poteſt fieri, ut me non mordeat: tamen fieri poteſt ut aliquando me mordeat (54). —— Who being conſcious of his own infirmity, and ſenſible that the veſſel which he carries is brittle, is afraid to make a falſe ſtep, leſt he ſhould fall, and break it. For which reaſon he ſhuns the ſight of women, eſpecially of the younger ſort, and keeps ſo ſtrict a guard over himſelf as to be afraid in the midſt of ſecurity. you will ask the reaſon of my retiring into ſolitude. It is that I may not hear, or ſee you, that I may not be moved with your fury, that I may not be expoſed to a war with you, that no leud eye may enſlave me, that no raviſhing beauty lead me to forbidden embraces. You will anſwer, this is not to fight but to fly; keep your rank, ſtand to your arms, that when you have conquered you may receive the crown. I own my weakneſs. I would not fight in hopes of victory, leſt I ſhould fail in the ſucceſs. If I fly, I eſcape the ſword. If I encounter, I muſt conquer or fall. But where is the neceſſity of quitting certainty and following uncertainty. Death may be avoided either by fighting or by flying. You who fight may be either conquered or a conqueror. I, who fly, do not conquer in that I fly; but I fly that I may not be conquered. No man can ſleep in ſafety when a ſerpent's near him. It is poſſible it may not bite, and it is poſſible it ſometimes may.’ The author of a book, printed at Paris in 1630, intituled Le Miroir des Chanoines, has collected together a great number of ſentences which loudly condemn the raſh behaviour of thoſe who come as near danger as they can. Joſeph, ſays he (55), left his mantle without ſtaying to contend with Potiphar's wife, becauſe the touch of a woman is contagious and venemous, and ought to be as much dreaded as the bite of a mad dog. This is St Jerome's compariſon. Ipſe mulieris contactus quaſi contagioſus & venenatus eſt, viro fugiendus, non minus quàm rabidiſſimi canis morſus (56). Our author adds that St Jordan, in St Antoninus †, ſeverely chides a monk for only touching a woman's hand. Why, ſaid the monk, ſhe is a devout woman. No matter for that, replied St Jordan, the earth is good, and water is good: but if thoſe two elements are mixed, from thence proceeds nothing but dirt . . . . . ⸸. ‘ St Jerome knowing what prejudice the converſation of Women, though free from ſuſpicion and ſcandal, did to clergymen; Hoſpitiolum tuum (ſays he) aut raro, aut nunquam mulierum pedes terant: quia non poteſt toto corde cum Deo habitare, qui fœminarum acceſſibus copulatur: fœmina ſecum pariter habitantis conſcientiam exurit, fœminæ nomen tuum noverint, vultum neſciant. Let the feet of women ſeldom or never tread thy chamber floor, becauſe he that delights in the converſation of women cannot devote his heart entirely to God. A woman burns the conſcience of him ſhe dwells with, let women know thy name, not thy face . . . . nor do thou know theirs . . . . . ‡ St Cyprian ſubtilly and learnedly confutes thoſe daring ſpirits, who preſume upon their own integrity ſo much, that they fear nothing from women, generouſly hoping to come off clear without engaging in the leaſt their holy affections. His words are as follow: It is impoſſible to be ſurrounded with flames and not to be burnt; it is more expedient to fear well than to preſume ill. It is better for a man to confeſs himſelf weak, that he may become ſtrong, than to pretend to be ſtrong and prove weak. He deceives himſelf, who thinks himſelf to be ſomething and really is nothing. Who can carry fire in his boſom, and his cloaths not be burnt? true, but I would conquer that I may triumph. Haſt thou not thy own fleſh to contend with and overcome? why ſhouldſt thou deſire laurels from another climate? the fleſh luſteth againſt the ſpirit, and the ſpirit againſt the fleſh. Let it be ſaid once for all. The converſation of women is the devil's bird-lime to catch and enſlave men . . . (57) Horrid blindneſs! to chuſe to live in a place where we muſt every day neceſſarily either periſh or overcome, and to imagine to ſleep ſafely near a viper. * Quid tibi neceſſe (ſays St Jerome) in ea verſari domo, in qua neceſſe habeas quotidie aut perire, aut vincere? quis unquam mortalium, juxta viperam ſecuros ſomnos capit?’ Our author afterwards giving, ſome preſcriptions againſt the motions of the fleſh, places abſtinence in the firſt place, frequenting good company in the ſecond, and then he ſays (58), that the third will be never to come near women, but to ſee them afar off, as Lacides, in Laërtius, told king Attalus he ſhould look at pictures. . . .  St Auſtin upon theſe words of St Paul, fly fornication, obſerves that St Paul does not ſay reſiſt but fly, becauſe victory is ſurer by flight than by reſiſtance: Contra libidinis impetum apprehende fugam, ſi vis obtinere victoriam, nec tibi verecundum ſit fugere, ſi caſtitatis palmam deſideras obtinere.

Tu fugiendo fuga, quem fuga ſola fugat.

Defeat by flight, what flight alone defeats,

Theſe maxims, ſo true and ſo important in themſelves, and beſides ſo conſiderable on account of the veneration that is paid to thoſe great ſaints, who have laid them down in their writings, are very often inculcated into the minds of thoſe who have moſt need of them. The ſame things are preached every day to them; they are preſſed in an infinite number of books; and yet thoſe perſons continue in the cuſtom of willingly expoſing themſelves to danger. One would think they ſet up for bravery, and that flight ſeems to them as ignominious an act of cowardice as

---

(53) Xenophon's remarkable things of Socrates, lib. i, p. 58.

(54) Hieronym. Epiſt. adver. Vigilant. It is the 13th of the third book, in the edition I uſe, pag. 563.

(55) Vital Bernard, Canon of the cathedral church of Puy. Miroir des Chanoines, pag. 240.

(56) Hieronym. lib. i, contra Jovinian. cited by Vital Bernard, ibid.

† D. Antonin. 3, p. tit. 23, c. 9, §. 5.

⸸ D Hieron. Ep. ad Nepot. ſub. fin.

‡ D. Cypr. de ſingul. Cler.

(57) The ſame Vital Bernard, Miroir des Chanoines, pag. 252.

* D. Hieron. lib. ii, Ep. ix.

(58) Vital. ubi ſupra, pag. 273.

 D. Aug. Ser. 250, de tem.

lar men, who have paſſed whole nights in bed with women without enjoying them [O], with much more reaſon it ought to be ſuppoſed that a monk ſhould be able to refrain upon ſuch occaſions. Mr Menage deſerves to be conſulted upon the proofs father de la Mainferme has rejected [P]. But more particularly ſhould we conſult the Apologetical it does to military men. They advance to the combat with boldneſs and chearfulneſs. The fair ſex, in whom courage is not required, yet ſhew a great deal of intrepidity upon this account: they are as ready to receive viſits in their cloiſters as the others are to pay them: both parties behave themſelves as if neither feared to be vanquiſhed, and it is very probable this ſecurity is not ſo much founded upon a knowledge of their own ſtrength, as upon an unwillingneſs to come off victorious in this conflict; and at the worſt the conflict itſelf, whatever may be the event of it, is not without it's charms: if a victory follows, it is ſo much gained upon nature; if they are foiled, it is ſo much gained for her. Let this be ſaid without prejudice to thoſe, who ſincerely keep the vows of chaſtity they have made, and who without doubt, if they do not happen to follow St Jerome's advice, are ſure their viſits, their long converſations, &c. will not excite ill deſires in them. But they would infallibly condemn that exceſs of raſhneſs which ſome have thought the founder of Frontevaux guilty of.

[O] There have been men, who have paſſed whole nights in bed with women without enjoying them.] Montagne affirms this. 'I do not look upon it, ſays he (59), as a miracle, as the queen of Navarre does in one of the tales of her Heptameron, (a diverting book in it's kind) nor a very difficult thing, to ſpend whole nights with the utmoſt freedom with a miſtreſs long courted, and keep a promiſe of going no farther than meer kiſſing.' He ſays in another place (60), that his father would 'tell of ſtrange intimacies, that he had had with very honeſt women without any ſuſpicions. And as to himſelf, he ſwore (61) ſolemnly that he had known no woman before his wife, tho' he did not marry till he was thirty three years of age, and had been a long time in the Italian wars.' If we may credit leud men, the caſe mentioned by this writer is nothing extraordinary. When theſe people are to tell their adventures, they proteſt they have ſometimes been forced to proceed gradually, and have not been allowed the laſt favour, till they have been proved whether they would keep their promiſe of being contented with leſſer ones. Some tell, without naming perſons, they could have done what they would, but they have abſtained, that they might not be embaraſſed with ill conſequences, or would not expoſe the woman to the diſhonour ſhe was afraid of. Let us grant to thoſe, who would make uſe of ſuch adventures, to make it probable that ſome Monks have been victorious over the moſt alluring opportunities; let us grant them, I ſay, that the paſſion of leud men is not always ſo impetuous, but that ſometimes it will ſtop of itſelf by the conſideration of certain circumſtances: what uſe will they make of this to juſtify thoſe Monks? do theſe debauchees refrain, without committing impurities, which in the judgment of moderate caſuiſts come up to mortal ſin, and ſometimes in the opinion of other caſuiſts to a ſin exceeding that of enjoyment? if the pretended victory of theſe Monks was ſomething of this nature, would it not really be the triumph of luſt, and not of chaſtity? and in proceeding thus againſt them, we muſt not ſpare their ſhe-companions: their raſhneſs was ſtill more unwarrantable than that of the men. Nor can the prudence of women, who thus expoſe themſelves, be better defended than their chaſtity. Common prudence would tell them, that neither promiſes nor oaths are to be depended upon, but that they ought to ſecure themſelves in a better way. This puts me in mind of an adventure I have read in a little book which was printed at Paris and in Holland in 1682. The ſtory is this: the adventurer ſpeaks; his name is Pontignan. 'I was in the country, ſays he (62), with two amiable ladies, and I loved them both after my manner. I had declared to each of them ſingly my kindneſs for them, and had no reaſon to be diſſatisfied with their anſwer. One evening, as I was alone in my apartment, and in my night-gown, in came the two ladies, and told me that, to put a trick upon a gentleman, who was with us, they muſt ſwaddle me up. They told me what the trick was. I was pleaſed with the conceit, and conſented very merrily to be ſwaddled. They took me in my night-gown juſt as I was, and wrapped me about with I believe more than a hundred ells of linnen, cut like ſwathes. I was juſt like an Egyptian mummy . . . . when I was thus equipped like a mummy, they told me, well, Pontignan, a well bred gentleman does not refuſe to lie with ladies when they deſire him. We have both of us promiſed thee favours, which we are ready to grant. Ah! wicked creatures, cried I, take away theſe ſwathes, and do what you will with me. No, no, ſaid they, thoſe will be no hinderance: and upon that they ordered me to be carried to one of their houſes, and put to bed all ſwaddled as I was, and the two gypſies placed themſelves on each ſide of me. The chamber was full of lights, and I could ſee them in fine and alluring night dreſſes. I had neither hands, legs, nor any thing in the world at liberty. I was buried in linnen, and had only my eyes out, which made me mad. You may eaſily imagine the condition I was in: ſometimes I begged them to let me have an arm, or hand, or only one finger. Sometimes I ſtruggled hard to get free from my bands; ſo that once the ladies thought I had broke them, and jumped out of bed, crying out both of them, we are undone. They were in the right of it; for truly if I had been in a condition to have been revenged, I ſhould have forced them to have cried for mercy. Sometimes I threatned to diſgrace them by falling aſleep by them, which yet I ſhould have found it hard to have done. They only anſwered me by inſulting me for the good fortune I loſt, and by little careſſes, for which I could freely have beaten them. I never paſſed ſuch a night in my life.' This was a well contrived caution (63): thoſe ladies, as immodeſt as they may be repreſented, were more prudent than the devout women of Frontevaux (64).

[P] Mr Menage deſerves to be conſulted concerning the proofs that father de la Mainferme has rejected.] 'Bollandus, in his annotations on the life of R. d'Arbriſſel, ſays, that father Sirmond, who publiſhed Geoffry of Vendôme's letters, repented he had made that public which we have mentioned, judging it ſpurious after a ſtrict examination, and that he deſigned to give notice of the ſame in a ſecond edition. But I can aſſure you, that father Sirmond never had any ſuch deſign, nor ever repented the publiſhing the ſaid letter. I knew him intimately and long, even to his death . . . . Mr Pavillon in the preface to his hiſtory of R. d'Arbriſſel, ſays that this letter of Geoffry of Vendôme, not being to be found in the manuſcript of the monaſtery of Vendôme, as father Sirmond knew well, and plainly inſinuates, it ought to be ſuſpected (65).' Mr Menage, having mentioned ſome other things, and particularly the certificate of Vincent Marſole, goes on thus: 'Since he affirms that letter was not in the manuſcript, I am perſuaded it was not there when he affirmed it. But on the other hand, as father Sirmond, who is a man of the utmoſt ſincerity, and who had ſeen that manuſcript, has not obſerved in his notes upon that letter, that it was not in the manuſcript, and never told me ſo, tho' I have talked with him more than once upon the letter, I am alſo firmly perſuaded that it was there, when father Sirmond printed his Geoffry of Vendôme. Therefore it muſt have been torn out afterwards at the requeſt of Joanna Baptiſta de Bourbon, legitimate daughter of France, abbeſs of Frontevaux; at whoſe deſire alſo Theophilus Raynaud retracted in his Trias fortium David, what he had wrote concerning R. d'Arbriſſel in his De ſobria utriuſque ſexus converſatione: this was told me by father Commire the Jeſuit. And what ſerves to convince me, that it was torn out, is, that they no longer ſhew the ſaid manuſcript, but tell you, in the abbey of Vendôme, that they know not what is become of it. But what ſufficiently refutes the opinion

(59) Montagne, Eſſais, lib. ii, cap. xi, pag. m. 172, 173.

(60) Id. ibid. cap. ii, pag. 21.

(61) That is Montagne's father.

(62) Academie Galante, pag. 160. Holland Edit.

(63) One might apply to this a parody of theſe two verſes in Horace, lib. i, Epiſt. ii, Ira furor brevis eſt: animum rege: qui, niſi paret, Imperat: hunc frænis, hunc tu compeſce catena. Paſſion's a frenzy, which, not rul'd, will rule: With chains confine it, and with curbs controul. Ver. 62, & 63.

(64) Suppoſing what is ſaid of them was true. In which caſe one might apply here the words of St Luke, chap. xvi, ver. 8, The children of this world are wiſer in their generation than the children of light.

(65) Menage, Hiſt. de Sablé, liv. iii, cap. xix, pag. 106, & ſeq.

Apologetical diſſertation for the bleſſed Robert d'Arbriſſelles .... concerning what I have ſaid of him in the firſt edition of this work. It is an apology ſo well turned, and ſo ſolid [Q], that every reaſonable man ought to acquieſce in it; and though I have ſufficiently ſhewed, that I did not give any credit to the common reports of ſharing a bed, &c. I declare here, that wherever I mention it, without adding my own opinion, I deſire to be ſo underſtood. They reckon thirty two, or thirty three abbeſſes of Frontevaux, from Petronilla de Chemille, who was the firſt, to the preſent abbeſs (k) [R]. The order is divided into four provinces [S], in each of which they have ſeveral priories.

‘ opinion of Bollandus, Theophilus Renaud, Coſnier, Pavillon, and father de la Mainſerme, is, that Marbodus, a man of great virtue, who, from a ſchoolmaſter of the church of Angers, was made biſhop of Rennes, and afterwards became a Monk of St Aubin of Angers, wrote ſuch a letter to Robert d'Arbriſſel †. This letter is to be ſeen in the collection of Marbodus's letters printed at Rennes. It is true that, in a manuſcript of the letters of Ildebert, biſhop of Mans, and archbiſhop of Tours, which is in the library of St Victor at Paris, the ſame letter is attributed to Ildebert. And Mr Baluze, who has promiſed us an edition of Ildebert's works, thinks it is rather Ildebert's than Marbodus's. But in this I am not of his opinion, hardly believing that Ildebert, who was charged himſelf with loving women, ſhould accuſe Robert d'Arbriſſel of the ſame thing. .... But tho' the letter ſhould be Ildebert's, yet it would prove what I intended it to prove, which is, that Arbriſſel was looked upon as a man fond of women. And this I prove alſo by one Petrus Salmurienſis. This Peter of Saumur, who was a Monk of St Florant, wrote ſomething like Geoffry of Vendôme's letter. This piece was in our time in the hands of father Vignier of the Oratory; who ſuppreſſed it at the requeſt of Joanna Baptiſta de Bourbon, abbeſs of Frontevaux. This I had from Mr de Herouval, Dom Luke d'Acheri, and Mr de St Beuve; all men worthy of credit, to whom father Vignier told theſe particulars ⸸. But let all this be ſaid without any prejudice to the memory of Rob. de Arbriſſel, for which I have a great veneration, being perſuaded that the report concerning him, and on account of which Geoffry, the abbot of Vendôme, Marbodus biſhop of Rennes, and Peter the monk of St Florant, had written the things abovementioned, is without any true foundation. As Robert d'Arbriſſel had inſtituted a monaſtery of women, to whom he had ſubjected the men; which du Moulin, in his notes upon the decree, has expreſſed in this manner ‡: ‘ In Monaſterio Fontis Ebraldi, adhuc præpoſterè Monachi ſunt infernè, Monachæ verò ſunt supernè: —— In the monaſtery of Frontevaux, the Monks are prepoſterouſly placed under, and the Nuns above. And as this inſtitution ſeemed contrary to St. Paul's words, that women are not to rule over men, it was thought he loved women; and this gave birth to certain jeſts upon him, and from thoſe jeſts aroſe the ſcandalous report.’ Mr Menage in his additions (66) informs the public, that the ‘ letter of Geoffry abbot of Vendôme to Robert d'Arbriſſel is found in the manuſcript of the letters of that abbot, which is in the Franciſcans library of S. Croix of Florence. This puts it paſt all doubt, that it is that author's: for it is alſo in the manuſcript of the abbey of la Couture at Mans, but in a different order from that of Florence.’ It is the firſt in the latter manuſcript, and the forty ſeventh of the fourth Book in the other. Mr Menage adds to the authority of theſe manuſcripts two arguments from the letter itſelf. Mr Magliabechi informed him of what concerned the manuſcript of Florence.

The reader need not be told what reflexions he ought to make upon the complaiſance ſhewn to an abbeſs of Frontevaux, who was a legitimate daughter of France. At her deſire an original piece is torn out of an old manuſcript. How many other pieces have been ſuppreſſed to gratify ſeveral people? on the other hand, how many have been forged? how many words have been razed out of manuſcripts to ſubſtitute others in their ſtead? ſee a book printed in 1699, and intituled Lettres Critiques où l'on voit les Sentimens de Monſieur Simon ſur pluſieurs Ouvrages nouveaux publiées par un Gentilhomme Alleman. Have not ſeveral facts by this means been turned into meer problems, and made matter of diſpute without being ever determined.

[Q] It is an apology (67) ſo well turned and ſo ſolid.] It is in the form of a letter, which they have done me the honour to addreſs to me, and contains 315 pages in 12ves. The civility, politeneſs, wit, and learning, of the author ſhine with great ſplendor in it, and I am very ſorry I am ſo little worthy of the encomiums ſo ingenious a writer compliments me with. His work conſiſts of nine articles, which he has proved in a manner, as I am informed, very much to the ſatisfaction of the world. ‘ I. That Geoffry's conteſted letter is really his, and is even in the manuſcript of Vendôme (68). II. That the letter imputed to Marbodus, biſhop of Rennes, or to Ildebert, biſhop of Mans, and afterwards archbiſhop of Tours, belongs to neither of thoſe two authors, and is more probably Roſcelin's. III. That at the worſt it is evidently proved, that thoſe three prelates had always a conſtant and uninterrupted eſteem for that holy founder, and believed the quite contrary to that report ſpread of him by obſcure and unknown people. IV. That the letter ſaid to be written by Peter de Saumur, let it be what it will, concludes nothing to his diſadvantage, no more than a fragment of a council of Albi, againſt the Albigenſes. V. That all thoſe writings were founded upon meer HEARSAY, without any ſhadow of proof, or even probability; that every conſiderate reader ought to deſpiſe uncertain rumours, which were ſpread abroad, when compared with an infinite number of poſitive evidences which can be brought to the contrary. VI. That the boldneſs with which Robert preached and exclaimed againſt the vices of the great men and eccleſiaſtics, together with his actions at the councils of Poitiers and Baugency, are a triumphant proof of his innocence and purity. VII. That even thoſe, who are pretended to be his enemies, may be brought as witneſſes in his behalf. VIII. That it would be very ſurprizing that a man, who openly bad defiance to ſo many ſinners, ſhould not at leaſt have made them murmur; and that, being ſo generally eſteemed, it is impoſſible but ſome muſt envy him: but he forced even envy itſelf to reſpect him. IX. That his death, as well as his piety, at laſt crowns all theſe proofs. That from all together reſults a plain evidence of the falſehood of the new kind of martyrdom imputed to him; and is ſufficient abſolutely to deſtroy the leaſt ſuſpicions in all judicious and conſidering minds.’

[R] They reckon thirty two or thirty three abbeſſes of Frontevaux .... to the preſent abbeſs.] (69) She is Mary Magdalen Gabriele Adelaide de Rochechoüart, daughter of the duke of Mortemar, and ſiſter to the marſhal de Vivonne. She was made abbeſs of the order in 1670 (70). She is a lady of extraordinary merit. I am aſſured by ſeveral perſons, who have had the honour to ſee, and converſe with her, that ſhe is univerſally admired for the agreeableneſs, the ſtrength, and ſolidity of her diſcourſe. Her virtue and knowledge (71), and other ſhining qualities, give her a place among the moſt illuſtrious perſons of the age. Read, in the third volume of the Clypeus naſcentis Font-Ebraldenſis Ordinis, page 192 and 193, the encomiums which are given her in the dedication of a dramatic piece.

She died the fifteenth of Auguſt 1704. See her elogy in the Memoirs of Trevoux, December 1704, page 2118, and following.

[S] The order is divided into four provinces.] Which are thoſe of France, Aquitaine, Auvergne, and Bretagny. There are fifteen priories in the firſt, fourteen in the ſecond, fifteen in the third, and thirteen in the fourth (72).

(k) La Mainſerme, Tom. III, pag. 172.

† Mulierum cohabitationem, in quo genere quondam peccaſti, diceris plus amare: ut quaſi antiquæ iniquitatis contagium, novæ religionis exemplo, circa eamdem materiam ſtudeas expiare. Has ergo, non ſolum communi menſa per diem, ſed & communi habitu per noctem, dignaris, ut referunt: accubante ſimul & diſcipulorum grege, ut inter utroſque medius jacens, utrique ſexui vigiliarum & ſomni leges præfigas. Has peregrinationis tuæ loquuntur eſſe pediſſequas: & diſputanti tibi jugiter aſſidere. Sed & diverſis locis & diverſis regionibus, non parum te aſſerunt habere numerum feminarum per xenodochia & diverſoria diviſarum, quas maribus non impune permixtas quaſi ad pauperum & peregrinorum obſequia, deputaſti. Quod quam periculoſe ſit factum, vagitus infantium prodiderunt.

⸸ Father Vignier ſaid alſo that there was a council held at Albi against the Albigenſes; in which it was ſaid, that thoſe heretics being charged with carrying women along with them, juſtified themſelves by ſaying. Sic nos docuit Chriſtus Dominus: ſic nos docuerunt magiſter noſter Robertus, qui nuper Conventum Virginum inſtituit.

‡ At the word in nullo loco, 18, Queſt. 2.

(66) Pag. 66.

(67) Printed at Antwerp, as the title ſays, for Henry Deſbordes, bookſeller at Amſterdam, 1701. Mr Bernard ſpeaks of it in his Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, July 1701, pag. 79, & ſeq.

(68) That is to ſay, that it is there yet in part, for it is at preſent without a title: the firſt leaf, which contains the beginning, is cut out; but the three next pages are enough to ſhew to whom it is directed, and agrees with what we have ſeen printed. Diſſert. Apologet. pag. 34, 35.

(69) This is written in the year 1699.

(70) La Mainſerme, Tom. III, pag. 182.

(71) See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, April 1686, art. ii, at the beginning.

(72) La Mainſerme, Tom. III, pag 357.

FONTIUS,

FONTIUS (BARTHOLOMEW) born at Florence, was one of the learned men of the XVth century. He wrote ſome books which are printed [A]. Matthias Corvinus, king of Hungary, honoured him with his friendſhip, and gave him the direction of the famous library of Buda. Picus Mirandula, Marſilius Ficinus, Jerome Donatus, Robert Salviati, and other learned men of that age, had a reſpect for him, if we may credit the two verſes of Verin, which I have inſerted in the remark. He taught rhetoric ſucceſsfully in his own country.

To aſſign the time when he taught rhetoric in his own country, I ſhould have ſaid that he was Politian's colleague in 1488. Gaddi gives a good proof of this (a).

(a) Gaddi, Tom. II, de Scriptor. pag 139, apud Angelicum Aproſium, in Biblioth. Aproſiana, pag. 3.

[A] He wrote ſome books which are printed.] Among Picus Mirandula's letters there is one written by Fontius to Robert Salviati (1), to thank him for a book (2) he had ſent him. One of Fontius's chief works is his Commentary upon Perſius, printed at Venice, in 1491. The abbreviators of Geſner's Bibliotheque, only mention this Commentary as a manuſcript kept in the emperor's library; but, as Gaſpar Maſſa (3) upbraids them with it, they did not know that it had been printed about a hundred years before. The public were better pleaſed with Fontius's harangues than with his Commentary (4). A collection of his works was printed at Franckfort in 1621, in which is inſerted the life of Paul Ghiaccetti. The two verſes I mentioned are as follow:

Fontius eſt Rhetor pubis moderator Hetruſcæ,
Judicio & nulli morum pietate ſecundus.

Fontius, preceptor to the Tuſcan youth,
For rhet'ric fam'd, for judgment, and for truth.

(1) It is the 17th of the ſecond book.

(2) L'Heptaple de Pic de la Mirandole.

(3) Della Vita, Origine, e patria di Aulo Perſio, pag. 17.

(4) Fontius & ipſe non parum in Perſio meruit, ſed illius orationes majore quodam favore excipiuntur Autor. Dialogi de Latinæ Linguæ reparat. pag. 412.

FORBES (PATRIC) in Latin Forbeſius, a Scotch Gentleman in the XVIIth century, devoted himſelf to an eccleſiaſtical life. By the perſuaſions of his biſhop he was prevailed upon to undertake the ſervice of a private cure in the country (a). He was then forty eight years of age. He diſcharged his duty ſo worthily, that a few years afterwards he was promoted to the biſhopric of Aberdeen, which he held about ſeventeen years. It was with great difficulty that king James made him accept of that dignity, and for ſeveral months he refuſed it, having propoſed to himſelf to live in a leſs conſpicuous ſtate. It was ſoon ſeen how much he deſerved to be a biſhop; and that his refuſal was not counterfeit, but the real effect of his humility. In all his behaviour he has diſplayed the character of a truly apoſtolical man (b). We ſhall ſee this more particularly here-under [A]. He died in 1635, at the age of ſeventy one years (c). He wrote ſomething upon the apocalypſe (d).

(a) Burnet's Preface to William Bedell's Life.

(b) Ibid.

(c) Konig, Bibl. pag. 312.

(d) Id. ibid.

[A] We ſhall ſee this more particularly hereunder.] 'He viſited his dioceſe without pomp and noiſe, attended only by one ſervant, that he might more eaſily be informed of what belonged to his care. When he was told of the negligence or weakneſs of any his clergy, he would go and lodge near his church upon Saturday in the evening, without making himſelf known, and the next day, when he was in the pulpit, he would go and hear him, that by this he might be able to judge what his common ſermons were, and as they appeared to him he encouraged or admoniſhed him. He took ſo much care of two colleges he had in his dioceſe, that they ſoon diſtinguiſhed themſelves, and became famous all over Scotland: and when the church was involved in troubles, it appeared by the writings that came out againſt the covenant, that none but the doctors of thoſe colleges were able to defend her cauſe; and though they were the firſt that entered the liſts in that famous controverſy, yet hitherto we have ſeen nothing that has eclipſed or excelled their writings. Their exemplary piety, and profound erudition, were equally beneficial and honourable to that dioceſe. . . . . . He commonly aſſembled his clergy twice a year, and before he entered upon any buſineſs, he made them a ſhort ſpeech to excuſe his own infirmities, and told them, that if they obſerved any defect in his conduct, if his errors were ſecret, they might privately reprove him, or before the whole aſſembly, if they were public, in the manner they ſhould think proper. Then he retired a little, leſt his preſence ſhould hinder particular perſons from ſpeaking. There never was but one turbulent fellow that abuſed this liberty, for which he was reprimanded by every body, except the biſhop, who treated him with that civility his character required (1).' This I have taken from the famous Dr Burnet now biſhop of Salisbury's preface to the Life of William Bedell.

(1) Burnet's Preface to William Bedell's Life.

FORBES (JOHN) ſon of the preceeding, was 'of a much more extenſive learning than his father, in which perhaps he was excelled by none of that age: Thoſe who ſhall read his book of hiſtorical and theological inſtitutions, will not diſpute this title with him; for it is ſo excellent a work, that if he had been left in quiet in the retirement he had choſe, to apply himſelf to his ſtudies, and could have finiſhed it by a ſecond volume, it would perhaps have been the moſt valuable treatiſe of divinity that has yet appeared in the world. He filled the profeſſor's chair (a) which his father had founded (b) when the covenanters expelled him, and forced him to fly beyond ſea.' The letter he wrote to Voſſius, dated from Amſterdam the ſeventeenth of January 1645, and that which Voſſius wrote to him ſome months after, are worth conſidering [A]. Note, there was one FORBES, a Scotchman, and a great puritan, who was expelled his country in the beginning of the XVIIth century, and took ſhelter in Holland, where he hotly oppoſed the Arminians (c).

I add, that having continued in Holland a little above two years, he returned to his country, where he ſpent the remainder of his life upon his eſtate of Corſe, and died there the twenty ninth of April 1648 (d). There was an edition of all his works in two

(a) Burnet's Preface to Bedell's Life.

(b) In the univerſity of Aberdeen.

(c) See Grevinchovius, in the preface of his book againſt Ameſius.

(d) Nouvelles de la Repub. des Lettres, Feb. 1704, pag. 181.

[A] The letter he wrote to Voſſius . . . . and Voſſius's letter to him, are worth conſidering.] The letter he wrote to Voſſius (1) accompanied a copy of a Latin treatiſe he preſented to him, which he had publiſhed, wherein he ſhewed, that the doctrine of St Auguſtin, concerning grace, was agreeable to the conſtant doctrine of the Catholic church. He excuſed himſelf to Voſſius, that he was not of his opinion. I never ſaw the anſwer to it; but Voſſius's letter (2), that I mentioned, is in the collection printed at London.

(1) It is the 402d among thoſe written to Voſſius.

(2) It is the 560th among Voſſius's letters.

[A] The

two volumes in folio publiſhed at Amſterdam 1703, to which is added his life written by George Garden. An abridgment of the ſame, together, with a general idea of his writings, is to be found in the journaliſts (e): for which reaſon I ſhall not enlarge upon them.

FORBES (WILLIAM) biſhop of Edinburgh in the XVIIth century, was born at Aberdeen in Scotland, where he went through his claſſical learning and philoſophy. At ſixteen years of age he was maſter of arts, and preſently after profeſſor of logic, which office he diſcharged for four years with great ſucceſs. He applied himſelf ſtrenuouſly to defend Ariſtotle's logic againſt the cavils of the Ramiſts. Afterwards he travelled, and made a prodigious progreſs in divinity and Hebrew in the univerſities of Germany, during the four years he continued in that country. After this he viſited the univerſity of Leyden, and got the eſteem of all the great men who flouriſhed there. The ill ſtate of his health not permitting him to undertake a journey into France and Italy as he deſigned, he went over to England. The fame of his learning ſoon ſpreading there, the univerſity of Oxford offered him a profeſſorſhip in the Hebrew tongue. He did not accept of it, for the phyſicians adviſed him to return to his native country. The magiſtrates of Aberdeen expreſſed a particular eſteem for him. He recovered his health and accepted the cure of Alford in the dioceſe of Aberdeen. His ſtay in this pariſh was but ſhort; his great learning, eloquence, and piety, requiring a more conſpicuous ſtation. Being called to preach in his own country, he accepted the call, and diſcharged the duty of a true miniſter of the goſpel. He was admitted doctor of divinity, when king James, among other things, had agreed with the deputies of the clergy (a), that the academical dignities and degrees ſhould be reſtored to their antient courſe. The miniſterial functions, and preaching, impairing his health, they aſſigned him a leſs toilſome employment, by making him principal of Marſhal college. He read lectures three times a week, as the ſtatutes required, and was afterwards declared dean of the faculty of divinity, and then rector of the univerſity; a poſt immediately next to the chancellor. The city of Edinburgh invited him to be their paſtor: he humbly thanked them for this mark of their eſteem, but at length was forced to accept of it, the ſupream council, and the provincial ſynod, having ordered him to do ſo. He was received at Edinburgh with all poſſible ſigns of friendſhip; but the tempers of men being afterwards altered [A], he withdrew from that flock, and returned into his own country, where he was paſſionately deſired. Some years after he was ſent for by king Charles I, who had been crowned with great pomp at Edinburgh in 1633. He preached before this prince with ſo much eloquence and learning, that he was admired by the whole auditory. The king, having founded an epiſcopal church at Edinburgh, found no body ſo worthy to fill the new ſee as our Forbes. He was conſecrated with the uſual ceremonies, and applied himſelf entirely to the functions of his dignity; but he fell ſick ſoon after, and died the firſt of April 1634, having enjoyed his biſhopric only three months. He was forty nine years of age (b). He had printed nothing, and compoſed but very little. He wrote a tract tending to pacify controverſies [B], which was printed in 1658, and reprinted at Helmſtad in 1704

[A] The tempers of men being altered.] The difference of opinions concerning epiſcopacy was the cauſe of this alteration. The paſtor taught, that biſhops are above prieſts: the people did not believe this epiſcopal primacy, being violently attached to the diſcipline of Geneva, and zealous for the equality of miniſters. Forbes maintained modeſtly and ſolidly in his ſermons, that the primacy of biſhops is not a humane inſtitution, but founded upon the word of GOD, the practice of the apoſtles, and the cuſtom of the primitive church. His auditors rejected this doctrine, reproaching their paſtor, and charging him with Popery (1). When he found that his labours were unprofitable to his flock, and that it was only ſeed ſown upon a barren ground, he reſolved to lay down his charge, and the rather becauſe his lean and macerated body could hardly bear the ſmoak of Edinburgh, without great danger (2). I act herein only the part of a tranſlator, without interpoſing my judgment in the diſpute between the Epiſcoparians and Presbyterians.

[B] He compoſed little: he wrote a tract tending to pacify controverſies.] The title of this book is, Conſiderationes modeſtæ & pacificæ controverſiarum de juſtificatione, purgatorio, invocatione ſanctorum, & CHRISTO mediatore, Euchariſtia (3). It will not be unacceptable to inſert here the character the author of his Life has given of it: 'Opus hoc poſthumum, quod jam 'in lucem prodit, eſt pacati ingenii & moderati animi 'ingens ſpecimen & indicium: in quo tanquam alter 'Caſſander & Catholicus moderator, rigidas & auſteras, utriuſque tam reformatæ quam pontificiæ partis, 'opiniones in quibuſdam religionis controverſiis, componere, ſaltem mitigare ſatagit. Quanti moderationem fecerit oſtendens dicto illo frequenter ab ipſo 'uſurpato: Si plures fuiſſent Caſſandri & Wicelii, non 'opus fuiſſet Luthero aut Calvino (4). ——— This 'poſthumous work, which now appears in public, is an 'extraordinary proof and ſpecimen of moderation, and 'a pacific temper, wherein, like a ſecond Caſſander 'and Catholic moderator, he ſtrenuouſly labours to compoſe, or at leaſt to mitigate, the rigid and auſtere opinions, both of the reformed and romaniſts. The great 'regard he had for moderation ſufficiently appears by 'that common ſaying of his; that had there been more 'Caſſander's and Wicelius's, there would have been no 'occaſion for a Luther or a Calvin.' Theſe laſt words are not reliſhed by zealous and hot men: they are a tacit cenſure upon Luther and Calvin; they ſeem to blame them for having carried a thouſand things to extremities, which moderate men, ſuch as Caſſander and Wicelius, would have tolerated for the ſake of peace. Obſerve that he had filled the margin of Bellarmin's four volumes with notes. Theſe notes were ſo well liked by Robert Baron, profeſſor in divinity in William Forbes's place, that he preferred them to all that had been publiſhed againſt that Jeſuit. He would have publiſhed them if death had not prevented him. For the reſt, the reſolution our prelate took not to write much was very good, and as ſolid as the advice he gave to one who uſed a great deal of paper. Read more, ſaid he, and write leſs. Pauca ſcripſit, ſcire enim maluit quam ſcribere, & hoc dicterium ſcripturienti cuidam, & ei magnos labores oſtentanti, lepide ſed ſolide uſurpavit; Lege plura, & ſcribe pauciora (5). The number of excellent writers would not be ſo ſmall as it is, if thoſe, who at length acquire a talent

---

(e) Ibid. pag. 176, & ſeq. Hiſtoire des Ouvrages des Sçavans, July 1703, pag. 291, & ſeq.

(a) He held an eccleſiaſtical aſſembly at St Andrew's in Scotland, to conſider of the affairs of the church of that kingdom.

(b) Taken from his life, at the beginning of a book mentioned in the rem. [B].

(1) Forbeſii ſanam doctrinam de Epiſcoporum primatu, multis convitiis inceſſere, ipſumque Pontificiæ profeſſionis reum inſimulare non verebantur. Elench. Vitæ Gul. Forbeſii.

(2) Ibid.

(3) It is in 8vo, and contains 466 pages. It was printed at London.

(4) Elench Vitæ Gul. Forbeſii, pag. penult.

(5) Id ibid.

1704 (c). We ſhall ſee below what the biſhop of Saliſbury ſays of the merit of this prelate [C]. Mr le Fevre, doctor of the Sorbonne, made an ill choice of his witneſſes, when he quoted the opinion of William Forbes, to prove that the Calviniſts do not adhere to the deciſions of the ſynod of Dort. Monſ. Arnauld knew how to make the moſt of his advantage on this occaſion [D].

(c) See the fifth volume of the Bibliotheque Choiſie, pag. 396, & ſeq.

of writing well, could bring themſelves to a reſolution of publiſhing but once in four years; but they abuſe the facility of writing they have obtained, and injure their reputation, by heaping volume upon volume: they will not be at the trouble of reviſing and poliſhing, and therefore do nothing that is good, or that comes near the merit of their firſt performances. To conclude, I believe that, if the man who wrote ſo much had come ſome time after, and told William Forbes, I have followed your advice, I have read ſuch and ſuch a number of books, he would have given him this farther advice, for the future, read leſs and meditate more. I have heard ſay that Mr Claude adviſed a very learned perſon, who had been a prodigious reader, to be three or four years without reading any thing, and to do nothing but meditate: as if he had ſaid, you have eat enough, now digeſt. Thoſe who are called helluones librorum have need of this advice.

[C] We ſhall ſee below what the biſhop of Saliſbury has ſaid of the merit of this prelate.] 'William Forbes was alſo one of the doctors of Aberdeen*: while king Charles was in Scotland, he was promoted to the biſhopric of Edinburgh, which that prince had then founded, and this gave him occaſion to ſay that he had met ſo excellent a clergyman, that he deſerved to have a new epiſcopal ſee erected for him, and indeed he was a great and ſublime divine ..... He preached with ſo much zeal and ardour, that frequently forgetting the meaſure of time, he continued his ſermons for two or three hours: this toil greatly diminiſhed his ſtrength, together with his faſting and aſcetic way of life, which he carried to ſuch a height, that he took no more nouriſhment than was juſt ſufficient to retard his death, which happened one year after his promotion to a biſhopric. He enjoyed this dignity long enough to exhibit the virtues of an excellent miniſter in his perſon, but too little a while to perform what might have been expected from a longer life. The few books he publiſhed are a ſufficient proof of his great and extenſive learning, though his ardent deſire after peace and unity among Chriſtians, made him too favourable to a great many corruptions in the church of Rome: Thus an unlimited charity engages great men to entertain imprudent opinions; but when the principle or motive they act by is truly good, they ought to be excuſed, or at leaſt cenſured with moderation (6).'

* In 1633.

(6) Burnet's Preface to the Life of Will. Bedell.

[D] Mr Arnauld knew how to make the moſt of his advantage on this occaſion.] He had mantained in his great book of the overthrow of morality, that the inamiſſibility of grace, or impoſſibility of falling from grace, was an article of faith among the Calviniſts determined by the ſynod of Dort. Mr le Fevre oppoſed this aſſertion, and endeavoured to prove that the Calviniſts were at liberty to believe what they pleaſed concerning it. He cited ſeveral Proteſtant writers who did not hold the inamiſſibility of grace, and particularly William Forbes. Let us ſee what Mr Arnauld replied to this (7): 'The very title of William Forbes's book ought to have convinced Mr le Fevre that he was not a fit perſon to be objected to me. For he was the moſt moderate and equitable of thoſe pacific epiſcopalians, who, deſiring a union between the Catholics and Proteſtants, made no difficulty to declare for the Catholics againſt the Calviniſts, when they believed the Calviniſts were in the wrong, as he himſelf believed they were in ſeveral points of controverſy he has handled. Therefore in the abridgment of his life, in the beginning of his book, he is called another Caſſander ..... His friends durſt not publiſh his book till 1658, twenty years after his death: and yet, long before it appeared, he was hated by the Calviniſts, as one that maintained againſt them the Arminian doctrine of the amiſſibility of faith, probably becauſe he could not forbear ſaying in his ſermons, that, when the presbyterians undertook the ruin of epiſcopacy, being ſupported by the parliament rebels, one of the reproaches they threw upon Laud, the unhappy archbiſhop of Canterbury, was, that he encouraged Arminianiſm; and the proof they brought of it is, that he perſuaded the king to promote to the biſhoprics of Scotland, men who had hardly any thing to diſtinguiſh them, but being known to be zealous Arminians, ſuch, ſaid they, as was Forbes promoted by that king to the ſee of Edinburgh. This liberty which he took to diſlike the Geneva opinions made him ſo obnoxious to Calvin's party, that, having been called to Edinburgh, to be paſtor there, before it was erected into a biſhopric, thoſe who were the moſt powerful in that city could not bear him, and branded him with the name of Papiſt.' This, and other things ſpecified by Mr Arnauld, ſhew ſo evidently that our Forbes's private ſentiments, concerning the inamiſſibility of grace, cannot be brought as a proof that the Calviniſts are at liberty to reject that doctrine, that it is unneceſſary to inquire what Mr le Fevre anſwered; for it may eaſily be ſuppoſed that it could not be to the purpoſe. And indeed his reply is ſo weak that I will not relate it (8).

(7) Arnauld, Calviniſme convaincu de nouveau, pag. 120.

(8) See chap. xvii of his Reply to Mr Arnauld.

FOULQUES, prior of Deuil in the XIIth century, was an intimate friend of Peter Abelard. He is little known, I believe, but by the conſolatory* letter (a) he wrote to that friend upon the loſs of his privities. We have given an account in another place (b) of the violence done to Abelard, who, inſtead of well inſtructing his pupil, had got her with child. This young woman's relations, to be more compleatly revenged, went to the very root of the evil, and plucked it up ſo well, that they put it out of the power of the criminal ever to relapſe. Foulques, knowing that Abelard was inconſolable on account of this mutilation, wrote him a letter, wherein he ſet out all the advantages that might accrue to him from ſuch a misfortune. He repreſented to him, that his great gifts, the ſubtilty of his wit, his eloquence and learning, which drew an admirable number of auditors to him from all parts [A], had filled

(a) It is in Abelard's works, pag. 217. Paris edit. 1616.

(b) In the articles of ABELARD and HELOISA.

[A] Abelard's great gifts drew an incredible number of auditors to him.] They came from Rome, Spain, England, Germany, the Netherlands, and the remoteſt provinces of France. Our Foulques expreſſes this in a very lively manner, though his ſtile ſavours a little of the bombaſt of the barbarous ages. 'Roma ſuos tibi docendos tranſmittebat alumnos, & quæ olim omnium artium ſcientiam auditoribus ſolebat infundere, ſapientiorem te ſe ſapiente tranſmiſſis ſcholaribus monſtrabat. Nulla terrarum ſpatia, nulla montium cacumina, nulla concava vallium, nulla via difficili licet obſita periculo & latrone quominus ad te properarent retinebat. Anglorum turbam juvenum mare interjacens, & undarum procella terribilis non terrebat, ſed omni periculo contempto, audito tuo nomine ad te confluebat. Remota Britannia ſua animalia erudienda deſtinabat. Andegavenſis eorum edomita feritate tibi famulabantur in ſuis. Pictavi, Waſcones, & Hiberi: Normannia, Flandria, Theutonicus & Suevius tuum colere ingenium, laudare & prædicare aſſiduè ſtudebat. Præterea cunctos Pariſiorum civitatem habitantes, & intra Galliarum proximas & remotiſſimas partes qui ſic à te docere ſitiebant, ac ſi nihil diſciplinæ non apud te inveniri potuiſſet. —— Rome tranſmitted her ſons to your tuition, and ſhe, who formerly infuſed into her pupils the knowledge of filled him with unſufferable vanity. He gently touches upon another thing that had not a little contributed to make him ſo proud, which was, that the women ran after him [B], and gloried in making a conqueſt of him. He told him, the loſs he had ſuſtained would cure him of his pride, and deliver him from the ſnares of women, which had reduced him to very great want [C], though his profeſſion was worth a great deal of

of all arts, did, by committing her ſcholars to your care, own the ſuperiority of your wiſdom. No diſtance of climate, no height of mountains, no depth of vallies, no ways however difficult or dangerous to travellers have prevented them from haſtening to you. The interpoſition of ſeas, the threats of ſtorms and tempeſts, could not deter the Britiſh youth, when they had once heard your name, from crouding to you. Remote Bretagne determined to ſhake off her ſavage ignorance. Anjou having ſoftened her native fierceneſs learned from you to obey. Poictou, Gaſcoin, and Spain; Normandy, Flanders, and Germany, owned, courted, and continually extolled the greatneſs of your genius. All the inhabitants of Paris, all the people in France, whether neighbouring or remote, had ſuch an inſatiable deſire of being inſtructed by you, that they ſeemed to think all diſcipline was engroſſed by you.' Foulques is not the only one that mentions this great affluence of ſcholars. There is a chronicle writer (1) who affirms they came from almoſt all the Latin countries: ‘Petrus Abailardus monachus & abbas, vir erat religioſus, excellentiſſimarum Rector ſcholarum ad quas pene de tota Latinitate viri litterati confluebant. —— Peter Abelard, monk and abbot, was a man of great piety, and a maſter of excellent ſchools, which were crouded by learned men, from almoſt all parts of the Latin world.' It cannot be denied they came ſome of them from beyond the Alps, ſince St Bernard writes that Peter Abelard had nothing to fear, becauſe he believed he had protectors at the court of Rome among the cardinals, and other eccleſiaſtics that had ſtudied under him. Securus tamen eſt quoniam cardinales & clericos curiæ ſe diſcipulos habuiſſe gloriatur (2). Cardinal Gui du Chatel, who was afterwards Pope Celeſtine II (3), was one of theſe patrons. If you conſult Abelard himſelf upon the number of his diſciples, you will find, that when he retired into the country, he was followed by ſuch crouds of ſcholars, that they could get neither lodgings nor proviſions enough for them: Ad quas (ſcholas) tanta ſcholarium multitudo confluxit, ut nec locus hoſpitiis, nec terra ſufficeret alimentis (4).

[B] Women ran after him.] Theſe are Foulques's own words: where it muſt be obſerved he ſpeaks only by hearſay. ‘Nam illud quod ſic te, ut ajunt, præcipitem dedit, ſingularum ſcilicet fœminarum amorem & laqueos libidinis earum quibus ſuos capiunt ſcortatores, melius mihi videor præterire quam aliquid dicere quod ordini noſtro & regulæ noſtræ religionis non concordet. —— As to that which, the world ſays, plunged you into misfortune, namely the love of women, and the ſnares of luſt in which they catch thoughtleſs wretches, I think it more proper to be paſſed over in ſilence, than to mention a thing which does not agree with our order, and the rules of our religion.'

[C] . . . . Women reduced him to very great want.] Foulques, who had heard ſay that Abelard was ſo poor, when this misfortune happened to him, that he had nothing but rags to cover him, begs him to conſider what great damage that little part of his body, which was cut off, had been to him, and how much he would ſave and get by loſing it. You ruined yourſelf, ſays he, by your leud intrigues; all your eſtate was ſwallowed up by that abominable gulf. ‘Hæc corporis particula quam omnipotentis Dei judicio & beneficio perdidiſti, quantum tibi nocuerat ac nocere quamdiu permanſit non deſiſtebat, melius tuarum diminutio rerum quam mea poſſit monſtrare oratio, docet. Quicquid verè ſcientiæ tuæ venditione perorando præter cotidianum victum & uſum neceſſarium, ſicut relatione didici, adquirere poteras, in voraginem fornicariæ conſumptionis demergere non ceſſabas. Avara meretricum rapacitas cuncta tibi rapuerat. Nulla audierunt ſecula meretricem velle alteri miſereri, vel peperciſſe rebus appetitorum quas quoquo modo auferre potuerunt. Videtur hoc probare tua profunda paupertas, qui nihil, ut dicitur, præter pannos ex tanto quæſtu habebas, cum his primum caſibus ſubjacuiſti fortunæ . . . . . Adde quod pecunia tua ſi quam tibi habere licuerit (non enim eſt monachorum ſine licentia proprium quid habere) vexationi diſtrahentium non erit obnoxia. A modo incipies poſſidere quod multis paulo ante diſtrahebatur eviſcerationibus. —— The diminution of your fortune is a more ample teſtimony, than any thing I can ſay, of the miſchiefs continually brought upon you by that troubleſome member, which by GOD's good will and favour you have now loſt. All the fruits of your labours, and the produce of your knowledge, except what was laid out on a bare ſubſiſtence, was perpetually ſunk in the all-craving gulf of fornication. The rapacious avarice of leud women ſtripped you of all. No age ever heard of a whore that knew compaſſion, or that ſpared the fortune of her followers, if ſhe could get it into her power. Your extream poverty ſeems to be a proof of what I advance; ſince, if report be true, you had nothing to ſhew of all your vaſt income, except a few old cloaths, when you lay under thoſe circumſtances. . . . . Beſides all this, your money, if you be allowed to have any (for the monks without permiſſion cannot call any their own) will no longer be ſubject to the depredations of thoſe rovers. From hence forward you will begin to enjoy what lately was embezzeled by the moſt laviſh profuſion.' No doubt common report had amplified things: I cannot think that Abelard at the time of his diſaſter was reduced to the condition of the prodigal ſon, who, having ſpent his living among harlots (5), was ready to periſh with hunger (6). I confeſs his comforter does not repreſent him as actually reduced to a bit of bread; but only in general as brought to rags. Nay it may be objected that it is more probable a leud fellow ſhould ruin himſelf to ſuch a degree, as to want cloaths rather than food; for the ſame leeches, that ſuck out his money, are glad he ſhould be luſty: it is their intereſt that he feeds well; but his cloaths are nothing to them; it is to their damage if he is not vigorous, and they would rather ſupply him with food, than let him ſtarve. Yet I believe Foulques had heard that Abelard was ſo ruined by women, that he wanted both nouriſhment and cloaths: I do not ſuppoſe Foulques minded thoſe ſubtle diſtinctions between diet and cloaths (7); but I am ſure he gave too much credit to fabulous ſtories; for though it ſhould not be ſuppoſed that Abelard's profeſſion, and marriage with Heloiſa, kept him within bounds, yet it is hard to think that a handſome man as he was, a fine ſpeaker, a ſubtle logician, in great repute, loved by the women, ſhould have ſpent upon them the laſt penny. A man of wit in his place, and acquainted with the world, would perhaps have got more money than he ſpent in ſuch a way. But here was Abelard's miſtake: he knew nothing of the practices of the looſe world, he was a ſcholar: and therefore, though he returned the ladies love for love, he knew not how to increaſe his income by it. He was a man to be fleeced on all hands.

I fancy it may be affirmed without raſhneſs, that our Foulques was but little acquainted with the old poet Archilochus, and little verſed in Ælian: yet he makes uſe of a thought ſomething like an expreſſion in Archilochus quoted by Ælian. Πολλάκις τὰ κατ' ὀβολὸν μετὰ πολλῶν πόνων συναχθέντα χρήματα, κατὰ τὸν Ἀρχίλοχον, εἰς πόρνης γυναικὸς ἔντερον καταιρουσιν (8). The tranſlator has not fully hit upon the meaning of the Greek poet: the word ἔντερον there ſignifies a purſe only in a metaphorical ſenſe: the learned Kuhnius ſaw it very well: κακέμφατον, ſays he (9), & ſenſus turpiculus ſubeſt voci ἔντερον. Ita Stoici τὴν συνουσίαν pro ſua εὐθυῤῥημοσύνῃ definiunt ἐντερίου παράτριψιν, &c. Nicetas Choniates applies this thought of Archilochus to the reign of Alexis Manuel Comnenus (10): Τὸ τοῦ Ἀρχιλόχου ἄντικρυς ἐπεραίνετο, ὅ φησιν, εἰς ἔντερον πορνης πολλάκις μεταῤῥυΐσκεσθαι τὰ χρόνῳ συλλεγέντα μακρῷ. Ut plane id fieret quod Archilochus ſcribit ea ſæpe in ſcorti pudenda confluere quæ longo labore & tempore ſint congeſta. —— That ſaying of Archilochus was entirely verified, namely that the produce of many years hard labour is often ſunk in a whore's lap. Foulques's expreſſion, in voraginem fornicariæ conſumptionis demergere non

ceſſabas

---

(1) Autor Chronici Moriniacenſis, apud And. du Cheſne, Not. in Hiſtor. Calamit. Abælardi, pag. 1155.

(2) Epiſt cxciii.

(3) See St Bernard's letter to him, in Abelard's works, pag. 299

(4) Abelardi, Oper. pag. 19.

(5) Ὁ καταφαγών σου τὸν βίον μετὰ πορνῶν. Qui abligurivit victum ſuum cum meretricibus. Luca cap. xv, ver. 30.

(6) Ἐγὼ δὲ λιμῷ ἀπόλλυμαι. Ego vero fame pereo. Ib. ver. 17.

(7) Theſe diſtinctions might do, ſuppoſing that a woman could not get another gallant; but Abelard was at Paris, where if a gallant has not money, he is neglected, and others looked for, who can maintain a miſtreſs, and then the diet of the firſt is as little minded as his cloaths.

(8) Ælian, Hiſt. Div. lib. iv, cap. xiv, pag. m. 276. Here follows the verſion of Vulteius: Sæpe pecuniæ, quas multo cum labore quis ſigillatim per obolos vix comparſerit, juxta Archilochum, univerſæ ſemel in ſcorti marſupium effunduntur.

(9) Kuhnius in Ælian. ibid.

(10) Nicetas Choniates, in Alexi Man. Comneno, pag. 253. Genev. edit. 1593, in 4to.

of money to him. He aſſured him the loſs of thoſe parts, he had made an ill uſe of, would ſtifle ſeveral paſſions in him that torment other men. That he would now be at liberty to keep his thoughts collected within himſelf, inſtead of ſuffering them to wander upon a thouſand laſcivious ſubjects. He adds, that his meditations being no longer interrupted by the emotions of the fleſh, he would be better able to diſcover the ſecrets of nature, and the reaſons of things; beſides, that he would not now ruin himſelf by intrigues, nor his purſe be again the prey of thoſe vile and voracious courtezans, who knew ſo well how to fleece him (c). He reckons it as a great advantage to him, that for the future he would not be the terror of any huſband [D], but might ſafely lodge any where; for being out of the reach of ſuſpicion from his landlord, he would be a welcome gueſt in all houſes, and ſkreened from jealouſy. He does not forget to tell him, that he might go in and out among the beſt dreſſed ladies, and view the moſt beautiful maids, without the leaſt danger or fear of thoſe criminal temptations, with which the ſight of ſuch objects can fire even the breaſts of old men themſelves. He congratulates him upon being freed from thoſe impure illuſions which invade our ſleep [E]; an ceſſabas, may alſo be compared with a paſſage in Sidonius Appollinaris, where the like extravagance is called ſumptuoſitas domeſticæ Charybdis. The paſſage is good, and deſcribes the behaviour of a young man, who, after having ruined himſelf by profligate women, at length opened his eyes, and forſaking his infamous intrigues married a good fortune. The author would have had his change more holy, and that from debauchery he ſhould have paſſed to continence; but, ſays he, few men can go ſuch lengths at firſt, and immediately deny themſelves every thing, who have been accuſtomed to the moſt abandoned liberties.

(c) See the remark [C].

‘ Hic proximè abrupto contubernio ancillæ propudio-
‘ ſiſſimæ, cui ſe totum conſuetudine obſcœna junctus
‘ addixerat, patrimonio, poſteris, famæ ſubitâ ſui cor-
‘ rectione conſuluit. Namque per rei familiaris damna
‘ vacuatus, ut primum intelligere cœpit, & retractare
‘ quantum de bonuſculis avitis paterniſque ſumptuoſi-
‘ tas domeſticæ charybdis abliguriſſet, quamquam ſerò ‘ reſipiſcens, attamen tandem veluti frænos momordit,
‘ excuſſitque cervices, atque Ulyxeas (ut ferunt) ceras
‘ auribus figens, fugit adverſum vitia ſurdus, meretri-
‘ cii blandimenta naufragii: puellamque (prout decuit)
‘ intactam vir laudandus in matrimonium aſſumpſit,
‘ tam moribus natalibuſque ſummatem, quàm facultatis
‘ principalis. Eſſet quidem gloria, ſi voluptates ſic re-
‘ liquiſſet, ut nec uxori conjugaretur: ſed etſi forte
‘ contingat ad bonos mores ab errore migrare, pauco-
‘ rum eſt incipere de maximis: & eos qui diu totum
‘ indulſerint ſibi, protinus totum & pariter incidere
‘ (11). —— Having broke off all commerce with his ‘ infamous maid, to whoſe leud embraces he had before ‘ abandoned himſelf, by this ſudden and happy change he ‘ conſulted his intereſt, his reputation, and the ho- ‘ nour of his family; for being reduced by the frequent ‘ damages which his fortune had ſuſtained, no ſooner did
‘ he begin to conſider what ſums had been ſwallowed up
‘ by this domeſtic Charybdis, though his repentance was ‘ late, yet, having at laſt broke his rein, and diſenga-
‘ ged himſelf, like Ulyſſes, he filled his ears with wax,
‘ became deaf to the muſic of vice, and the charms of a ‘ wanton ſyren. Having gained ſo noble a conqueſt over ‘ himſelf, he then married, and, as prudence directed,
‘ choſe a maid of ſpotleſs virtue, whoſe family and for- ‘ tune might claim the higheſt regard. The conqueſt
‘ however had ſtill been more glorious, had he ſo far
‘ ſubdued his deſires as not to have married; but tho'
‘ it ſometimes happens that a man may bid adieu to his ‘ error, yet very few at the firſt ſpring riſe to the ‘ heights of virtue, and, after they have allowed them-
‘ ſelves an unlimited indulgence, cut it entirely ſhort at ‘ once.’ See Rigaltius, and Gudius's notes upon a paſſage of Phædrus (12), where you will find a great many ſentences concerning the adddreſs with which a leud woman reduces her gallants to beggary. Foulques was not ignorant of this truth, and he believed Abelard had experienced the ſame. He could not have expreſſed himſelf more ſtrongly, even though he had been in a condition to profit by reading Signor Stefano Guazzo, who has the following words. ‘ So-‘ no piu damnoſe le donne vecchie che le giovani, per‘ che ſecondo il volgar detto, la capra giovane mangia
‘ il ſale, & la vecchia mangia il ſale, e'l ſacco . . . .
‘ coſi alla fine vi riſolverete, che ſiamo poſti al mondo
‘ dalle donne, per eſſer ruinati dalle donne: Et perciò ‘ diceva un meſchino, che ſe ne moriva di mal fran-‘ ceſe: Donna m'ha fatto, & donna m'ha disfatto.
‘ Et certo che disfanno in due modi, ſe crediamo à ‘ quel gentil poeta, che diſſe. —— Old women are ‘ more pernicious than the young; for according to the ‘ proverb, the young kid eats the ſalt, the old goat eats
‘ ſalt, and bag and all . . . . . So that it muſt be con-
‘ feſſed, as by women we are brought into the world,
‘ by women we are ruined. This made a poor ſinner
‘ juſt ready to die of the pox cry out: a woman gave ‘ me life, and by a woman I am deprived of life: and ‘ it is certain they deſtroy us two ways, if we may believe
‘ the poet, who has ſaid,

Succia Lesbia la borſo, & ſucca il core,
Pazzo è chi compra con due ſangui amore (13).

Lesbia ſucks the purſe as well as heart. Woe to the man that purchaſes love at ſo dear a rate.

[D] The terror of any husbands.] I have not tranſlated literally, for fear of falling into an expreſſion a little two comical; for Foulques's words are: ‘ Hoc ‘ quoque magni exiſtimare debes quod nulli ſuſpectus
‘ ab omni hoſpite hoſpes tutiſſime recipiaris. Maritus
‘ uxoris violationem ex te vel lectuli concuſſionem
‘ minimè formidabit.’

[E] And view the moſt beautiful maids without danger . . . . free from thoſe impure illuſions which invade our ſleep.] That I may not be thought to amplify things, here I ſhall produce the author's own words.
‘ Decentiſſime ornatarum turmas matronarum inviola-
‘ biliter pertranſibis, virginum choros flore juventutis ‘ ſplendentium, quæ etiam ſenes jam calore carnis de‘ ſtitutos ſuis motibus in fervorem libidinis inflammare
‘ conſueverunt, non timens earum inceſſus & laqueos,
‘ ſecurus & ſine peccato miraberis . . . . . Omnino poſt
‘ hos hujus fragiliſſimæ fragilitatis fluxus, quod mag-
‘ num Dei gratiæ munus in hoc ordine æſtimo, no-
‘ cturnas ſomniorum illuſiones te minime ſentire ita
‘ certum eſt, ſicut certum eſt quoniam voluntatem ſi ‘ forte aderit, nullus ſequetur effectus. —— You will ‘ now run no riſques amidſt the aſſemblies of ladies, how- ‘ ever their charms may be ſet off to advantage; you
‘ may now ſecurely, and without danger of falling, fre- ‘ quent the balls, and gaze on the nymphs that are a- ‘ dorned with all the pride of beauty, and who by their ‘ air have often inflamed old age itſelf, deſtitute of the ‘ warmth of the fleſh, with the fervour of deſire . . . .
‘ After this deprivation of the moſt frail of all frail-
‘ ties, which I look on as a ſignal mark of divine fa- ‘ vour in this order, 'tis as certain you will no longer be ‘ ſubject to the nocturnal illuſions of dreams, as it is, that
‘ no effect can be produced by the will if ever ſuch ſhould
‘ happen to be your caſe.’ It is needleſs to prove that Foulques rightly places this among the greateſt advantages of a clergyman's life. It is certain a man devoted to continency muſt think it happy to have a heart proof againſt love and beauty: he ought to wiſh to have the ſame qualities with reſpect to that fire, as the Hirpes had for common fire (14). It is not only the eaſieſt but the ſureſt way to be chaſte; for thoſe, who cannot perſevere in this way without frequent conflicts, are much to be pitied: they live in continual agitation and trouble; their ſtate is always doubtful; victory is ſometimes wavering (15), and even ſometimes goes againſt them: they are too often convinced that ſucceſs is uncertain, nor do they ſcarce ever come off conquerors in thoſe conteſts without being covered with wounds. We juſtly conclude that thoſe are miſerable, who are never out of the phyſician's hands (16). This is no leſs true of thoſe

(11) Sidon. Apollinar. Epiſt. vi, lib. ix, pag. m. 571.

(12) See theſe words of the ſecond Fable of the ſecond book: A fœminis utcunque ſpoliari viros
Ament, amentur, nempe exemplis diſcimus.
Loving or lov'd, we by example find,
That women are the rooks that ſtrip mankind.

(13) Stefano Guazzo, la civil Converſatione, lib. ii, pag. m. 261.

(14) See the remark [M] of the article LOYOLA.

(25) See the remark [N] of the article FONTEVRAUD.

(16) Vivere medice eſt miſere vivere.

an exemption, ſays he, that is a great gift from God. The matrimonial functions; continues he, and the care of a family, will not hinder you from applying to pleaſe God (d); and what a happineſs is it to be placed out of danger, and aſſured of ſinning no more: He urges the example of Origen, and ſome holy martyrs, who are now rejoicing in heaven, that they were on earth in the ſame condition, which Abelard was lamenting. He repreſents to him, that his loſs is irreparable [F], and therefore he ought thoſe who are always forced to combat with a ſanguine conſtitution, and be in a conſtant oppoſition to the irruptions of the fleſh. This is a lamentable ſtate: a man is often beat back to his intrenchments; his conſcience ſighing and groaning for the defeat: what progreſs would he not make towards perfection, could he walk without thoſe obſtacles, and without fighting the enemy at every ſtep? As to the other point, I mean the impurities of ſleep, St Auſtin will tell us what the happineſs is, that Foulques congratulates his friend for; St Auſtin, I ſay, who begs of God the grace of being delivered from the inconvenience he felt on that account. He ſubmitted in ſleep to what he would not have done when awake, and laments that remainder of infirmity in him. ‘Adhuc vivunt in memoria mea, ſays he (17), talium rerum imagines, quas ibi conſuetudo mea fixit: & occurſant mihi vigilanti quidem carentes viribus, in ſomnis autem non ſolum uſque ad delectationem, ſed etiam uſque ad conſenſionem factumque ſimillimum. Et tantum valet imaginis illuſio in anima mea & in carne mea, ut dormienti falſa viſa perſuadeant, quod vigilanti vera non poſſunt . . . . . Numquid non potens eſt manus tua, Deus omnipotens, ſanare omnes languores animæ meæ, atque abundantiore gratia tua laſcivos motus etiam mei ſoporis extinguere? Augebis, Domine, magis magiſque in me munera tua, ut anima mea ſequatur mea ad te, concupiſcentiæ viſco expedita, ut non ſit rebellis ſibi: atque ut in ſomnis etiam, non ſolum non perpetret iſtas corruptelarum turpitudines per imagines animales uſque ad carnis fluxum, ſed ne conſentiat quidem. —— The images of ſuch things, ſays he, as cuſtom had left in my memory, are ſtill freſh therein; and tho' whilſt I wake they preſent themſelves without making any impreſſion, yet in ſleep they not only excite a pleaſure, but a conſent, and the reſemblance of an act. Such moreover is the power of theſe illuſions on my ſoul, and my fleſh, that falſe appearances in a dream have a greater influence upon me, than the real objects whilſt I wake. Is not thy hand, O almighty GOD, able to heal all the infirmities of my ſoul, and by thy more abundant grace to extinguiſh all the wanton emotions of my ſlumbers? Pour down, O Lord, more and more thy mercies upon me, that my ſoul being freed from the power of concupiſcence, may no longer riſe in rebellion againſt itſelf, but be directed to thee, and that even in ſleep it may not only be free from pollution, and the illuſion of animal images, but alſo from a conſent.’

(d) Blanditiæ uxoris corporumque contactus, ſine quo uxor haberi non poteſt, ac liberorum cura ſingularis quominus Deo placeas minime retardabunt.

[F] He tells Abelard that his loſs is irreparable.] This is moſt certain: it does not happen here as to the Sybil's tree; that when one golden branch was cut off, another preſently ſprouts up in the room of it.

- - - - - Primo avulſo non deficit alter
Aureus; & ſimili frondeſcit virga metallo (18).

When one is pluck'd, behold a ſecond riſe
And glitter on the tree.

He who, ſpeaking of a maidenhead, ſaid it could be loſt but once, and that no artifice could repair it, was right in the main:

. . . . nulla reparabilis arte
Læſa pudicitia eſt, deperit illa ſemel (19).

No arts, no means, can honour loſt reſtore,
When that once ſinks it never riſes more.

But probably he knew that, though the original is not to be recovered by any contrivance, yet ſometimes a copy of it at leaſt may be recovered (20). But it is not ſo with Abelard's wound: it is incurable; there are no reſtorers of that kind, no falſe pieces to be had for money; it is a cypreſs tree (21). The inference Foulques draws is not ſo certain: grieve not, ſays he, for the loſs of your member; for it will never grow again, nature will not allow it to be reſtored. ‘Ergo, frater, ne doleas, nec contriſteris, nec perturbatione hujus incommodi quatiaris, præſertim cum hoc tam plures, ut dictum eſt, utilitatis afferat fructus, & quod hoc modo factum eſt ſemper & irreparabile permaneat & evulſum. Sic hoc tibi ſolamen aſſiduè quod redintegrari natura non patitur, levius poteſt tolerari. —— Grieve not therefore, my brother, be not dejected, torment not your ſelf with the thoughts of a diſaſter, eſpecially ſince, as I have before obſerved, it will be attended with ſo far larger a train of advantages; beſides, whatever is affected in this manner remains for ever diſunited and irreparable. This therefore may be a perpetual conſolation, that as nature will never ſuffer what is thus loſt to be retrieved, ſo the loſs may the more eaſily be ſupported.’ One would think that in theſe laſt words Foulques had a view to this ſentence in Horace,

Levius fit patientiâ quidquid corrigere eſt nefas (22).

The worſt of ills by patience milder grows.

But he does not well expreſs the ſenſe of it: the poet does not mean that an irreparable loſs is eaſier to be born than a reparable one; he only ſays that the weight of an irreparable loſs becomes lighter, by a reſolution to bear it patiently.

EXAMINATION of ſome common-places of conſolation.

It muſt be confeſſed that moſt of the common-place conſolations have two faces, and two handles. They have this defect that they may be retorted: for inſtance, what can be more reaſonable than to do nothing in vain? Upon this foot you argue well with a mother, mourning for the loſs of her dear ſon, when you tell her, that her tears are to no purpoſe, and let her ſay or do what ſhe will, ſhe can never reſtore her ſon to life: but ſhe may anſwer, that is the very thing that makes me inconſolable; for if I could repair my loſs, I ſhould bear it patiently: if I could hope, as they do in trade, to regain upon one ſhip what I had loſt upon another, I ſhould have little want of conſolation. I doubt not but Foulques would have had more ſucceſs in comforting Abelard, if the latter had only loſt his beard: what are you grieved for? would he have ſaid: they have robbed you of your beard: a great misfortune that: ſtay a month or two and you will have another. No doubt this would have been a great ground of comfort; but the ſingle thought that his wound was incurable, and ſubject as much or more than any thing to that ſevere philoſophic rule, à privatione ad habitum non datur regreſſus; this thought alone, I ſay, which his comforter urged as a ſtrong argument for patience, was the chief cauſe of his deſpair: nor would it mend the matter to tell him that at laſt that rule would prove falſe, viz. in the reſurrection at the laſt day (23); for then he might anſwer, that then he ſhould have no need of ſuch things, ſince at the reſurrection they neither marry, nor are given in marriage, but are as the angels of GOD in heaven (24).

Note, what I have ſaid above concerning an irreparable loſs may be confirmed by the teſtimony of the chief of the ſeven wiſe men of Greece, that it renders men more inconſolable. Solon was lamenting the death of his ſon: his friends repreſented to him that his tears could be of no ſervice; for that very reaſon, ſays he, I weep. Αὐτόν φησι Διοσκουρίδης ἐν τοῖς ἀπομνημονεύμασιν ἐπειδὴ δακρύοι τὸν παῖδα τελευτήσαντα . . . . . πρὸς τὸν εἰπόντα, ἀλλ᾽ οὐδὲν ἀνύτεις, εἰπεῖν, δι᾽ αὐτὸ δὲ τοῦτο δακρύω, ὅτι οὐδὲν ἀνύτω. Ipſum refert Dioſcorides in commentariis cum lacrymaretur ac lugeret defunctum filium . . . . . diceretur que à quodam, at nihil proficis, reſpondiſſe, & propter hoc ipſum illacrymor quia nihil proficio (25). See in the remark [K] of the article AMPHIARAUS how Carneades confuted certain common-places of conſolation.

(17) Auguſt. Confeſſ. lib. x, cap. xxx, pag. m. 217, 218.

(18) Virgil Æn. lib. vi, ver. 143.

(19) Ovid. Epiſt. v, ver. 103. Heroid.

(20) There are cheating women who pretend to reſtore maidenheads. Furetiere, at the word Pucelage.

(21) Cupreſſi mortuorum domibus ponebantur ideo quia hujus generis arbor exciſa non renaſcitur, ſicut ex mortuo nihil eſt jam ſperandum. Feſtus.

(22) Horat. Od. xxiv, lib. i, ver. 19, 20.

(23) John xi, 24.

(24) Matth. xxii, 30.

(25) Diog. Laërt. in Solone, lib. i, n. 63.

ought to bear it patiently. That he did not receive the wound in an ill action [G], ſince he was alone in bed, faſt aſleep, and deſigning miſchief to no body. Then he comforts him by other arguments; ſhews how greatly the biſhop, canons, and clergy of Paris were concerned at his diſgrace [H]: How much he was pitied by the inhabitants,

[G] . . . . That he did not receive his wound in an ill action.] He means that he was not taken in the fact with a woman, which has coſt ſome people the ſame parts he loſt. ‘Fer & hæc, ut ait ille, ſolatia ‘tecum, quoniam tempore hujus diminutionis vel ‘thorum violando, vel in aliquo fornicationis veneno ‘minimè deprehenſus es.’ This conſolation was better than the former, though it muſt be owned Abelard had drawn this diſgrace upon himſelf, by a crime no leſs ſinful than adultery. So that he could not ſay with the ſame confidence as that other Eunuch:

Quid fortunæ, ſtulte, delictum arguis?
Id demum eſt homini turpe, quod meruit pati (26).

Why doſt thou, ſot, the crimes of fortune trace?
That only, which a man deſerves, is baſe.

However, the crime was over, and when he was mutilated he had no thoughts of injuring any body. Generally ſpeaking the rule is true, Quæ venit ex merito pœna, dolenda venit, whether Abelard could or could not make the application of it to himſelf. Beſides, there are good authorities, which prove that thoſe who were taken in the very fact leave the inſtrument of their crime behind them. Thus Plautus (27) brings in his Synceraſtus ſaying:

- - - SYN. Facio quod manifeſto hi mœchi haud ferme ſolent.
MI. Quid id eſt? SYN. Refero vaſa ſalva.

That is, I have done what adulterers ſeldom do. MI. What's that? SYN. I have brought away my tackle ſafe and ſound. I make uſe of Mr Dacier's tranſlation, who quotes this paſſage in his note upon a place in Horace, where that kind of puniſhment is mentioned (28). Periplectomenes in the ſame Plautus (29) will not only uſe the hectoring ſpark in the ſame manner, but alſo hang his members, when they are cut off, about his neck for a child's play-thing.

Vide, ut tibi iſtic ſit acutus, CARIO, culter probe.
CA. Quin jamdudum geſtit mœcho hoc abdomen adimere
Ut faciam quaſi puero, in collo pendeant crepundia
- - - - - - - - - - - - - - - -
PE. Cur es auſus ſubagitare alienam uxorem? impudens!

Look to it, CARIO, that your blade carry a good edge. CAR. Fear not, ſir, 'tis keen ſet, and longs to be about his what-do-ye-call-ums. I'll make a boy of him again, and hang a new faſhioned coral and bells about his neck.

Terence only ſays (30) that the criminal was bound and they were juſt going to inflict on him the puniſhment of adulterers; but, either becauſe he was more modeſt than Plautus, or becauſe it is a ſervant maid that ſpeaks, he does not ſay what the puniſhment was. It was well enough underſtood.

- - - Ut ne viderem, miſera huc effugi foras
Quæ futura exempla dicunt in eum indigna - - - .
- - - Colligavit primum eum miſeris modis - - - -
- - - - Nunc minatur porro ſeſe id quod mœchis ſolet
Quod ego nunquam vidi fieri neque velim.

Dear heart! I left the houſe in haſte to get out of the ſight on't. What a dreadful example do they ſay they'll make of him! . . . . He firſt bound him hand and foot, 'twould grieve your heart to ſee it . . . . . And now he threatens to ſerve him like a common adulterer, a ſight I ne'er ſaw, nor would I for the world.

See in Valerius Maximus (31) two examples of this puniſhment. By the Egyptian laws (32) it was inflicted on thoſe who violated a woman. Zonaras ſays that the emperor Juſtinian condemned all Sodomites to this puniſhment. ‘In eos Juſtinianus pœnam planè ‘convenientem ſtatuit. Nam qua parte erant tam ignominioſi, hac eos privari imperabat, ut Zonaras prodidit. Quid enim? (ajebat) ſi ſacrilegium commiſiſſent, nonne eis manus amputaſſem (33)?’ What, ſaid he, if they had committed ſacrilege, ſhould not I have condemned them to loſe their hands? the puniſhment was well proportioned to the crime, and was a means to prevent it for the future: a gallant who eſcaped with his members might charge again; as a ſoldier that runs away may rally again. To prevent this they proceeded to amputation (34).

One of the authors I have cited (35) quotes a ſhort epigram of Martial, in which he laughs at a husband that cut off the noſe of his wife's gallant. She loſes nothing by that, ſays he; that is not the part that had offended you.

Quis tibi perſuaſit nares abſcindere mœcho?
Non hac peccatum eſt parte, marite, tibi.
Stulte quid egiſti? nihil hic tua perdidit uxor,
Cum ſit ſalva ſui mentula Deiphobi (36).

What could, my friend, your barb'rous blade engage,
On your wife's lover's guiltleſs noſe to rage?
Fool that thou art! thy ſpouſe no loſs ſuſtains,
The guilty part, that injur'd thee, remains.

A poet of the XVIth century, exerciſed his muſe upon the like thought; but he changed the circumſtances of the fact. This is his epigram:

De marito, cujus mœcha erat conjux.

Cum mœcha ſenſit mœchum dormire maritus,
Extemplò uxori conſtruit ille dolos.
Nocte ſemel media repetens ſua limina, mœchum
Cum mœcha in tepido conſpicit eſſe toro.
Diſtringit gladium, mœchæ duo brachia ſcindit,
Atque duos mœchi diſſecat enſe pedes.
Non ſic debuerat facinus punire nephandum:
Pars, qua peccatum eſt, hæc reſecanda fuit (37).

On a husband, whoſe wife uſed to cuckold him.

The husband found his ſpouſe leud pranks had play'd,
And for the wanton dame a trap he laid:
Returning late one night, with ſilent pace,
He found a ſtranger had uſurp'd his place;
His ſword he drew, of arms bereft his wife,
Her minion's legs compounded for his life.
But why this rage on guiltleſs members ſhewn?
The part that injur'd ſhould the crime attone.

[H] He repreſents to Abelard how much the clergy of Paris were concerned at his diſgrace.] Nothing ſhews better the great eſteem they had for that philoſopher. No doubt our Foulques exaggerates things in his letter; for one would imagine by what he writes that almoſt the whole city of Paris was afflicted and diſmayed for the loſs of Abelard's members. From hence the comforter draws one of his beſt arguments: as if this ſignal mark of the affection of the Pariſians was worth more than all that Abelard had loſt (38). I do not believe the ſufferer would acquieſce in this valuation, and would without doubt rather have been ignorant all his life of the friendſhip they had for him, than to have known it upon ſuch terms. This might have been ſaid to people who made no uſe of what they had; but Abelard uſed his talent ſtoutly, and drew a good income from it, and always pretended to make the moſt of it: be this as it will, let us hear the comforter's own words. ‘Plangit hoc ‘tuum

[illegible] with the Rotmarl. C—where he is said to be impoverished by y^e women

---

(26) Phædr. Fab. xi, lib. iii.

(27) In Pænul. Sc. II, Act. IV, ver. 40.

(28) Quin etiam illud Accidit, ut cuidam teſtes, caudamque ſalacem Demeteret ferrum. Horat. Sat. ii, lib. i, ver. 44.

(29) In Milit. Gloſ. Scen. ult. ver. 5.

(30) Eunuchus, Act. V, Scen. V, ver. 3.

(31) Lib. vi, cap. i, n. 13.

(32) Diod. Sicul. lib. i, cap. lxxviii.

(33) Salmuth in Pancirollum Rerum Memorabil. Part. II, pag. m. 86.

(34) Ἀνὴρ ὁ φεύγων καὶ πάλιν μαχήσεται. Vir qui fugit rurſum integrabit prælium. Demoſthenes quoted this verſe when he was reproached with running away. See Aul. Gellius, lib. xvii, cap. xxi.

(35) Salmuth in Pancir. Rerum Memor. Part. II, pag. 86.

(36) Mart. Epigr. lxxxv, lib. iii.

(37) Jo. Vulteius, Epigram. lib. ii, pag. m. 136.

(38) Tantus omnium luctus extitit, ut melius mihi videaris te debere velle periiſſe quam ſervaſſe quod periit: Felix ſe neſcit amari. Pene tota civitas in tuo dolore contabuit. Habes arram veræ dilectionis in te quam ſi prius agnoviſſes nullas, meo judicio, divitias illi comparabiles æſtimares.

tants, and lamented by the women [I]. He deſcribes the whole in a very lively manner; but in touching upon the laſt head of conſolation, he does not ſay a word of Heloiſa [K]. As he ſeemed inclined to fly to the Pope for juſtice, he deſires him to lay 'tuum vulnus & damnum venerabilis Epiſcopi benignitas, qui quantum licuit vacare juſtitiæ ſtuduit. Plangit liberalium Canonicorum ac nobilium Clericorum multitudo. Plangunt cives civitatis hoc dedecus reputantes, & dolentes ſuam urbem tui ſanguinis effuſione violari. —— Your loſs has been deplored by the venerable prelate, who ſought to do you juſtice as far as poſſible. It is deplored by the canons, and the dignified clergy. It is deplored by the citizens: with ſorrow they reflect on your misfortune, and think it a diſgrace to their town, that it ſhould be ſtained with your blood.' See the remainder, either in the margin, or in the following remark. See alſo the remark [N] of the article HELOISA; where I have quoted what Abelard ſaid himſelf of the grief his misfortune cauſed him.

[I] Lamented by the women.] They wept as bitterly for him as if each had loſt her huſband, or lover, in the field of battle; it is true no man's life was loſt, but yet they had loſt their champion. Theſe are Foulques's words (39). They had loſt their Adonis; therefore their ſorrow for him muſt have been more ſincere than that of thoſe women of old, who annually celebrated the memory of Venus's mourning for Adonis (40), Plangentes Adonidem (41). Methinks the comforter ſhould not have touched this ſtring; it was by no means proper to his deſign, and could only exaſperate the grief of the unhappy Abelard for two invincible reaſons; for firſt, he ſaw by that, in a very particular manner, the importance of the good he had loſt; ſecondly, he was made ſenſible of a favour which he found himſelf utterly unable ever to make a grateful acknowledgement of. I cannot therefore but ſay it over and over again, that our Foulques was too bombaſt an Orator who confounds two things that ought to be diſtinguiſhed. He will have the tears of all the women, ſingularum feminarum, to proceed from their having loſt their champion, militem ſuum; but this could only be true of a few that Abelard was intimate with, or who hoped one day to partake of his favour. Therefore he ſhould have ſaid, either that the others did not lament him, or, if they did, it was leſs out of love to Abelard, than fear of the conſequences. I mean, they were under apprehenſions that that barbarous manner of puniſhing leudneſs ſhould be introduced in the world, and the example of the canon be practiſed upon others. So that ſome wept for being deprived of their happineſs, and others for fear they ſhould alſo be deprived of theirs (42). This is a diſtinction improperly neglected by our Foulques. There is in the Bibliotheque Univerſelle a ſtory ſo ſuitable to this remark, that I muſt either have been ignorant of it, or been very negligent not to inſert it here. The ſtory is this. 'The Greeks made war upon the duke of Benevento, and made him very uneaſy. Thedbald, marquis of Spoleto, his ally, marching to his aſſiſtance, and having taken ſome priſoners, ordered them to be caſtrated, and in that condition, ſent them back to the Greek general, with orders to tell him, that he had done it to oblige the emperor, whom he knew to be a lover of eunuchs, and he would endeavour to ſend him in a ſhort time a much greater number of them. The marquis was preparing to be as good as his word, when one day a woman, whoſe huſband had been taken priſoner, came all in tears to the camp, and begged to ſpeak with Thedbald. The marquis having asked her the cauſe of her grief, my lord, ſaid ſhe, I wonder that ſuch a valiant hero as you ſhould trifle away your time in warring with women, when men are unable to reſiſt you. Thedbald replied, that, ſince the days of the Amazons, he had never heard, that ever war had been made upon women. My lord, anſwered the Greek woman, can a crueller war be made upon us, than to deprive our huſbands of what gives us health, pleaſure, and children. When you make eunuchs of them, it is mutilating us, not them: you have lately taken away our cattle and goods, without any complaint from me: but this being an irreparable loſs to ſeveral of my neighbours, I could not avoid imploring the compaſſion of the conqueror. The whole army was ſo pleaſed with this woman's ingenuous declaration, that they reſtored her huſband to her, and all they had taken from her. As ſhe was going away, Thedbald asked her what ſhe would be willing ſhould be done to her huſband, if he was found in arms again. He has eyes, ſaid ſhe, a noſe, hands, and feet: theſe are his own, which you may take from him if he deſerves it; but leave him, if you pleaſe, what belongs to me (43).'

Note, that, in all probabillty, this woman had rather they ſhould have taken away her huſband's life, than ſee him an eunuch, a condition in which ſhe would have known all the evils without the conveniencies of widowhood: ſhe would have had neither liberty to marry again, nor right to diſſolve her marriage on account of impotence: for the courts of juſtice would not have admitted her plea: they take no notice of impotence that comes from ſuch accidents. Obſerve, by the way, that the Romans would not have cenſured this woman's taſte. They would rather chuſe to loſe their lives than their virility. This Cæſar repreſented to the embaſſadors of Pharnaces, when he complained of the cruel treatment the Roman merchants underwent in the kingdom of Pontus. 'Se magnas & graves injurias civium Romanorum qui in Ponto negotiati eſſent, quoniam in integrum reſtituere non poſſet, concedere Pharnaci. Nam neque interfectis amiſſam vitam, neque exectis virilitatem reſtituere poſſe, quod quidem ſupplicium GRAVIUS MORTE cives Romani ſubiiſſent (44).'

[K] Without ſaying a word of Heloiſa.] This is not to be wondered at; for as ſhe was the moſt injured of all, her grief was ſufficiently known, and it would have been no news to her huſband to have been told how bitterly ſhe lamented his loſs. It is true, ſhe was then in a convent, but had only the dreſs of a nun: the ſecret viſits ſhe received from her huſband were for ſomething more than meer chat; they had the ſkill to withdraw into ſome corner to be free and eaſy (45); and ſhe had long enjoyed theſe converſations under the habit of a nun (46). So that ſhe had not renounced what her huſband was deprived of. To judge of the grief which pierced her ſoul, when ſhe heard this news, I will not confine myſelf to the new tranſlation of her letters (47). How cruel were they (thus the tranſlation has it) when their blind fury incited an aſſaſſin to ſurprize you in your ſleep! had I been with you, I would have defended you at the expence of my own life; my very cries would have ſtopped his arm. But here love itſelf is wounded, and my modeſty, joined to my deſpair, render me ſpeechleſs. It is not lawful for me to ſay all I think about it, and if it were I could not poſſibly do it. And indeed there is an eloquence in ſilence, when the greatneſs of a calamity is beyond all expreſſion. How ſignificant is this! nature herſelf ſpeaks; one would think it not the language of the fancy, but the voice of ſenſation and experience, and of one that really was in Heloiſa's place (48). I wiſh theſe were her own words, and am ſorry not to ſee, in the original Latin, what I read in the French paraphraſe. But if ſhe did not ſay ſhe would have ventured her own life to have ſaved her huſband's virility, and that her outcries would have preſerved that ineſtimable jewel from the murderer's hands, at leaſt ſhe ought to have ſaid it, and the tranſlator is not to be blamed for lending her a thought ſo natural. Nevertheleſs, I ſhall not make this my rule to judge of Heloiſa's ſorrow. Her own Latin is enough. Her murmurs againſt the divine providence come little ſhort of blaſphemy, ſuch as never fell from the lips of Job, when he had loſt his wealth and children, and was miſerably tormented in his own body. Heloiſa thought her loſs greater than his, though ſhe and her huſbund were both well; after all, ſays ſhe, the only comfort that remains, is, that I know he is not dead, being for ever debarred from all other joys coming from him (49). Whereupon ſhe utters bitter complaints againſt the divine providence. God, ſays ſhe, has diſcharged upon me all the arrows in his quiver, ſo that other ſinners may now reſt ſecure. Death is the only puniſhment he has not inflicted, which would have put an end to my miſery, but he will not ſuffer me

to

HELOISA's extream grief for the caſtration of her huſband.

---

(39) Quid ſingularum feminarum referam planctum quæ, ſic hoc audito, lachrymis, more fœmineo, ora rigarunt propter te MILITEM SUUM, quem amiſerant, ac ſi ſingulæ virum ſuum aut amicum forte belli repeririſſent extinctum?

(40) That is, according to ſome, for a diſaſter which befel poor Adonis, like that of Abelard. See the remark [L] of the article ADONIS.

(41) Ezekiel, viii, 14.

(42) This is much like what Horace ſays, Epiſt. i, lib. ii, with reſpect to ſatire, Doluêre cruento Dente laceſſiti: fuit intactis quoque cura Conditione ſuper communi. Ver. 150.

(43) Bibliotheque Univerſelle, Tom. XI, pag. 10.

(44) Hirtius, de Bello Alexandrino, pag. m. 411.

(45) See the remark [E] of the article HELOISA.

(46) She diſguiſed herſelf in that habit, when ſhe went to lye-in at Abelard's ſiſter's houſe. See her article, citat. (b).

(47) Printed at the Hague, by John Alberts, 1693.

(48) I have been told that a woman is the author of that tranſlation.

(49) Ubi nullum niſi te remedium habeam, & nullum aliud in te niſi hoc ipſum quod vivis omnibus de te mihi aliis voluptatibus interdictis, cui nec præſentia tua conceſſum eſt frui, ut quandoque mihi reddi valeam.

lay aſide all thoughts of it, ſince it would require too much money to ſucceed there [L]; that the authors of the injury had been puniſhed [M]; that he was to blame to complain of the cathedral church, and that being a Monk, he ought to renounce all deſire of revenge, leaving it entirely to Almighty GOD, and love even his worſt enemies. To conclude, he exhorts him not to lament the happineſs he had loſt, ſince that pretended happineſs is always accompanied with a thouſand inconveniencies: And he aſſures him, that if he perſeveres to the end, he ſhall recover at the day of judgment what had to die, tho' daily expiring. 'O ſi fas ſit dici crudelem 'mihi per omnia Deum! ô inclementem clementiam! ô 'infortunatam fortunam! quæ jam in me univerſi conaminis ſui tela in tantum conſumpſit, ut quibus in alios 'ſæviat jam non habeat. Plenam in me pharetram exhauſit, ut fruſtra jam alii bella ejus formident. Nec ſi ei adhuc telum aliquod ſupereſſet, locum in me vulneris 'inveniret. Unum inter tot vulnera metuit ne morte 'ſupplicia finiam, & cum interimere non ceſſet interitum tamen quem accelerat timet.' All the reſt of her diſcourſe ſhews that her horrible murmurings were founded upon nothing elſe but the loſs of her husband's converſation, as appears from her own confeſſion, page 59 (50). She takes an unbounded liberty to arraign providence, as if God had chaſtiſed them, when they did not deſerve it, and bore with them, when they deſerved puniſhment. God, ſays ſhe, ſpared us when our pleaſures were criminal, delaying our puniſhment till marriage had made them innocent; 'Et ut ex injuria major indignatio ſurgeret, omnia in nobis æquitatis jura pariter ſunt perverſa. 'Dum enim ſolliciti amoris gaudiis frueremur, & ut 'turpiore, ſed expreſſiore vocabulo utar, fornicatione 'vacaremus, divina nobis ſeveritas pepercit. Ut autem illicita licitis correximus, & honore conjugii 'turpitudinem fornicationis operuimus, ira Domini 'manum ſuam ſuper nos vehementer aggravavit, & 'immaculatum non pertulit thorum qui diu ante ſubſtinuerat pollutum (51).' This poor woman was ſtrangely deluded, if ſhe imagined her love was pure becauſe ſhe did not ceaſe loving her husband after he was made impotent. She upbraids him for having only had a laſcivious paſſion for her, ſince he neglected her, when he could no longer enjoy carnal pleaſures with her (52): but does ſhe not confeſs (53) that ſhe laments paſt pleaſures, that ſhe thinks night and day on their mutual enjoyments? does ſhe not own a deſire after their continuance (54)? if this is not a luſtful love, a love of fleſh and blood, what can be ſo? Abelard was ſenſible of this, and exhorted his wife to entertain other thoughts, leaſt ſhe ſhould be juſtly charged with impure love. 'Cave obſecro 'ſays he to her (55), ne quod dixit Pompeius mœrenti Corneliæ tibi improperetur turpiſſimè,

- - - vivit poſt prælia Magnus
Sed fortuna perit, quod defles illud amaſti *.

'Attende, precor, id & erubeſce, niſi admiſſas turpitudines impudentiſſimas commendes. —— Take care, 'ſays he to her, I entreat you, leſt what Pompey ſaid 'to the diſconſolate Cornelia ſhould be maliciouſly turned upon you.

- - - 'Tis true my fortune's loſt;
Who grieve for that, no love for me can boaſt,
But mourn the loſs of what they valu'd moſt.

'Be circumſpect, I beſeech you, let modeſty reſtrain you, 'and ſeem not to juſtify the moſt ſhameful and impudent practices.

[L] He told Abelard it would require too much money to be able to ſucceed there.] Our Foulques ſpeaks ſo much to the diſadvantage of the court of Rome, that if they have not placed him in the catalogue of the witneſſes of truth, it it not his fault. He ſays, the avarice of the Romans is inſatiable, and that if Peter Abelard viſits the Pope without good ſtore of money, his journey will turn to no account. Let us hear his own words; the language he ſpeaks in will bear the harſheſt terms better than ours. 'Nunquid 'non audiſti aliquando de Romanorum avaritia & 'impuritate? quis unquam ſuis potuit opibus meretricum voraginem ſatiare? quis potuit ſacculis cupiditatis earum ſufficere crumenis?..... Subſtantia tuæ rei ad viſitationem Romani Pontificis cum 'aut modica ſit aut nulla, minime ſufficit. Quid 'Palatinis morſibus objectabis?.... ſi defecerit (pecunia) & iter tamen impleveris incaſſum te ſudaſſe 'nulli dubitare fas eſt: quotquot enim noſtris temporibus ad illam ſedem ſine pondere pecuniæ acceſſerunt, perdita cauſa, confuſi & reprobi abſceſſerunt. —— Have you never heard of the avarice and 'corruption of the chiefs at Rome? who ever could 'glut a whore's all-craving appetite with his ſubſtance? or who from his purſe could fill the bags 'of their reſtleſs deſires?.... Your ſtock of wealth, 'which cannot be great, and may be nothing, is far 'from being ſufficient to defray the expences of a 'viſit to the Roman Pontif. Wherewith will you anſwer the cravings of the Papal court?.. If money ſhould 'fail when you come to your journey's end, every body 'knows what ſucceſs you will meet with. Whoever 'in our times has undertaken ſuch an expedition, before he has laid in an immenſe ſtore, has had the 'mortification to ſee himſelf baffled, and his ſuit rejected.' This miſchief continues to this very day, if we may believe Mr Hallier, in his letter from Rome to father Dinet, the Jeſuit, dated the 16th of June 1653. Mr Hallier was one of the deputies that ſollicited the condemnation of Janſeniſm. 'It would be very juſt, 'ſays he (56), that they ſhould have a greater 'regard for us, after the extraordinary charge we 'have been at on this occaſion. You cannot imagine how much money goes away in preſents and 'bribes. Every little ſaint muſt have his fee... 'The Janſeniſts have ſpent here above a hundred 'thouſand livres, and perhaps above a hundred and 'fifty thouſand.'

[M] The authors of the injury had been puniſhed.] Only two of them were taken, one of which was Peter Abelard's footman. They were not only diſmembered by way of retaliation, but alſo had their eyes put out. Abelard ſays (57): 'Quibus mox converſis in fugam qui comprehendi potuerunt oculis '& genitalibus privati ſunt, quorum alter ille fuit ſupradictus ſerviens qui cum in obſequio meo mecum 'maneret, cupiditate ad proditionem ductus eſt. —— 'Who being immediately put to flight, two of them, 'whom we ſeized, were deprived of their eyes and 'genitals, one of which was my ſervant before mentioned, who, altho' he lived in my houſe, and was 'bound by the moſt ſolemn ties of duty, was perverted by the love of money to that perfidious act.' Foulques ſays in general, that ſome of the villains were condemned to be caſtrated and loſe their eyes, and that the canon himſelf was deprived of his whole eſtate, tho' he denied he had any concern in the action (58). Abelard was not pleaſed with this ſentence; he complained of the biſhop, and the canons, and had a mind to implore the juſtice of the court of Rome. '(59) Totum meæ pondus injuriæ Romanis auribus 'intimare ſtudebo, & tam Epiſcopum quam Canonicos quoniam primum judicium de illo qui in me malus extitit mutare machinati ſunt, quantum potero 'perturbabo, ac tum demum intelligent quàm ſit 'contrarium honeſtati à rigore juſtitiæ deviaſſe.... '(60). Noli Canonicos vel Epiſcopum tui ſanguinis effuſores vel perditores vocare, qui propter te '& propter ſe quantum potuerunt juſtitiæ intenderunt. —— I will endeavour to make my appeal to 'his holineſs, and lay before him the whole weight 'of my injuries. I will, to the utmoſt of my power, 'purſue both the biſhop and the canons, ſince they 'firſt contrived the ſentence againſt the author of my 'misfortunes, that they may at length be ſenſible 'how repugnant it is to honour, to deviate from the 'rigour of juſtice... Call not the biſhop or the 'canons the ſpillers of your blood, who for you, and 'for themſelves, have, to the utmoſt of their power, laboured for juſtice.' It is pity we have not the trial of Abelard's aſſaſſins, and of him that ſet them on; and I wonder that among the great number of pieces, that have been brought out of obſcurity for theſe hundred years, we have ſeen nothing concerning had been taken from him, and that then that maxim in dialectics in habitum nunquam poteſt redire privatio would prove to be falſe. It is pity we have not Abelard's anſwer to this conſolatory letter. It is probable we ſhould have ſeen there a kind of picture of Job's diſpute with his friends; I mean, that Abelard would have found anſwers and replies, and Foulques, in ſome things, would have been a miſerable comforter.

---

(50) Si vere miſerrimi mei animi profiteor infirmitatem qua pœnitentia Deum placere valeam non invenio, quem SUPER HAC SEMPER INJURIA ſummæ crudelitatis arguo, & ejus diſpenſationi contraria magis eum ex indignatione offendo quam ex pœnitentiæ ſatisfactione mitigo.

(51) Pag. 57.

(52) Concupiſcentia te mihi potius quam amicitia ſociavit, libidinis ardor potius quam amor. Ubi igitur quod deſiderabas ceſſavit, quicquid propter hoc exhibebas pariter evanuit. Pag. 47.

(53) See the remarks of her article.

(54) Quomodo etiam pœnitentia peccatorum dicitur quantacunque ſit corporis afflictio ſi mens adhuc ipſam peccandi retinet voluntatem, & priſtinis æſtuat deſideriis? Pag. 59.

(55) Pag. 75.

* Lucan lib. viii.

(56) See the pieces concerning the New Teſtament of Mons, Tom. I, pag. 405.

(57) Pag. 17.

(58) Quidam illorum qui tibi nocuerunt oculorum privatione & genitalium abſciſione mutilati ſunt. Ille autem (He ſpeaks no doubt of Fulbert, Heloiſa's uncle,) qui per ſe factum abnegat jam ab omni poſſeſſione ſua bonorum comportatione exturbatus eſt.

(59) Foulques introduces him ſpeaking thus.

(60) It is Foulques who ſpeaks.

For the reſt, the priory of Deuil, poſſeſſed by our Foulques, is ſituated near Montmorenci, three leagues from Paris. See upon this father Chifflet (the Jeſuit)'s Genus illuſtre D. Bernardi aſſertum, where he mentions one Eudo of Deuil, and Velaſius, in his Notitia Galliarum, at the word Pariſii (e).

(e) Taken from a manuſcript which I received from the Mazarin library.

ing this affair. I think they were too favorable to the canon; who ought to have had the Lex Talionis inflicted upon him. Mr du Cange (61) having told us, that the Salic law condemned to caſtration ſlaves taken in adultery and theft, that the law of the Wiſigoths condemned ſodomites to the ſame puniſhment, and that the laws of William the conqueror inflicted the ſame upon thoſe who raviſhed a woman, adds that Sugerius, in page 308 of the life of Lewis VI, makes mention of a traytor who was condemned to have his eyes put out, and his privy members cut off. Mr Hofman (62) has not copied Mr du Cange aright; for inſtead of theſe words apud Sugerium in Ludovico VI. page 308, he has made it apud Eugenium in Ludovico VI page 1308. The traytor Sugerius ſpeaks of was a man that the king of England had heaped favours upon, and yet he entered into a conſpiracy againſt his maſter: he came off with the loſs of his privy-members and eyes, and was not hanged as he well deſerved. Tam horribili factione deprehenſus oculorum & genitalium amiſſione, cum laqueum ſuffocantem meruiſſet, miſericorditer eſt damnatus (63). Father Theophilus Raynaud, who had read ſo much, yet was ignorant that Abelard's aſſaſſins had been puniſhed by order of juſtice, which plainly appears by Foulques's letter. This Jeſuit had therefore forgot that letter, ſince he affirms, that to puniſh thoſe who mutilated Abelard, without public authority, was as criminal as their action. 'Petrus Abelardus..... privata auctoritate eſt eviratus, quam fuiſſe vindictam illicitam eſt manifeſtum. Et æque nefaria fuit, ſi privata autoritate facta eſt, repenſa executoribus trucis illius ultionis exoculatio ſimul & exectio (64). —— Peter Abelard was caſtrated by the contrivance of ſome private perſons, and it is plain that action was illegal. Nor was the privation of ſight, and caſtration, executed on tho authors of that bararous revenge leſs to be condemned, if it was only founded on private authority.' I ſhall perhaps ſpeak in another place of the puniſhment inflicted upon the gallants of Philip the fair's three daughters in law (65).

(61) Gloſſar. Ling. Latinæ Voce Caſtratio.

(62) Lexic. Tom. III, pag. 389.

(63) Suger, Tom IV. Hiſt. Francor. Script. pag. 308.

(64) Theophil. Raynaudus, de Eunuchis, pag. m. 75.

(65) They cut off their privy-parts, and flead them alive. See Guaguin. lib. vii, folio, m. 129.

FRACHETTA (JEROME) native of Rovigo in Italy, made himſelf famous by ſome political works [A]. He ſpent many years at Rome, very much eſteemed by the duke of Seſſa, ambaſſador of Philip II, and Philip III, kings of Spain, and was employed in affairs of ſtate as well as war, in all which he behaved well. But notwithſtanding all this, he had like to have been overcome, even to have been in danger of his life in the perſecutions that were raiſed againſt him. He retired to Naples, and being not altogether void of friends, he made his innocence appear to the court of Spain, who ordered the count de Benevento, viceroy of Naples, to employ him as a faithful ſervant whenever an opportunity ſhould offer. This was put in execution, ſo that Frachetta lived honourably at Naples with a ſuitable penſion (a). I know not what grounds Moreri goes upon, when he ſays, his indiſcreet zeal involved him in a troubleſome affair. For Ghilini, the only author he cites, inſinuates no ſuch thing.

(a) Taken from Ghilini, Tom. I, pag. 120, 121.

[A] He made himſelf famous by ſome political works.] The moſt conſiderable of all, is that intituled il Seminario de' Governi di Stato, & di Guerra. He has collected together in 110 chapters about eight thouſand ſtate and military maxims, taken from the beſt authors; and has added to each chapter a diſcourſe by way of commentary. This work was printed at leaſt twice by the author. It was reprinted at Venice in 1647, and at Genoa in 1648, in 4to, to which was added, il Principe nel quale ſi conſidera il Principe & quanto al Governo dello Stato, & quanto al manegio della Guerra, of the ſame author. This laſt treatiſe was reprinted at Venice by John Baptiſta Ciotti, in 1599, in 8vo, and it was an edition corrected and enlarged by the author. The firſt edition was certainly done in 1597; for the epiſtle dedicatory is dated from Rome the ſeventh of November in that year. It informs us that the occaſion of Frachetti's compoſing that book was a converſation, in which the duke of Seſſa had ſaid, among other things, that it was his opinion, it was no leſs neceſſary than difficult to let princes know the truth of what paſſes in their own dominions. Note that, before he publiſhed his il Seminario de' Governi, he publiſhed a general idea of it in 1592. His other writings are Diſcorſo della Ragione di Stato: Diſcorſo della Ragione di Guerra: Eſpoſizione di tutta l'Opera di Lucrezio (1).

(1) See Ghilini's Theatre, Part. I, pag. 121.

FRANC (MARTIN) provoſt and canon of Lauſanne, and ſecretary to the Popes Felix V, and Nicholas V, flouriſhed about the middle of the XVth century. He was one of the beſt French poets of that time. He wrote a poem againſt the Romance of the Roſe, and intituled it Le Champion des dames, or the Ladies Champion, in which are ſeveral Verſes concerning Pope Joan [A]. I do not think that David Blondel

[A] In his Champion des Dames are ſeveral verſes about Pope Joan.] I ſhall here inſert ſome of them, being well aſſured that ſeveral readers will be pleaſed with them. But it muſt be obſerved, that the book is a dialogue between the ladies adverſary, and their champion. What follows is an objection ſtarted by the adverſary, taken from the hiſtory of the female Pope.

> Tu ſcais qu'elle ſceut tant de lettres,
> Que pour ſon ſens on la crea
> Papeſſe & Preſtreſſe des Preſtres.
> O comme bien eſtudia!
> O grande loüange ſi a!
> Femme ſe diſſimula homme
> Et ſa nature regnia, > Pour devenir Pape de Rome.
>
> O benoiſt Dieu comme oſa femme
> Veſtir chaſuble & chanter Meſſe:
> O femme oultrageuſe & infame;

del has put this author into the liſt he has made of writers, who have affirmed the ſtory of that ſhe-Pope. But this would not be the only author he has omitted [B]. The learned

Comment euſt elle la hardieſſe,
De ſe faire Pape & Papeſſe ?
Comment endura Dieu, comment,
Que femme ribaulde & Preſtreſſe
Euſt l' Egliſe en gouvernement ?

Lors le monde eſtoit bien nouvel:
Dire l'on peut qu'il ne tenoit
Sinon à la queuë d'un vel,
Puis que femme le gouvernoit.
Merveille eſtoit que ne tournoit
Le ciel, & que pour vengement
Dieu ſur la terre ne venoit
Tenir ſon cruel jugement.

Mais il eſt tardif à punir
En attendant que l'on s'amende,
Et quand on ne peut revenir
A raiſon, combien qu'il attende,
Certes c'eſt force qu'il entende,
A donner ſa punition,
Et qu'à juſtice ſon droit rende
Sans plus longue remiſſion.

Ainſi touſjours pas n'endura
Que l'Egliſe fuſt abuſée
De celle qui trop y dura,
Car ſa fraude fut encuſée ;
O vengeance bien adviſée!
La ſaincte Papeſſe enfanta,
Nonques plus la putain ruſée
A l'autel Sainct Pierre chanta.

Entre le Mouſtier Saint Clement
Et Colliſée chacun vit
Le feminin enchantement.
Si fut tantoſt fait un edict
Que jamais Pape ne ſe fiſt,
Tant euſt il de ſcience au nas,
S'il ne montroit le doy petit
Enharnachié de ſon harnas.

O Dames Dames couronnez
Voſtre Pape & Voſtre Papeſſe,
Deſſus les quatre couronnez
Elle acreut moult voſtre nobleſſe.
Alors le Champion ſe dreſſe,
Et en jettant le dextre bras
Dit, temps eſt que ce parler ceſſe,
De ce mal tu te remembras (1).

Her ſenſe and learning wond'rous were:
Prieſteſs of prieſts ſhe ſoon became;
She counterfeited well the man,
And mounted to the papal chair.

Heav'ns ! that a woman ſhould preſume
To wear the cope, and chant high maſs !
Why did God ſuffer it to paſs,
And let a whore be pope of Rome ?

The world was in it's infancy,
Thus to be govern'd by a woman:
'Tis ſtrange, ſuch practices uncommon
Did not draw vengeance from the ſky.

Tho' heav'n to puniſh guilt is ſlow,
In hopes the ſinner will repent;
Yet puniſhment at laſt is ſent,
And juſtice, mock'd, inflicts the blow.

Thus, by her pregnancy betray'd,
(O well conſidered vengeance !) Joan
Deſcended from the papal throne,
And from abuſe the church was freed.

From the like cheat to keep her free,
Without examination, none
Sat, after, on St Peter's throne;
Such was the church's wiſe decree.

Ye fair, whoſe heads ſupport a crown,
Pope Joan advances high your glory:
And, proud of ſuch a lucky ſtory,
Your champion throws his gauntlet down.

I ſhall not here ſet down the champion's reply, who excuſes Pope Joan as well as he can, by recriminating on ſeveral Popes. Here is a ſhort ſpecimen of his diſcourſe:

Or laiſſons les pechez diſans
Qu'elle eſtoit Clergeſſe lettrée,
Quand devant les plus ſouffiſans
De Rome eut l'iſſuë & l'entrée.
Encor te peut eſtre monſtrée
Mainte Préface que dicta
Bien & ſainctement accouſtrée
Où en la foi point n'heſita.

Let us forget her crimes, and ſay
She was a learned ſhe-divine;
Fix'd in the faith, whoſe conſtancy
In many a preface ſtill doth ſhine.

A BOOK intituled L'Arbre des Batailles.

[B] He would not be the only author he has omitted.] Mareſius obſerves, that Blondel, in his catalogue, has omitted a certain author of a book, intituled, L'Arbre des Batailles (the tree of battles). ‘Eſt quoque mihi, ſays he (2), vetus Manuſcriptum Gallicum, compoſitum ante 300 annos, quod inſcribitur, L'Arbre des batailles, —— I have by me an antient French manuſcript, written 300 years ago, intituled, the tree of battles; compoſed by Honoratus Bonet, doctor of the canon-law, and prior of Challon, to the honour of God, and in the behalf of king charles VI, ſurnamed the beloved. Illius libri, p. 1. c. 7. author explicans quo ſenſu in Apocalypſi tertia pars Solis dicatur obſcurata ad tubam Angeli quarti, idque intelligens de multis qui circa illa tempora ſedem Pontificiam illegitimè occupaverant, ſic inter alia ſuo ſtylo loquitur. —— In part 1, cap. 7. of that book, the author explaining, in what ſenſe the ſun is ſaid, in the apocalypſe, to be a third part eclipſed, upon the fourth Angel's ſounding his trumpet; and underſtanding it of many, who, about that time, had unlawfully uſurped the popedom, among other things, ſpeaks thus, after his manner; and at that very time, it happened, that the Pope died, and a woman was choſen to ſucceed him, whom no body ſuſpected to have been one. She came from England; and it was no ſmall affliction for people to think, they had a woman for a Pope. Eam ex Anglia fuiſſe dicit, quod fortè ſe curaſſet nominari Johannem Anglicum, vel, ut habet vetus Fragmentum apud Wolphium, Johannem de Anglia, cum tamen natione Moguntina eſſet. Et credo quod ſi hoc Catalaunenſis Prioris teſtimonium vidiſſet Rev. & Cel. Blondellus, qui etiam Catalaunenſis fuit, minus impendiſſet operæ in veritate iſtius hiſtoriæ oppugnanda. —— He ſays, ſhe was of England; perhaps becauſe ſhe had taken care to be called Engliſh John, or, as an old fragment in Wolphius has it, John of England; tho' ſhe was born at Mentz. And I believe, that, if the reverend and celebrated Blondel had ſeen the teſtimony of the prior of Challon, his country-man, he would have taken leſs pains in oppoſing the truth of that ſtory.’ A little further, he likewiſe obſerves, that Egbert-Grim, an Engliſhman, licentiate of divinity (3), had publiſhed a Flemiſh book concerning Pope Joan, wherein he quotes, for the affirmative, the teſtimony of one hundred thirty five writers. Blondel mentions not many more than ſeventy.

But, ſince we have occaſion to ſpeak of this Honoratus BONET (4), it will not be amiſs here to ſet forth, for the better information of the reader, the errors learned differ about the place where he was born [C]. His Eſtrif de fortune & de vertu, ſtrife between fortune and vertue (a), publiſhed at Paris in 1505 (b), is a mixture of proſe and verſe.

---

(1) The Ladies Champion, printed at Paris by Galliot Dupré, in the year 1530, folio 335. This work was dedicated to Philip II, Duke of Burgundy, ſirnamed The Good.

(2) Samuel Mareſius, in Joanna Papiſſa reſtituta, pag. 11.

(3) He was profeſſor at Weſel, and died in 1636, aged twenty eight years. Mareſius, ibid. pag. 12.

(4) Spondanus ſpeaks of him, ad annum 1395, n. 10, and ſays, he was of the order of the Auguſtins, and that he compoſed a dream againſt the ſchiſm.

(a) La Croix du Maine, pag. 314.

(b) Du Verdier Vau-Privas makes it 1519.

errors of ſome men in reſpect of this writer. I ſay then, firſt of all, that he is called, by Du Verdier Vau-privas, Honoratus Bonnor, prior of Salon, who ſuppoſes him to have been the author of a book, containing 165 chapters, intituled, L'Arbre des Batailles, and dedicated to Charles V. He further adds, that this book was printed at Paris by John Dupré, in the year 1495. Here we find three ſeveral variations between Du Verdier and Mareſius: I. As to the name of the author; II. As to the name of his priory; and, III. As to the name of the prince, who was the hero of the book. For my own part, I take Mareſius's teſtimony, as to the firſt and laſt article, to be of better authority than du Verdier's, becauſe father Labbe does not cenſure him in this particular. The epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque has ſtill a greater blunder than all this, in metamorphoſing the title of a book into an author. You will find there, page 534, theſe words; L'Arbre Batailles de bello & duello. Page 360, it is ſaid, Honoratus Bonhor, ſcripſit de bello & duello. You find then already three different names (5) given to the author of that book. But let us now paſs on to father Labbe's criticiſm upon Mareſius (6). 'In Honorato Boneto, auctore libri vernaculi, qui inſcribitur l'Arbre des Batailles, multa peccat: I. Priorem de Challon vocat, cùm fuerit de Salon. II. Compoſitum librum dicit ante annos 300, cùm tamen Carolus VI, cui dicatus fuit, regnarit dumtaxat ab anno 1388, ad 1422. III. Challon reddit Catalaunenſem, id eſt Chaalons, cùm appellare Cabillonenſem debuiſſet. Ita enim diſcriminantur illæ Civitates: hæc Matronæ in Campania, illa Arari in Burgundia impoſita, utraque Epiſcopalis. IV. Atque hinc longè abſurdior apparet alluſio, alioquin Alpina nive frigidior: Quòd ſi illius teſtimonium vidiſſet Blondellus qui Catalaunenſis fuit, minus impendiſſet operæ in fabula illa expugnanda. ——— He commits many miſtakes, in relation to Honoratus Bonetus, author of a book in our mother tongue, intituled the Tree of Battles: Firſt, he calls him prior of Challon, whereas he was of Salon. Secondly, he ſays the book was written three hundred years ago; whereas Charles VI, to whom it was dedicated, reigned only from the year 1388 to 1422. Thirdly, he tranſlates Challon Catalaunenſis, that is Chaalons, when he ought to have called it Cabillonenſis: for ſo thoſe cities are diſtinguiſhed; the one ſituated on the Marne in Champagne, the other upon the Soane in Burgundy; and both biſhops ſees. Fourthly, and hence the alluſion, otherwiſe more cold than Alpine ſnow, appears far more abſurd. Had Blondel, who was himſelf of Challon, ſeen his teſtimony, he would have taken leſs pains in oppoſing the truth of that ſtory.'

[C] The learned differ about the place where he was born.] Preſident Fauchet (7) aſſures us, that he was a native of the county of Aumale in Normandy. But, according to John le Maire de Belges, he was born in the city of Arras (8).

(5) Bonet, Bonnor, Bonhor.

(6) In Joannæ Papiſſæ Cenotaphio everſo, ad calcem Diſſertat. de Scriptoribus Eccleſ. Tom. I, pag. 922.

(7) Des anciens Poëtes François, liv. ii, pag. 205.

(8) Jean le Maire, Couronne Margaritique, pag. m. 57.

FRANCIS of Aſſiſi, a great ſaint of the Romiſh church, and founder of one of the four orders of the Mendicants, was born at Aſſiſi in Italy, about the year 1181. His father was a merchant, whoſe profeſſion he followed till the year 1206, when, being ſtrongly moved with the precepts of the goſpel, he reſolved to forſake the world (a). And, devoting himſelf to ſolitude and mortifications, he acquired ſuch a ghaſtly countenance, as made all the inhabitants of Aſſiſi believe, that he was mad (b). His father reſolved to bring him back to his profeſſion; and, the better to effect it by his ſeverity, confined him to a cloſe priſon: But finding his endeavours unſucceſsful, he brought his ſon before the biſhop of Aſſiſi, where, on this occaſion, he not only renounced his right to all his paternal eſtate, but pulled off his very cloaths, his ſhirt not excepted [A]. Thus, by his example, he induced a great many people to devote themſelves to an evangelical poverty; and he drew up for them an inſtitute, which the Popes did approve. To quench the fire of luſt, he would lie upon ice and ſnow [B]. But (a) Spondanus, ad ann. 1228, n. 7.

(b) Bonaventura, in vita St Franciſci.

[A] He pulled off his cloaths, his ſhirt not excepted.] Let us ſee after what manner Mr Ferrand has endeavoured to juſtify this new ſaint, at the expence of the prophet David: 'Michal, ſays he (1), the wife of David, perceiving, through the window, her husband, who, tranſported with a holy zeal, was leaping and dancing before the ark of the lord, deſpiſed him in her heart, and .... ſaid to him in deriſion; how glorious was the king of Iſrael to day, who uncovered himſelf in the eyes of the handmaids of his ſervants, as one of the vain fellows ſhameleſsly uncovereth himſelf! Now theſe laſt words of holy writ ſeem to imply, as if David had ſtripped himſelf ſtark naked. Nevertheleſs, becauſe the ſame ſcripture (ver 14.) ſpeaking of David's dancing before the ark, ſays, that he had a linnen ephod on; I cannot think that he ſtripped himſelf ſtark naked. But he ſtripped himſelf ſo as to look as if he had been naked; which therefore was cenſured, and accounted by all unbecoming the majeſty and gravity of a king, and the more becauſe it was done publickly, and before a great concourſe of people. David's behaviour, conſidered with all it's circumſtances, is not more becoming than that of St Francis, who was ſeen but by very few; ſo that, if the behaviour of the one ought to be blamed, the other muſt be ſo too; and therefore we read, that Michal laughed at it. But let us ſee whether the HOLY GHOST derided it; and we may gueſs by that, whether St Francis's behaviour is an object of laughter.' He relates afterwards what David anſwered to Michal, and what the ſcripture obſerves concerning the barenneſs of that woman. I will make uſe of Mr Ferrand's words, to expoſe Francis's nakedneſs; and thus I ſhall not be afraid of thoſe reproaches, wherewith he loaded his adverſary (2). '(3) As for what the apologiſt ſpecifies concerning St Francis's ſtripping himſelf ſtark naked, I will relate the ſtory as St Bonaventure hath written it .... This tereſtrial and carnal father (ſays † St Bonaventure, ſpeaking of St Francis's father) after he had deprived this ſon of grace of money, brought him before the biſhop of the city, that he might quit all right and title to his father's eſtate, and return what was in his hands. Francis did it, and reſtored to his father even all his cloaths, under which was found a hair cloth, wherewith he macerated his fleſh: afterwards ┼, moved by a wonderful fervour of zeal, wherewith he was tranſported, he ſtripped himſelf ſtark naked before all thoſe that were preſent, and thus addreſſed himſelf to his Father. Hitherto I have called you my father on earth; but hereafter I may certainly ſay ‡ our father which art in heaven, ſince I have put all my treaſure and confidence in him. The biſhop, ſeeing this, and admiring ſo excellent a fervency in the man of God, roſe from his ſeat, and, as he was a devout and kind man, he, with tears in his eyes, took up Francis in his arms, and covered him with his cloak.'

[B] To quench the fire of luſt, he would lie upon the ice and ſnow.] Let us go on with Mr Ferrand's tranſlation. 'Bleſſed Francis (ſays St Bonaventure), at the beginning of his converſion, would often, in winter, throw himſelf into a ditch full of Ice, that he might get a compleat victory over his domeſtic enemy, and to preſerve the robe of chaſtity from the conflagration of pleaſure. He aſſerted, that a ſpiritual man would rather chuſe to ſuffer great cold in his fleſh, than to feel the leaſt heat of carnal pleaſure in his ſoul. Being one day ſtrongly preſſed

'by

(1) Ferrand's Anſwer to the Apology for the Reformation, pag. 364, 365.

(2) He accuſes Mr Jurieu of having not acted fairly, when he related the actions of Francis of Aſſiſi; and he quotes ſome of his falſhoods, beſides thoſe two, which are in the remark [H]. Ferrand's Anſwer to the Apology for the Reformation, pag. 361.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 362, 363.

† Tentabat deinde pater carnis, &c. ibid.

┼ Inſuper ex admirando fervore, &c. ibid.

‡ Matth. vi, 9.

But that was all he thought fit to imitate of St Aldhelme. He durſt not come near women, in the height of his eager deſires [C]; and perhaps he acted prudently; for he was not ſure, that he could have withſtood temptation, as St Aldhelme did. Let us ſpeak more poſitively, and ſay, that his behaviour was, without compariſon, more diſcreet than that of the other ſaint. It is a mad raſhneſs for people, who aſpire to the greateſt purity, to come ſo near the borders of a condition, which, according to the doctrine

---

'by a temptation of the fleſh, he pulled off his cloaths, and ſcourged himſelf ſoundly. Then, warmed with an admirable fervency of zeal, he opened his cell; and, coming out of it, he went into a garden, where, having thrown himſelf naked into a great heap of ſnow, he made of it ſeven balls, and laying them before him, he thus ſpoke to his external man: the largeſt of theſe balls is thy wife; the other four are thy two ſons and two daughters; and the remaining two are thy man and maid ſervants, which thou muſt keep. Make haſte then to cloath them, for they are ſtarved with cold. But, if the trouble, they put thee to, is uneaſy to thee, ſerve carefully one only God. The devil, who then tempted St Francis, being baulked, immediately left him, and this holy man returned victorious into his cell. For the cold, which he endured externally, ſo extinguiſhed the internal flames of his concupiſcence, that he was never after troubled with them (4).'

(4) Ferrand, ubi ſupra, pag. 368.

[C] He durſt not (like St Aldhelme) come near women in the height of his eager deſires.] Aldhelme, who, from a monk, became a biſhop in England, towards the end of the VIIth century, dipped himſelf in water in the middle of winter, as high as his ſhoulders, to quell the rebellion of the fleſh. However, he would upon ſome occaſions expoſe himſelf to danger; he did not avoid women, when he found himſelf tempted; on the contrary he would get one, and lie by her till the temptation was over, and nature was quiet. He made the devil mad by his great triumph; for this did not hinder him from ſinging pſalms; and he diſmiſſed the woman as unpolluted as ſhe came to him. This is a coarſe tranſlation of the Latin, which I inſert in the margin (5); but here is a paraphraſe of it full of inimitable ornaments. 'St Aldhelme was an Engliſh monk of the VIIIth century, who was raiſed to a biſhopric for his learning and piety. But the moſt ſhining part of his holineſs was an invincible chaſtity, which was more to be valued, becauſe it had coſt him a great many ſharp conflicts. For the author of his life relates, that he would dive into cold water, or ſnow, to extinguiſh the flames of concupiſcence. He was, no doubt, preſſed very hard, ſince he applied ſuch violent remedies. Nevertheleſs, he got ſo perfect a maſtery over his fleſh, that the fineſt woman made no impreſſion upon him. Nay, he proceeded further; for he went to bed to a young maid, that he might triumph over the moſt dangerous temptations, and which would perhaps embaraſs the greateſt ſaints. Any other, but he, would have had his mind very much taken up in ſo nice a circumſtance; but he repeated the whole Pſalter, and the motions of his heart tended only to heaven. They ſay here, that the devil fretted and fumed, ſeeing him look danger ſo unconcernedly in the face, and his virtue ſtrengthen, where it commonly ſinks. Father Henſchenius would not however adviſe the preſent ſaints, of either ſex, to expoſe themſelves to ſuch trials of virtue. He thinks this an example, which ought rather to be admired, than imitated; and that there is a great deal of raſhneſs in preſuming ſo much on one's ſelf (6).' I wonder, that father de la Mainſerme hath not mentioned this adventure, becauſe it might have admirably helped him out at a dead lift. Although Aldhelme lay by a woman, and there rehearſed the praiſes of God, in ſpite of temptation, and triumphed over nature in the midſt of ſo imminent a danger; yet he hath been ranked among the ſaints, and deſerved that honour by a great many miracles. Why then ſhould it be thought ſtrange, that the bleſſed Robert d'Arbriſſel went to bed to one of his nuns, to obtain a victory ſo much the more meritorious becauſe it was hard to be obtained? If people will blame this, as indeed it is very much to be condemned; at leaſt it muſt be acknowledged, from the example of the Engliſh biſhop, that it doth not hinder the gift of miracles.

(5) Ut vim rebelli corpori conciſſeret, fonti, qui proximus Monaſterio, ſe humero tenus immergebat. Ibi nec glacialem in hyeme rigorem, nec æſtate nebulas ex locis paluſtribus halantes curans, noctes durabat inoffenſus. Finis duntaxat percantati Pſalterii terminum imponebat labori. . . Inter hæc præclaram hominis conſcientiam deſcribere penè verecundaretur oratio; niſi eſſet in facto glorioſæ victoriæ occaſio. Si quando enim ſtimulo corporis amoveretur; non ſolum illecebræ denegabat effectum ſed aliàs inſolitum reportabat triumphum. Neque tunc conſortium fœminarum repudiabat ut cæteri, qui ex opportunitate timent prolabi. Immò verò vel aſſidens vel cubitans aliquam detinebat; quoad carnis tepeſcente lubrico, quieto & immoto diſcederet animo. Derideri ſe videtur Diabolus, cernens adhærentem fœminam virumque alias avocato animo inſiſtentem cantando Pſalterio. Valefaciebat ille mulieri ſalvo pudore, illæſa caſtitate. Reſidebat carnis incommodum: dolebat nequam ſpiritus de ſe agitari ludibrium. Wilhelmus Malmesbur. in vita Aldhelmi apud Angliam Sacram. Part. II, pag. 13.

(6) Beauval's Hiſtory of the Works of the Learned, for the month of April, 1689, pag. 164, 165, giving the abſtract of the Acta Sanctorum Maii, Tom. VI & VII.

I have ſpoken, in another place (7), of an honeſt hermit, who let fall his breviary at the ſight of a couple, who were diverting themſelves at the ſport of love. This had not happened to him, had he been as ſtrong as St Aldhelme. This ſaint, though he had by his ſide a pretty woman, yet did not loſe one word of either breviary, or pſalmody; and I do not queſtion, but that, if he had had the caſe of conſcience, which Peter Damianus examined, propoſed to him, he had anſwered as Peter Damianus did. You may find this in La Mothe le Vayer. Agnes, ſays he, (8), Widow to Henry II (9), asked, by a biſhop, this pretty queſtion of Peter Damianus, one of the moſt underſtanding churchmen of his age, 'Utrum liceret homini inter ipſum debiti naturalis egerium aliquid ruminare Pſalmorum (§α)? —— *Whether it was lawful for a man, during the performance of matrimonial duty, to repeat to himſelf any part of the pſalms. It was decided in the affirmative, as Baronius informs us, upon the authority of the text of St Paul, in the firſt epiſtle to Timothy , which ſays, that God may be prayed to every where.' Is it poſſible, that there has been an empreſs ſo weak, as to propoſe ſuch queſtions? and if the curioſity of a woman extended ſo far, ought any grave Caſuiſts to have examined them? It is a true ſaying, that a man's mind will leave nothing unſtirred: the moſt gloomy and dark receſſes are not without it's reach; and, againſt all the rules of decency, it will carry thither a torch. I will obſerve, by the way, that one of the moſt celebrated of Ariſtotle's commentators would have anſwered the empreſs's queſtion quite otherwiſe than Peter Damianus did. He had maintained, that the public welfare requires, that, in this action, as much as in any other, hoc age, and nothing elſe, ſhould be remembered: for he pretends, that the reaſon, why the children of ingenious and learned men are commonly dull and ſtupid, is, becauſe their fathers let their thoughts wander when they ſhould be thinking on what they are doing, when they beget them. On the contrary, ſays he, you ſee ſome blockheads, who get children of admirable parts, becauſe they get them in earneſt, and not for faſhion-ſake: they mind what they are about, and nothing elſe, and wholly apply themſelves to the buſineſs in hand. Read this Latin: 'Alexander Aphrodiſæus magno ſe labore conficit, dum cauſam conatur inveſtigare & tradere, cur non rarò contingat, ut craſſus quiſpiam, tardus ac propemodum hebes, liberos gignat ſolertes, prudentes & acutos. Cujus rei cauſam hanc tandem ſtatuit, quòd qui tardiore eſt ingenio, is in ipſo coitu ita ſe totum præſenti voluptati percipiendæ addicit, ut nihil aliud animo cogitet, quem totum corpori immerſum detinet. Itaque ex eo corpore ductum & hauſtum ſemen, cui ſpiritus admixti ſunt, multum habet ipſius facultatis intelligendi: quo fit ut liberi naſcantur ipſo patre prudentiores. E diverſo, qui ingenio ſunt acuto, aut etiam eruditione præſtant, quia eorum animus in perpetua quadam cogitatione verſatur, in ipſo venereo complexu alias res agunt. Quare ſemen quod tunc profluit, quum nihil niſi corporeum habeat (animo nempe tum peregrinante) non multum illius præſtantiſſimæ facultatis habet (10).' A great many phyſicians have vented this fine doctrine. Read only Gaſpar à Reies, in his ſeventy ſixth queſtion, where he ſays, among other

(7) In citat. (35) of the article FONTEVRAUD.

(8) In the twentieth Academical Homily, Tom. XIV, of his Works, pag. 291.

(9) It ſhould have been Henry III.

* Chap. ii.

(10) Corraſius, Not. 5. in Areſtum Parliamenti Tholoſ. pag. m. 21. He quotes Alex. Aphrod. Prob. lib. xxix.

doctrine of the greateſt philoſophers, far from leaving room for pious ejaculations, allows not the ſoul a freedom of thought [D]. What is moſt extraordinary in St Francis, is, that it is pretended, that JESUS CHRIST ſtamped upon him the marks of his five wounds. The Monks of his order relate a thouſand wonderful things on this ſubject.

other things, that wiſe and thoughtful men, who perform matrimonial duties not ſo much to gratify their inclination, as to keep peace at home, and who, even in the very performance, have their mind taken up with philoſophical notions, ſee their children degenerate. He adds, that, for a contrary reaſon, baſtards are generally ſtrong, and ingenious: ‘ Nec ipſo quidem venereo congreſſu, omnino à rerum ſtudio, & contemplatione deſiſtunt prudentes, à quibus cerebrum debile redditur, quo fit ut plerumque tales minus ſalaces, minuſque fervidi ſint, & qui non magnopere hanc monomachiam ardentius expetant, imo detrectent potius, & velut inviti accedant, tantummodo ut uxoribus gratificentur, eaſque pacatiores experiantur, ſicque ad concubitus debitum ſolvendum magis videntur accedere, quàm avidè expetere (11).’ His advice is very wide of the deciſion ſent to the empreſs Agnes (12), and of the doctrine of the Rabbins (13).

[§ (α) The caſuiſts, building on the canon law, have declared for the negative. John Neviſan, l. 1. n. 25. of his Forêt Nuptiale: ‘ In actu coitus ſemper impeditur ratio ab actu ſuo, & in omni illo actu Prophetæ non habebant influxum ſpiritus Prophetici, ſecundum Tabienam in verbo Matrimonium iii. §. j. imo etiam in actu matrimonii quod eſt tantum Sacramentum, Spiritus Sanctus adeſt uſque quo venitur ad copulum, quia tunc recedit. Cap. Connubia xxxij. quæſt. ij. —— In the act of copulation reaſon is always hindered from exerting itſelf, and in all that act the prophets had not the influx of the prophetic ſpirit, according to Tabiena on the word Matrimonium, 3. ſect. 1. nay, even in the act of matrimony, which is ſo great a ſacrament, the HOLY GHOST is preſent no longer than till they come to copulation, becauſe then he retreats. See his chapter Connubia, 32. quæſt. 2.’ See the new Menagiana, edit. of Paris, 1715, tom. 1. p. 367. REM. CRIT.]

Cicero would have laughed at this pretended cauſe of the dulneſs of children; for he ſays, that the ſoul is ſo abſorbed, that it is not capable of any reaſonable act: ‘ Cujus (voluptatis) motus ut quiſque eſt maximus, ita eſt inimiciſſimus philoſophiæ, congruere enim cum cogitatione magna voluptas corporis non poteſt. Quis enim cum utatur voluptate ea qua nulla poſſit eſſe major attendere animo, inire rationem, cogitare omnino quidquam poteſt (14)?’ He has confirmed this, in another book, by the authority of a great Pythagorean philoſopher (15). ‘ Cumque homini ſive natura ſive quis Deus nihil mente præſtabilius dediſſet: huic divino muneri ac dono nihil eſſe tam inimicum, quam voluptatem. Nec enim libidine dominante temperantiæ locum eſſe, neque omnino in voluptatis regno virtutem poſſe conſiſtere; quod quo magis intelligi poſſet, fingere animo jubebat, tanta incitatum aliquem voluptate corporis, quanta percipi poſſet maxima. Nemini cenſebat ſore dubium, quin tamdiu dum ita gauderet, nihil agitare mente, nihil ratione, nihil cogitatione conſequi poſſet; quocirca nihil eſſe tam deteſtabile, tamque peſtiferum, quam voluptatem: ſiquidem ea, cum major eſſet atque longior, omne animi lumen extingueret (16). —— And, as the mind is the moſt excellent gift of nature, or ſome God, nothing, he ſaid, is more pernicious to this divine preſent, than ſenſual pleaſure. For, under the dominion of luſt, there is no room for temperance; nor, indeed, can virtue conſiſt, where pleaſure reigns. The better to prove this, he bid us ſuppoſe a man excited as ſtrongly as poſſible by corporeal pleaſure: and no one, he thought, could doubt, but that, during ſuch an enjoyment, he could have no room for thought and reflexion: for which reaſon nothing is ſo deteſtable and contagious as pleaſure; ſince if we ſuppoſe it to riſe higher, and continue longer, it would extinguiſh the whole light of the mind.’ See the following remark.

[D] A condition . . . . which, according to the doctrine of the greateſt philoſophers, allows not the ſoul a freedom of thought.] You have juſt now ſeen Cicero's opinion, which is agreeable to that of the greateſt men of antiquity. We have already ſeen (17) that Hippocrates and Democritus called the venereal act, a little epilepſy. What can be added to this definition? doth it not emphatically expreſs what is contained in our text? but let us not here forget the divine Plato. It is reported, ſays he, that the gods forgive falſe oaths to the pleaſures of love, as if they were children void of underſtanding: Ἡδονὴ μὲν γὰρ ἁπάντων ἀλαζονέστατον, ὡς δὲ λόγος, καὶ ἐν ταῖς ἡδοναῖς ταῖς περὶ τὰ ἀφροδίσια (αἳ δὲ μέγισται δοκοῦσιν εἶναι) καὶ τὸ ἐπιορκεῖν συγγνώμην εἴληφε παρὰ Θεῶν· ὡς, καθάπερ παίδων, τῶν ἡδονῶν νοῦν οὐδὲ τὸν ὀλίγιστον κεκτημένων. Voluptas enim maxime omnium temeraria: fertur enim de venereis voluptatibus, quæ ingentiſſimæ omnium æſtimantur, quòd pejerantibus illis Dii prorſus ignoſcunt, quaſi pueri quidam voluptates ſint, nullius intelligentiæ compotes (18). Ariſtotle obſerves, that pleaſures are obſtacles to the faculty of thinking well; and that thoſe of love give not the ſoul leave to meditate, or examine any one thing: Ἔτι ἐμπόδιον τῷ φρονεῖν αἱ ἡδοναί· καὶ ὅσῳ μᾶλλον χαίρει, μᾶλλον· οἷον τὴν τῶν ἀφροδισίων· οὐδένα γὰρ ἂν δύνασθαι νοῆσαί τι ἐν αὐτῇ. Deinde prudenter ſentiendi facultatem impediunt voluptates, eoque magis quo quiſque magis delectatur: qualis eſt ea quæ ex rebus venereis percipitur. In ea voluptate enim neminem quicquam animo agitare, aut ratione explicare poſſe (19). Montagne was not altogether of this opinion, and he went upon his own experience. Here are his words (20): ‘ Thoſe, who cry down ſenſuality, gladly make uſe of this argument, to ſhew that it is intirely vicious, and unreaſonable, and that, when it is at it's height, it maſters us ſo much, that reaſon is ſhut out of doors; and they alledge the experience we find of this in the converſation of women,

> - - - * Cum jam præſagit gaudia corpus
> Atque in eo eſt Venus, ut muliebria conſerat arva.

> When now the limbs preſage approaching joys,
> And the whole man for the attack prepares.

‘ Where it appears to them, that pleaſure tranſports us ſo much beſide our ſelves, that our reaſon, being charmed and captivated, cannot exert itſelf. I know that it may happen otherwiſe, and that, if a man will, he may arrive, at that very inſtant, at bending his thoughts on ſomething elſe; but they muſt be purpoſely forced and ſtretched. I know that the effort of this pleaſure may be checked, and I have ſome inſight into it; for I have not found Venus ſo imperious a goddeſs, as many, and more moderate, men than I, pretend.’ This would be a ſlender excuſe for thoſe monks, whom we attack here: the obſervation, which an Italian phyſician has made, would better teach them their duty. The very thought, ſays he (21), of ſuch an action overſets reaſon, and inſpires a ſort of fury. ‘ Atque utinam in ipſo Veneris actu duntaxat mente privaremur, non etiam in previa meditatione ad eundem, quam furorem & rabiem dixit & deſcripſit Virgilius, lib. 3. Georg. hiſce carminibus (22). . . . . . . Tranſimus conſulto carminis majeſtatem, leporem, poſſuntne apertioribus argumentis phyſice comprobari, quas furias addat ſola meditatio Veneris non homini tantum, ſed & brutis quoque cæteris (23). Pudenda itaque, vel partes reprehenſibiles exiſtunt, quod animalia omnia in rabiem agant, naturæ cancellis propriis amoveant, in homine verò maximè omnium jugulent ipſam rationalem animam. —— And I could wiſh we were deprived of reaſon only in the very act of venery, and not driven, even by the previous meditation on it, to that madneſs, and rage, deſcribed by Virgil . . . . I purpoſely take no notice of the grandeur and elegance of the verſes, and whether the truth of them may not be phyſically proved by plainer arguments, as alſo what that kind of madneſs is, which the meditation alone on venereal pleaſure raiſes, not only in man, but in the brute creation. Thoſe parts therefore are deſervedly termed Pudenda, (or what we may be aſhamed of), ſince they drive all animals to madneſs, break down the proper fences of nature, and, in man particularly, deſtroy the very rational ſoul.’ We ſhall ſee in ano-

(11) Gaſpar à Reies in Jucundo Elyſiar. Quæſt. Campo. Quæſt. LXXVI, pag. 1035.

(12) Igitur qui optimæ & ſimilis prolis deſiderio tenentur, non ſecus ac bruta, totos ſe Veneri tradere debent, & illius illecebris cum uxoribus attentos eſſe neceſſe eſt, alioquin ſi aliter imaginationem occupatam habeant, vel conceptus impedietur, vel propoſito optimæ prolis fine minimè potientur. Id. ibid. pag. 1036.

(13) See the remark of the article ARODON.

(14) Cicero, in Hortenſio, apud Auguſtin. contra Pelagium, lib. iv.

(15) Architas Tarentinus.

(16) Cicero, de Senectute, cap. xii.

(17) In remark [S] of the article DEMOCRITUS.

(18) Plato, in Philebo, pag. m. 405, C.

(19) Ariſtot. Ethic. Nicomach. lib. vii, cap. xii, pag. m. 72. C.

(20) Montagne's Eſſays, book ii, chap. xi, pag. m. 172.

* Lucret. lib. iv, ver. 1099.

(21) Marcus Antonius Ulmus. Phyſiologiæ Barbæ humanæ, Sect. II, cap. iii, pag. 128.

(22) He inſerts here 24 verſes of Virgil.

(23) It muſt be obſerved, that he enquires into the reaſon why the parts, deſigned for generation, are called the Pudenda.

ſubject. They have obtained a permiſſion to conſecrate a feſtival in honour of theſe holy marks, and to recite the office of it (c) [E]. They have reported ſo many things of their patriarch, and with ſo little judgment, that they have expoſed him to many bitter invectives and jeſts [F]. Some of thoſe jeſts are, without doubt, too biting, and malicious [G]: But one can hardly forbear imitating Democritus, or Heraclitus, when one reflects, that Francis of Aſſiſi receives divine honours after his death; he, who was guilty ther place (24) a paſſage of Melanchthon, which has ſome affinity with this. But we muſt not refer St Auguſtin's fine maxim to another place. He concludes, that, ſince the ſoul is affected with ſuch an exceſs of pleaſure, as to be incapable of any intellectual function, every man, who is truly wiſe, and ſenſible of holy pleaſures, had rather that the conjugal duty were ſeparated, if poſſible, from the voluptuous ſenſation, which accompanies it (25). 'Hæc autem (libido) ſibi non ſolùm totum corpus, nec ſolùm extrinſecus, verum etiam intrinſecus vendicat, totumque commovet hominem, animi ſimul affectu cum carnis appetitu conjuncto atque permixto, ut ea voluptas ſequatur, qua major in corporis voluptatibus nulla eſt: ita ut momento ipſo temporis, quo ad ejus perveniatur extremum, penè omnis acies & quaſi vigilia cogitationis obruatur. Quis autem amicus ſapientiæ ſanctorumque gaudiorum, conjugalem agens vitam, & ſicut apoſtolus monuit *, Sciens vas ſuum poſſidere in ſanctificatione & honore, non in morbo deſiderii, ſicut & gentes quæ ignorant Deum, non mallet, ſi poſſet, ſine hac libidine filios procreare; ut etiam in hoc ſerendæ prolis officio, ſic ejus menti, ea quæ ad hoc opus creata ſunt, quemadmodum cætera: ſuis quæque operibus diſtributa membra ſervirent, nutu voluntatis acta non æſtu libidinis incitata? —— But luſt governs the whole man, the affection of the mind being united with the carnal appetite, whence follows that pleaſure, which is the greateſt of all corporeal enjoyments; inſomuch that, at that inſtant of time, when it is raiſed to the higheſt pitch, all thought and reflexion is taken away. Who therefore, that is a friend to wiſdom and heavenly joys, leading a married life, and, as the apoſtle adviſes, Knowing how to poſſeſs his veſſel in ſanctification and honour, not in the luſt of concupiſcence, as the Gentiles, which know not God, would not rather, if he could, get children without this luſt; and wiſh, that, in the very act of propagating his ſpecies, the faculties of his mind, no leſs than his body, were ſubſervient to his will, not under the government of luſt.'

[E] The monks of his order obtained a feſtival in honour of theſe holy marks, and leave to recite the office of it.] See Alcoran des Cordeliers (26), and you will find there a marginal note, very ſatirical, in theſe words: As for the marks of this idol, the Jacobins ſay, that it was St Dominic, who made them with a ſpit, as he was hid under the bed, upon a quarrel between them. And thus theſe abominable ſects worry one another. The author of this note is at leaſt guilty of a very great omiſſion; for he quotes no body, who relates, that the Jacobins ſay this. Now it is ſo unlikely, that they have ever reported it, that twenty witneſſes would not be too much to make them ſuſpected of it.

Obſerve, that Faber Stapulenſis very freely condemned, as ſuperſtitious, the feaſt of the holy marks of Francis of Aſſiſi. See his comment on the ſeventeenth verſe of the ſixth chapter of the epiſtle of St Paul to the Galatians (27). The ſuperſtition of this feſtival is very contagious, and able to delude devout minds; for the preachers on that day are ſo pathetical, and full of high flights, that they ſow enthuſiaſm and extaſies in many weak brains; and, when ſome certain incidents chance to concur, theſe ſeeds never fail to ſpring up. I remember a paſſage of Balzac, which is worth inſerting here. 'There was ſome time ago, in a town of Spain, a ſociety of devout women, who meditated for many hours in the day, and who forſook the care of mean concerns, to live, as they pretended, a more ſublime life. But what think you was the event of this? a thouſand domeſtic diſorders, and a thouſand public extravagancies. The leſs credulous miſtook the pricks of pins for holy marks; the moſt humble thought their husbands profane; and the wiſeſt talked to themſelves, and were continually making grimaces. In fine, when only three or four of them run mad in the month of May, it was thought a good year (28).'

[F] They have publiſhed ſo many things of their patriarch, and with ſo litle judgment, that they have expoſed him to many invectives.] See the book, intituled, Liber Conformitatum Divi Franciſci ad vitam JESU CHRISTI, and you will need no arguments to prove the text of this remark. Thoſe, who compiled, in the XVIth century, the Alcoran of the Franciſcans, took their materials from thence, and only publiſhed ſome abſtracts of this book, with marginal notes. They made uſe of the edition of Milan, 1510. In all likelihood, the Franciſcans would have beeen a little wiſer, had they foreſeen what happened by the means of Luther and Calvin. But thoſe, who dared exclaim againſt the Romiſh church, were, for ſo long a time, cruſhed by the ſecular power, that they eaſily believed thoſe, who ſhould follow their ſteps, would meet with the ſame fate. But they were miſtaken. A large body of a church aroſe before the middle of the XVIth century; and this large body as yet maintains itſelf, ſubſiſts, and is ſtill in a capacity to make itſelf dreaded. It has had abundance of writers of all ſorts, who have taken notice of the impertinencies of former authors. Therefore, as the impreſſion of the book, intituled, Liber Conformitatum, &c. was imprudently allowed, the Franciſcans have been obliged to ſmart for it. This is not a blow, that is ſoon over, as when a whole ſect is extirpated, with all it's books. But thoſe, who gave this blow, have a great many authors among them, and a great many libraries, and printing houſes.

[G] Some of thoſe jeſts are, without doubt, too biting and malicious.] I reckon among them what I have already ſaid concerning the marks of Francis. Thoſe blows with a ſpit, which he received from St Dominic, muſt be looked upon as a ridiculous and malicious ſtory. Some body framed to himſelf a comical notion of the two founders of theſe orders, and fancied, that, one day, they quarelled, and came to blows; and that, St Francis hiding himſelf under a bed, his antagoniſt, armed with a ſpit, thruſt it five or ſix times into his body: whereupon another carried the jeſt ſo far, as to ſay, that St Francis's marks proceeded from this quarrel. I alſo rank, among theſe jeſts, this raillery of d'Aubigné (29): 'If any biſhop, or cardinal, falls in love with his page, let him comfort himſelf after the example of St Francis, who calls his love to brother Maceus, ſacred. And, in truth, they expreſſed their luſt even at the altar; for, as the ſaid book ſays, St Francis was all in a flame, when he looked upon brother Maceus, and would often cry out, as he did one day, when he held the chalice, and Maceus the burette or cruet, as if he had been tranſported with fury, Præbe mihi te ipſum!' Laſtly I reckon, among thoſe malicious jeſts, Conrad Badius's gloſſes, which I am going to relate. I put them, as he does, in the margin. As for the text, taken from the book intituled, Liber Conformitatum, &c. here it is in the body of this column. 'We muſt know how St Clara † was dedicated and conſecrated to CHRIST. The night after Palm-Sunday, being in honeſt company, ſhe went out of the town of Aſſiſi, and came to St Mary of the angels, in the convent of the brethren, where St Francis and his companions ſtayed for her; where, being honourably received by St Francis, and his companions, ſhe was conducted to the altar of the virgin Mary; and there, in the firſt place, ſhe was ſhaved; then her worldly cloaths were pulled off, and the habit of the order put on her: which being done, St Francis, and his companions, conducted her to the monaſtery of Panzo, which is now of his order, and was before of that of St Benedict.... One time, St Clara told St Francis, that ſhe had a mind to eat with him; but he would by no means agree to it; for which he was blamed by his guilty of ſo many extravagancies during his life [H]. He died the fourth of October 1226 (d), and was canonized by Pope Gregory IX, the ſixth of May, 1230. His feſtival was appointed to be on the fourth day of October. The moſt violent ſatire, that hath appeared againſt him, is one intituled, Alcoranus Franciſcanorum. A Monk of his order has endeavoured to refute it [I].

(c) Spondan. ad ann. 1223, n. 11.

(24) In remark [B] of the article FRANCES, citat. (9).

(25) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. xiv, cap. xvi, pag. m. 129.

* 1 Theſſ. iv.

(26) Lib. i, pag. 4, of the edit. of Geneva, 1560, in 8vo, ſold by Conrad Badius; and pag. 5, of the edit. of Geneva, 1578, in 12mo, ſold by William de Laimarie.

(27) Mr Simon's Critical Hiſtory of the Commentators on the New Taſtament, chap. xxxiv, pag. 494, and 495. He quotes Faber's Words.

(28) Balzac, in the third book of his Letters.

(29) Confeſſ. Catholique de Sancy, lib. i, cap. ii.

† Here is the ſhe-wolf that has brought forth ſo many others. Now we may very well think, that this laſs had been very familiar with this ruffian Francis, who (as they themſelves ſay in their book) was a thorough debauchee, delighting in all ſort of diſſoluteneſs, in dancing, gaming, junketting; and I leave you to judge whether he abſtained from fornication, before Satan had choſen him to compleat that diſaſter, which has overturned chriſtianity. For what ſort of behaviour is it, for a young woman, of an honourable family, to go out, in the night-time, without any attendants, or the knowledge of her parents, to meet certain Monks, hotter than bulls, and be ſo familiar with them, as to ſuffer them to do what they will with her, to ſhave her, ſtrip her naked, cloath her again, and then carry her where they pleaſe, and all under pretence of holineſs? Alcoran des Cordeliers, liv. ii, pag. 220. Geneva edit. 1560.

The

‘ his brethren, and therefore at laſt he conſented ‡. Thus having with her a ſhe-friend, and two of St Francis's companions, ſhe came to St Mary of the angels; and, after ſhe had bowed before the altar of the virgin, where ſhe had married Christ, ſhe went to eat the dinner, which St Francis had ordered to be laid on the ground. For the firſt courſe, St Francis began to ſpeak of God ſo ſweetly and holily, and ſo divinely and ſublimely, that the good ſaint himſelf, St Clara, and her friend, with the other brothers, were charmed with it: and, on a ſudden, as they were thus tranſported, having their hands and eyes lifted up to heaven, a great fire appeared over the convent of the brethren, ſo that the place and the foreſt ſeemed all in a flame. The inhabitants of Aſſiſi, ſeeing this, made all the haſte they could to the convent, to put out the fire: but they ſaw that nothing had been damaged, and that the brethren, and St Clara, were in extaſies; and then they perceived, that the fire was a divine fire, which had viſibly appeared to comfort thoſe, who were there aſſembled, wherewith they were mightily edified. Now when they came to themſelves, not caring for any other victuals, St Clara and her friend returned to her monaſtery (30). Nothing can be more dull and impertinent, than what Badius ſays in his laſt gloſs: A great fire appeared upon the convent; that is to ſay, it was reported abroad, that the monks diverted themſelves there with ſome nuns. What ſort of interpretation is this? Is not this to transfer Anaxagoras's principles of phyſics into morality (31). At this rate, one may find any thing any where.

[H] He gave ſo many marks of extravagancy during his life.] ‘ He, who had a wiſe, and daughters, of ſnow, might very well have ſwallows, and graſhoppers, for his ſiſters, and hares and lambs for his brothers; for thus he called theſe animals. Swallows, my ſiſters, you have chattered enough: my brother leveret, haſt thou let thyſelf be thus deceived? Graſhopper, my ſiſter, ſing and praiſe the creator. He told a countryman, who carried two lambs upon his ſhoulders, why doſt thou thus torment my brothers? his mercy extended even to lice and worms; for he would not ſuffer them to be killed; becauſe it is ſaid, in the twenty firſt pſalm, I am a worm, and not a man .... He himſelf killed the eldeſt ſon of a phyſician, in a place, called Nuceria, to have the pleaſure of raiſing him again from the dead (32).’ Compare this paſſage of Mr Jurieu with that of Mr Ferrand, which I am going to quote, and you will ſee what facts cannot be diſputed: they are thoſe, which Mr Ferrand durſt not deny. ‘ I omit here, (Mr Ferrand ſpeaks (33) thoſe things, which are either of no moment, or which are notoriouſly falſe; as is, for inſtance, St Francis's clemency to lice and worms, which he would not ſuffer to be killed; and the murder, which the apologiſt ſays this ſaint committed on the eldeſt ſon of a phyſician, to have the pleaſure of raiſing him from the dead. This is either ſo weak, or ſo evidently falſe, that we ought not to inſiſt upon it. The bare propoſing of it is it's refutation.’ Theſe are the only falſities which Mr Ferrand upbraids his adverſary with; he therefore grants the reſt; and that is enough to ſhew, that Francis had unhinged his mind by ſome very falſe notions of devotion. I pity Mr Ferrand, for having engaged to apologize for theſe fine fraternities. ‘ If the apologiſt, ſays he (34), was like St Bonaventura, he would take care (35) not to cenſure the name of ſiſter and brother; which St Francis gave to animals. He would admire that, as well as St Bonaventura. Whoſe interpreter I cannot forbear to be here again.’ ‘ St Francis, conſidering the firſt origin of all things, and being full of an abundant charity, called, by the name of brother and ſiſter, the minuteſt creatures. He did it, becauſe he knew, that theſe animals came from the ſame principle, as he, that is, that God was their creator: but he embraced, with more tenderneſs and friendſhip, thoſe animals, which, both by their own nature, and by the application, which the ſcripture made of them, repreſented the meekneſs of Jesus Christ; as, for inſtance, lambs. As he was one day at Santa Maria della Portiuncula, there was a graſhopper on a fig-tree, near the cell of the man of God. This graſhopper invited often, by her notes, the ſervant of God to praiſe him; for he had learned to admire the magnificence of the creator, even in the ſmalleſt beings. He called her one day, and, as if ſhe had been inſpired from above, ſhe flew upon Francis's hand. This ſaint ſaid to her; ſiſter graſhopper, ſing, and praiſe God by your tunes. The graſhopper obeyed immediately, and fell a ſinging.’ If it be true, that St Francis placed himſelf ſtark naked in the room of a crucifix, we cannot doubt, but that he was mad. I do not affirm it poſitively, becauſe I have only read it in the Confeſſion of Sancy. Let us ſee the paſſage, and fetch it a little higher. ‘ When we read of St Francis cohabiting with his wife of ſnow, it muſt be ſaid, that it was an antidote againſt his own natural heat, and that which appears in his poſterity. When he preached to fiſhes, it implies, that, when his poſterity preaches, they want dumb hearers. When he preached to them, as a miracle, that God preſerved them from drowning at the flood; it means, according to Richeome, that the miracles of the Romiſh church are to proceed from natural cauſes. When he called wolves his brothers, and gave them his hand, it was to foretel, that the Franciſcans would be a ravenous crew, who would endeavour to ſurprize innocent ſheep. He called ſwallows his ſiſters, becauſe his brothers, as well as they, in the time of matins, neſtle in the boors houſes. When the angel told him, in his prayers, that Antichriſt would come out of his order, it was, that the Franciſcans might not be thought unworthy of being Popes. And, when he laid aſide his ſhirt, to ſtand naked before the ladies, in the place of a crucifix, it was to ſhew the beauties of nature, as not having eaten of the fruit of the tree of knowledge, and to repreſent, if not the knowledge, at leaſt the nakedneſs of father Adam (36).’ I conclude with this obſervation; none have done more prejudice to St Francis, than his own children. If, when they publiſhed his hiſtory, they had expunged ſeveral things, which were not fit to be rehearſed, they had not given the Proteſtants occaſion to laugh at him. What grief was it not for the Iriſh Capuchins, when they came to ſettle at Sedan, to find themſelves entertained with three ſermons from Mr du Moulin (37) full of the ridiculous paſſages of their patriarch's legend, which that miniſter, who naturally loved bantering, ſeaſoned pretty high?

[I] A Franciſcan monk has endeavoured to refute the Alcoranus Franciſcanorum.] The author of this refutation is a Franciſcan of the Low-Countries, called Henry Sedulius. He publiſhed his book (38) at Antwerp, in the year 1607. He obſerves, 1. that the book intituled, Liber Conformitatum, &c. was compoſed by brother Bartholomew de Piſis in the year 1389; and that in the year 1513, a book intituled, The Alcoran of the Franciſcans, appeared, in High-Dutch, againſt it, without the name either of the author or bookſeller. 2. That this Alcoran, enlarged by half, appeared at Geneva, in Latin and French, in the year 1578, and that it was printed in Dutch at Dort in the year 1589 (39). He obſerves, 3. that the author of this Alcoran is called Eraſmus Alberus, and ſtiles himſelf miniſter of the church in the country of Brandenburgh. Now as, in the year 1513, Luther had not yet declared againſt the Pope, Sedulius fancies, that the date of the impreſſion is ſuppoſititious; for before Luther, the title of Eccleſiæ miniſter was not in uſe. In the 4th place, he obſerves, that it is a calumny to affirm, as Alberus does, that the Liber Conformitatum, &c. hath as much authority among the Franciſcans, as the Alcoran among the Turks. 5. He denies, what Conrad Badius aſſerts (40), that, ſince the reformation, this Liber Conformitatum, &c. which was often reprinted before that time, is as much ſuppreſſed as can be. He ſets, upon that account, Badius in oppoſition to Luther (41), and obſerves, that this book was printed at

Bologne

‡ He has ſaid before, that ſhe was 42 years ſhut up, without ſtirring out of the monaſtery. Reconcile theſe two things, if you can. In the mean time remember what I have already obſerved, That, if theſe things are true, it may well be conjectured, that leudneſs was mixed with his holineſs. For what decency is it, for two maids to go along with two monks, from one place to another, for a dinner? Moreover, whence came this Inclination in this holy nun, to feaſt with the holineſs of this fine father? unleſs that ſhe had a mind to rump, and to renew their former acquaintance? Ibid. pag. 223.

(d) Spondan. ad ann. 1226, n. 11.

(30) Ibid. pag. 224.

(31) Quodlibet ex quolibet, quia quidlibet in quolibet.

(32) Jurieu's Apology for the Reformers, chap. i, pag. 52, 53. Edit. in 4to.

(33) Ferrand's Anſwer to the Apology for the Reformation, pag. 356, 357.

(34) Ibid. pag. 369, 370.

(35) What a thought is this! It is as if I ſhould ſay, If the biſhop of Meaux was like Mr Claude, he would take care not to blame the reformation.

(36) Confeſſion Cathol. de Sancy, lib. i, cap. ii.

(37) They were printed in the year 1641. Father Joſeph wrote againſt theſe ſermons; but du Moulin replied by a book, intituled, The Capuchin, which he publiſhed at Sedan, in the ſame year 1641. See the remark [M].

(38) Intituled, Apologeticus adverſus Alcoranum Franciſcanorum, pro Libro Conformitatum, libri tres, in 4to.

(39) He knew nothing of the edition 1556, cited by du Verdier, Bibl. pag. 858, nor of the Geneva edition, 1590, in 8vo, by Conrad Badius. Note, That Voëtius, Deſper. Cauſa Papatus, pag. 619, knew only the Dutch edition of that Alcoran.

(40) In the preface to the Alcoran des Cordeliers, of the Geneva edition.

(41) Tam hoc eſt falſum (pudere nos libri conformitatum) quam quod ſcribit Lutherus verum, nos hæc abominatione necdum pœnitentiam agere, hanc non recantare. Sedulius in Prolegom.

The method he has taken will rather pleaſe, than diſpleaſe, his enemies (e); for, inſtead of condemning what is evidently blameable, in the Liber Conformitatum, he has attempted either to juſtify, or excuſe, it all. It was impoſſible to ſucceed in this; and therefore his book is only fit to inſpire theſe thoughts into the minds of the Proteſtants, viz. that the monks, unwilling to abate any thing, do ſtill approve the greateſt exceſs of ſuperſtition, which was occaſioned by the gloomy ages of ignorance. Would they but abandon the cauſe of Bartholomew de Piſis (f), they might, in ſome meaſure, ſtop the mouths of thoſe, who lay a great ſtreſs upon the Alcoran of the Franciſcans; but with might and main to defend it, is to put new arms into their hands, and to give them the ſatisfaction of ſeeing that this ſatire was reaſonable, and that it attacked an inveterate Diſeaſe, againſt which the moſt cauſtic remedies were not too ſtrong. I know, that the Franciſcans might have feared ſomething, had they confeſſed themſelves in the wrong: And this gives me occaſion to ſay, that thoſe are under very unhappy circumſtances, who, being aſſaulted by their enemies, afford them matter of triumph, whatever courſe they may take [K]. The Franciſcans find themſelves in this plunge, when they are reproached with the extravagant and ſcandalous propoſitions of the book of Conformities. They are not the only people, that are reſolved, right or wrong, to acknowlege

(e) See the paſſage of Rivetus in the remark [G], citat. (43).

(f) Author of the book, intituled, Liber Conformitatum, &c, which is the ground and foundation of the Satire, intituled, Alcoranus Franciſcanorum.

Bologne in the year 1590. Laſtly, he obſerves, that the names of the compilers of this Alcoran appear neither in the German, nor in the French and Dutch editions; and that he will not anſwer the marginal obſervations, but only the objections that are grounded on the words of Bartholomew de Piſis.

The notes on the Confeſſion Catholique of Sancy (42) inform us, that the Alcoran of the Franciſcans was printed with this title, De ſtygmatiſato Idolo, quod Franciſcum vocant, blaſphemiarum & nugarum lerna, ſeu Alcoranus Franciſcanorum, in 1543; and that it was only a tranſlation from the High-Dutch, which was publiſhed in 1513 *, or rather in 1531; for, in 1513, there were as yet no Proteſtants; and that this year, 1531, which is only a tranſpoſition of the two preceding numbers, is ſet down † for the epoch of the life of Dr Eraſmus Alberus, who at firſt wrote, in High-Dutch, the Franciſcans Alcoran. Let us ſee Andrew Rivet's judgment upon this work of Sedulius. A certain Franciſcan, called Henry Sedulius, ſays he (43), who attempted to mimic Lipſius, hath endeavoured to defend all theſe idle tales and ſcandalous propoſitions, heaping together ſeveral ſentences out of eccleſiaſtical authors, and others, which only ſwell his book, and perplex the ſubject: and, though, at the beginning, he grants, that there is ſomething too free in this book, by reaſon of the ſimple age it was writ in, yet there is no freedom of expreſſion there, but he ſtrives to juſtify: and therefore he compares them to ſome few drops of water, which do not alter the nature of wine, inſtead of acknowledging them a rank poiſon, that choaks the underſtanding of thoſe, who delight to drink of it. This book is approved by the cenſors of Antwerp, as very uſeful againſt heretics. Truly, it is ſo uſeful to us, that I could wiſh, for the glory of God, that there was not one Papiſt of ſenſe, but what had one, and read it with attention, that he might ſay to the author, and thoſe like him, thou haſt a whore's forehead, and thou refuſedſt to be aſhamed ‡. To make this appear, requires a larger volume than his; but his is ſufficient.

[K] Thoſe are under very unhappy circumſtances, who, being aſſaulted by their enemies, afford them matter of triumph every way.] Thoſe authors, who are expoſed to ſuch attacks, are like the Roman army, who ſuffered themſelves to be hemmed in ad furculas caudinas (44). They could not get out, but by ſubmitting to great ignominy. They could neither reſiſt, nor capitulate, but at a great diſadvantage. There are ſome controverſies, which have the ſame fate. Peace cannot be ſued for, nor war continued, but to one's confuſion. This was the caſe of the Franciſcans in the XVIth century, when the Proteſtants attacked them, concerning the book of Bartholomew de Piſis. To acknowledge, that this work contained many blaſphemies, many ridiculous, extravagant, and impious propoſitions, &c. was to ſacrifice the glory of the order, ſcandalize devout ſouls, and acknowledge that the heretics were obliged to teach them how to think and ſpeak better. Beſides, it was to make thoſe heretics proud, to give them a large ſcope to inſult the Franciſcans, and to prepare them the way to overthrow many other things, by acknowledging, that they were miſtaken in ſome, and that they had left the world, for ſo long a time, in a groſs ſuperſtition. They thought it better neither to give way, nor to capitulate, but to defend themſelves as well as they could, though their poſt was not well fortified. They then ſaw themſelves within the reach of the ancient proverb, A fronte præcipitium, à tergo lupi; Go forward and fall, go backward and mar all. There was a neceſſity to chooſe one of two evils, and they thought the worſt was to confeſs themſelves vanquiſhed: they hoped, ſome apologies might be made, which would ſatisfy devout ſouls; and that their adverſaries replies, though never ſo ſtrong, would not ſtagger the faith of good Romaniſts. In a word, they found, that, if it was diſhonourable to contend, it was much more ſo not to reſiſt (45). Generally ſpeaking, it is true, that, in a diſpute, he, who attacks, has more advantage, and can better maintain his ground, than he, who is attacked: but this was more particularly true, with reference to thoſe, who declared war againſt the book of Conformities. They fought, ſure of the victory; they run no riſque; and they were certain to get the better, which way ſoever the enemy turned. If he holds his peace, they might have ſaid, he will acknowledge our objections unanſwerable: if he ſuppreſſes the book of Conformities, he will grant the ſame thing; for he will confeſs himſelf aſhamed of the extravagancies of his predeceſſors, and confirm our charge againſt them. If he pretends to juſtify this book, he will as much confirm our accuſation: his anſwers will be wretched, and only ſhew his obſtinacy, and give us a fair opportunity to inſult over him, and tell him, that he does not innocently ſuffer for the faults of his anceſtors (46), but rather as an accomplice, ſince he adopts them, and endeavours to juſtify them as well as he can. Note, that Sedulius, the apologiſt of Bartholomew de Piſis, obſerves, that there were ſome heretics, who charged the Franciſcans with being aſhamed of this book, and that others upbraid them with not being aſhamed of it (47). Were not they like to expoſe themſelves, whether they approved, or diſapproved, the book of Conformities?

Such muſt always be the fate of thoſe who are to defend poſts of this nature. Mr le Camus, the famous biſhop of Bellai, did not foreſee, when he began a controverſy with Mr Drelincourt about the worſhip of the virgin Mary, that he would be drawn into this defile. Mr Drelincourt made a large collection of the moſt extravagant expreſſions, that he found in the writings of the Roman Catholics, concerning the power of the holy virgin, and deſired Monſieur le Camus to give him his opinion about them. This prelate was hampered; he racked his invention and fancy, and anſwered, that he was in the country, and could not come to verify the paſſages alledged by the miniſter; he drolled, and gave himſelf merry airs; but, in the main, he formally condemned nothing: he durſt neither ſwallow, nor caſt out the bit; he only chewed it, and even recurred to a mean and comical recrimination (48). All which proves how much he was puzzled. This recrimination, how bad ſoever it be, is more tolerable than that, which the Franciſcan Feuardentius made uſe of in a like caſe. It came into his head to reproach the miniſters, that Theodore Beza had invoked his Candida as a goddeſs. Theſe are his words: 'But what will you ſay, if I ſhew you, by 'the writings of your chief miniſters and preachers, 'that they invoke and adore their whores as Goddeſſes?

' In

(42) Pag. 91, 92, of the edition of 169..

* Henry Sedulius ſays ſo.

† Theatre Hiſt. de Helvic. Table xxxvii.

(43) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Reſponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part. II, pag. 352.

‡ Jerem. iii, 3.

(44) See Florus, lib. i, cap. xvi.

(45) Turpe quidem contendere erat, ſed cedere viſum Turpius. Ovid. Metam. lib. v, ver. 315.

(46) What Horace. Od. iv, lib. iii, ſaid to the Romans, Delicta majorum immeritus lues Romane, could not therefore have been applied to them.

(47) See the remark [I].

(48) See it above, at the end of the remark [A], of the article ARODON.

acknowledge nothing; for the Jeſuits alſo undertake to defend the book of Bartholomew de Piſis, when they ſee it attacked by the Proteſtants [L]. Some laymen have been ſeen to take pen in hand in a like cauſe, againſt the miniſter du Moulin [M], and have met with the fate they deſerved. However, the Franciſcans continue to preach up many abſurd things concerning their founder; and the world would be better informed of

‘Is not that to deny the only living and true God? Theſe are Beza's own verſes concerning his whore Candida.’

Et tamen hanc audes maculare, & dicere nigram?
Deſine, habet certè Numen & iſta ſuum.
Quæ niſi ſit precibus noſtris lenita, veremur
Ne diſcas læſæ quàm gravis ira deæ.

Dare you to blacken and prophane the fair?
Deſiſt; for, O! divinity is in her.
If ſhe relent not at our prayer, expect
To feel the vengeance of an angry goddeſs.

‘And a little after,

Parce, rogo, quæcunque dea es.

Thy humble ſupplicant in mercy ſpare,
Whate'er divinity reſides within thee.

‘And again,

Ecce fugam fateor, veniam ne, Diva, negabo.

Goddeſs, I own my flight, and ſue for pardon.

‘After that, he gives and conſecrates his ſoul to her, as to a goddeſs:

‘Ipſam nempe animam tibi dicatam, Amoriſque tui ignibus peruſtam, Quæ pridem tua ſit licet, ſuamque Te pridem Dominam vocetque ametque, Se rurſus tibi datque dedicatque. —— My very ſoul, dedicated to thee, and burnt up with the fires of your love; which, though it has been long your's, and has long called you it's miſtreſs, and loved you, again devotes and dedicates itſelf to you.

‘And again,

Ergo fas alium te, Candida, dicere Solem,
Utpotè quæ facias æſtum hyememque mihi.

Thou art, my Candida, another ſun,
Since from thy kind, or angry, eyes alone
My ſummer and my winter I derive.

‘Doth it become your authors, and arch-preachers, to call their ſluts, Ladies, Miſtreſſes, Suns, and Goddeſſes; and is it idolatry for the Catholics to call the moſt holy Virgin, and mother of God, ſtar of the ſea, advocate of ſinners, life, ſweetneſs, and queen of mercy (49)?’ Any body may ſee how ridiculous this parallel is: for, 1. there is a vaſt difference between a poetical expreſſion, and a phraſe of devotion. Thoſe are only witty conceits, which are not ſerious; but theſe are ſeriouſly uſed, as an act of religion. In the 2d place, Beza was not a miniſter, when he made thoſe verſes. 3. He diſowned, and abhorred, them as ſoon as he made public profeſſion of the Proteſtant religion.

[L] The jeſuits alſo undertake to defend the book of Bartholomew de Piſis, when they ſee it attacked by the Proteſtants.] Du Pleſſis Mornai, in one of his books (50), diſplayed the compariſons, which the author of the Conformities has made between Jesus Christ, and the founder of the Franciſcans. Gretſerus, the jeſuit, anſwered (51), ‘that there is nothing in that work, but what a pious ſoul may make a good uſe of; and that there are a great many things in it, which a wicked ſoul may wrongfully explain; that, before candor and ſimplicity had forſaken the earth, many things were ſaid ſimply and candidly, which now men of deceitful hearts cavil at and revile.’ After this manner, this is Andrew Rivet's reflexion (52), any one may defend Mahomet's Alcoran; and there is not a blaſphemous expreſſion, but may be turned into a divine ſentence by thoſe, who can ſo eaſily ſatisfy thus their pious ſouls, little zealous for the honour of Christ.’ Coëffeteau, who was a Dominican, did not ſtand up ſo much in vindication of this book of Bartholomew de Piſis, when he anſwered this work of du Pleſſis. ‘As for the book of the Conformities between St Francis and Jesus Christ, the Romiſh church has never approved it. It is the work of a private man, who, tranſported with an indiſcreet zeal for his patriarch, may very well be blamed for want of judgment; becauſe, being willing to ſtretch too far his encomium, he has written ſome things, which may be explained in a bad ſenſe. Thoſe of his order, who approved it in their general chapter, did not imagine that his words would be ſo ſeverely conſtrued; and I am ſure, that not one of them believed, for all that, that St Francis equaled, or was above, Jesus Christ, though they looked upon him as one of the great ſaints of heaven (53).’ Let us conclude with Rivet's reply: ‘If the Romiſh church doth not approve theſe blaſphemies, why has it born with them ſo long? why have the cenſors of books, the maſters of the palace of Rome, and all the inquiſitors, been as it were aſleep, with relation to them? have not they approved, by their ſilence, of two hundred years ſtanding, what the infamous Bartholomew de Piſis hath written? have not they, of late years *, given leave that it ſhould be printed at Bologna, without any cenſure or preſervative? can Coëffeteau, then, throw it upon a private man, who, tranſported with an ardent zeal .... He comes off very cheap, if this will ſerve his turn. What, was his general, and the chapter, a private man? they did not believe, ſays he, that his words would be ſo ſeverely conſtrued. But could they ſay, with a good conſcience, that, after they had thoroughly examined it, they had not found in it any thing that wanted to be corrected? is it not at leaſt a proof of palpable ſtupidity and ignorance (54)?’ I wanted this to prove what I have already ſaid, concerning the inextricable labyrinths, into which the Proteſtants have driven their adverſaries, when they attacked the author of the Conformities. And thus far the influence of the folly of a private man extends: it expoſes a whole ſociety to ſtorms, as formerly Ajax's crime expoſed the Grecian fleet (55). If you would rather have another compariſon, ſee the margin (56).

[M] Some laymen have been ſeen to take pen in hand in a like caſe againſt the miniſter du Moulin.] William Cacherat, advocate, the king's attorney in the admiralty of France, in the juriſdiction of Quillebœuf, wrote a book, printed at Paris in the year 1642, intituled, The Capuchin vindicated againſt the calumnies of Mr Peter du Moulin, miniſter; or, an apologetic treatiſe, containing the juſt reaſons, why the parliament of Bourdeaux hath cauſed to be burned, by the executioner of criminal ſentences, the defamatory libel againſt the Capuchins, written and publiſhed at Sedan by this miniſter, and diſperſed in this kingdom, contrary to the edicts of pacification: with a ſummary refutation of the calumnies and impieties, which are contained in it. I have already ſpoken (57) of this work of du Moulin; and I add here, that Cacherat ſhewed as much zeal to vindicate the Capuchins, as if he had been of their order; but his apology is good for nothing. He reckons (58) this paſſage the ninth calumny of that miniſter: ‘The Capuchins, who profeſs to obſerve entirely St Francis's rule, do not obſerve it; for his rule commands, that the Franciſcans ſhould work with their hands, which the Capuchins do not.’ Let us ſee how he ſtrains, to prove that it is a calumny: ‘The generals of the order, ſays he (59), who are to give an account of the actions of all their monks to the cardinal their patron, and he to the Pope, and who have the greateſt intereſt, that the rule be punctually obſerved, and who watch carefully, that it ſhould be ſo, do not complain, that it is neglected: and the miniſter du Moulin, having no authority to enquire into it, nor having ever been in the convents of this order, of this, were all prelates as vigilant and ſteady as the archbiſhop of Rheims [N]. Let us ſpeak of another matter of fact. Francis founded an order, which, in a ſhort time, grew very conſiderable, and has been a main prop of Popery. Some Popes, ſeveral Cardinals, a great many Prelates, and famous Authors have been of that order. Some particulars concerning this may be ſeen in the commentary of Henry Sedulius, a Flemiſh Franciſcan, on the life of St Francis, compoſed by St Bonaventura (g); and a great many particulars in the annals of the order, written in ſeveral volumes by Lucas Wadding, an Iriſh Franciſcan, who writ alſo a volume concerning the Franciſcan authors. This order is divided into ſeveral bodies, ſome more rigid than others, but all true heirs of that old emulation, which ſoon appeared between the children of St Francis, and thoſe of St Dominic. This emulation hath divided them, not only in religious matters,

---

(49) Feuardent, Examination of the Confeſſions, Prayers, Sacraments, and Catechiſms, of the Calviniſts, p. 95. He quotes Elegia 6, quæ eſt de ſua Candida, ad quendam Lodoicum. I have an edition of the Juvenilia Poëmata of Theodore Beza, wherein the place, and time, it was printed, is not ſpecified, and without the name of any Printer. The ſix firſt verſes, which Feuardentius quotes, are in the fifth elegy. The following, which this monk confounds together as if they were proſe, are in an epigram, intituled, Xenium Candidæ. The two laſt verſes are in another epigram. Judge by that, whether Feuardentius knew how to quote.

(50) In the Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 334, and more fully in his Traité de l'Euchariſtie, lib. iii, cap. xvii. Note, That Henry Stephens took notice of it in the 25th chapter of his Apology for Herodotus.

(51) Gretſer. Exam. Myſter. cap. 53. apud Rivet. remarques ſur la Rêponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Tom. II, pag. 351.

(52) Rivet. ibid. pag. 352.

(53) Coëffeteau, Rêponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 870.

* Anno 1590.

(54) Rivet, ubi ſupra, pag. 351.

(55) Unius ob noxam & furias Ajacis Oilei. Virgil. Æneid. lib. i, ver. 41.

(56) Sicut grex totus in agris Unius ſcabie cadit & porrigine porci. —— One tainted ſwine doth the whole herd infect. Juven. Sat. II, ver. 79.

(57) In remark [H].

(58) Cacherat, Capuchin vindicated, pag. 72.

(59) Id. ibid.

to ſee whether it be punctually obſerved, ought to be looked upon as a ſlanderer, and ignorant of what St Francis meant by theſe words, to work with their own hands; which ought not to be underſtood as this miniſter will have it, but as the church and the ſuperiors of the order underſtood them, and explain them now.’ It is evident, that to prove a calumny after this manner is very little to the purpoſe; and that it is rather a calumny, than a refutation of a calumny. This pretended proof amounts to this; The church diſpenſes the Capuchins from the literal obſervation of their rule: but that very thing proves, that they do not obſerve it, and that du Moulin's accuſation is juſt. Had he accuſed them of infringing the orders of their founder, without being warranted by ſome diſpenſations, or allegorical gloſſes, he might have been ſtiled a calumniator; but he only ſaid, that they did not obſerve St Francis's rule. Their vindication, grounded on the diſpenſations of Popes, and on the interpretation of their ſuperiors, would not have puzzled this miniſter; it would have afforded him new arguments againſt him. And indeed it is a very great abuſe, to profeſs a very auſtere rule, aud afterwards to obtain a diſpenſation to infringe it. And this the Franciſcans did, with relation to their vow of poverty: they got the Pope to give them leave to handle money, which gave birth to a diſpute, that made a great noiſe in England, of which Eraſmus gives a very diverting deſcription (60). Read it, and you will ſee, that the motive, which obliged Standiſh, the ringleader of the Franciſcans in that country, to make ſuch a ſtir, was, that he might hinder the Auguſtins from purſuing their traffic, becauſe their gain diminiſhed that of the Franciſcans. Some mendicant fryars, famous for their writings, might be named, who had leave from their ſuperiors to bargain with bookſellers. The latter give them a good price for their copies, and for the trouble of correcting the proofs: they give the author both money and copies, and the author himſelf ſells for ready money the copies that are given him. Do they then obſerve their vow? not at all. But they have leave to break it; and that very thing proves, that they do not obſerve it. This diſpenſation ſuppoſes, and proves, that they do infringe it.

[N] The public would be better informed of the abſurd things which the Franciſcans continue to preach concerning their founder, were all prelates as vigilant and ſteady as the archbiſhop of Rheims.] (61) A Franciſcan, a Capuchin, and a Benedictin, had preached, in his dioceſe, the ſecond of Auguſt, 1694, the panegyric of St Francis, at the ſolemnity of the Portiuncula. ‘ (62) He gave them himſelf their recantation in writing, to undeceive the people, whom they had deceived, to make them for the future more circumſpect in the exerciſe of their functions, and to give the people a preſervative againſt ſuch extravagancies. The three preachers humbly complied with his orders; and the Franciſcan declared in the pulpit, that the text, which he had taken for the ſubject of his ſermon, Tres ſunt qui teſtimonium dant in Cœlo, Pater, Verbum, & Spiritus Sanctus, & hi tres unum ſunt, had no relation to what he had undertaken to diſcourſe upon, and could not be applied to it, without evidently wreſting the word of God: that, having a wrong notion of the merits of St Francis, though he was a great ſaint before God and men, he had raſhly affirmed, that St Francis, in the Portiuncula, had done, by his tears, what JESUS CHRIST did for ſinners, in the manger of Bethlehem, by his; that St Francis had done, in the Portiuncula, by the blood of his wounds, what JESUS CHRIST did by his on Calvary; and that St Francis had done, in his heart, for ſinners, what JESUS CHRIST did in his upon the croſs . . . . (63) The Capuchin recanted likewiſe ſome propoſitions, contrary to ſound doctrine, which he had aſſerted in a ſermon the ſame day. The firſt, that St Francis, proſtrating himſelf on the ground, made the ſon of God come a ſecond time upon earth. The ſecond, that the Portiuncula is ſo entire and perfect an amneſty, that it may be ſaid, that, in all former ages, God never ſhewed himſelf more indulgent to ſinners, than at that ſolemnity: that, when he had ſaid, that St Francis, like St Paul, may boaſt, to have compleated what was wanting in our Saviour's paſſion, he had made a raſh application of this apoſtle's words, and contrary to their true meaning: that he had alſo advanced a raſh and falſe propoſition, when he made St Francis ſay, my GOD, if it be neceſſary, that your juſtice ſhould be ſatisfied, pardon, mercy, mercy to ſinners; I offer to be alone the victim, and to ſatisfy your juſtice for them . . . . (64) He acknowledges further, that, in a parallel . . . . which is falſe, raſh, and erroneous, as well as what he had affirmed, that the indulgence of the Portiuncula is an image of the immenſity, infinity, and eternity of God, becauſe it is gained in all St Francis's churches, becauſe it expiates the puniſhment of ſin, and will endure to the end of the world.’ Theſe are the propoſitions which the Benedictin was obliged to retract: ‘ (95) The firſt is that, wherein it is ſaid, that he did not know which to admire moſt, the divine word coming down into the chaſte boſom of Mary, or the ſame JESUS coming down into the chapel of the Angels. The ſecond, that he did not know which to admire moſt, St Francis's charity for ſinners, or JESUS CHRIST's love for St Francis. The third, which he has repeated often, that St Francis made himſelf a victim for ſinners, and hath taken upon him the ſins of the world. The fourth, that JESUS CHRIST hath given to St Francis the fulneſs of his graces. The fifth is that, wherein he ſaid, in many places of his ſermon, that the holy Virgin hath an abſolute power over her ſon, by reaſon of the authority of father and mother, which ſhe hath over him. The ſixth, that the cry of St Francis was more favourably heard, than that of Moſes and St Paul. The ſeventh, that the Bleſſed Virgin gave St Francis the life of grace, as ſhe gave our Saviour that of nature. The eighth, that St Francis makes up what is wanting to our Lord's paſſion in the behalf of ſinners, by co-operating with him in his victories over ſin and hell. He likewiſe retracts ſeveral other propoſitions, and dangerous expreſſions, as the following are: that the Franciſcans are uterine brothers to JESUS CHRIST, the children of Mary, the companions of the bleſſed ſpirits; that, like them, they draw their origin from the midſt of the ſplendors of grace and glory: that the plenary indulgence of the Portiuncula is irrevocable and eternal, ſanctified by the HOLY GHOST, who deſcended into the chapel of the Portiuncula, in the ſhape of a dove, as he appeared at the river Jordan, to make this indulgence as it were a baptiſm of ſalvation: that the indulgence of the Portiuncula doth not only remit the puniſhment due to ſin, but in ſome manner the guilt of it, ſince it is JESUS CHRIST, who grants it; he, who never, during his mortal life, remitted ſin, but he remitted both: that JESUS CHRIST himſelf grants the indulgence of the Portiuncula independently from the Popes: that it was a ſeraphim who drew up the bull of it: that St Francis asks either a fulneſs of grace for ſinners, or a want of mercy for himſelf.’

To

(g) Printed at Antwerp, 1597, in 8vo.

(60) Eraſm. Adag. chil. ii, cent. v, n. 98, pag. m. 511, & ſeq.

(61) See the Journal des Savans, of Apr. 11, 1695, pag. 241, Dutch Edit.

(62) Ibid. pag. 242.

(63) Ibid. pag. 244.

(64) Ibid. pag. 245.

(65) Ibid. pag. 246.

matters, as that about the immaculate conception of the holy virgin, but alſo about a great many queſtions of philoſophy. The Scotiſts and Thomiſts, thoſe Franciſcans, and theſe Dominicans, differ as much now, as formerly the Platoniſts and Peripatetics did. I take no notice of a controverſy, that laſted a long while among the monks of St Francis, and which created a great deal of trouble to their ſuperiors and to the Popes, tho' it was only about a trifle; for the thing in diſpute was only the ſhape of a hood, &c. Gentillet relates this very pleaſantly (b). Mr Nicolle ſpeaks of it in one of his imaginary letters. Obſerve, that the ſaint, of whom I ſpeak, was called Francis, becauſe his father had traded in France (i).

(b) In the Preface to the 2d book of his Political Diſcourſes againſt Nicolas Machiavel.

(i) Volaterr. lib. xxi, p. m. 761.

Reflexions on what has been ſaid.

To avoid prolixity, I will not make all the obſervations, which might be made upon what I have juſt now related. I will confine my ſelf to three. The firſt is, that the ſame propoſitions, which the archbiſhop of Rheims obliged theſe fryars to diſown, the ſame propoſitions, I ſay, or ſome equivalent to them, are every year preached, not only in Spain, Italy, Germany, &c. but alſo in France. The greateſt part of the prelates do not mind it, or are not ſcandalized at it: And this is the reaſon, why theſe doctrines, meeting with no oppoſition, go on quietly; and it is never known in foreign countries, that they have been vented. Should we ever have known, that they were delivered from the pulpit in the dioceſe of Rheims, in the year 1694, if the archbiſhop had not taken exception at them, and obliged the three preachers to make public reparation for their faults? let this ſuffice to ſhew that the empire of the monkiſh fancies concerning the credit of certain ſaints, and the prerogatives of certain indulgences, is very little leſſened; although the time of ignorance, which gave it birth, is vaniſhed, and has been ſucceeded by a return of learning and knowledge, which have laſted a great while. My ſecond obſervation is, that the Benedictin's hyperboles, concerning the indulgences of the Portiuncula, and the greatneſs of St Francis, exceeded thoſe of the Franciſcan, or Capuchin. This is a good office, which the monks mutually do one another. The Franciſcans imagine, that the praiſes of their founder will not be ſo much ſuſpected in the mouth of a monk of another order; and therefore they deſire either a Benedictin, or a Carmelite, &c. to preach in their churches at their great feſtivals. He, whom they employ to preach, is ſure to have his mind and body handſomely entertained; for he never returns to his convent, before he has been plentifully treated, and ſufficiently praiſed, and largely thanked, for his eloquence. Beſides, they are ready to requite him upon occaſion; for his order hath alſo it's feſtivals. A Franciſcan's ſermon is requiſite there, and is more effectual than one of the ſame order. He often is more extravagant in his encomium on the efficacy of the ſcapulary, than a Carmelite. This is a mutual intercourſe of good offices. It is not long ago, that an ingenious man, and who is now a Proteſtant, told me, that, when he was a Benedictin, he was deſired to preach in a convent of Franciſcans, at the feſtival of the Portiuncula. They ſpecified on what they would have him chiefly inſiſt. He partly complied with their deſire; but he gave his ſubject a certain turn, which did not pleaſe them. Some of them artfully let him know it: he excuſed himſelf, and then asked them, as among friends, whether it was reaſonable to affirm in the pulpit ſo many things which are not true? what then will you have us do? replied they. Will you have us ſtarve? which leads me to the third obſervation. There are ſeveral abuſes in the Romiſh church, which, in all likelihood, will laſt as long as that church. It will be to no purpoſe to go from a learned age to one more learned; thoſe things will not alter. It is true, they ſprung up in the times of ignorance; but ignorance was not the only cauſe, nor even the principal cauſe, of their birth. The wants of a ſociety, as well thoſe of food, as commodious lodging; the intereſt they had in ſhewing the people an altar well ſet off, and rich church ornaments; all this required ſome wonderful deſcriptions, to exalt the privileges of a certain ſaint, or of a certain chapel, or of ſome particular feſtival. It was a daily fund of ſubſiſtence; and, when the anniverſary feaſt came, then the order had it's harveſt and vintage. Now the wants, that I ſpeak of, are not ſubject to the viciſſitude of light and darkneſs; they are the ſame at all times, in an ignorant, as well as in a learned age. Therefore, tho' knowledge is greater, and more common, yet they produce ſtill the ſame effects. Philoſophical heads are puzzled, whether they ſhall admire, in this, the long forbearance, or the long anger, of heaven. And ſome would willingly apply here the tantæne animis cæleſtibus iræ, which an Engliſh doctor applies to the errors in which the hiſtory of nations have been plunged for ſo many ages (66).

(66) See, above, citat. (55) of the article BRACHMANES.

FRANCIS I, king of France, was one of thoſe great princes, whoſe extraordinary qualities were mixed with many faults. The French hiſtorians (a) very ſincerely acknowledge this mixture; and even ſome complain, that the Spaniſh writers, inſtead of acknowledging it, affect to repreſent this king as an accompliſhed prince [A]. There may be a great deal of deſign in both their proceedings; however there ſeems to be leſs in the French, than in the Spaniſh writers. For a man muſt be blind, not clearly to perceive, in Francis the firſt's reign, a long ſeries of faults and imprudence. This prince had like to have deprived himſelf of the right of ſucceeding Lewis XII. He took the ready

(a) Beaucaire, Spondanus, Mezerai, Varillas, &c.

[A] The French hiſtorians .... complain, that the Spaniſh writers ... affect to repreſent this king as an accompliſhed prince.] Some of Mr Varillas's critics would have had him imitate the .... Italian and Spaniſh hiſtorians who have not been contented to exaggerate Francis the firſt's noble actions, but have moreover concealed thoſe, that were not praiſe-worthy (1). Among other things, he anſwers, that they did it not to oblige Francis I, but that they wrote favourably of him, by a refined policy, which it is neceſſary to unfold; and he unfolds it thus: ‘ They were jealous of the growth of France, and they were afraid, leſt the French ſhould carry their conqueſts even into their country, after they were free from thoſe civil wars, they had been involved in for forty years. There was no better way to prevent it, than to perſuade the French, that they would not, for the future, have better ſucceſs againſt Spain, Germany, and the Low Countries, than they had under Francis I; and, to effect it, they were to be accuſtomed to read, in the hiſtory of this prince, that he had done what mortal man could do againſt the houſe of Auſtria, and that he was not able to ſhake it: that he had made no falſe ſteps: that the faults, which were aſcribed to him, belonged rather to the monarchy, than to the monarch; that is to ſay, that Francis I had, for his part, done what ought to be done, to overcome Charles V, but that France could not make ſufficient efforts, nor raiſe men and money enough for ſo great a victory: that what was imputed to Francis I, as a misfortune, ought to be aſcribed only to the weakneſs of his kingdom; and that, if the greateſt generals and politicians, that ever were, had commanded the ſame armies, and had been in the ſame circumſtances, they had been overcome at the battle of Pavia, and, like him, had diſintangled themſelves by the ſhameful treaties of Madrid, Cambray, and Crepy. The French hiſtorians might have eaſily refuted ſo palpable an er‘ ror,

(1) Varillas's Preface to his Hiſtory of Francis I.

ready way to it, by the tender careſſes, wherewith he charmed the young queen (b) [B], when he was informed of the danger he expoſed himſelf to. Altho' this ſtory is variouſly told [C], yet it is not agreed on all hands, that he made a good uſe of this wholeſome ror, by laying open, as I have done, the naked truth, and by ſhewing, by authentic pieces, that Francis Iſt did not do, by far, what he might have done againſt Charles V, and that it was ſeveral times in his power to beat him: that his moſt chriſtian majeſty's negligence, and prepoſterous management in ſome things, cannot be excuſed: that theſe irregularities proceeded always from the monarch, and not from the monarchy: that weakneſs had no ſhare in it, and misfortune the leaſt; that theſe miſcarriages were chiefly occaſioned by the miſunderſtanding, ſo common, in the hiſtory of France, between the ſovereigns of former times, and their miniſters: and that ſome better generals, and more vigilant politicians, would one day mend what Francis Iſt had ſpoiled.'

[B] The tender careſſes, wherewith he charmed the young queen.] Lewis XII, who had married the king of England's ſiſter, in the month of November, 1514, died the firſt of January following; and many thought that his too great careſſes of the young queen were the cauſe of his death (2). Theſe careſſes, exceſſive for ſo tender a prince as he was, were not ſo for his ſpouſe, who was but eighteen years of age. She hearkened to amorous tales both in French and Engliſh. A gentleman of her own country loved her, and had followed her into France. She married him afterwards. On the other hand, ſhe appeared charming to the preſumptive heir of the crown. He then was called the duke of Valois. Let us ſee what Mezerai ſays: 'The young duke of Valois, who was a great admirer of fine ladies, was ſoon ſmitten with the young queen; and Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, who loved her before this marriage, and followed the court of France as embaſſador of England, had not extinguiſhed his firſt flame: but Arthur de Gouffier-Boiſy, who had been governor to the duke of Valois, repreſenting to him, that he run the riſque of getting a maſter, and that he ought to fear the ſame thing from the duke of Suffolk; he cured himſelf of this folly, and had this duke narrowly watched (3).' Varillas has very much enlarged upon this: he ſpeaks thus, after having ſaid that the count of Angouleſme (4) was ordered to go and marry, at Bologne, the princeſs of England for the king. 'He could not forbear being ſmitten with her, whom he married for his father-in-law (5), as ſhe could not forbear wiſhing, that heaven had given her the count for her huſband. Perhaps, the conveniency, which they had of ſeeing one another, might have made them carry things too far, if the protonotary du Prat (6), who was ſent with the count to check the violent motions of his youth, had not made him conſider, that it was the new queen's intereſt not to be chaſt; becauſe going to a huſband, by whom every body told her ſhe ſhould have no children, it was to be feared ſhe would give way to the temptation of having a ſon, who ſhould ſupport her in her rank in France, when ſhe became a widow, and exempt her from returning into England under her brother's government: but that, as for him, he had the greateſt intereſt in the world to take care, that the queen ſhould be chaſt, ſo far ought he to be from debauching her; ſince, if ſhe had a ſon, tho' by him, this ſon would hinder him from coming to the crown, and force him to be ſatisfied with the duchy of Bretagne, which he had by his wife: beſides, he would be obliged, againſt the order of nature, to pay homage for it to his own baſtard. This reaſon ſlackened the count of Angouleſme's eagerneſs, who, ever after, only looked on the queen with a jealous eye. He obſerved her ſo narrowly, that he diſcovered at laſt her inclination for Suffolk (7).' Varillas relates afterwards ſome very curious things concerning the precautions taken againſt Suffolk. See the following remark.

[C] This ſtory is variouſly told.] Brantome does not give the glory of this prudent advice, either to Gouffier-Boiſy, or Du Prat, but to a gentleman of his province. I am ſure, that his words will be more acceptable than mine, and therefore I will tranſcribe them (8). 'They ſay, that queen Mary of England, third wife to king Lewis XII, did not do the ſame thing (9); for, being diſpleaſed with, and diffident of, the king her huſband's ſtrength, ſhe had a mind to ſound the ford, taking the count of Angouleſme for her guide, who was afterwards king Francis, and then a very beautiful and agreeable prince, whom ſhe made very much of, calling him always Monſieur mon beau-fils; (my ſon-in-law) and ſo he was; for he had already married the lady Claudia, king Lewis's daughter. She was truly very much ſmitten with him, and he with her; ſo that they would have proceeded too far, had it not been for the late Mr de Grignaux, a gentleman of Perigord, who had been knight of honour to queen Anne, as we have ſaid, and was ſo ſtill to queen Mary. This gentleman, being informed of the intrigue, that was then carried on, repreſented to the ſaid count of Angouleſme the fault that he was going to commit, and angrily told him; how now! what will you do? do not you ſee, that this cunning and ſubtle woman would draw you in to get her with child; and, if ſhe comes to have a ſon, you will be ſtill count of Angouleſme, and never king of France, as you expect? the king her huſband is old, and cannot get her with child; and you will meddle with her, and do it ſo well, you that are young and hot, and ſhe young and hot too, that it will take like wild-fire; ſhe will bring you a child, and then you are very well helped up. You may then indeed ſay, adieu my ſhare to the kingdom of France; therefore think on it. This queen had a mind to put in practice the Spaniſh proverb, which ſays, that nunca muger aguda murio ſin herederos; an ingenuous woman never dies without heirs: that is to ſay, that, if her huſband does not get her ſome, ſhe employs a ſecond to perform that office. The count of Angouleſme thought ſeriouſly upon it, and proteſted, that he would be wiſe, and quiet his deſign; but, being inticed over and over by the careſſes and allurements of this beautiful Engliſh woman, he was more ſmitten than ever. How furious is love! that, for the ſake of ſuch a little piece of fleſh, which a man longs for, he abandons, nay loſes kingdoms and empires? and you may ſee frequent inſtances of this in hiſtory. At laſt, Mr de Grignaux, ſeeing this young man run headlong to his ruin, and that he went on with his intrigue, told it to the counteſs of Angouleſme his mother; who curbed his love, and chid him for it, ſo that he left it off.' Compare theſe three relations, and you will find they vary a little; but Brantome chiefly differs from Mezerai and Varillas in this, that the young queen, being a widow, endeavoured to ſuppoſe a child, to ſupplant Francis I. The two other hiſtorians clear her from that crime. After Lewis the twelfth's death, Mary of England was thought to be with child; but the contrary was ſoon known, by her own acknoledging ſhe was not. They are Mezerai's words (10). Theſe are Varillas's (11). The queen was as narrowly watched as before, whilſt there was room left to doubt whether ſhe was with child; but after ſhe had declared that ſhe was not, and that there were ſufficient proofs that what ſhe ſaid was true, the count of Angouleſme, coming to the Crown, &c. Brantome ſpeaks after a very different manner (12). 'They report however, that the ſaid queen did what ſhe could, to live and reign as queen mother, a little before, and after the king her huſband's death: but he died too ſoon, and ſhe had too little time to compleat her deſign; and yet ſhe reported, every day after the death of the king her huſband, that ſhe was with child; ſo that, being not ſo inwardly, they ſay, ſhe ſwelled herſelf outwardly, by little and little, with linnen cloths; and, the term being come, ſhe had a ſuppoſed child, which another big bellied woman was to have, and to produce at the pretended time of her delivery. But the lady regent, who was a Savoyard, and knew what it was to have children, and who ſaw, that her's and her ſon's intereſt was too much concerned in this affair, had her well examined and ſearched by

' phyſicians

(b) Lewis the twelfth's wife.

(2) Mezerai's Hiſtory of France, Tom. II, p. 872.

(3) Ibid. Abregé Chronologique, Tom. IV, pag. 470, ad Ann. 1514.

(4) So he names the prince, whom Mezerai calls the Duke de Valois.

(5) The princeſs Claudia, daughter to Lewis XII, was married to Francis I.

(6) Mr Varillas puts in the margin the following words, Some relations mention Gouffier de Boiſy inſtead of Duprat.

(7) Varillas's Hiſtory of Francis I, lib. i, p. 17.

(8) Brantome, Dames Galantes, Tom. II, p. 117.

(9) He had been ſaying, that Queen Louiſa, wife to Henry III, rejected the advice, that was given her, of being got with child by ſomebody elſe, ſince ſhe could hope for none from her huſband.

(10) Hiſtory of France, Tom. II, pag. 895.

(11) Hiſtory of Francis I, lib. i, pag. 20.

(12) Brantome, ubi ſupra, pag. 118, 119.

wholſome advice; but he was not circumſpect with regard to other women (c); and ſome pretend, that it coſt him his life [D]. I have ſaid elſewhere (d), that the chief of his miſtreſſes had like to have made him loſe his whole kingdom. He did not ſuſpect that black deſign; and, ſeeing how ill his affairs went, he let fall ſome complaints againſt divine providence [E]. It was during a war, which was ſooner ended, than 'ſicians and midwives, and, by the ſight and diſcovery of the linnen and clouts, ſhe was found out, and ſo miſcarried in her deſign; and, inſtead of being queen-mother, ſhe was ſent back into her own country.' This irrefragably confutes thoſe, who ſay, in behalf of king James (13), that it cannot come into any one's thought, who is in the midſt of a numerous court, always ſurrounded with a vaſt number of domeſtics, to ſuppoſe a child. Here is Brantome, who underſtood the world as well as another, and knew the court extreamly well; here is he, I ſay, relating ſuch another project actually carried on at the court of France. It is an argument, that there are ſome men of ſenſe, who fancy, that it may be done.

[D] Some pretend, that it coſt him his life.] The French authors ſpeak very freely of this. One of them, mentioning an abſceſs, which reduced this prince to a very low condition (14), adds; I have ſometimes heard ſay, that he had got this diſtemper of the handſome Ferronniere, one of his miſtreſſes, whoſe picture is ſtill to be ſeen in ſome cloſets of the curious; and that her husband, out of a ſtrange and ſilly ſort of revenge, went into a ſcandalous houſe, on purpoſe to get this infectious diſtemper, that he might infect them both. Tho' the danger was over, yet did he ſuffer for a long while after (15). Thus Mezerai ſpeaks, under the year 1539. Let us ſee what he ſays concerning the king's laſt ſickneſs. That malignant ulcer, which happened to him in the year 1539, not being cured by his phyſicians, becauſe they durſt not treat him with that ſevere method, which ought to be uſed in thoſe diſtempers, crept as far as the neck of the bladder, and began to corrode it with intolerable heats; ſo that this pain and infection, which was ſpread all over his body, cauſed in him a ſlow fever, and a ſullen peeviſhneſs, which made him incapable of any great deſign (16). This ſlow fever was ſoon converted into a continual fever, which carried him off the thirtieth of March 1547. Although this author, in his chronological abridgment, has ſaid moſt of the things, which we have juſt now ſeen, I will ſet down here what he repeats, becauſe ſomething new will be found in it. 'Three months after, the king was grievouſly ſick of an ulcer, which affected that part, which the phyſicians call the Perinæum. This diſtemper was reported to be the reſult of a ſcandalous intrigue, which he had with the handſome Ferronniere, one of his miſtreſſes. This woman's husband enraged at an affront, which courtiers call only gallantry, bethought himſelf to go to a bawdy-houſe, to infect himſelf, that he might infect his wife, and ſo extend his revenge to his rival. The unhappy woman died of it; her husband was cured by ſome ſpeedy remedies, and the king had all the troubleſome ſymptoms of it. And, as his phyſicians took care of him more according to his quality than his diſtemper, ſomething of it ſtuck by him ever after, whoſe malignity altered very much the ſweetneſs of his temper, and made him peeviſh, ſuſpicious, and hard to pleaſe (17).' Tho' Mr Varillas, contrary to his cuſtom on ſuch ſort of ſubjects, is ſhort, yet he expreſſes himſelf fully enough, not to put his reader upon a neceſſity of ſupplying any thing by his imagination (18). I have read, in Brantome, that the king gave queen Claudia the diſtemper he had got. See father l'Enfant's Calendar (19), and you will find in it this pox of Francis I, which he had got with the handſome Ferronniere. This author quotes du Verdier in this king's life.

I have heard ſay, that this miſtreſs was called LA FERONNIERE, only becauſe her husband was an ironmonger. I ſhould leſs ſuſpect this, had not I read in Lewis Guion, that ſhe, who was infected by her husband, and infected the king, was the wife of an advocate. Theſe are this writer's words (20). 'Francis I, courted the wife of an advocate at Paris, who was a very handſome and genteel woman; I will not name him, becauſe he has left ſome children, who are very rich, and in good repute. This Lady would not comply with him; which grieved the king extreamly. This coming to be known by ſome courtiers, and royal pimps, they told him, by virtue of his royal authority and power, he might take her away. Purſuant to this advice, one of them went and told it to the lady, and the lady to her husband. The advocate ſaw very well, that his wife and he muſt quit the kingdom, which yet he was not ſure they could do, if they did not obey. At laſt, the husband gives his wive leave to comply with the king's deſires; and, to be no hindrance, he pretended to go into the country for eight or ten days about buſineſs. In the mean time, he kept himſelf private in Paris, and frequented bawdy-houſes, that he might get the pox, to give it his wife, that the king might get it from her: he ſoon found what he ſought, and infected his wife, and ſhe afterwards the king, who gave it to ſeveral other women, which he kept; and himſelf could never be well cured of it; for he was ſickly the remainder of his life, and became peeviſh, troubleſome, and inacceſſible.' I wonder that Brantome does not particularize any woman in the paſſage, which I am going to quote, where he ſpeaks of this pox. King Francis, ſays he (21), loved 'much, and too much; for, being young and free, he indifferently embraced, ſometimes one, ſometimes another, as, at that time, he was not a gallant man, who did not whore indifferently every where, and by it got a ſwinging pox, which haſtened his end: for, when he died, he was then but fifty three years of age, which ſhews that he was not a very old man. Having been racked by this diſtemper, he conſidered, that, if he continued his looſe intrigues, he might be again caught, and, being grown wiſe by woful experience, he reſolved to make love gallantly; and for that purpoſe made his fine court to be frequented by beautiful and modeſt princeſſes, great ladies, and gentlewomen. And this he did that he might preſerve himſelf from that naſty diſtemper, and be no more defiled by it, and to ſuit himſelf not to a looſe, but to a genteel, clean, and pure love.' He then immediately ſpeaks of this prince's love to madam de Helli; and this is in effect to pretend, that his pox preceded his impriſonment. It cannot be doubted, but this writer pretends it, ſince he ſays in another place (22), that the king gave queen Claudia the pox, which haſtened her death. Now this queen died in the month of July, 1524.

[E] He let fall ſome complaints againſt divine providence.] Brantome (23) affords me a comment upon this text. 'I have heard a lady of that time ſay, that of all the blows, that the king had received of Charles V, none affected him ſo much, as when he heard of the taking of St Diſier (24), and that the emperor was coming directly to Paris, to beſiege it with ſo numerous an army, that he ſaw it already ſhaken; he was then ſomething indiſpoſed, and kept his chamber: the late queen of Navarre his ſiſter, and a great many other ladies, were then with him. Crying ſomewhat loud, he ſaid, ah! my God, thou ſelleſt me very dear a kingdom, which I thought thou hadſt freely given me; thy will however be done. Then he told the ſaid queen, my darling, (for ſo he called her) go to church, and there pray to God for me, that ſince ſuch is his will to love and favour the emperor more than me, that he will do it ſo, that I may at leaſt never ſee him encamped before the principal city of my kingdom, and that it may not be ſaid, one day, that my rebel vaſſal is come as far to ſee me, as his grandfather the duke of Burgundy did to king Lewis XI, who gave him battle ſo near: however, I am reſolved to go and meet him, to prevent and fight him; and I pray God, that I may ſooner die in battle, than undergo a ſecond impriſonment. He might then have ſaid, O crown! if thy weight was known, &c (25).

(c) He undertook his journey to Milan, among other reaſons, to lie with a fine woman. See the Penſées ſur les Cometes, p. 715.

(d) In the article ETAMPES, remark [E].

(13) James II, late King of England.

(14) In 1539.

(15) Mezerai's Hiſt. of France, Tom. II, pag. 1005.

(16) Id. ibid. pag. 1039, ad Ann. 1546.

(17) Abrégé Chronol. Tom. IV, pag. 606, ad annum 1538.

(18) It could not be doubted, but the amorous exceſſes of Henry VIII (king of England) had ſhortened his days, and Francis perceived his end approaching, occaſioned by a diſtemper ſpoken of in the fourth book. Varillas's Hiſt. of Francis I, lib. xii, pag. 264. I think that inſtead of fourth it muſt be eighth, and that Mr Varillas meant this place of the eighth book, pag. 359. Two famous accidents ended the year 1538. One was the king's long ſickneſs at Compiegne, occaſioned by an ulcer in thoſe parts, which modeſty forbids naming: his Majeſty was then cured, but died of it nine years after.

(19) Under the 31ſt of March, pag. 197.

(20) Tom. II of his Diverſes Leçons, n. 1, p. 109.

(21) In Eloge de Henri II, Tom. II, of his Memoires, pag. 5.

(22) In the Memoirs of illuſtrious Ladies, pag. m. 298, where ſpeaking of queen Claudia, he ſays, That, if queen Anne her mother had lived, king Francis had never married her; for ſhe well foreſaw how ill ſhe was like to be uſed by him; for the king her husband gave her the pox, which haſtened her death.

(23) Francis I, Elogium, at Tom. I, of his Memoires, pag. m. 318.

(24) Mr Varillas, inſerting a tranſlation of this place of Brantome in the Hiſt. of Francis I, lib. xi, pag. 102, applies this to the taking Chateau-Thierri, and not to that of St Diſier.

(25) See Valerius Maximus, lib. vii, cap. ii. n. 5. Ext. Stobæus, Serm. xlvii, aſcribes this ſentence to king Antigonus.

than thoſe, who knew not the bottom of things, had believed [F]. He ſaw too late, that he had for his favourites two or three perſons, who were very unworthy of it, and had done him a great deal of prejudice, by their evil counſels. Had he removed from him the conſtable of Montmorency (e) twelve years ſooner, he had never found himſelf in ſo great ſtreights. Beſides, there was ſomething ſo prepoſterous in his deſtiny, that, even when he acted according to the rules of prudence, yet he wanted ſucceſs. All theſe things, duly conſidered, make his reign very wonderful; for who would not be ſurprized, to ſee this Prince, frowned upon by fortune, ill ſerved by his own mother [G], in the hands of imprudent favourites, betrayed by thoſe, whom he honoured with his ſtricteſt confidence, ſo glorioully reſiſt the emperor Charles V; that is to ſay, an enemy, whoſe dominions were much larger than France, who had more money and forces than he, who was a very great warriour, and a very able politician, who was faithfully and well ſerved by his generals and miniſters, and who had generally the aſſiſtance either of England, or of other potent princes, againſt him alone? After all, it is a greater glory for Francis I to have preſerved his kingdom under thoſe circumſtances, than for Charles V not to have been able to conquer it. I believe it may be ſaid of theſe two princes, that, had not the one been oppoſed by the other, either of them might have graſped the univerſal monarchy; and that, ſince there were oftner leagues made in favour of Charles V, than of Francis I, this king of France was more dreaded than that king of Spain. I believe farther, that, if the liberty of Europe was not oppreſſed by Charles V, it is almoſt wholly owing to the valour of Francis I (f). I cannot tell whether the ill fortune of this monarch has any where appeared more than in the alliance, which he made with Soliman. He never could gain any real advantage by it, and gave his enemies occaſion to declaim againſt him, and make him odious, which did him more harm than ever the Ottoman Porte did him good. The lies, that were ſpread on this occaſion over all Europe, cannot be excuſed, but by the maxims of a very pernicious morality [H]. They diſperſed the

(e) See the article of HENRY II.

(f) See, above, remark [A] of the article CHARLES V.

[F] This war was at an end ſooner than thoſe, who knew not the bottom of things, had believed.] Moſt people thought, that Charles V, having made ſo great a progreſs in Champagne, would not hearken to any terms of peace, but what would be too ignominious for his enemy to accept. They had then no good opinion of the ſucceſs of the negociation on foot; but thoſe, who knew very well, that he would be very glad to end this war, were full of good hopes. Among theſe, was an Italian poet who had ſheltered himſelf at Paris. Read this paſſage: When king Francis I, and the emperor Charles V, came in ſight of each other, in France, in the year 1544, with each a potent army, both weary of making war againſt one another, ſome great men interpoſed to make that peace, which was then concluded between theſe two great monarchs. Some asked Lewis Alamani, a Florentine, whether he believed that thoſe perſons could make this peace. He anſwered in this Italian diſtich:

Com' eſſer può ch'a noi pace ſi toglia,
S'un n'ha neceſſita, l'altro n'ha voglia (26)?

How can we have otherwiſe than peace, ſeeing the one deſires it, and the other ſtands in need of it?

Nothing could be more juſt than this reaſoning; for there is no better prognoſtic (27) of a peace near at hand, than the neceſſity, wherein both parties find themſelves to end the war. Want of money tires as much as a ſurfeit. People then do, as the emperor Claudius's wife did (28); they retire, not glutted, but fatigued. Before this, the mediators were not heard; but then they are intreated to act, or rather they are laid aſide; becauſe both parties treat directly with each other, agree upon the main points, and then conclude without them; or if they are made uſe of, it is only pro formà. We read this in an hiſtorian of the peace of the Pyrenées (29). This peace was concluded, without the intervention of thoſe, who had a long while mediated it, and gave occaſion to remember what Pope Innocent ſaid, one day, that he was at a window of his palace on the Piazza Navona: he ſaw two men, of an inferior rank, boxing one another furiouſly, and he forbad that they ſhould be parted, adding, you will ſee that, when they are weary, they will leave off of themſelves; which happening a little while after: thus, (continued he) the French and Spaniards will do, when they are tired of waging war againſt one another; for then they will make peace without any body's mediation.

[G] He was ill ſerved by his own mother.] She was of the houſe of Savoy. I will only ſpeak of two things, which ſhe did to the prejudice of France. She got the money, which had been promiſed to Lautrec, governor of the Milaneze, which occaſioned the loſs of that country: and, when ſhe ſaw Francis I, in a rage for this loſs, ask his treaſurer (30), what was become of that money, ſhe point-black denied, that it was ever repreſented to her for what uſe it was deſigned. The lie, that ſhe gave this poor treaſurer, was the cauſe that he was hanged (31). What miſchief did ſhe not do to France, becauſe ſhe had a mind to marry Charles de Bourbon? Mad, that her advances were ſlighted, ſhe perſecuted that prince by a thouſand vexatious law-ſuits; which exaſperated him ſo much, that he went over to the emperor, and commanded his armies in Italy againſt France; and even againſt Francis the firſt himſelf, at the battle of Pavia (32).

[H] The lies, that were ſpread over all Europe, on this alliance with the Turk, cannot be excuſed.] I have mentioned, in another place (33), the ſpeech, which Charles V made at Rome, in the year 1536. Let us add here, that the copies of it, which he ſent to the princes of the empire, and the imperial towns, were different, and even contrary to one another (34). He left out in the copies, which he ſent to the Proteſtants, what might diſpleaſe them, and added ſomething elſe, which was likely to be acceptable to them. He ſent emiſſaries into all the circles of the empire, to give out, ‘ That the king of France had barbarouſly treated all the ſubjects of the empire that were found in his kingdom, either to trade or to travel, and all the French who had lived in Germany: That he had made an offenſive and defenſive league with the Turks: That it was in concert with them, that he had uſurped Savoy and Piedmont, to draw into theſe two provinces all the forces of Chriſtendom, and to give Soliman an opportunity to fall upon Germany, whilſt the emperor ſhould be employed towards the Alps. Theſe calumnies, which were at firſt only whiſpered, became afterwards the ſubject of ſermons, and were authorized by libels, licenced by the eccleſiaſtical and civil magiſtrates. Though this ſlander was very groſs, yet it produced a prodigious effect; for all Germany was prepoſſeſſed againſt him in leſs than a fortnight. The moſt famous of all theſe libels was that, which was vended at Nuremberg, with the emperor's licence. It had, for it's device, a ſword ſurrounded with flames, and contained a challenge from the emperor to the king, and threatned the French with fire and ſword, if, within fifteen days, they did not

‘ renounce

---

(26) Meynier, pag. 589, of his Curious Queſtions and free Anſwers. I have corrected ſome errors of the preſs. He has taken this from Conſiderationi Civili di Remigio Fiorentino, cap. 97, fol. m. 123, verſo.

(27) Such was that of all knowing men at the beginning of the conferences of Ryſwic, in 1697.

(28) Et laſſata viris nondum ſatiata receſſit. Juven. Sat. vi, ver. 129.

(29) Galeazzo Gualdo Priorato, Hiſtory of the Peace, pag. 124, 125. Edit. 1667.

(30) His name was James de Beaune, lord of Samblançai. See the article SAMBLANÇAI.

(31) Varillas's Hiſtory of Francis I, lib. iii, pag. 215, 216, ad ann. 1522.

(32) Id. ibid. lib. iv, pag. 247, & ſeq.

(33) In remark [E] of the article CHARLES V.

(34) Varillas, ib. lib viii, p. 310, ad ann. 1536.

the form of the oath, which they ſuppoſed that prince had taken to the Grand Signior. Nothing can be more horrid, impious and abominable, than this oath [I]; and this, with ſome other circumſtances, ſhews plainly, that it is an improbable Impoſture. However, this formulary was inſerted as an authentic piece in a pamphlet that appeared, in the laſt war, againſt France (g). There was another lie ſpread, as abſurd as this, concerning ‘renounce their alliance with the Turks. This libel was followed by another of the ſame nature, which particularized the day, that this pretended challenge was made, the name of the herald, with ſome circumſtances, ſaid to have been taken from his verbal proceſs: And, as no body went about to diſcover the impoſture, it produced it's deſired effect; ſince it excited a hatred in people's minds againſt France, which laſted even after they ſaw the cheat..... Langey, at his arrival at Francfort, found there theſe libels, and writ two anſwers to them, one in High Dutch, and the other in Latin. He made an excellent uſe of the time, that the merchants of all the circles of the empire returned from the fair of Lyons; for he had them before the magiſtrates of Strasburg, and took their depoſitions, which were printed, and ſent every where. They imported, that the deponents had been very civilly treated in France; that the emperor's challenge was a fable; and that the French, far from inſulting the Germans without cauſe, did not ſo much as queſtion them about their religion. Thus the impoſture gave way to truth (35).’ Here is yet a ſtranger cheat. ‘Fregoſa (36) and Rincon (37), at the inſtigation of Langey, had parted with their papers; ſo that thoſe, who killed them (38) chiefly for theſe papers, were mightily ſurprized to find none. They had not, however, been much concerned at it, had the murder been kept ſecret; but, after Langey had proved, as clear as the day, that they were murdered, the emperor's council in Italy foreſaw, that, unleſs they found a way to prevent it, this aſſaſſination would turn much to the advantage of the French in all the courts of Europe, eſpecially in Germany, where the public faith was more regarded than any where elſe: and therefore they pretended, that ſome fiſhermen had found, in the Po, the cloaths and trunks of theſe embaſſadors, and they forged ſome inſtructions and cyphers, which they publiſhed, as if they had been collated with the originals. The inſtructions, which were aſcribed to Fregoſa, contained all the means, that policy could invent, to engage the ſenate of Venice to forſake the emperor's intereſt. It was propoſed, in it, to divide the duchy of Milan between the French and Venetians; and there was not one word in it of preſerving the ſovereignty of that ſtate to the emperor: on the contrary, the cities, with their dependencies, were diſpoſed of, to be intirely incorporated with that republic, and the French monarchy. The inſtructions, imputed to Rincon, were yet worſe, becauſe there was not only malice, but alſo impiety therein. It was propoſed to Soliman to concert with France to attack the houſe of Auſtria in two places at the ſame time: and, to ſhew him the neceſſity of this correſpondence, he was privately informed, that Hungary, which he had juſt then conquered, would undoubtedly be wreſted, the next ſummer, out of his hands, if he gave the emperor time to draw his forces from Naples, Sicily, Milan, and the Low Countries, to be joined with the formidable army, which the diet of Ratisbon would not fail to grant him: whereas, if his highneſs would agree to invade Germany in the ſpring, at the head of 300000 men, the king would enter the duchy of Milan with 50000 men, and thus give a diverſion to the emperor's forces, whilſt his highneſs, unexpectedly attacking the Germans, and finding them divided in matters of religion, would as eaſily conquer them, as he had done the Hungarians, the year before. But the Imperialiſts artifice was ſo groſs, that any man of common ſenſe might eaſily diſcover it; not only becauſe they did not offer to produce the originals, but alſo becauſe they gave occaſion to ſuſpect, that they had committed the murder, by acknowledging, in ſo nice a juncture, that they had made advantage of it. Nevertheleſs, it produced the deſired effect in the diet of Ratisbon: for Francis I was there looked upon as a prince, who was ready to renounce his religion and honour, provided he was aſſiſted to diſmember the duchy of Milan from the empire. Olivier, his embaſſador, was heard with ſo much prepoſſeſſion, that whatever he ſaid was underſtood in a contrary ſenſe; and that miniſter was obliged to retire, after he had ſeen, to his ſorrow, the diet grant the emperor near fourſcore thouſand men, to be employed as he ſhould think fit (39).’

I refer all thoſe, who will learn to make a true judgment of this affair, to Mr de Wicquefort (40); but I do not know to whom I ſhall refer thoſe, who will be diſpoſed to grieve, when they conſider, that ſuch plain and diabolical calumnies have turned ſo much to the advantage of their authors. It muſt be confeſſed, that it is a thing that gives great offence; but ſuch is the way of the world; and we muſt adore thoſe great and profound myſteries of providence without murmuring. I ſhall conclude with this reflexion; our age does not afford us inſtances of ſuch impoſtures, as Mr Varillas relates: for, among ſo many libels, wherein anonymous authors invent what they pleaſe, we ſee no forgeries inveſted with the public authority, as were thoſe, which Charles the fifth's court knew how to invent.

[I] Nothing can be more horrid .... than the oath, which it was ſuppoſed Francis I took to Soliman II.] Every body yet remembers the harangue, which the marquis de Rebenac made to the Pope in 1692, to repreſent what miſchiefs might enſue to the Catholic religion from the alliance, which the emperor and the king of Spain has made with Proteſtant princes. The anonymous author, who made an anſwer to this harangue, did not forget to object, that Francis I combined with the Turks againſt Charles V. ‘It will not, perhaps, be unacceptable to the public, adds he (41), to inſert here the formulary of an oath, which this prince took to ſultan Soliman, to confirm that infamous alliance, which as yet ſubſiſts, and which ſeems to be knit ſo faſt by Lewis XIV, that it is not to be broke. I know that you will not bluſh at it: for, if there were none then, but chancellor du Prat, who were honeſt enough to diſapprove it; it may be now preſumed, that your court, which hath got over all divine and humane laws, cannot abhor any ſacrilege or impiety. Give me only leave to deſire the reader here to pardon me, if I lay before his eyes an object, which he cannot ſee without horrour, and which ſhould never have come to the knowledge of the Chriſtians. This is it: Per Deum Magnum & Altum, Miſericordem & Benignum, formatorem Cœli & Terræ, & omnium quæ in eis ſunt: & per Sancta hæc Evangelia: per Sanctum Baptiſma, per Sanctum Joannem Baptiſtam, & per Fidem Chriſtianorum, Promitto & Juro, quòd omnia quæ novero, aperta erunt Altiſſimo Domino Sultano Solimano, cujus Regnum Deus fortificet. Ero Amicus ſuorum unicus, & Inimicus Inimicorum. Ero Redemptor Captivorum Turcarum ex Vinculis Hoſtium ejus: nihil in mea parte fraudulentum erit. Quòd ſi hoc neglexerim ero Apoſtata, & mandatorum Sancti Evangelii Chriſtianæque Fidei Prævaricator. Dicam Evangelium falſum eſſe; Negabo Chriſtum vivere, & Matrem ejus Virginem fuiſſe; ſuper Fontem Baptiſmatis porcum interficiam, & Altaris Presbyteros maledicam; ſuper Altare fornicabor cum Luxuria; & Sanctorum Patrum maledictiones in me recipiam. Ita me Deus reſpiciat ex alto. I believe I need not enlarge on the enormity of this oath.’

I find fault with two things in the proceedings of this Writer: One, that he quotes no body; and the other, that he hath not tranſlated into the vulgar tongue the form of the oath, which he relates. When there was only occaſion to ſay, in general, that Francis I had made an alliance with the Ottoman Porte, our anonymous author (42) did not omit quoting Ribier's memoirs. How comes it then to paſs, that when he ſpeaks of a more heinous circumſtance he quotes no author? He ought to have quoted either a French author, or one wholly indifferent to France, or to the houſe of Auſtria; at leaſt, he ought to have told us, that ſuch a Spaniſh, Flemiſh, or German author, hath inſerted this oath in his book, and ſhewed which way this myſtery was diſcovered. But our anonymous author, having (g) See remark [I].

(35) Ibid.

(36) He was a Genoeſe, whom Francis I was ſending to Venice as his embaſſador in ordinary. Varillas, ibid. lib. ix, pag. 403.

(37) He was born a ſubject to the king of Spain, and had negotiated privately with Soliman for Francis I, and was then going to the Porte as embaſſador of France. Id. ibid.

(38) The Marquis du Guaſt cauſed them to be murdered on the Po, as Langey proved it. Id. ibid. p. 407, &c. ad ann. 1541.

(39) Id. ibid. pag. 409, & ſeq.

(40) Above, remark [G] of the article BRUN (ANTONY LE).

(41) Anſwer to a ſpeech made to his Holineſs by the Marquis de Rebenac, pag. 18, 19.

(42) Ubi ſupra, pag. 18.

concerning a pretended deſign of recovering the hoſtages, that Francis I. had given [K]. I have read another, and a very groſs one, which relates to the trouble, wherein this prince ving done nothing of all this, ſhews, that he durſt not declare whence he hath taken this formulary; and that he knew, that, if he declared it, he would diſcredit his authority. He ſeems to have artificially omitted the French tranſlation of this formulary, fearing, perhaps, to expoſe the forgery to too many: Be it how it will, here is the tranſlation of the Latin that he hath printed. 'By the great and high GOD, merciful and gracious, author of heaven and earth, and of all things therein; and by theſe holy Goſpels, by the holy baptiſm, by St John the Baptiſt, and by the faith of Chriſtians, I promiſe and ſwear, that whatever comes to my knowlege ſhall be made known to the moſt high lord ſultan Soliman, whoſe reign may GOD ſtrengthen. I will be the only friend of his friends, and an enemy to his enemies. I will redeem the Turkiſh priſoners out of the bonds of his enemies. There ſhall be no fraud on my ſide. If I neglect theſe things, I will be an apoſtate, and a prevaricator of the precepts of the holy goſpel, and the chriſtian faith. I will ſay, that the goſpel is falſe; I will deny that CHRIST is alive, and that his mother was a virgin; I will kill a hog on the font, and I will curſe the prieſts of the altar; I will luxuriouſly commit whoredom on the altar, and may the curſes of the holy fathers fall on my head. Thus may GOD look upon me from on high.' I queſtion whether any ſenſible and reaſonable man can ever imagine, that the form of this oath was ever contrived between the miniſters of France and thoſe of the Porte (43). Every thing in it ſhocks probability, and there is nothing in it worthy either of the gravity of Soliman, or that of Francis I. The ſultan had been well enough ſatisfied with the common form of oaths, and he was too wiſe a man not to perceive what advantages he might expect from ſo potent an ally.

Perhaps it may be objected, that it is the cuſtom of the Turks to preſcribe this form of an oath; and I confeſs, that the Venetians were charged with having taken ſuch an one in the perſon of the baſtard of Cyprus: but this would ſerve at the moſt to elude the acceſſory obſervation, which I have juſt now incidentally propoſed. Beſides, it is a queſtion, whether the Venetians acquieſced in that form, and whether a good proof can be brought for it. However, becauſe the book, in which that reproach was caſt on them, during the war with Lewis XII, is grown ſcarce, I ſhall here recite the tenor of the oath. 'The ſaid baſtard took an horrible, execrable, and moſt damnable oath to the ſaid ſultan; which was afterwards tranſlated from Arabic into Latin, and brought to Pope Pius by ſome knights of Rhodes; for which reaſon he would never receive the embaſſadors of the ſaid James as the embaſſadors of a chriſtian king; but reprimanded them very ſeverely. Since, then, the Venetians are his heirs, is it not neceſſary that they ſhould take ſuch an oath as the ſaid James did, in the following manner?

'Firſt, He invoked the name of Almighty GOD forty times, and then ſaid: By the great and high GOD, merciful and gracious, maker of heaven and earth, and of all things that are therein; by theſe holy goſpels, by the holy baptiſm, by St John the Baptiſt, and all the ſaints, and by the chriſtian faith; I promiſe and ſwear, that whatever I ſhall know, ſhall be diſcovered to my ſovereign lord Alleſeraph Aſnal, ſultan of Egypt, and emperor of all Arabia, whom GOD ſtrengthen in his kingdom; and I will always be a friend of his friends, and an enemy of his enemies, and conceal nothing from him: I will ſuffer no pirates in my kingdom, nor furniſh them, or aſſiſt them, with any proviſions: All the Egyptians, who are ſlaves in my kingdom, I will redeem and ſet at liberty: I will offer every year, on the firſt day of October or November, by way of tribute to the ſovereign temples of Jeruſalem and Mecca, the ſum of five thouſand ducats of gold: I will take care, that the Rhodians furniſh the pirates with no arms: Whatever ſhall come to my knowledge, that deſerves to be known, I will communicate to the ſultan truly, and without fraud. If I fail in any of the aboveſaid matters, I will be an apoſtate from the chriſtian faith, and the commands of the goſpel: I will deny that JESUS CHRIST lives, and that his mother is a virgin: I will kill on the font a camel, and curſe the prieſts of the church: I will deny the divinity, and adore the humanity: I will commit fornication on the high altar with a Jeweſs, and receive on myſelf all the curſes of the holy fathers. Was not Mark Corrario, a Venetian (whoſe daughter the ſaid baſtard king afterwards married to his detriment), preſent at the adminiſtring of the ſaid oath and homage? Therefore it is moſt likely, that they are in poſſeſſion of Cyprus upon the ſame terms, ſince they have uſurped that title (44).'

[K] A lie was ſpread .... concerning a pretended deſign of recovering the hoſtages that Francis I. had given.] Francis I, coming out of priſon, delivered his ſons to the Spaniards: He could not have them again but on diſadvantageous conditions; for the Spaniards would keep them till the treaty of Madrid was executed. Some people were ſo fooliſh, or ſo malicious, as to ſpread a report, that he had ſent for a German magician, who ſhould tranſport from Spain into France theſe two hoſtages, ſo as that no body ſhould perceive it, and do a great many other miracles. You will find this abſurdity in one of Agrippa's letters; for he is the author of that letter, although it is intituled, in the edition in 8vo, Amicus ad Agrippam. But this is a tranſpoſition of words; it muſt be read, Agrippa ad Amicum. It was printed under this title, with the three books of his occult philoſophy, in the year 1533, as Gabriel Naudé obſerves at the 410th page of his apology for great men. Theſe are Agrippa's words: 'Accerſitus eſt è Germania non modicis ſumptibus vir quidam dæmoniorum, hoc eſt magus, in quo poteſtas dæmonum inhabitat, ut, ſicut Jamnes & Mambres reſtiterunt Moyſi, ſic iſte reſiſtat Cæſari. Perſuaſum enim eſt illis à patre mendaciorum, illum futurorum omnium præſcium, arcanorum quorumcunque conſiliorum conſcium, ac deliberatarum cogitationum interpretem: tanta præterea præditum poteſtate, ut poſſit regios pueros reducere per aëra, quemadmodum legitur Abakuk cum ſuo pulmento traductus ad lacum leonum, poſſetque, ſicut Heliſæus obſeſſus in Dothaim, oſtendere montes plenos equorum & curruum igneorum, exercitumque plurimum: inſuper & revelare ac transferre theſauros terræ, quaſque volet, coget nuptias amoreſque, aut dirimet, deploratos quoque curabit morbos ſtygio pharmaco (45). —— There was ſent for out of Germany, at a great expence, a certain magician, endued with a diabolical power, that, as Jannes and Mambres reſiſted Moſes, ſo might he reſiſt the emperor: for they were perſuaded by the father of lies, that this man knew before-hand all future events, was privy to the moſt ſecret counſels, and an interpreter of the intentions of the mind; moreover, that he was endued with ſuch power, that he could bring back the king's children through the air, as we read that Habakkuk was tranſported with his pottage to the lake of Lions, and that he could, like Eliſha beſieged in Dothaim, ſhew the mountains full of fiery horſes and chariots, and a numerous army; and farther, that he could diſcover and convey away hidden treaſures, and make, or break, what matches and love-affairs he pleaſed, and cure deſperate diſeaſes by an infernal medicine.' This letter was written from Paris the twenty third of February, 1528. He even obſerves, that the cardinals and biſhops conſented, that this magician ſhould be ſent for, and contributed to defray his expences: 'Huic tam nefario idololatriæ & ſacrilegorum artifici audaciam præſtat, quæ iſtis tam impenſè favet orthodoxa illa mater, & Chriſtianiſſimi filii accommodatur autoritas, & è ſacris pecuniis largiuntur munera, conniventibus etiam atque tam nefariam operam conducentibus columnis eccleſiæ, epiſcopis & cardinalibus, & impietatis miniſtro impii applaudunt proceres, quemadmodum operibus lupi congratulantur corvi (46). —— The moſt orthodox mother herſelf, and her moſt chriſtian ſons by their authority, greatly encourage ſo wicked an artificer of idolatry and ſacrilege; and the church's money is employed for this purpoſe, by the connivance, and even contribution of thoſe pillars of the church, the biſhops and cardinals; and the impious nobles applaud this miniſter of impiety, as the crows congratulate the actions of the wolf.'

---

(43) It ſeems as if they would have required ſuch an oath from Lewis IX. See Paulus Æmilius, lib. vii, fol. 271, verſo.

(44) John le Maire de Belges, Legende des Venitiens, pag. 75. Edit. Lyons 1549.

(45) Agrippa, Epiſt. xxvi, lib. v, pag. 913.

(46) Ibid. pag. 914.

Prince found himſelf in the year 1544 [L]. I ſpeak, in another place (b), of a Fable, which is told of the emperor's journey through France, when he went to chaſtize the city of Ghent. It is not the only one that hath been ſpread, in reference to that time [M]. Francis I was the author of ſome innovations, among which we muſt chiefly reckon the cuſtom of womens going to court [N]; which did not alter that article of the Salic law, which excludes women from the crown of France: However, it may be ſaid, that, since that time, till the end of the XVIth century, more or leſs, France hath been governed by women (i). Francis Iſt hath been wrongfully accuſed of having too much indulged the Lutherans of his kingdom [O]. It is one of thoſe lies, which John Wierus, Agrippa's diſciple, tells part of theſe fine ſtories; I mean, what relates to the carrying away of the hoſtages. 'Quemadmodum dicitur, quo tempore Franciſci primi regis Galliæ filii detinebantur obſides in Hiſpania, magum in Galliam evocatum è Germania fuiſſe, qui tanta credebatur præditus poteſtate, ut poſſet regios pueros per aëra reducere, theſauroſque inveſtigare & transferre (47). ——— As it is reported, that, when the ſons of Francis I, king of France, were detained as hoſtages in Spain, a magician was ſent for from Germany into France, who was thought to be endued with ſuch power, that he could bring back the king's ſons thro' the air, and diſcover and convey away treaſures.' The count de la Rocca (48) knew this paſſage of John Wierus; not that he had read the books of this author; he had only ſeen this paſſage quoted by Bodin: but he was in the wrong to ſay only, that Bodin ſpeaks of it; he ſhould have added, that Bodin rejects it as a fable. 'It is enough for me, theſe are that French civilian's words (49), to refute Wierus by his own words and books. For he himſelf * writes, that he hath ſeen men carried through the air by devils, and that there is no abſurdity in it; and, in the ſame place, he writes this lie, viz. that a magician was ſent for from Germany, who promiſed to get out of the caſtle of Madrid king Francis's ſons, and to have them tranſported through the air from Spain into France; but that this was not done, becauſe it was feared they ſhould break their necks.' I have not found this laſt particular in John Wierus's book. I make uſe of the Amſterdam edition, 1660.

[L] I have read another very groſs lie, which relates to .... the year 1544] John Saxon, rector of the univerſity of Wittemberg, cauſed a Programma to be affixed the twelfth of October, 1544, and therein declared, among other things, that it was not by chance, but by the juſt judgment of GOD, that France was overwhelmed with calamities. The emperor, ſays he, came near Paris, and the queen of France and the dauphin went to meet him as humble ſupplicants. 'Non caſu jam Gallia miſerabiliter vaſtatur, & rex potens venit in tantum diſcrimen ut cum Carolus imperator acceſſerit ad Lutetiam uſque, ſupplices occurrerint regina & delphinus, ut ante paucos annos ad Carolum Burgundum venit ſupplex rex Franciæ Ludovicus cui induit dux Carolus Burgundicum Thoracem cui confeſſio victoriæ inſcripta erat, VIVAT DUX BURGUNDIÆ (50). —— In like manner as, a few years before, Lewis, king of France, met, as a ſupplicant, the duke of Burgundy, whom duke Charles inveſted with the Burgundian breaſt-plate, inſcribed with this confeſſion of victory, LONG LIVE THE DUKE OF BURGUNDY.' Theſe two facts, compared together, are falſe. The firſt is ſo abſolutely, and without any mixture of truth; and the other, in it's principal circumſtances: for, when Lewis XI was forced to follow the duke of Burgundy to Leige, he did not go to meet him as a ſupplicant, but to have a conference with him, hoping to bubble him. It is a ſhame, that the rector of a famous univerſity ſhould publiſh, in a Programma, a lie unworthy the Gazette.

[M] It is not the only fable, that hath been ſpread in reference to that time.] 'How many romances have been made of Francis I? Hath it not even been reported, that he fought a duel with the emperor; and that this prince going through France, the king, with an unparallelled generoſity, offered him his kingdom? That Charles had one day ſate on Francis's throne; that he had ordered a criminal to be condemned, and had afterwards granted him his pardon, to ſhew his authority (51).'

[N] He was author of ..... the cuſtom of womens going to court.] What I am going to quote, will, no doubt, be read with pleaſure. 'One day, it is Brantome ſpeaks (52), as I was diſcourſing with a great prince about the great virtues of Francis I.... He ſpoke very much in his praiſe; but he blamed him very much for two things, which had done the court and France a great deal of miſchief, not only during his own reign, but alſo during thoſe of his ſucceſſors: to wit, for having introduced into the court the great aſſemblies, reſort, and ordinary reſidence of ladies; and for having invited thither, and entertained ſo many eccleſiaſtics: as for the ladies, it muſt be confeſſed, that, before his time, they ſeldom came there, and but ſew of them too. It is true, that queen Anne began to bring to her court more ladies than the other preceding queens; and, had it not been for her, the king her husband had not much regarded them. But, when the ſaid king Francis came to the throne, he conſidered, that the ladies were the ſole decoration of the court, and therefore peopled it with them, more than was formerly uſual.' Brantome tells us the reaſons, which this critical prince made uſe of. 'If the court ladies only, ſaid he (53), had grown looſe, it had been no great matter; but they ſet ſuch a bad example to all the other ladies of France, that, following their way of dreſſing, genteel carriage, faſhions, dances, and way of living, they would alſo imitate them in their intrigues and whoring; for, ſaid they, at court, they are thus dreſſed, they dance after this manner, and whore, and we may do ſo too.' Concerning the prelates, he ſaid (54), 'That, then beginning to be debauched and looſe, they ſet an ill example to others in France to do the ſame thing; and that it had been better, if they had kept in their dioceſes, to preach to their flocks (55).' Brantome refutes all theſe reaſons: he maintains, that, before the reign of Francis I, there was as much corruption among women, and clergymen (56); and that nothing but troubles and hereſies had been ſeen in France, ſince preaching had been ſo frequent (57). See Mr Jurieu's reflexions on all this (58).

[O] He is wrongfully accuſed of having too much indulged the Lutherans.] You may ſee this accuſation ſtrongly refuted by theſe words of Mezerai. 'The infection of errors increaſing, the king cauſed the the fire to be re-kindled, to purge France of them. There were ſtill ſome remains of them in the city of Meaux, after biſhop Briçonnet had received there le Fevre, and the Rouſſels. Above ſixty were taken there, and brought to Paris, whereof fourteen were burned, others hanged, and the reſt whipped and baniſhed. Which proceedings, and others like theſe, palpably convict that Italian author of falſity, who hath written the hiſtory of our civil wars of religion, and of the League (59), who, through groſs forgetfulneſs, or egregious malice, ſaid, in his firſt book, That Calvin's belief began to ſpread in this king's reign, whether he allowed it, or took no notice of it; and that it was rather received with indignation and ſcorn, than feared, or carefully ſuppreſſed. What! To make ſix or ſeven ſevere edicts to ſtifle it, to convoke the clergy ſeveral times, to aſſemble a provincial council, to be continually ſending embaſſadors to all the princes of Chriſtendom, in order to have a general one called, to burn heretics by dozens, to ſend them to the gallies by hundreds, and to baniſh them by thouſands; Can this be ſaid to allow, or to take no notice of it? Are theſe bare reſolutions, or real performances? This ought to engage you, judicious reader, to read this foreign author with a great deal of caution, and will perhaps give you occaſion to obſerve a great many faults, which the curious ought not to forgive him, ſince he hath ſpoken thus of the father of learning (60).' It were to be wiſhed, for the honour of this king, that

---

(b) In the remark [I] of the article CHARLES V.

(i) See, in the remark [Z], Mezerai's words.

(47) Jo. Wierus, de Lamiis, lib. iii, cap xii, n. 7, pag. m. 195.

(48) See his Hiſtory of Charles V, pag. 171, Bruſſels edit. 1663.

(49) Bodin's Refutation of John Wier's Opinions, pag. m. 513.

* Lib. ii, cap. xii, de Præſtigiis, pag. 6.

(50) See the book, intituled, Scriptorum publice propoſitorum à Profeſſoribus in Academia Witebergenſi ab anno 1540, ad ann. 1553, Tom I, fol. 96, verſo.

(51) Chapuzeau, Project of a new Hiſtorical Dictionary, pag. 11.

(52) Brantome, Memoires, Tom. I, pag. 277.

(53) Ib pag. 280.

(54) Ib. pag. 282.

(55) Ib. pag. 285.

(56) I never heard, nor read, that they were better men before, or lived more regularly; for they were as debauched in their biſhoprics and abbies, as ſoldiers. Ibid. pag. 282.

(57) Id. pag. 285.

(58) Jurieu's Apology for the Reformers, cap. vii, pag. 121, & ſeq.

(59) Mezerai means Davila. Theſe are the words of that Italian, pag. m. 32, of the firſt book. Comincio l'origine di queſta diſſentione inſino al tempo del Rè Franceſco il Primo, il quale benche faceſſe tal volta qualche ſevera riſolutione, occupato nondimeno del continuo nel travaglio delle guerre ſtraniere ò permeſſe, ò non ſi avidde, che andaſſero all' hora ſerpendo i principii di queſta piu toſto diſpregiata & odiata che temuta ò avertita credenza.

(60) Mezerai's Hiſtory of France, Tom. II, pag. 1038.

which our dictionary ought to cenſure. Had it been ſaid, that this prince was very uſeful to the Proteſtants [P] of Germany, it would not have been a miſtake. I have obſerved, in another place (k), what trifling excuſes he made uſe of, to juſtify himſelf to them for putting ſome Lutherans to death. Mr Varillas is here guilty of an anachroniſm [Q]. The laſt part of Francis the firſt's life was calamitous to him. The effects of his incontinency (l), and the remembrance of the unhappy circumſtances, wherein the miſmanagement of his miniſters had engaged him, ſo overwhelmed him with grief, that he was incapable of conſulting his true intereſt; for he was ſenſibly affected with an accident, which he ſhould have looked upon as very lucky to him; I mean, the death of Henry VIII, king of England (§ α;) a prince, who had ſo often acted againſt France, and who would have always been inclined to ruin it, provided he might have ſhared it with Charles V. The diſquietude, which Francis the firſt 's children gave him, encreaſed the anxieties of his mind [R]. I do not relate the ſeries of his actions, becauſe

[(§ α) This death of a prince, a few years older than himſelf, put him in mind of his own approaching end, and this reflexion, among others, quite ſunk him. See the Memoirs du Bellai, towards the end of book x, and Thuanus, Tom. I, pag. 85. B. C. of the edition 1626. REM. CRIT.]

Mezerai's cauſe were not ſo good. An unprejudiced hiſtorian, who hath a true notion of uprightneſs, and of the univerſal laws of order, would wiſh, that Davila's reproaches were well grounded: Juvat, would he ſay, hæc opprobria nobis, & dici potuiſſe, & non potuiſſe refelli (61): But I have unluckily too many reaſons to call Davila a calumniator: Why am I able to prove him one by ſo many arguments (62)? Whoſoever hath a true notion of true glory, and a value for Francis the firſt's memory, whether he be a Proteſtant or Roman Catholic, will ſpeak after this manner; for nothing can be more abominable, than to put to death thoſe, who ſeparate from a communion, only becauſe they are afraid of offending GOD, and who behave themſelves in all other reſpects as very good ſubjects: nothing is more conſonant to reaſon, than to leave the empire of conſcience to GOD alone.

Let us oppoſe to Davila this paſſage of Brantome: 'The Lutherans, and thoſe of the new religion, have 'been mightily incenſed againſt Francis I; which 'hath perhaps made both thoſe of his time, and of 'this too, ſpeak ſo ill of him, as they have done; 'for he burnt a great many of them, and ſpared 'none of thoſe that he could diſcover. He is ſaid 'to have been the firſt, who brought thoſe burnings into vogue, ſince they were ſcarce ſpoken of in 'his predeceſſor's time: GOD be thanked, that Luther 'was not as yet come, who was the firſt and new 'heretic (although there were ſome few before him) 'who drew ſo great a part of Chriſtendom after him. 'I leave this to thoſe, that know it better than I. 'This great king, notwithſtanding theſe fires and burnings, took Geneva under his protection, when Charles, 'duke of Savoy, would beſiege it; which occaſioned the 'loſs of part of his territories, which thoſe of Bern 'took from him: His ſaid majeſty was blamed for it, as 'alſo for having ſent into that city the bands of the lord 'Rance de Lore to it's aſſiſtance. Reconcile, I beſeech 'ye, if you can, theſe fires with that protection (63).

[P] Francis I. was very uſeful to the Proteſtants.] We have juſt now ſeen, that he ſaved the republic of Geneva, the metropolis of the reformed, their mother-church, which ſent her apoſtles and books into France, and her advice every where to maintain their cauſe. This behaviour of Francis I. enlarged the canton of Bern, of which the reformation ſtill feels the benefit. He did directly many good ſervices to the league of Smalcalde, but many more indirectly; for he was the cauſe that Charles V had, on many occaſions, a great regard for the Proteſtants of Germany, to draw them off from the intereſt of France. As it is more agreeable to the principles of religion and piety, to acknowledge the hand of GOD, I mean a particular influence of providence, in the eſtabliſhment of the reformation, I approve thoſe that judge of it in that manner: but I cannot forbear ſaying, that ſome underſtanding perſons believe, that the rivalſhip between Charles V, and the king of France, was more than ſufficient to afford the Proteſtants the means of diſputing the ground; and that, if Luther made a greater progreſs than ſo many other reformers that lived before him, it is becauſe he appeared in a favourable time, when Francis I and Charles V were competitors, who, to thwart one another, favoured this new ſect by turns; and, when it was once ſettled in Germany, it ſent the Calviniſts of France ſufficient ſupplies to keep their poſts, &c. Brantome's queſtion, upon the little relation there is between burning a hundred heretics, and protecting their neſt, centre, and metropolis, will puzzle thoſe, who do not obſerve, that this is one of the moſt common ſcenes of the great comedy of the world. Sovereign princes have in all ages thus played with religion; and they play this game ſtill; for they perſecute at home a religion which they ſupport abroad. You muſt not infer from hence, that they have no religion: for the inference would be falſe; they are often religious, even to bigottry. What then can be the reaſon of this? They have a greater regard for the temporal intereſt of their dominions, than for the kingdom of JESUS CHRIST (64). I do not except the Pope himſelf. I believe that he was no better pleaſed with the emperor's progreſs againſt the league of the Proteſtants, than Francis I. was. Let us quote Mezerai. 'The noiſe of the emperor's arms frightned 'all Chriſtendom; the Pope himſelf quaked for fear, 'leſt, after having conquered Germany, he ſhould 'come into Italy. When Francis had duly weighed 'the conſequences of the ruin of the Proteſtants, he altered his opinion, made a league with them, and obliged himſelf to receive the duke of Saxony's eldeſt 'ſon in France, and to allow him the private exerciſe of 'his religion, and promiſed to ſend one hundred thouſand crowns to his father, and as many to the landgrave of Heſſe, till he ſent them ſome forces (65).' Had not he a great deal of zeal for his religion? He condemned to the flames ſome poor private perſons, becauſe they did not go to maſs; and ſent a powerful aſſiſtance to princes who had aboliſhed the maſs in their territories. This was to attack the party by the weather-cocks; to take ſome tiles and ſtones, or plunder ſome huts, while they build for them ſtrong forts and places of arms (66). Add to this the remark [AA] of the article HENRY II, and the remark of the article SERGIER.

How uſeful the emulation of Charles V and Francis I proved to the Proteſtants.

[Q] Mr Varillas is here guilty of an anachroniſm.] For he ſuppoſes (67), that, when Francis I. put ſix Lutherans to death on the nineteenth of January, 1535, the French monarchy was more dangerouſly ſhaken by Calvin's Inſtitution, than it had ever been by either the Engliſh, or the houſe of Auſtria. We have already ſhewed (68), that Calvin reſolved to publiſh this book, in order to refute the calumnies, that were ſpread againſt thoſe, whom Francis I. put to death; that were ſpread, I ſay, to appeaſe thereby the Proteſtants of Germany, who were very much exaſperated at the laſt execution of thoſe ſix Lutherans.

[R] The diſquietude his children gave him, encreaſed the anxieties of his mind.] The eldeſt was called Francis. He was born at the caſtle of Amboiſe, the twenty eighth of February, 1518 (69). He was poiſoned with a cup of freſh water by Sebaſtian Montecuculi, and died at the caſtle of Tournon the tenth of Auguſt, 1536 (70). 'The king, his father, was ſo afflicted at 'his death, that he was a long time before he could 'recover himſelf; for he conceived mighty hopes, and a 'great opinion of this ſon. Mr de Bellai relates this very well in his memoirs (71).' Francis the firſt's ſecond ſon reigned after him, and was called Henry II. Without doubt he gave his father a great deal of trouble, by keeping a correſpondence with Montmorency, who was out of favour, and by making a cabal againſt the ducheſs of Etampes, his father's favourite. He combined againſt her, with his own miſtreſs, Diana of Poi'ctiers;

(k) See, above, remark [E] of the article BELLAI (WILLIAM DU).

(l) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. II, pag. 1039.

(61) Ovid. Metamor. lib. i, ver. 758, but, inſtead of juvat, he ſays pudet.

(62) O utinam arguerem ſic, ut non vincere poſſem. Me miſerum! quare tam bona cauſa mea eſt? Id. Amor. lib. ii, Eleg. v, ver. 7.

(63) Brant. Life of Francis I, in the firſt Tome of his Memoirs, pag. 231.

(64) See, above, remark [H] of the article AGESILAUS II.

(65) Mezer. Abrégé Chronol. Tom. IV, pag. 637, ad ann. 1547.

(66) Francis I. preſerved Geneva, where the duke of Savoy would have deſtroyed the reformation, if that king had not prevented it. The following words may be applied to thoſe who make uſe of ſuch a policy: Urbem (philoſophiæ) mihi crede proditis, dum caſtella defenditis. — Believe me, you betray the city, while you defend the citadel. Cicero de Divin. lib. ii, cap. xvi.

(67) Hiſt. de François I, lib. vii, pag. 248.

(68) In remark [F] of the article CALVIN, towards the beginning.

(69) Father Anſelme, Hiſtoire de la Maiſon Roiale, pag. 136.

(70) Id. ibid. He ſays, that he was poiſoned at Valence; but Brantome ſays more truly, Tom. I, pag. 336, that he was poiſoned at Lyons.

(71) Brantome, ibid. pag. 338.

cauſe it would oblige me to repeat what is ſufficiently expreſſed in other dictionaries. The ſirname of GREAT, which was given him after his death, was of no long continuance [S]. He deſerved it in certain reſpects, but eſpecially for his courage, and that free, open, and generous temper, which is ſo rare in perſons of his rank. His undauntedneſs failed him ſometimes; for it flagged in his priſon, where he was like to die of grief; and he betrayed too great a fear when he returned into France [T]. What I have read in a ſmall book, lately publiſhed (m), I take to be a fabulous ſtory; which is, that he killed, at Madrid, a great lord, who had been wanting in his reſpect to him, and that the emperor did not take it ill.

Here follow the additions I make to this article in this ſecond edition. It hath been falſly reported, that Francis Iſt was born after his mother had been a long time barren [U]. He hath been reckoned among thoſe princes, who, when they came to the throne, did not revenge the affronts, which they received, when they were private men. It is reported, that, under the reign of Lewis XII, he ſent Charles de Bourbon a challenge, who had endeavoured, by ſome reports, to ſet the king againſt him; and that, when he came to the crown, he took ſo little notice of the hatred he had conceived againſt Charles de Bourbon, that he promoted him to the office of conſtable (n). Every body knows

(m) It is intituled, Avis à l'Auteur du Mercure Hiſtorique & Politique. It was printed, if I am not miſtaken, in the year 1689, againſt ſome things which the author of the Mercure had ſaid of Chriſtina, queen of Sweden. I have not been able to find this Advice again.

(n) See Camerarius, Meditat. Hiſtor. Tom. II, cap. xlv, ſub fin. pag. m 194. He quotes du Ferron, in Vita Franciſci I.

ctiers; and it cannot be imagined what miſchief theſe two womens jealouſies cauſed (72), If the jarring of the father's and ſon's miſtreſſes gave the king a great deal of trouble, the diſagreement of the dauphin, and his brother the duke of Orleans, gave him no leſs, and was no leſs prejudicial to him. The ducheſs of Etampes's faction was for the duke of Orleans; and that of Diana of Poictiers thwarted this prince, and poiſoned him at laſt. Let us ſee what Mezerai ſays of it: 'The 'duke of Orleans, a prince of great hopes, died at 'Foreſt-Mouſtier, the eighth of September, either of 'the plague, or of poiſon, which it was ſuſpected his 'brother's creatures gave him; becauſe they could not 'endure that the king ſhould be ſo fond of him as he 'was, and that he ſhould be angry, that the dauphin, 'contrary to his orders, held a correſpondence with 'the conſtable of Montmorency, whoſe return they 'wiſhed, becauſe their maſter earneſtly deſired it (73).' What grief was it for Francis I to ſee, that his ſon, by meddling more than he ought to do with ſtate-affairs, obliged him to take thoſe meaſures, which were neither agreeable nor advantageous to him! The dauphin's faction was the cauſe, that the king ſigned the treaty of Creſpy. The dauphin had written 'to 'his father, with the conſent of the general officers of 'his army, to beg that his majeſty would be pleaſed 'to ſend again the conſtable to the army, to perform 'his office, and that nothing but this general was 'wanting to make his forces invincible . . . . The 'king never expreſſed ſo much reſentment as he did 'at the reading of this letter. He complained, that 'his ſon encroached upon his authority, and that his 'officers preſumed to preſcribe him laws. He declared his indignation to all that approached his perſon, 'and ſeverely checked all thoſe, who had exaſperated 'him. He reſolutely told the dauphin, that it was 'his duty to ſet his ſubjects a pattern of perfect obedience, and not to find fault with his conduct, by 'propoſing to him to reſtore a favourite, whom he 'had diſgraced upon good grounds. He threatened 'the reſt with his diſpleaſure, if they perſiſted in their 'indiſcretion; and the ducheſs of Etampes's cabal, 'laying hold of his paſſion, ſo powerfully repreſented, 'that the only way to be free from all the importunate 'petitions, that might be made in behalf of the conſtable, was to conclude a ſudden peace, that his majeſty ordered admiral Annebaut to do it, &c (74).' 'This peace being more advantageous to the duke of 'Orleans, than to France, the dauphin, who could 'endure neither the aggrandizing of his brother, nor 'the prejudice done to the kingdom, proteſted againſt 'it in the caſtle of Fontainebleau, in the preſence 'of the duke of Vendoſme, the count d'Enghien 'his brother, and Francis d'Aumale, the ſecond day 'of December (75).' It may be eaſily imagined, that the king of France underwent the ſame fate, that many other princes undergo; which was, to be unhappy in his family, and to have occaſion to be jealous of him, who was to be his ſucceſſor. Thoſe, who poiſoned the duke of Orleans, ſaved, perhaps, the lives of two hundred thouſand men, and, perhaps, prevented the order of ſucceſſion in France from being ſhamefully diſturbed (76).

[S] The ſirname of GREAT, which was given him after his death, was of no long continuance.] Theodore Beza informs me (77), that this ſirname was given him after his death; but I conclude, that it did not continue long, becauſe every body ſays, and writes, Francis the Firſt, and not Francis the Great. They ſay, and write, Henry the Fourth, or Henry the Great, which is the ſame thing; and it would be the ſame thing too, with reference to Francis the Firſt, and Francis the Great, had not that title been laid aſide almoſt as ſoon as it was given. There is no need to put you in mind, that the great king Francis the Firſt, and Francis the Great, do not ſignify the ſame thing.

[T] He betrayed too great a fear, when he returned into France.] I will make uſe of Mezerai's words: 'As ſoon as the king was on this ſide of the river, he 'immediately got upon a Turkiſh horſe, as if he had 'been afraid of ſome ambuſh, and put on to St John 'de Luz, which is four leagues from thence; and, 'having refreſhed himſelf for half an hour, he ſpurred 'on as faſt to Bayonne (78).' Sure he had been very baſely treated in his confinement, ſince he charged his children to revenge him, on pain of his curſe. I have read this in a letter of admiral Chabot's ſecretary (79), which Mr le Laboureur hath publiſhed. It was written from London, the fifth of February, 1535, and contains, among other things which Henry VIII told this ſecretary, 'that he remembered very well, 'when they were laſt together, that the ſaid king '(80), ſpeaking one day to the dauphin, the duke of 'Orleans, and the duke of Angouleſme, his children, 'ſaid to them theſe words: that, if he knew that 'they ſhould ever forget the injuries and barbarous 'uſage, which he and they had received from the 'ſaid emperor, or did not revenge him, in caſe he 'could not do it himſelf, from that time he gave them 'his curſe (81).'

[U] It has been falſely reported, that Francis I. was born after his mother had been a long time barren.] Many of thoſe, who have publiſhed Francis de Paula's life, ſay, that the princeſs Loüiſa of Savoy, wife to Charles de Valois, lamented, to this holy man, her unhappy barrenneſs; and ſhe had been, add they, a long while ſenſible (82) of this imperfection. Francis de Paula, by his prayers, cured her of it; and therefore, being delivered of a boy, ſhe had him called Francis. This they relate. Theophilus Raynaud, upon the credit of theſe authors, reported the ſame thing in his Trinitas Patriarcharum; a book, wherein he makes the panegyric of St Bruno, the patriarch of the Carthuſians, of St Ignatius, the patriarch of the Jeſuits, and of St Francis de Paula, the patriarch of the Minimes; but he was informed afterwards, that it was a great falſity, ſince Loüiſa of Savoy became a widow at nineteen years of age, and was then mother to the princeſs Margaret, and prince Francis; which irrefragably ſhews, that ſhe could not deplore her long barrenneſs to Francis de Paula. 'Hoc correctione indiget, ſays 'he (83), neque enim longam ſterilitatem ſuam deplorare potuit Ludovica, quæ anno ætatis undeviceſimo 'vidua relicta, duplicem jam prolem enixa erat, Margaritam filiam natam Engoliſmæ XI. Aprilis anno '1492, & Franciſcum, Cognaci editum anno 1494, '12. Septembris.' He adds, that Hilarion de Coſta, who wrote afterwards, had obſerved this in the life of the founder of the Minimes, and that the brothers Sammarthanus

(72) See the article ETAMPES.

(73) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. IV. pag. 635, ad ann. 1545.

(74) Varillas, Hiſt. de François I, liv. xi, pag. 108, ad ann. 1544.

(75) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. IV, pag. 631, ad ann. 1544.

(76) See the article HENRY II, rem. [S].

(77) Hiſtoire des Egliſes Reform. liv. i, at the end, pag. 66.

(78) Hiſtoire de France, Tom. II, pag. 950, ad ann. 1526.

(79) His name was Palamedes Gontier.

(80) That is, Francis I.

(81) Addit. aux Memoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. I, pag. 420.

(82) Diu ſterili. Theoph. Raynaud. Syntagm. de libris Propriis, Art. lv, pag. 639 Apopompæi.

(83) Id. ibid.

knows his love to learning; but few are informed of a particular, which may be ſeen, in relation to that, in a letter of Andreas Alciatus, which was not publiſhed till the year 1697 [X]. There is another thing remarkable, and of greater moment, which hath been lately known, viz. that the Duke of Orleans, Francis the firſt's ſecond ſon, offered to the Proteſtant princes of Germany, to allow them the exerciſe of their religion [Y]; and it is conjectured, that he did it with his father's conſent (o). I have ſpoken, in the remark [N], of the diſorders, which were cauſed in France by the new cuſtom, that Francis Iſt introduced into his court, when he brought the ladies there. Theſe diſorders cannot be better repreſented, than they are by Mezerai, and therefore I will make uſe of his words [Z]. The author (p) of ſome dialogues, printed at the Hague in the year 1700, hath judiciouſly obſerved this king's faults. It is in the dialogue between this

(o) See the end of the remark [I].

(p) He is reported to be the ſame, who has publiſhed the Adventures of Telemachus: that is, the archbiſhop of Cambray.

Sammarthanus had confirmed it (84), ſince they ſay, that Loüiſa of Savoy was born in the year 1477, and that ſhe was married to Charles of Orleans, count of Angouleſme, in the year 1488; and that ſhe was delivered of Francis the twelfth of September, 1494, and loſt her huſband the firſt of January, 1496. Here is then a falſhood demonſtratively confuted: beſides, here is an inſtance of the precipitation, wherewith miracles upon miracles are crowded in the legend of a ſaint, without ever conſulting genealogical and chronological tables. Had they been conſulted by thoſe writers, they would not have ſaid, that a woman, who at the age of fifteen is delivered of a girl, and of a boy at ſeventeen, had grieved at her long barrenneſs, and had not been cured of it, but by the prayers of a holy man. GOD grant there may be nothing elſe but ſimplicity and credulity in this ſtory, and that the wants and intereſt of a ſociety, whereof I have ſaid ſomething in another place (85), may not have engaged the Minimes to adorn the life of their patriarch with this falſe glory.

[X] Few are informed of a particular, which may be ſeen in a letter of Andreas Alciatus, which was not publiſhed till the year 1697.] This letter was written from Bourges, the third of September, 1530. Alciatus ſays in it, that one Julius Camillus, a learned man, had offered to Francis I. to teach him, in a month's time, to ſpeak Greek and Latin, in proſe and verſe, with as much elegancy, as Demoſthenes and Cicero, Homer and Virgil. He required the king to be with him but one hour a day: but Camillus would be alone with him, becauſe he thought, that ſo extraordinary a ſecret was not to be imparted, but to crowned heads (86). He alſo demanded an income of two thouſand crowns a year in good benefices. He ſpoke with ſo much aſſurance, that Francis I. believed there was ſomething in theſe extraordinary promiſes. But, after he had been twice with Camillus, he diſmiſſed him with a preſent of ſix hundred crowns (87).

[Y] The duke of Orleans, Francis the firſt's ſecond ſon, offered to the Proteſtant princes of Germany, to allow the exerciſe of their religion.] We are obliged to Mr le Vaſſor for the diſcovery of this ſingularity. He hath publiſhed it in the ſecond edition of Vargas's letters, which he hath tranſlated from the Spaniſh, and adorned with ſeveral very ſolid remarks. He found (88), among cardinal de Granvelle's papers, the inſtruction, which the duke of Orleans gave to his ſecretary and valet de chambre, when he ſent him to the dukes of Saxony, the landgrave of Heſſe, and other Proteſtant princes, who were to meet at Francfort (89). It is dated from Rheims the eighth day of September, 1543, and begins thus: 'He ſhall declare to them 'the great deſire, which, by the grace of God, we 'have, that the holy goſpel be preached all over the 'kingdom of France, where we would ſee already a 'beginning of it. And becauſe the filial reverence, 'and fraternal honour, which we have for our moſt 'honoured lord and father, the moſt chriſtian king, 'and for the dauphin, our eldeſt brother, hinder us 'from having it freely preached in our duchy of Orleans, which is under the juriſdiction and in the 'poſſeſſion of our ſaid lord and father; beſides that 'the Pope, Emperor, and other princes, might oppoſe us; and other reaſonable cauſes, which we reſerve to be urged by us in a fit time; we have faithfully applied ourſelves to the moſt illuſtrious and excellent princes, the duke of Saxony, the landgrave of 'Heſſe, and other Proteſtant princes, to give them 'notice, that we are reſolved, and promiſe to them 'expreſsly, and without any regard, to have it preached in the duchy of Luxemburg, whereof we hope 'our ſaid lord the king will leave us in quiet poſſeſſion, and of other territories, which belong to us by 'the laws of arms. But we would have the ſaid Proteſtant princes to receive us into an offenſive and 'defenſive alliance and confederacy: and we earneſtly 'require them not to refuſe ſo juſt and reaſonable a demand; not to aſſiſt us with their protection, forces, 'or aid, againſt any particular prince, but only in 'what concerns the affairs of the Chriſtian religion, 'whoſe encreaſe we chiefly deſire, which by theſe 'means may the more eaſily be known in our other 'territories, and in the ſaid kingdom, when my ſaid 'lord, the king, comes to ſee me allied with the ſaid 'princes, who will be the cauſe, that he will declare 'his good zeal in this buſineſs, and we ſhall be able 'to excuſe ourſelves to him, and defend ourſelves againſt our adverſaries. Therefore, may it pleaſe the 'ſaid princes, that, as ſoon as we begin to have the 'ſaid goſpel preached in the ſaid duchy of Luxemburg, 'at that very time our alliance and confederacy with 'them may begin (90).' This is Mr le Vaſſor's reflexion: 'It is very likely, that the duke of Orleans did 'not make this ſtep without his father's knowledge. 'He ſpeaks too confidently of Francis the firſt's good 'zeal; he too freely offers all this king's power; he 'gives too great hopes of what will be done, as ſoon 'as the Proteſtants have admitted him into their 'league. All this ſuppoſes, that the father and ſon 'acted in concert (91).' Thoſe who ſay, that the ducheſs d'Etampes was a Lutheran in her heart, and that ſhe caballed, in favour of the duke of Orleans, againſt the dauphin (92), will not fail to ſay, that, without the king's knowledge, ſhe engaged this young duke to link himſelf with the princes of the league of Smalcalde; and that afterwards ſhe induced him to court the emperor (93), when ſhe ſaw, that fortune was likely to be more favourable that way. Perhaps ſome will think, that the king came clandeſtinely into this plot of his ſon, without any real deſign of favouring the new religion in France, but only to make a better advantage of the aſſiſtance of Germany, by giving theſe Lutheran princes hopes, that he would declare, at a proper time, for the reformation, if he found it his intereſt. I believe, that this diſcovery of Mr le Vaſſor will induce the curious to ſift out the bottom and drift of this negociation, and they will find ſome papers, that will clear this affair.

[Z] I will make uſe of Mezerai's words.] 'King 'Francis I, who had a noble paſſion for what was 'great, took great delight in magnificence, believing 'that nothing could better diſplay his grandeur: and, 'as he thought, that the beauty of the ladies would 'heighten the glory of his pomp, and, as he was of 'an amorous diſpoſition, he was the firſt who accuſtomed the fair ſex to frequent the court. It had at 'firſt a very good effect; this lovely ſex having introduced there politeneſs and civility, and inſpiring 'noble ſouls with principles of generoſity. But, when 'impurity crept in, and the example of great men authorized corruption; what was before a fine ſpring 'of honour and virtue, became the ſink of all vices: 'infamy became in credit; proſtitution was the way to 'favour; and none was a favourite, and continued ſo, 'but by theſe baſe means: in a word, offices and employments were at the ſole diſpoſal of women. And 'becauſe, when they are diſorderly, they are more 'eaſily induced to injuſtice, fraud, vengeance, malice, 'and impudence, than men; they were the cauſe, 'that ſeveral very ill maxims were introduced into 'the government, and that the ancient candour of 'the Gauls was baniſhed yet farther than chaſtity. 'This

---

(84) Aſtipulantur F. F. Sammarthani, Tom. I, lib. x, pag. 627. Id. ibid.

(85) In the remark [N] of the article FRANCIS of Aſſiſi.

(86) Nolle enim ea arcana cuiquam inferiori à Regè patefieri. Alciat. Epiſt. xxiii, inter Gudianas, pag. 109.

(87) Ex Alciato, ibid.

(88) Le Vaſſor. Lettres & Memoires de Vargas, pag. 24, edit. 1700.

(89) Ib. pag. 25.

(90) Ibid.

(91) Ib. pag. 29.

(92) See, above, rem. [H] of the article ETAMPES.

(93) Ibid. remark [F].

this prince and Lewis XII. It is pity that this dialogue is ſo ſhort; this is perhaps it's only fault. Francis I made a regulation, which deſerves a remark; I mean, that he aboliſhed the cuſtom of drawing up all public acts in Latin [AA]. Naudé (q) mentions this, and ſeveral other particulars, which concern the learning of this prince, his writings, and love to learned men. The laſt thing I ſhall ſay of him is pretty remarkable: It is pretended (r), that Francis de Paula, the day before he died, ſpoke after this manner to Loüiſa of Savoy; Your ſon ſhall be king of France, and will exceed in glory, riches, and happineſs, all the princes of his age, provided he applies himſelf to the reformation of the church; but, if he doth not mind it, he will be very unhappy. Obſerve, that Francis de Paula died the ſecond of April 1507; and that Lewis XII, who then ſwayed the ſceptre, lived almoſt eight years after, and that his wife was not barren (s).

Here are ſome things which I have collected ſince the ſecond edition. It has been falſely ſaid, that, after he was taken priſoner at the battle of Pavia, he was conveyed to the caſtle of Ambres, near Inſpruc [BB]. Among the praiſes beſtowed on him for his encouraging learning, we muſt not forget, that the learned acknowlege themſelves indebted to him for ſome excellent editions [CC]. The Paſſage he cauſed to be through a mountain is very ſurprizing [DD]. I have ſomething more to ſay concerning the oath, which

‘This corruption began under the reign of Francis I, and was almoſt univerſal under Henry II, and at laſt came to it's height under Charles IX, and Henry III (94).’

[AA] He aboliſhed the cuſtom of drawing up all public acts in Latin.] Let us make uſe of Varillas's words: ‘Juſtice had, till that time, been adminiſtered in Latin, throughout the French monarchy, or at leaſt in the greateſt part of it; and that tongue had been ſo corrupted, that it was ſcarce known, but by the termination of words; whether it was thro' ignorance, or that the judges endeavoured by that to be better underſtood. This abuſe was not to be born with at the time that they ſo ſucceſsfully ſtrove to reſtore the ancient politeneſs; and ſince the French monarchy had never any dependance on the empire of Rome, it was not fit, that it's moſt authentic acts ſhould be in that tongue. It had been ridiculous to have put them in good Latin, becauſe moſt people would not have underſtood them; and the king was of opinion, that they would be better in good French, than in bad Latin. Thus this order was made in the year 1539; and, of all thoſe of Francis I, none hath been more univerſally and conſtantly obſerved than this (95).’ This hiſtorian had but juſt before obſerved, that chancellor Poyet had procured this reformation, a little before his fall. Germany had reformed this abuſe almoſt three hundred years before. What follows is found in the hiſtorical meditations of Camerarius. ‘The emperor Rodolphus I . . . . moved by the complaints of the German nation, and ſeeing himſelf, as it were, under the yoke of foreign ſecretaries, who underſtood Latin, and whom he was obliged to make uſe of, to the great prejudice of his affairs, becauſe ſuch perſons often betrayed him, held a diet at Nuremberg in the year 1252; wherein it was ordered, with the common conſent of all the ſtates of the empire, that, from thence forward, the German tongue ſhould be uſed in the chanceries, and public contracts. This occaſioned the Germans to improve their language; and it is arrived to ſuch a perfection, that now any hiſtory or ſcience may be elegantly, and clearly expreſſed in it, either in print, or manuſcript (96).’ Obſerve, that it has been ſaid, that the king of France was induced to baniſh the Latin tongue from all public acts of juſtice, becauſe he was told, that the firſt preſident of the parliament of Paris, had uſed a very barbarous term, when he pronounced ſentence. ‘Scripſerat morem Galliæ fuiſſe, leges regni ſemper Latino ſermone ſcribi, donec Franciſcus Rex ejus nominis primus id vetuit anno 1539. Sed debuerat Matharellus cauſam addere: quoniam videlicet Præſes Curiæ Parliamenti in arreſto pronuntiando dixerat, debotamus & debotavimus: quod Gallice jam pronunciatur. Avons debouté & deboutons (we have diſmiſſed, and do diſmiſs). De quo Rex Franciſcus (ut quidam dicunt) multum reſerat: ut alii, multum iratus fuerat (97).

[BB] It has been falſely ſaid . . . . . that he was conveyed to the caſtle of Ambres near Inſpruc.] Let us quote the Hiſtorical Mercury of March 1702. ‘By letters from Vienna of the fourth of this month, we are informed, that, by order of the emperor, the marêchal de Villeroi (98) has been carried from Inſpruc to the caſtle of Ambres, at a leagues diſtance, and that he is in the ſame chamber, in which Charles V confined king Francis I, after he had taken him priſoner before Pavia.’ Some of the Dutch Gazettes had already ſaid the ſame thing. I could wiſh, the author of the Mercury had refuted, inſtead of followed, them. It is certain, that Francis I. was not carried into Germany, but into Spain. Bouchet obſerves, that the viceroy of Naples (99) gave the charge of the perſon of the king of France to the lord Alarcon, governor of Apulia and Calabria, whom he carried to the caſtle of Piſqueton (100). Paradin, Mezerai, and ſeveral other hiſtorians give the name of Piſqueton to the caſtle, in which this prince was detained, before he was carried into Spain. This caſtle is on the river Adda in the Milaneſe, and is called in Italian Picighitone. See Leander Alberti in his deſcription of Italy (101).

[CC] The learned are indebted to him for ſome excellent editions.] We need only read theſe words of Peter Victorius (102): ‘Veritas quoque non patitur, ut reticeam egregiam voluntatem atque operam, inferioribus temporibus in hac re poſitam à Franciſco primo Gallorum rege, qui ut erat omnibus in rebus magno animo, ac vere regio præditus, proclivisque in humanum genus juvandum, rectaque ſtudia ſumma ope augenda, curavit, ut quidquid antiquorum ingenii monimentorum reſtaret in afflicta Græcia, ad ſe mitteretur: cui beneficio magno addidit alterum, & ipſum valde utile ad hanc ipſam honeſtam artem ornandam: ſtuduit enim, magnis præmiis propoſitis, ut lepidæ admodum formæ litterarum, & Græcarum, & Latinarum, fingerentur: in quo etiam felix fuit: ita enim pulchræ atque politæ fabricatæ fuere, ut non videantur ab humano ingenio venuſtiores, & exquiſitiores ullo pacto conformari poſſe: librique ipſis excuſi, non invitent tantum, ſed etiam aliquo modo rapiant ad ſe legendos. —— Truth will not allow me to diſſemble the obligations we are under of late years in this reſpect, to Francis I, king of France, who, as he diſcovered a greatneſs of mind in every thing, and a truly royal diſpoſition, in promoting the good of mankind, and encouraging uſeful learning, to the utmoſt of his power, ſo he took care to have the ancient monuments of wit, remaining in deſolated Greece, tranſmitted to him; to which great piece of ſervice he added another, of great uſe towards the carrying on this deſign; for, by propoſing large rewards, he encouraged the founding of beautiful Greek and Latin Types; in which he met with ſucceſs; for ſuch beautiful and elegant ones were founded, as were not to be ſurpaſſed by the ſkill of man, and the books, which were printed with them, not only invited, but even forced men to read them.’ To this we may add, what I relate in the article VERGERIUS (ANGELUS) (103), and this paſſage of the Antiquities of Paris: ‘It appears, that, in the year 1541, Angelus Vergerius, Greek ſecretary to the king, had a penſion of 450 French livres, charged on the Exchequer (104).’

[DD] The paſſage he cauſed to be made through a mountain is very ſurprizing.] Mr Leger affirms (105), that

---

(q) Naudé, Add. à l'Hiſtoire de Loüis XI, pag. 369.

(r) See Richer. Hiſtor. Concil. lib. iv, pag. 101.

(s) See the article FERRARA, rem. [A].

(94) Mezerai, Hiſt. of France, under Henry III. Tom. III, pag. 446, 447.

(95) Varillas, Hiſt. de François I, livr ix, pag. m. 381.

(96) Camerarius's Hiſtorical Meditations, Vol. III, lib. iv, cap. v, pag. 271, 272, of Simon Goulart's Tranſlation.

(97) Matagonis de Matagonibus adverſus Italogalliam Antonii Matharelli, pag. m. 226.

(98) He was taken priſoner in Cremona, the firſt of Febr. 1702.

(99) It was Charles de Lanoi.

(100) Bouchet, Annal. d'Aquitaine, fol. m. 217.

(101) Folio 407, verſo, Edit. Venice, 1561.

(102) P. Victor. Præfat. Comment. in VIII Libros Ariſtot. de optimo Statu Civitatis.

(103) Citat. (b).

(104) Jacq. du Breui, Antiq. de Paris, pag. m. 568.

(105) Jo. Leger, Hiſt. des Egliſes Vaudoiſes, Part. I, pag. 2.

which certain ſatirical writers pretend he made to the Turk [EE], and which I have ſet down in the very terms (t).

that Mount Viſol which is eſteemed the higheſt in all Europe, and where the Po riſes, is a mountain, of which hiſtory informs us . . . . that Francis I. cauſed it to be dug quite through to open a paſſage into Italy. But (adds this author) ‘ ſince the French have found ‘ the ſecret of opening the paſſage of Mount Genevre, ‘ which is much ſhorter and more convenient, they ‘ make no farther uſe of this hole; which yet ſubſiſts, being cut thro’ a rock, and requiring two ‘ hours to paſs it, which may be done with loaded ‘ mules; and the only inconvenience attending it is, that ‘ it is ſo dark, travellers are obliged to carry torches.’ This author not having given us the date of this ſurpriſing piece of work, nor told us where he met with the relation. I have made inquiries which induce me to believe, that the expedition of Francis I into Italy, in the year 1515, is the epocha of this. I thought, that Martin du Bellai had very fully deſcribed the difficulties to be ſurmounted in paſſing the Alps; but I found, that he ſpeaks of it very ſuccinctly (106), and without giving any idea of the prodigious labour in accompliſhing it. I conſulted Guicciardin (107), who gave me more ſatisfaction. Mr Varillas gave me no leſs: theſe are his words (108): ‘ Lautrec and Navarre, with the choice men ‘ of the French army, left Geneva (109) on the left ‘ hand, forded the river Durence, and entered the ‘ Argentaires (110), by a place called Gilleſtre: ‘ from thence they penetrated as far as the rock ‘ St Paul, which they were forced to open with iron ‘ tools and fire. The two following days, the pioneers were for the moſt part uſeleſs; for, as each ‘ mountain was ſeparated from the reſt by abyſſes, ‘ the mine and ſap were of no uſe, and they had recourſe to bridges of communication, to tranſport ‘ the artillery. The ſoldiers and pioneers dragged it ‘ along in places inacceſſible to beaſts of burthen; ‘ they filled with faſcines places, which would admit ‘ of it, and if they were too large, the void ſpace ‘ was ſupplied with props and great trees. After this ‘ manner, they reached mount Pied-de-Porc; which ‘ they deſpaired of penetrating, becauſe it conſiſted ‘ of but one ſolid rock, ſteep on all ſides: but Navarre, who examined it thoroughly, diſcovered one ‘ vein more ſoft than the reſt, and followed it ſo ‘ exactly, that he made himſelf a way through the ‘ middle. Thus, by the induſtry of engineers, by ‘ the labour of the ſoldiers, and by the perſeverance ‘ of their leaders, the French army arrived, about ‘ the evening of the eighth day, in the marquiſate ‘ of Saluces *.’ But, good as this deſcription is, it will be found cold and inſipid, when compared with that of Paul Jovius (111). There is an obſervable difference between him and Varillas. This latter takes no notice of Trivulcio, to whom Paul Jovius gives the honour of diſcovering this new paſſage, and being the principal director of the execution.

[EE] I have ſomething more to ſay concerning the pretended oath . . . . . he took to the Turk.] We have ſeen (112) what John le Maire de Belges reproached the Venetians with. I add, that the Saracens, who had the king St Lewis in their power, propoſed to him the form of an oath, much ſhorter than that which the baſtard of Cyprus is ſuppoſed to have made no ſcruple of taking, and which is the ſame Francis I is ſuppoſed to have taken. It is plain, that the one was copied from the other; but St Lewis would not ſubmit to this hard condition.

(t) See remark [I].

(106) Martin du Bellai, Memoir. livr. i, ad ann. 1515, pag. m. 28.

(107) Guicc. livr. xii, fol. m. 356.

(108) Varill. Hiſt. de François I, livr. i, pag. 43. Edit. of the Hague, 1690.

(109) It ſhould Mount Genevre.

(110) It ſhould be (Le col de l'Argentire) The defile of Argentiere.

* In the relation of the paſſage ſent to the king's mother by the count de Morette.

(111) Jovius, Hiſt. ſui Temp. lib. xv, fol. m. 301, &c.

(112) In remark [I].

FRANCISCA, a devout lady canonized in the year 1608, was born at Rome, about the year 1384. She ſhewed from her infancy, that her heart was turned towards heaven, for ſhe loved prayers and ſolitary places, and had an averſion for the pleaſures and diverſions of that age. At eleven years of age, ſhe reſolved to become a Nun; but her father would not agree to it; on the contrary, he married her to a rich Gentleman (a). Her ſolitary and devout temper did not alter with her condition; for ſhe was alone, and prayed as often as the buſineſs of her family gave her time. She frequented neither public ſhews, nor banquets, nor weddings; nay, ſhe did not viſit her relations; but all her delight was to go to the churches and hoſpitals. She perſuaded a great many maids to forſake the world, and founded for them a convent in Rome, according to the rule of St Benedict. They were called Oblates, and were of the congregation of the Olivetans. Having loſt her huſband, ſhe very humbly petitioned to be admitted into that ſociety, where ſhe profeſſed herſelf a Nun, and was wonderfully punctual in the performance of all her duties. She died the ninth of May 1440. She wrought a great many miracles during her life, and ſoon after her death; ſo that, ſome months after her deceaſe, the preliminaries of her canonization were begun (b). This buſineſs was re-aſſumed ſeveral times, at the earneſt requeſt of the citizens of Rome, but it was not ended before the pontificate of Pope Paul V in the Year 1608 [A]. I have found, in a book of Nicolas Vignier, a very ſtrange ſtory [B], and of which I have in vain ſought the original.

I have

(a) Called Laurence Pontiani.

(b) Taken from the bull of her canonization, inſerted by Bzovius in the 16th Vol. of the Eccleſiaſtical Annals, pag. 730, & ſeq. ad ann. 1440.

[A] This buſineſs was re-aſſumed at ſeveral times. . . . . but it was not ended before . . . . . . the year 1608.] The proceedings were begun under Pope Eugenius IV, in the 1440. A biſhop and a prior of the Carthuſians were appointed commiſſioners, to examine the witneſſes of the life and miracles of Franciſca. After two years and ſome months, this buſineſs was put into the hands of cardinal Alberti; thirty witneſſes were heard upon eighty articles. Nicolas V, ſucceſſor to Eugenius IV, ordered theſe informations to be renewed by two biſhops, who judicially received the depoſitions of 132 witneſſes. There the buſineſs ſtood, till the pontificate of Clement VIII; in the mean while the devotion for the deceaſed did not cool, and the day of her death was kept at Rome. Clement VIII, at the ſollicitation of the inhabitants of Rome, ordered, that this affair ſhould be expedited out of hand. He named commiſſioners, who examined the former proceedings from the beginning, and made ſome new informations to the year 1604. The Pope, dying in the mean time, could not ſatisfy the deſires of the Roman people. Paul V, his ſucceſſor, being urged to make an end of it, ordered, that it ſhould be diſpatched; and, at laſt, after the formalities required in the like caſe, he canonized our Franciſca, the twenty ninth of May 1608, and appointed the ninth of March for her feſtival (1). The people of Rome took upon them the expence of this great ceremony, and laid out upon it above a hundred thouſand crowns (2).

[B] We find in a book of Nicolas Vignier, a very ſtrange ſtory. Theſe are his words; for I make no alteration in them, nor indeed ought I to do it (3). A Roman matron, called Franciſca, was ranked among the ſaints by the Pope, becauſe ſhe was wont to curb her carnal affections, by diſtilling burning Bacon upon her Pudenda. Volaterranus. You ſee he quotes Volaterran after a very indeterminate manner, without mentioning either the title, or number of the book, or chapter, or ſection. This is uſual enough with him; but I think he ſhould not have done it here, conſidering the oddneſs of the thing, and that he ſhould have made the verification of that paſſage as eaſy

(1) Taken from the bull of her canonization, inſerted by Bzovius, in the 16th Vol. of the Eccleſiaſtical Annals, pag. 730, & ſeq.

(2) Continuat. Hiſtor. Thuani, lib. i, pag. 30, ad ann. 1608, in fine.

(3) Nicolas Vignier, Recueil de l'Hiſtoire de l'Egliſe, pag. 626, ad ann. 1505.

I have at length found in Volaterran the words, which gave Vignier room to mention this ſtrange fact. The public has been informed of it, and may be ſenſible, that this ſcarce excuſes that writer [C].

eaſy as poſſible. I have ſearched in Volaterran (4). Wherever the table of matters, which is not good, and the diſtribution of the ſubjects might ſerve me as guide; but I have not been able to meet with it. A learned man had already informed me, that he had met with no ſuch thing in the volume of Volaterran. This is not the only thing I have to ſay againſt Vignier. I cannot comprehend, why he mentions this Roman matron under the year 1505. It is not the time when ſhe lived, nor that of her death, nor that of her canonization. Bzovius, under the year 1505, ſpeaks of two perſons of the fair ſex, who died in the odour of ſanctity, the one at Bourges, the other at Ravenna; but they were not the ſame with our Franciſca: the one was Joan of France, foundreſs of the religious of the Annunciade; the other was called Margaret. Laſtly, I obſerve that I can never be perſuaded, unleſs I ſee the expreſs words of Volaterran, that the quotation of Vignier is faithful. It is contrary to all probability, that Volaterran ſhould ſay, that Franciſca was canonized in the year 1505; for it was not till 1608; and it is yet leſs probable, that he ſhould affirm, that her canonization was founded only on the reaſon aſſigned by Vignier. He was too well acquainted with the ſtyle of the court of Rome, to advance a thing ſo diſtant as this is from the practice of canonizations. They are never grounded meerly on the virtues of the perſons, tho' never ſo eminent: miracles true or falſe muſt come in; I mean, witneſſes muſt be examined, which depoſe, that the interceſſion, relics, &c. of the perſon to be canonized, have done miraculous cures, &c. I would not alledge againſt Vignier the ſilence of the bull of Paul V; for I very well conceive, that, although it had been proved, that Franciſca, made uſe of that ſevere mortification, yet it would not have been expreſsly inſerted in the canonizing bull. I own, that ſome particular acts of auſterity, leſs ſurprizing than this, have been inſerted in it; but they had no relation to obſcene images which are not to be inſerted in a bull. 'Nec minori virtute in Chriſto JESU, (theſe are Paul the fifth's own words,) cum hoſte domeſtico pugnavit, ſed exemplo electorum Dei, admirabilem in modum caſtigavit corpus ſuum, & in ſervitutem redegit. Cibum illi ſemel in die herbæ, & legumina, aqua potum præbuerunt, ſive vigilaret, ſive dormiret, aſperum lancum induſium non exuebat, duroque cilicio, ac ferreo cingulo ſuper nudum membra mortificabat; accedebant flagella ferreis aculeis aſpera, quibus corpuſculum, quamquam aliunde attritum ſeveriſſime atterebat (5).' Theſe Latin words ſay, that ſhe eat nothing but greens and pulſe, and drank nothing but water; that, day and night, ſhe wore a woollen ſhift, a hair cloth, and an iron girdle next to her ſkin; and that ſhe unmercifully whipped herſelf. Whoever doth this, hath no need of the lard mentioned by Vignier, eſpecially when, after the example of Franciſca, a woman avoids the company of worldly perſons, their viſits, weddings, banquets their profane diverſions, &c. Let us add that ſhe became a widow but a few years before her death (6), and ſhe died in the fifty ſixth year of her life. Theſe are ſufficient reaſons why this ſaint ſtood in no need of this violent cure of immodeſty.

After all, had our Francis made uſe of ſuch a violent remedy, ſhe would deſerve, not only the praiſes but alſo the admiration of all good people. She would have ſhewed a love for chaſtity incomparably ſtronger and livelier, than if ſhe had followed the example of St Aldhelme (7), and ſuch other raſh votaries, who excited concupiſcence, in order to have greater merit in curbing it. A bad victory, not only dangerous, but alſo not to be gained, but at the peril of the virtue, for which they contended. The thought alone, the imagination, a burning got the better of, are a ſtate of impurity, and an object which muſt be diſpleaſing in the ſight of the lawgiver and his holy angels. St Paul's words (8), which, according to moſt tranſlations, ſignify, that the widow, that lives in pleaſure, is dead while ſhe liveth, ought to be otherwiſe explained, if we believe Melanchthon. The apoſtle doth not mean, according to him, that a widow, who loveth junketing, gaming, going abroad, ſuch worldly pleaſures, hath loſt the HOLY GHOST, and the life of grace; but he means, that this ſpiritual death belongs to thoſe widows, who are expoſed to the burnings of the fleſh; and he doth not underſtand a temptation, which ſatisfies their criminal deſires, but a temptation, which hinders the ſoul from thinking on heavenly things, and makes it dwell on laſcivious thoughts. Theſe are Melanchthon's words: 'Accuſat Paulus illas mulieres non levibus verbis: Pruriens viva mortua eſt. Nam vocabulum σπαταλῶσα propriè ſignificat prurientem; quod plus eſt quàm appetere delitias ciborum, ſed eſt habere incendia libidinum, σπάτος cutem ſignificat, σπατίζειν, σπάτος τίλλειν, vellicare cutem, ſeu titillare, σπατάλη pruritus ſeu titillatio cutis. Deinde καταςρηνιᾶν, ſignificat turgere ſeu diſtendi ſaginatum & tumefactum eſſe contra Chriſtum. His inſignibus verbis multi turpes motus pugnantes cum Caſtitate ſignificantur. Hac ſalacitate dicit veram fidem expulſo Spiritu ſancto extingui. Hæc eſt nativa ſignificatio verborum Pauli (9).' What is it to reſiſt theſe temptations? it is to wiſh to have no lewd deſires or motions: but ſtill you have them. The ſafeſt way, then, is to put one's ſelf in a ſtate of never having theſe deſires. And this our Franciſca did, if Vignier's ſtory be true (10).

[C] I have found in Volaterran, the words which gave Vignier room to mention this ſtrange fact . . . this ſcarce excuſes that writer.] The public has ſeen, in a letter, which I wrote the ſixth of May 1702, this whole affair cleared up. Obſerve, I beſeech you, Sir, theſe are the words of my letter (11), that I have not accuſed Vignier of citing Volaterran falſely; I have only ſaid, that, having ſearched in Volaterran, wherever the table of matters, which is not good, and the diſtribution of the ſubjects, might ſerve me as a guide, I could not meet with this paſſage. You your ſelf acknowledge, that you have in vain turned over this author's bulky volume; but you add, that you cannot forbear thinking, that Vignier had read in it what he mentions. You are in the right, generally ſpeaking, and I am well pleaſed, both for your ſatisfaction, and that of my readers, to inform the public here, that, in ſearching, two days ago, for ſomethiug elſe, in Volaterran, I light upon this. It is to be found in the twenty ſecond book, at page 810 of the edition of Francfort, 1603, at the place, where he mentions Pope Urban V. There we meet with theſe words: Quam (Catharinam Virginem filiam Brigidæ) Julius jamjam in Catalogum referre una cum Franciſca Romana Matrona ſtatuit, quæ & ipſa ſub Eugenio claruit prodigiis & ſanctitate: voluptatem inviti coitus ardente ſupra vulvam larido reprimebat. I have ſet down, in my dictionary (12), Vignier's tranſlation of this paſſage. Examine carefully my criticiſm, and you will find it juſt: for it is true, that Volaterran obſerves, that Julius II deſigned to canonize this lady, but not that he did canonize her, &c.

(4) That is, in the work, intituled, Commentariorum Urbanorum libri octo & triginta. I have at laſt found the paſſage. See the remark [C].

(5) Literæ decretales Canonizationis S. Franciſcæ, apud Bzovium, ubi ſupra, pag. 732.

(6) Defuncto marito, paucis annis ante ſuam dormitionem. Ibid. pag. 731.

(7) See the article of FRANCIS of Aſſiſi, remarks [G] and [D]. See alſo the article FONTEVRAUD, remarks [M] and [N].

(8) Ἡ δὲ σπαταλῶσα ζῶσα τέθνηκε. Nam quæ in deliciiis eſt, vivens mortua eſt. Epiſt. ad Timoth. I, cap. v, ver. 8.

(9) Melanchth. Reſponſ. ad impios Articulos Bavaricæ Inquiſitionis, Art. xxvi. fol. m. H. 2.

(10) Confer quæ ſupra, rem. [A] of the article CORONEL (ALPHONSUS).

(11) Journal de Trevoux. May 1702. Amſterdam Edit. pag. 380, 381.

(12) Above, citat. (3).

FRANCUS (SEBASTIAN), an Anabaptiſt of the XVIth century, who publiſhed ſeveral books full of errors, which the Lutherans confuted. He was a true fanatic. He taught, that all ſins are equal, and undermined the authority of ſcripture; for he maintained, that men were to ſeek for the ſuggeſtions of the Holy-Ghoſt, without minding the words revealed. He alſo believed, that the true church was an aggregate of ſeveral ſects, wherein the Papiſts were no leſs comprehended than the Proteſtants. The divines of the confeſſion of Auſburg, aſſembled at Smalcalde in the year 1540, deſired Melanchthon to refute this man's conceits, and thoſe of ſome other fanatics natics (a). The ſame Francus publiſhed a very ſatirical book againſt women, which was refuted by John Freder, and by Luther [A].

Let us add, that he drew very ſtrange conſequences from an axiom of Servetus concerning the preſence of God; for he pretended, that not only beaſts, but the inanimate creation likewiſe partook of a general ſoul, that was divine. The ſieur de Saint Aldegonde, who informs me of this, wiſhed that ſome one would examine to the bottom the principle, whence theſe conſequences were drawn [B]. Obſerve, that he ſays, Francus was a German; but others make him of Woerden, a town of Holland (b); they ſirname him Werdenſis in the abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque (c), and give the titles of ſeveral of his works, among which we muſt not forget a German chronicle, in which he intermixes many wonderful things (d). Some, writing even in Latin, call him Franc. Mr Moreri has mentioned him under this name: He ſays ſcarce any thing of him, though Spondanus, whom he cites, might have furniſhed him with ſome particulars, and among others this, that Francus was expelled from Straſburg, that his chronicle was there condemned, and that he is the firſt, who aſſerted, that Anabaptiſm was divided into more than forty four ſects (e).

[A] He publiſhed a very ſatirical book againſt women, which was refuted by John Freder and Luther.] John Freder wrote a dialogue concerning marriage, in anſwer to this ſatire of Francus, and dedicated it to Dorothy queen of Denmark (1), upon whom he beſtowed a very noble encomium. Luther prefixed a preface before this work, and exclaimed bitterly againſt Francus: he ſaid, among other things, that he was a ſlanderer, who raked together all the filth of mankind, and impudently publiſhed it. He compared him to flies, &c. But it is better to ſet down the author's own words, whence I have all this: ‘ Oppoſitus ille (Dialogus de conjugio) eſt maledicentiæ Sebaſtiana Franci .... qua fœmininum ſexum edito libello proterve inſectatus eſt..... Lutherus in præfatione fatetur, ſe Francum hominem peſſimum reſponſo indignum judicaſſe, certum, quod ſcripta ejus lucem haud diu ſint latura, cum non niſi ſatiris & convitiis indulgeat, & aliorum detegat & exagitet vitia, illitaſque turpitudinum illarum inverecunda relatione chartas mundo obtrudat; Comparat eum cum muſcis & veſpis, quæ fœdiſſima quæque pervolitantes & perrepentes, poſtea inquinatæ & fœtentes, naſo, oculis, genis & labiis hominum impudenter inſidere velint. Taxari quidem mereto vitia etiam a piis doctoribus, ſed non cum petulantia aut inſultatione, aut quod delectentur in eorum enarratione, ſed ut odium flagitiorum excitent, & viam ad emendationem oſtendant (2). —— The dialogue concerning marriage is oppoſed to the calumny of Sebaſtian Francus ..... who libelled the female ſex in a book that he publiſhed .... Luther, in the preface, confeſſes, that he had thought Francus, the worſt of men, unworthy of a reply, being well aſſured, that his writings were ſhort-lived, ſince he indulges himſelf in nothing but ſatire and calumny, and detects and cenſures the vices of others, and obtrudes his books on the world, ſtuffed with immodeſt accounts of filthy actions. He compares him to flies and waſps, which flying and creeping thro' the naſtieſt things, afterward, defiled and ſtinking as they are, impudently endeavour to ſit on the noſe, cheeks, and lips of men. Vice is deſervedly cenſured by the moſt pious teachers, but not with petulancy and inſult, or to ſhew that they are delighted with the narrative, but to raiſe an hatred to vice, and to print out the path of amendment.’

[B] St Aldegonde .... wiſhed that ſome one would examine to the bottom the principle, whence theſe conſequences are drawn.] Read a letter, which he wrote to Theodore Beza in the year 1566, where you will find theſe words: ‘ Sebaſtianus Francus homo Germanus qui mirifica hujuſmodi portenta congeſſit in ſuas farragines, ac in primis in eum, quem Paradoxa inſcripſit, librum, Axioma illud Serveti de Dei reali vel eſſentiali in omnibus & rebus & locis præſentia ita urget, ut ex eo colligat non modo brutas pecudes, ſed ipſa etiam corpora inanima, tamen anima quadam communi atque divina vel cœleſti vegetari, quæ niſi fallor à Virgilio mundi ſpiritus, ab hoc verbum internum, ſermo, ſpiritus, lux, potentia, vis, ac denique Filius ipſe Dei nominatur. Eam cùm hominum omnium animus communi quadam vi fovere, tum præſertim in piis viris facultatem quandam præcipuam ac ſingularem exerere. Eòque rectè illos vel Deos vel certè deificatos appellari. Quo ſenſu vult Chriſtum ipſum dici Filium Dei, cui Socratem ac Mercurium Triſmegiſtum, alioſque hujus farinæ nonnullos, tanquam æquales ac ſocios adjungit. Ejus infinitas blaſphemias ſtatuerunt quidam refutare, ſed hoc unum eos remoratur, quod haud ſatis illis conſtare poſſit quid de primo illo axiomate Servetico ex quo cætera omnia manant, ſit judicandum. Mihi certè haud dubium ſit, quin ex eo multa non modo falſa, ſed prorſus etiam impia conſequantur. Tamen neque Joannes Calvinus neque ex veteribus (quod quidem ſciam) quiſpiam argumenta ad illius ipſius refutationem ſuppeditat. Quinimò verò veteres illi Theologi videntur mihi præſentiam illam realem Divinæ eſſentiæ in immenſum plerunque extendiſſe (3). —— Sabaſtian Francus, a German, who heaped together in his miſcellaneous collections wonderful portents of this kind particularly in that book, which he entituled Paradoxes; wherein he urges that axiom of Servetus, concerning the real or eſſential preſence of GOD in all things and places, in ſuch a manner, as to gather from it, that not only brute beaſts, but even inanimate bodies, are vegetated by a certain common and divine or celeſtial ſoul; which, if I miſtake not is called, by Virgil, the ſpirit of the world, by him the internal word, the ſpeech, breath, light, power, force, and, laſtly, the ſon of GOD himſelf. He aſſerts, that this ſoul not only cheriſhes the minds of all men by a certain common energy, but exerts a particular force in good men: and that therefore they are rightly ſtyled Gods, or deified men: In which ſenſe he pretends, that Chriſt himſelf is called the ſon of GOD, with whom he joins, as equals and companions, Socrates, Mercurius Triſmegiſtus, and others of that ſtamp. Some perſons have reſolved to refute his many blaſphemies; but this one thing has hitherto ſtopped them, that they know not what to think of that firſt axiom of Servetus, from whence all the reſt flow. For my own part, I am convinced, that it is attended with many, not only falſe, but even impious conſequences. However, neither Calvin, nor any of the old writers (as far as I know) furniſh us with arguments for the confutation it. Nay, thoſe old divines ſeem to me for the moſt part, to have immenſely extended that real preſence of the divine eſſence.’ I omit what he ſays afterwards, and which ſhews, that the received opinion of the immenſity of God puzzled him, and ſeemed to him productive of many vain and empty notions. I paſs by likewiſe Beza's anſwers to him (4); but I will obſerve, by the by, that the opinions of the divines, which import, that the eſſence and ſubſtance of God is extended thro' all bodies, is liable to a thouſand difficulties. The Carteſians ſhew this very plainly. See what Mr Wittichius (5) obſerves againſt Suarez, who has endeavoured to explain how God may be preſent in imaginary ſpace. Mr Arnauld cenſured alſo a miniſter, who had made uſe of the received opinion, to prove, by an argument, ad hominem, that one might worſhip marble (6). The miniſter in his reply, ſaid ſeveral things, and among others this (7); that the divinity of Vaſques, according to which all inanimate and irrational things may be worſhipped, becauſe GOD is in all creatures by his eſſence, and ſuſtains

(a) Taken from Seckendorf, Lutheran. Hiſt. lib. iii, pag. 268, 269.

(b) Crenius, Animadv. Part. II, pag. 92.

(c) Pag. m. 746.

(d) Quia homo fuit deditus Swenckfeldii, phantaſiis, ideo mira ſubinde admiſcet. Keckerm de Hiſt. pag. 209.

(e) Spondan. Annal. ad ann. 1529, n. 9.

(1) King Chriſtiern the third's queen.

(2) Seckendorf. Hiſt. Lutheran. lib. ii, pag. 593, col. 1. ad ann. 1545.

(3) Epiſt. vi, Theod. Bezæ, Tom. III. Oper. pag. 206, 207.

(4) Ibid. Epiſt. vii, pag. 208, 209.

(5) Wittich. in Conſenſu Verit. pag. 86, &c. Edit. 1682.

(6) Arnauld, Reflexions ſur le Preſervatif, pag. 69, &c.

(7) The Janſeniſt convicted of vain ſophiſtry, pag. 194.

ſuſtains them, is ſhocking, but that it is by no means irrational, nor ill connected with his principles . . . . that ‘Vaſques* reaſons divinely on the ſubject of man according to the tenets of his church, in order to prove, that man, who is the lively image of the divinity, may be worſhiped with the act of adoration, by which we worſhip God (8).’ We ought not to wonder after this, that the Sieur St Aldegonde (9) feared the ill conſequences of the doctrine of Servetus, adopted by Sebaſtian Francus.

FRANGIPANI, a very antient Roman family, related to the beſt families of Europe [A], owes it's name to ſome extraordinary acts of charity to the poor in a famine [B]. It is long ago, ſince a branch of this illuſtrious family ſettled glorioūſly in Hungary [C]. Mutio FRANGIPANI ſerved in France, in the Pope's troops in the [A] A Roman family ... related to the beſt families of Europe.] Mr le Laboureur (1) ſays, that the marquis Frangipani, whom he had ſeen at Rome, reckoned, among the younger brothers of his family, the arch-dukes of Auſtria, and the kings of Spain, grounded on the opinion of Raphael Volterranus, which opinion he would have been ſorry to have been undeceived in; and that he was perpetually troubleſome to the new princes of Rome, by pretending to be of ſo ancient a family, that none could preſume to compare with his. This author, having deſcribed the equipage of the ſame marquis in a great ceremony (2), adds (3), that it gave him notions quite contrary to the eſteem, which is due to the firſt and moſt ancient name of Rome, and to the moſt illuſtrious family of Dalmatia and Frioul, ſince about the year 1120, when one of that houſe married the daughter of Engilbert marquis of Frioul, ſiſter to Mahaut, wife to Thibaut IV, earl of Champagne and Brie, aunt to Alice of Champagne, wife to Lewis the younger, and mother to Philip Auguſtus king of France. Zazzera, who hath written an hiſtory of ſeveral families of Italy, and who knew nothing of this alliance, adds another, which he proves, namely, with a niece of the emperor of Conſtantinople, who, in the year 1170, was ſent in great pomp, attended by ſeveral biſhops and great lords of Greece, to marry Eudo Frangipani. It appears by the hiſtory of this illuſtrious family, written by him, that it was the moſt powerful in Rome, and that they have ſeen there the riſe of the grandeur of all the others, whom the abuſes of the times engaged to take upon them the quality of princes. We ſhall ſee below (4), that the Frangipani pretend to be related to St Gregory.

[B] . . . . Owes it's name to ſome extraordinary acts of charity to the poor in a famine.] ‘Frangipani in Italy, bears azure, two hands argent, holding a loaf, or, cut into halves; becauſe one of his predeceſſors, in a time of dearth, relieved a vaſt number of indigent perſons.’ Thus father Gilbert de Varenne ſpeaks in his Theatre of Arms, and atchievements (5). They were at firſt called Fricapani, as it appears by theſe words of Geoffry of Vendoſme: ‘Primo anno, quo, deo volente vel permittente, nomen abbatis ſuſcepi, audivi piæ recordationis Dominum Papam Urbanum in domo Joannis Fricapanem latitare (6). ——— The firſt year, in which, by the will or permiſſion of GOD, I took upon me the name of abbot, I heard, that Pope Urban of pious memory lay concealed in the houſe of John Fricapani.’ See father Sirmond's note on this place (7). The name of Frangipani was already in vogue in the XIIth century; for theſe words are found in the chronicle of the monaſtery of Anchin (8): ‘Schiſmatici quietem non ferentes eccleſiæ, iterum quemdam Clericum de progenie illorum quos Frangipanes Romani vocant contra Papam Alexandrum, Antipapam ſtatuunt, quem mutato nomine, Innocentem III vocitarunt. —— The ſchiſmatics, not enduring the repoſe of the church, again ſet up, againſt Pope Alexander, an Anti-Pope, a certain eccleſiaſtic, of the race of thoſe, whom the people of Rome call Frangipani.’ Conrad, abbot of Urſperg, makes uſe of the word Frangentes panem. He ſpeaks thus: ‘Imperator convocavit ad ſe de civibus Romanis potentiſſimos & nobiliſſimos de familia eorum qui dicuntur Frangentes panem, & aliis ad quos præcipue habebat reſpectum populus Romanus (9). —— The emperor ſent for the moſt powerful and noble of the Roman citizens, of the family of the Frangentes panem, and of thoſe, to whom the people of Rome paid a particular regard’

[C] It is long ago, ſince a branch of this family ſettled glorioūſly in Hungary.] Scioppius produces an act, or deed, dated in the year 1260, whereby Bela, king of Hungary, acknowledges, that, when his country was laid waſte by the Tartars, he was aſſiſted and comforted by Frederic and Bartholomew Frangipani, who, with their relations, went into his ſervice, and aſſiſted him with a large ſum of money. And, for an acknowledgment, he tranſferred to them the poſſeſſion of a maritime town, with all the rights and lands that belonged to him. See page 215 of the book intituled, Oporini Grubinii Amphotides Scioppianæ. Scioppius affirms (10), that this act was communicated to him by George Antigonus Frangipani, gentleman of the bed-chamber, and great maſter of the horſe to the arch-duke Maximilian Erneſtus. Let us quote ſomething of it (11): ‘Deus totius conſolationis, qui conſolatur ſuos in omni tribulatione, etiam nobis fontem aperire dignatus eſt, & ad conſolandum nos Feldericum & Bartolomæum illuſtres & ſtrenuos viros de Frangipanibus, nobiles de Weglia quaſi de cœlo projecit, qui nobis cum omni parentela adhærentes inter actus promiſcuos, fideles exhibuerunt famulatus & non modicam pecuniam eorum, quæ ultra XX. marcarum millia tranſcendunt, in vaſis aureis & argenteis atque aliis rebus pretioſis nobis de bonis eorum præſentaverunt, & præſentando donaverunt. Demum nos, cum à nobis Deus ſuam indignationem amoverit, recompenſantes eorum ſervitia & dona, de conſilio dominæ Mariæ, chariſſimæ conſortis noſtræ, & Baronum noſtrorum fidelium, quandam civitatem noſtram, circa littus maris exiſtentem, Segniam vocatam, cum omnibus ſuis utilitatibus & pertinentiis univerſis, ſimul cum tributo ſeu Telonio, & aliis circumferentiis, & in eadem libertate, ſicut nobis ſervire conſueverant, dedimus & donavimus, & contulimus ipſis Felderico & Bartolomæo in filios filiorum perpetuo & irrevocabiliter poſſidendum. —— The GOD of all conſolation, who comforts his people in every diſtreſs, has vouchſafed to open a fountain even to us, and has ſent, as it were from heaven, to comfort us, Felderic and Bartholomew, illuſtrious and brave men, of the family of the Frangipani; nobles of Weglia, who, adhering to us with all kind of fatherly affection, have ſerved us faithfully, and given us no ſmall ſhare of their wealth, amounting to above 20,000 marks, in gold and ſilver veſſels, and other valuable things. In recompence for which ſervices and preſents, we, being reſtored to the favour of heaven, do, by the advice of our deareſt conſort Mary, and our faithful barons, give and beſtow, and have given and beſtowed, on Felderic and Bartholomew, and their heirs for ever, the poſſeſſion of one of our maritime towns, named SEGNIA, with all it's profits and appurtenances, together with the tribute or toll, as hitherto paid to us.’ This prince, by another deed, granted them ſeveral privileges and immunities, and gave ſome reaſons for it, that are very honourable; which obliges me to quote his words. They are ſo many hiſtorical facts, fit to be inſerted in this place: ‘Deus ad refulciendum & corroborandum nos, Feldericum & Bartholomæum de Frangipanibus, illuſtres & ſtrenuos viros, nobiles de Weglia alta ex proſapia urbis Romanæ ſenatorum ortos, tanquam angelos protectionis de arce polorum miſit, qui nobis cum eorum parentela & familiarium caterva armigera in opem & noſtræ perſonæ ſaluberrimam tutelam adhærendo, per eorum ſtrenua certamina, quoſdam ductores ipſorum Tartarorum, ſequaceſque eorum diræ necis exterminio necari, & quoſdam captos nobis offerre, ubi etiam crebra ſtigmata & gravia ſuſtulere & multos ex eorum charis proximos & familiares amittere, ſupraque omnibus prænarratis copioſam pecuniarum ipſorum in auro etiam & argento ac rebus pretioſis quantitatem ad XX. millia marcarum ſe extendentem nobis pro aſſumendis ſtipendiariis & expeditionibus variis offerre maluerunt, &c (12). —— GOD, in order to reſtore and ſtrengthen us, ſent from heaven, as guardian angels, Felderic and Bartholomew Frangipani, illuſtrious and brave men, nobles of Weglia, in the reign of Charles IX [D]. One of his grand-children had ſome employments in the ſame kingdom in Lewis XIIIth's time (a). One of his jeſts was made uſe of, and, he who uſed it, was ſeverely cenſured for it [E]. This grand-child of Mutio Frangipani invented the compoſition for perfume and ſcents, which yet retain the name of Frangipane (b) [F]. He thought it an honour to be the laſt of that illuſtrious name, and did not ſtick to ſay, that he kept himſelf ſingle out of neceſſity, becauſe his quality did not allow him to mix his blood with upſtarts, wherewith the ancient majeſty of Rome had been diſhonoured (c). The equipage, wherein he appeared at Rome in a ſolemn cavalcade, was remarkable [G].

---

* In iii Thom. Diſp. cx, Quæſt. xxv, cap. iii.

(8) Janſeniſt convicted, &c. pag. 195.

(9) Epiſt vi, Theod. Bezæ, pag. 207.

(1) Additions to the Memoires of Caſtelnau, Tom. II, pag. 704.

(2) See the remark [G].

(3) Ibid. pag. 705.

(4) In remark [F].

(5) Apud Menagium, Origini della Lingua Italiana, pag. 231.

(6) Godefrid. Vindocinenſis, lib. i, epiſt. viii, apud Menagium ibid.

(7) Vetuſtiſſimæ ac nobiliſſimæ apud Romanos familiæ nomen nunc paululum inflexum; Frangipanes enim dicuntur. Sirmondus, Not. in epiſt. viii, lib. i. Godefr. Vindoc. apud Menag. ibid.

(8) Ad. ann. 1179, apud Menag. Ibid.

(9) Conrad. Abbas Urſperg. ad ann. 1227, apud Menag. Ib.

(10) Scioppius, Amphot. pag. 214.

(11) Ib. pag. 218.

(12) Apud Scioppium, Amphotid. pag. 217, 218.

‘ lia, deſcended from the high anceſtry of Roman ſenators; who, ſtanding by us with their protection, and an armed force of their friends, fought bravely in our defence, killed ſome of the Tartar generals, ſlaughtered part of their army, and brought us others priſoners; in which actions, they were not only often and dangerouſly wounded, but loſt many of their neareſt relations and friends; and, beſides the abovementioned ſervices, preſented us, for the hire of troops, and for various expeditions, a large ſum of money, in gold and ſilver, and other valuable things, amounting to 20,000 marcs, &c.’ See, in the ſupplement to Moreri's dictionary, the tragical end of a great lord of Hungary, called Frangipani, who had plotted againſt the emperor, in the year 1671.

[D] Mutio Frangipani ſerved in France . . . . in the reign of Charles IX.] ‘The Pope concerning himſelf mightily in the wars about religion in France, ſeveral great Italian lords paſſed the Alps: ſome were officers of the forces, which he ſent; others, to ſhew their reſpect to that crown, ſerved as volunteers. The lord Mutio Frangipani thought, that he was the more obliged to engage himſelf in that expedition, becauſe he was a partizan of France, and had there a great many relations by his wife Julia Strozzi, ſiſter to the counteſs of Fieſque, who had beſides the honour of being related to the queen. He gave ſome proofs of his bravery in the battle of Jarnac, where he was wounded; and afterwards he returned home, to enjoy quietly the glory, which he had acquired in that war (13).’

[E] One of his jeſts was made uſe of, and he, who uſed it, was ſeverely cenſured for it.] Coſtar, writing to Mr Colbert (14), made uſe of the following expreſſions: ‘How would you have me go to court? I have been almoſt theſe five years in the country, becauſe I am not ſtrong enough to bear the fatigue of Paris, and to repair to thoſe places, where one muſt ſhew a great deal of reſpect, and where one muſt continually be in that troubleſome poſture, which ſeemed intolerable to the marquis de Frangipani, when he was at the French court; which made him ſay pleaſantly, Star ſempre dritto è ſcapellato: — You know the reſt, Sir; or, if you do not know it, you muſt not expect to be informed of it by an archdeacon (15).' Let us ſee how he was cenſured for this. ‘Theſe words need no explanation, ſince every body underſtands them. It is an old jeſt, which all thoſe, who glory in their leudneſs, do often repeat; and, if my antagoniſt hath been aſhamed to explain it, who will undertake it (16)?’

[F] He invented the perfume and ſcents, which yet retain the name of Frangipane.] Here follows what Menage ſays of it (17). ‘Da uno di que' Signori Frangipani, (l'abbiam veduto qui in Parigi) furono chiamati certi guanti porfumati, Guanti di Frangipani. Ludovico Balzacio in una ſua lettera à madama Deſloges: yeſterday he ſaw himſelf willingly your tributary, and engaged to ſend you every year a pretty good quantity of his paſtils. If you find them good, they will be in more repute than the gloves of Frangipani. But, becauſe your people of Limouſin might here miſtake, pray give them notice, that this Perfumer is worth above thirty thouſand livres a year, and hath the firſt dignity of this province; and that his Glover is a Roman lord, who is mareſchal de camp of the king's armies, and related to St Gregory the great; and, what I value more than all this, he is one of the honeſteſt men in the world.’ Menage quotes afterwards theſe Latin verſes of Ceriſantes, which are very pretty.

Amice, nil me, ſicut antea, juvat
Pulvere vel Cyprio Comam nitentem pectere,
Vel quas Britannus texuit ſubtiliter,
Mille modis varias jactare ventis tœnias:
Vel quam perunxit Frangipanes ipſemet,
Pelle manum gracilem coram puellis promere (18).

Whilom a fop, thoſe arts I now give o'er,
The powder fetch'd from Cyprus' diſtant ſhore,
The various fillet, pendent from behind,
By Britons wove, and floating in the wind,
The lady-hand, ſo ſmooth, ſo white, and ſpare,
From glove drawn off produc'd to court the fair,
And breathing Frangipane his ſcented air.

[G] The equipage, wherein he appeared at Rome . . . was remarkable.] Mr le Laboureur, an eye-witneſs, ſpeaks of it after this manner: ‘I cannot forbear adding concerning this laſt marquis of Frangipani, that I ſaw him once at the cavalcade, which is performed on St Peter's day, to conduct the Pope from the Vatican to Montecavallo, very well mounted, and gracefully ſitting on horſeback, but not in a garb ſuitable to this ſolemnity, which is altogether warlike, and which was celebrated by firing all the guns of the caſtle of St Angelo. He was cloathed in black taffety, with a cloak upon his ſhoulders, tucked up under his arm, his cloaths of the ſame ſtuff, with hanging ſleeves to his doublet, ſitting on a deep ſaddle, with ſilk ſtockings, and garters roſe-wiſe, and a ſwitch in his hand. I made it my buſineſs to be ſure, that it was he, though I knew him; becauſe I thought it ſtrange, that he ſhould publickly appear ſo like a citizen on ſo ſolemn an occaſion (19).’

FRATRICELLI, heretics, who appeared in Italy towards the end of the XIIIth century. They performed their devotions in private places, where they met in the night-time; and, after they had ſung ſome hymns, they put out the candles, and every one laid hold of a woman, as he was directed by chance (a). The children, that were begot by this commerce, were brought into the aſſembly, and handed round about till they expired. He, in whoſe hands they expired, was choſen high-prieſt. They burned one of thoſe children, and put the aſhes in a veſſel, in which they poured wine, which they gave to drink to thoſe they initiated into their brotherhood. They exclaimed againſt the property of goods; and maintained, that the faithful ought not to meddle with magiſtracy, and that the ſouls of the bleſſed ſhall not ſee GOD till after the reſurrection (b). Madam des Jardins traces this Sect to a very probable origin [A]; for 'tis hard to believe, but that moſt of thoſe religious hypocrites, who ſet

[A] Madam des Jardins traces this ſect to a very probable origin.] She ſuppoſes (1), ‘that the report of their amorous atchievements having given the alarm to jealous huſbands, they encreaſed the number of their ſpies, ſo that this commerce was abſolutely interrupted. Some young people were extremely concerned at this reformation. . . . . Seeing therefore, that the noiſe their public gallantry made was the cauſe

---

(a) See, in the remark [F], Balzac's words.

(b) Le Laboureur, Addition to the Memoirs of Caſtelnau, Tom. II, pag. 705, wherein the marquis of Frangipani, his own brother, is ſaid to have been a partner in this invention.

(c) Id. ib. pag. 704.

(13) Le Laboureur, Addit. à Caſtelnau, Tom. II, pag. 704.

(14) He was then only ſteward of cardinal Mazarin's houſe.

(15) Coſtar, cited by Girac, Reply, pag. 27.

(16) Girac. ibid.

(17) Origini della Ling. Italiana. pag 231.

(18) Taken from an ode which he addreſſed to Voiture, and which has been printed at the end of Balzac's Letters.

(19) Le Laboureur, ubi ſupra, pag. 705.

(a) Noctu in abditis locis ſacra operari ſoliti, poſt quoſdam hymnos ſeu cantilenas, extinctis luminibus promiſcuis ac fortuitis coïtibus ſeſe inquinabant. Spondanus, ad ann. 1297, n. 9. He quotes Sabellic. 9, en. 7. Prateolus, Sanderus, Gualtier.

(b) Idem Spondanus, ibid.

(1) Annales Galantes, III Part. Hiſt. VII, pag. 156. Holl. Edit. 1677.

ſet up conventicles under pretence of reformation, have a deſign upon women. They perſuade themſelves, that the fair ſex will eaſily fall into the ſnare, and that their inclination to the outward exerciſes of religion, as well as to thoſe of nature, which maintains an admirable correſpondence with the other, will furniſh them with means to bend women to whatſoever they ſhall pleaſe.

In order to obſerve the rule, that we ought to hear both parties, Audi & alteram partem, I ought to note in this place, that an illuſtrious Proteſtant gives us to underſtand, that the Fratricelli were not guilty of the enormities, that were laid to their charge [B]; but that the true reaſon, both of the calumnies, that were ſpread abroad againſt them, and of the rigour, with which they were perſecuted, was, becauſe they taught tenets, which claſhed with Popery. The anſwer, which has been made to that Proteſtant, will inform us, that, according to ſome authors, the Fratricelli did not lie with women, to enjoy them, but only to render their continence more meritorious [C]. We muſt not forget, that ſeveral of them called themſelves Friars of the order

‘ cauſe of that diſorder, they reſolved to make love by ſtealth, and, to ſave the appearances, which alarmed huſbands, they affected to live in retirement; they ſtudied a mortified outſide, and, forming a new religious order, under the name of Fratricelli, or Little brethren, they quickly gained ſo much reverence by the piety they ſeemed to practiſe, that they were looked upon as new anchorets. Some of the moſt ſuſpicious huſbands, and whoſe ſpouſes were none of the chaſteſt, had the curioſity to ſee thoſe devout men. People, diſtracted with domeſtic cares, make great uſe of conferences; and ſo, finding the converſation of the Fratricelli very edifying, there was none of them but hoped, from their charitable remonſtrances, the entire converſion of the moſt coquetiſh wives. They were impatient to return home, to cry up the new order; and the women, looking upon all the pretences of viſits as ſo many ſteps towards liberty, ſhewed as great a deſire to ſee the Fratricelli, as the huſbands had they ſhould go to them. Thus our Fratricelli received agreeable viſits, with which the huſbands were very well pleaſed; for, in order to eſtabliſh their new dominion, they preached up nothing but the keeping conjugal faith, the bounden obedience of wives towards their huſbands, and many other wholſome precepts, all very neceſſary towards domeſtic peace, and very edifying to married men: but, becauſe what was proper to be ſaid to the one, was not agreeable to the other, they exhorted the ladies to come and ſee them in private: In order, ſaid they, that we may put the axe to the root of the tree, and work effectually their entire converſion. They found no difficulty in obtaining from the wives that mark of their deference; they had much rather come to their ſermons, than be confined at home; and, finding the ſecret inſtructions of the Fratricelli not ſo hard to be practiſed, as thoſe of common ghoſtly fathers, they received them with docility, and ſubmitted to them without reluctancy.’

An Inquiry into the cauſes, which draw ſo many women to fraternities of auſtere devotion.

It is a truth, confirmed by the experience of all ages, that one of the ſureſt means to draw the ſex, and make them run after men, is to ſet up fraternities of an auſtere reformation, and to make a great ſhew of ſtrict devotion in certain conventicles. Thoſe, who trace events to their cauſes, have not forgot to meditate on the reaſons of this. They divide into two principal claſſes thoſe female ſcholars. Some go to that ſchool out of a good principle; being led by devotion, which is innate to the ſex: others have heard a thouſand times, that there is a great deal of hypocriſy in theſe religious founders, that they are men like the reſt, and that they play the hypocrites, only to make love without ſcandal, and under the cloak of ſecrecy. Without doubt, the following ſong has a long time been ſung all over the world, though in other terms.

. . . Bourgeois de Sodome,
Voyant Dom Côme
Dit en courroux,
Ces bigots ſont tous en priere,
Ils ſont tous au ciel les yeux doux,
L'oraiſon ne leur ſert de guiere,
En amour ils ſont tous
Moins bêtes & plus fripons que nous.

A burgher of Sodom, ſeeing Dom Côme, ſaid in a paſſion; theſe bigots are all at their prayers; they ſweetly look upon heaven; but their praying is to little purpoſe; for in love they are more politic, and leſs ſcrupulous than we.

This is the reaſon a woman hopes to find a lucky hour among thoſe pretenders to devotion, and is eager to put herſelf under their direction, with whom ſhe may loſe nothing with regard to pleaſure, and get a great deal as to her reputation. Women even hope, that, in caſe ſuch men ſhould not be hypocrites, they may have the addreſs powerſully and victoriouſly to tempt them; for, of all vices, none is more untameable and ungovernable than concupiſcence (2). As for the ſhe-ſcholars of the other claſs, they conceive ſo great a veneration, and even ſo great an affection for the pretended man of GOD, that they blind themſelves in his favour. If he finds it neceſſary to perſuade them that there is no ſin in doing ſome things, he inſenſibly turns them that way, and at worſt their tenderneſs does not ſuffer them to reſiſt his deſires. However it be, there never was a head of a ſect, nor a founder of a conventicle, let the things practiſed there be never ſo abominable, but found very tractable diſciples among the other ſex (3): and when we ſee how ſollicitous theſe men are to draw in women, one muſt have a great deal of charity not to believe, that the ſcope of their devotion rather centres in the body, which they have received from nature, than in the ſalvation of their ſoul.

[B] An illuſtrious Proteſtant gives us to underſtand, that the Fratricelli were not guilty of the enormities laid to their charge.] Mr du Pleſſis looks upon them as a branch of the Vaudois: But beſides, ſays he (4), that the Vaudois continued in France, we trace them into Italy and Germany, by their own blood, which was ſpilt by the inquiſitors. In Italy, where Boniface exterminated, by all manner of ſeverities, thoſe they called Fratricelli, brethren, whoſe teachers were Gerard Sagarelli of Parma, and Dulcino of Novarra, diſciples of Herman, who was eſteemed a ſaint in Italy, and was afterwards dug up by Boniface at Ferrara. Thoſe poor people, to whom, according to cuſtom, they impute a thouſand infamous enormities, but who, in truth, taught, that the Pope was Antichriſt, and the church of Rome the Babylon of the Revelations; thoſe pretended inſpired men reproved ſeveral Romiſh abuſes and traditions; and their being perſecuted by Boniface, one of the moſt leud and prophane Popes that ever was, ought to make us preſume that it was not on account of leudneſs. We find them alſo at the ſame time in Germany.

[C] The Fratricelli did not lie with women, to enjoy them, but only to render their continence more meritorious.] Coëffeteau, anſwering that paſſage of the Myſtery of Iniquity, affirms (5), ‘ that the very favourers of the Waldenſes and Albigenſes, and even of theſe Fratricelli, relate ſome things of them, which render the depoſitions of others probable:’ Let us hear how Vigniere ſpeaks of them. ‘ Pope Clement (ſays he) * being informed, that the aſſemblies and congregations of thoſe they called Fratricelli, who dwelled in the mountains of Piedmont and Lombardy, and even in the neighbourhood of Verceil and Novara, increaſed more and more, inſomuch that they could not be diſperſed, cauſed the Jacobins and Franciſcans to preach a cruſade againſt them: ſo that a great number of croyſes went in queſt of them in their mountains, where they deſtroyed, that year, either by the ſword, hunger, or cold, above 400, and burnt 140 of them; among whom was found their principal miniſter Dul- ‘ cin, order of St Francis. Bzovius, who affected to make that remark, was cenſured for it by the Franciſcans. We ſhall ſee part of what has been ſaid in his juſtification [D]. Neither muſt we paſs over in ſilence, that Prateolus, who warmly affirms all the ill reports, that have been ſpread againſt the Fratricelli, confeſſes, that they oppoſed the court of Rome, and the papal authority [E].

---

(2) What Seneca ſays in general, Nunquam bona fide vitia manſueſcunt, is applicable in a particular manner to this.

(3) See the remark [A] of the article GUILLELMA.

(4) Du Pleſſis Mornai, Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 412. He quotes Guido Perpinia. de Hereſib. Blond. dec. ii, lib. ix, Guillau. de Nangis.

(5) Coëffeteau, Rêponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, pag. 1015, 1016.

* Vig. pag. 3, of the Biblioth. Hiſt. in the year 1308.

cin, and his wife Margaret, who were alſo put to death. Some call them Dulcins, becauſe of the ſaid Dulcin; others, Fratricelli, becauſe they called one another brethren; and the women, who accompanied them, ſiſters in JESUS CHRIST; with whom, Platina and other hiſtorians ſay, they cohabited, and whored promiſcuouſly, in their conventicles, after the manner of thoſe called Adamites and Nicolaites, putting out the candles: but the Mer des Hiſtoires ſays only, that they did not ſcruple to lie together, without knowing one another carnally, eſteeming ſuch a continence as meritorious, as the raiſing one from the dead, &c. Does not this lying together, and beſtial indifference, make their leudneſs more than probable, unleſs we ſuppoſe them to have been marble? but Vignier flatters them as well as du Pleſſis. The common opinion is, that they defiled themſelves with a thouſand infamous impurities, for which they deſerved to be exterminated as monſters, that diſhonoured the chriſtian religion. Maſſeus, ſo often quoted by du Pleſſis, ſpeaks of them in theſe words: † In 1308, in Lent, were taken above 400 Dulcins, in the mountains of Novara, and the neighbourhood of Verceil. Now theſe were the remains of thoſe, whom St Bernard mentions, on the Song of Solomon. They mingled promiſcuouſly, men and women lying in the ſame bed: the men ſaying, that they kept women company in order to make their own continence more meritorious, by paſſing by thoſe occaſions of ſinning, and leaving them virgins, &c.' I omit ſome faults, which have been taken notice of. Rivet, replying to Coëffeteau, declares himſelf the apologiſt of the Fratricelli: he does not confeſs, that they endeavoured to ſignalize their continence by lying near a woman, without going further; he owns, that, if they had done ſo, they had been to blame; but however, he does in ſome meaſure extenuate the fault. Theſe are his words (6): 'The witneſſes againſt the Fratricelli agree like the witneſſes of Suſanna: what Vignier writes, and what Coëffeteau takes from him, is a proof of it: for what Platina imputes to them is more than what the Mer des Hiſtoires ſays of them. And, though I will not approve, that men and women ſhould lie together without ſcruple, to make their continence more painful, and conſequently more commendable; yet Coëffeteau might have found ſuch a proceeding warranted in antiquity by ſeveral eccleſiaſtics, againſt whom Cyprian and Jerome exclaimed: for they had their Agapetæ, and companions of celibacy, with whom they lay, as we have ſaid elſewhere: however, we do not own what is ſaid of them in that Mer des Hiſtoires, which is often a ſink of lies.' Obſerve by the bye, that the miſconduct imputed to Robert d'Arbriſſel is very antient, and that it would be common to him with many, who have lived both before and after him.

[D] We ſhall ſee part of what has been ſaid in Bzovius's juſtification.] The complaints of the Franciſcans, together with their anſwers and apologies, are found (7) in the book intituled, Nitela Franciſcanorum contra Bzovium; and in Wadding, in the third tome of the Annals of the Friars Minors (8). The reply for Bzovius is found in the writings of a dominican, called Nicolas Janſenius; to which I refer my readers; contenting myſelf to ſay, that father Vincent Baron has ſhewn, by the teſtimony of Oderic Raynaldus, the continuator of Baronius, that the Fratricelli had obtained confirmations and privileges of Pope Celeſtine V, in the quality of monks of the order of St Francis. 'Illi (Bzovio) aſſentitur . . . . . Odericus Raynaldus tomo quinto decimo ſuorum annalium ad ann. 1317. n. 56. & ſequent. ita habet: variæ fuerunt fratricellorum ſectæ; & certum eſt ex extravag. Joannis XXII. Sancta Rom. de Relig. Domib. fratricellorum alios prætexuiſſe, habitum ſe, & vitæ ritum ab epiſcopis, aut eccleſiarum prælatis accepiſſe; alios jactaſſe ſe tertii ordinis ſancti Franciſci, pœnitentium vocati, habitum induiſſe; finxiſſe alios ordinem fratrum Minorum profiteri, & ſancti Franciſci regulam ad literam obſervare, & objecto eo fuco, ipſos à Cæleſtino quinto hujuſmodi vitæ, & ſtatus privilegium obtinuiſſe: quamvis ea ratio non valeat; cum Bonifacius octavus conceſſa à Cæleſtino reſciderit, ac poſteriori decreto ſtandum eſſet. Hæc Odericus (9). —— With Bzovius agrees . . . . Odericus Raynaldus, in the fifteenth tome of his Annals, under the year 1317, n. 56. &c. he has theſe words: There were many ſects of the Fratricelli; and it is certain from the Extravagant of John XXII, that, of the Fratricelli, ſome pretended to have received their habit and manner of life from the biſhops or prelates of the church; others boaſt, that they have taken upon them the habit of the third order of St Frantis, called the Penitents; others pretended to profeſs the order of Friars Minors, and to obſerve punctually the rule of St Francis; and, by this pretence, they obtained of Pope Celeſtine V their privileges; although this reaſon is of no avail, ſince Boniface VIII annulled the grant of Celeſtine, and they were obliged to abide by the latter decree.' He quotes alſo this paſſage of Alvares Pelagius, a Franciſcan monk. Multi ſæculares & Fratres Minores pro iſto carnali ſpiritu libertatis, per inquiſitores hæreticæ pravitatis incarcerati fuerunt (10). Note, that this paſſage of Raynaldus confirms what Hoſpinian obſerves, that the Popes have varied in their judgments about the Fratricelli: 'De Fratricellis à Johanne XXII. condemnatis, à Gregorio XI. & Eugenio approbatis, refert Hoſpinianus de Monachis, lib. 6. cap. 32. Vides judiciorum Papalium auctoritatem (11). —— Hoſpinian, de Monachis, lib. 6. c. 32. gives an account of the Fratricelli, condemned by John XXII, and approved by Gregory XI, and Eugenius. You ſee the authority of Papal decrees.'

[E] Prateolus, who warmly affirms all the ill reports . . . . againſt the Fratricelli, confeſſes that they oppoſed the court of Rome, and the Papal authority.] What he relates is intermixed with ſeveral things, that are not mentioned in our preceding remarks; wherefore I think I ought to copy it, the better to ſhew what has been ſaid of theſe heretics. 'Some, who would be thought of the third order of St Francis's inſtitution, and who were called by the Italians, in the kingdom of Sicily, and province of Narbonne, Fratriculi, or Fratricelli, or Fratres de paupere vita, or Biſochi, or Beguini, and other names, were at that time accuſed and condemned of hereſy, by Pope Boniface VIII; though ſome ſay they were ſo firſt by Pope John XXII. They contemned the ſacraments of the church; and ſaid, that it was not lawful for chriſtians to hold any thing in property, nor to meddle with the adminiſtration and government of commonwealths; and that the ſouls of the bleſſed did not enjoy the ſight of God till the laſt day. In their aſſemblies, (like the Adamites now-a-days, who ſay that all women are common) after the celebration of their myſteries, they indulged carnal luſt, contrary to conjugal chaſtity, with the next woman that came to hand; which they did by night, after having put out the candles. The chroniclers relate, how thoſe, who were of that ſect, were diſcovered, to wit, by a merchant of Milan, named Conrad; who, ſeeing, that his wife often roſe in the night, had a mind to know whither ſhe went, and why ſhe got up. He therefore followed her once ſecretly, and went into their ſynagogue; where, after their myſteries were performed, and the candles put out, holding her cloſe, he enjoyed her, and took a ring off her finger for a token, and afterwards declared it to the reſt, and informed the inquiſitor of the faith of it. All the women, who were of that ſect, had a crown like the clerks and monks, and thereby were all diſcovered. See the ſupplement to the Chronicles. They ſaid alſo, that the power of the church, by reaſon of the ill morals of the eccleſiaſtics, had been a long time made void and extinguiſhed; that they were the only church of God; that they imitated the apoſtles; that the church of Rome was a whore; and that the Popes, from Sylveſter, the firſt of that name, had all been wicked, as not having lived in poverty; and that therefore people ought not to pay tithes to them. They were ſo impudent, that they ſaid, that one Margaret, concubine to one of their principal preachers and miniſters, named Dulcinus, had conceived by the Holy Ghoſt (12).'

---

† Maſſæ. Ch. Mund. lib. xvii.

(6) Rivet, Remarques ſur la Rêponſe au Myſtere d'Iniquité, Part. II, pag. 478.

(7) Ad. ann. 1317.

(8) Ad ann. 1317.

(9) Vincent. Baronius, Apologet. lib iv, ſect. iii, art ii, pag. 107.

(10) Alvar. Pelagius, de Planctu Eccleſiæ, lib. ii, cap lii, apud Vinc. Baron. ibid. pag. 108.

(11) Giſb. Voëtius, deſperata cauſa Papatus, pag. 211.

(12) Du Preau (or Prateolus), Hiſt. de l'Eſtat & Succés de l'Egliſe, Tom. II, fol. 2, verſo, & fol. 3, ad ann. 1303.

FRAUWENLOB (Henry), a German author, who died at Mentz, in 1317. His funeral was very ſingular. The women carried his corps from his houſe to the great church, filled the ſtreets with their lamentable cries and complaints, and poured ſo great a quantity of wine on his grave, that it over-flowed the church: All which they did in acknowlegment of the praiſes he had beſtowed on their ſex in his books. See the remark [A].

[A] See the remark.] This article is taken from Albertus Argentinenſis, one of the writers of the hiſtory of Germany (1), whoſe words I am ſure the reader will not be diſpleaſed to ſee here: ‘Anno Domini 1317. ‘ſepultus eſt Henricus dictus Frauwenlob in Moguntia ‘in ambitu majoris eccleſiæ . . . . qui deportatus fuit ‘à mulieribus ex hoſpitio uſque ad locum ſepulturæ, ‘& lamentationes & querelæ maximæ auditæ fuerunt ‘ab eis propter laudes infinitas quas impoſuit omni ‘generi fœmineo in dictaminibus ſuis. Tanta etiam ibi ‘copia fuit vini fuſa in ſepulcrum ſuum quod circumfluebat per totum ambitum eccleſiæ.’

(1) He is in the collection of the Scriptores Rerum Germanicarum, by Urſtiſius.

FREIGIUS (John Thomas) grand-ſon of a peaſant, and ſon of a civilian [A], lived in the XVIth century. He was born at Friburg in the Briſgaw, and acquired great reputation by his learned works. He ſtudied the law in his own country under the famous Zaſius, and he had likewiſe for maſters Henry Glarean, and Peter Ramus. He addicted himſelf extremely to the principles and method of the latter. He taught firſt at Friburg, and afterwards at Baſil; but meeting with ill ſucceſs, he was near breaking with the Muſes, and retiring into the country. He was revolving this deſign in his thoughts, when the ſenate of Nuremberg, at the inſtigation of Jerom Wolfius, offered him the rectorſhip of the new college of Altorf. This poſt became vacant by the death of Valentine Erythreus the firſt who had enjoyed it. He took poſſeſſion of this employment the thirtieth of November 1575. He diſcharged his duty in it zealouſly, in explaining the hiſtorians, the poets, and the inſtitutes of Juſtinian, &c. He returned to Baſil, and died there of the plague in the year 1583 (a) [B]. This contagious diſtemper had a little before deprived him of a ſon of great hopes, and two daughters, one of whom had already made ſome progreſs in learning [C]. He publiſhed

(a) Taken from Melchior Adam, in Vitis Juriſcon. pag. 252, & ſeq.

[A] He was grandſon of a peaſant, and ſon of a civilian.] This civilian's name was Nicolas Freigius: his father was an honeſt countryman, or husbandman, who lived near Baſil.

Me pater agreſti genuit ſub rure colonus,
  Hic ubi Rauriacos Rhenus adurget agros (1).

A cottage gave me birth, my ſire a clown,
Where the Rhine rolls it's rapid waters down.

His inclination to ſtudy lead him on as far as the degree of doctor in law. He married at Friburg in the Briſgaw; he made himſelf known to the public, by procuring editions of ſome of the works of Zaſius. He exerciſed the profeſſion of an advocate at Enſheim in Alſace, and from thence went with his family to Ulm, and was there one of the counſellors of the town. He died there of a dropſy in the year 1550: his wife buried him in a convent of nuns at Sefflingen near Ulm. Melchior Adam recites the Latin verſes of John Thomas Freigius (2), which contain the aforeſaid particulars; yet he had juſt before ſaid, that Nicolas Freigius ſurvived his wife, who died in the year 1564 (3); & matrem quidem primo amiſit (Jo. Thomas Freigius) peſte ſublatam cum duabus ſororibus (4) anno Chriſti milleſimo, quingenteſimo, ſexageſimo, quarto. Has ſubſecutus eſt pater. If he had conſidered the following verſes, he would have known, that they were written in the year 1564, fourteen years after the death of Nicolas Freigius.

Hic jam namque, pater, bis ſeptimus ingruit annus,
  Ex quo te triſti fata tulere nece (5).

Now twice ſeven years their mournful courſe have run,
Since death, my father, tore thee from thy ſon.

Moreri has committed ſeveral faults: for he ſays, I. that Nicolas Freigius died of the plague: II. that it was in the year 1564: III. that it was with his wife, IV. and with two of his daughters (6); V. that he had made great diſcoveries in both civil and canon-law; VI. that his ſon ſtudied law under the greateſt men of his time. This is falſely to ſuppoſe, that Glareanus and Ramus taught him law. VII. He gives him the chriſtian name Thomas; whereas he ought to call him John Thomas.

(1) Jo. Th. Freigius, Triſtium Libro, Eleg. iv, pag. m. 366. He introduces his father ſpeaking. Taken from Melc. Adam, ubi ſupra.

(2) Taken from Elegy IV, which I have juſt now cited.

(3) Melch. Adam, ubi ſupra.

(4) It ſhould be cum tribus. See the third Elegy of John Thomas Freigius.

(5) Joh. Thomas Freigius, Eleg. 4, Libri Triſtium, pag. 365.

(6) Three died with the mother.

[B] He died of the plague, in 1583.] On the ſixteenth of January, if we believe Melchior Adam, who adds, that, according to others, it was in 1582. The epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque (7) affirms, that he died in the college of Altorf, in the year 1582. I believe Melchior Adam is not miſtaken, and that there is a fault in the date of the epiſtle dedicatory of Joan. Thomæ Freigii Quæſtiones Geometricæ & Stereometricæ. The author himſelf dedicates this work to ſix mathematicians his good friends. It is a book, which was printed at Baſil, by Sebaſtian Henricpetri, in the month of March 1583. The epiſtle dedicatory is dated from Baſil the firſt of March of the ſame year. This cannot agree with an advertiſement at the end of the book. This advertiſement relates to the elegies, which Freigius publiſhed in the year 1564, and of which he made a new edition, which was added to the Quæſtiones Geometricæ, &c. He dedicates this new edition to his two ſons, and dates his epiſtle dedicatory at Baſil the laſt of December 1582. The advertiſement informs us, that, during the re-printing theſe elegies, the author was ſeized with the plague, and that it carried him off at the end of forty hours, on the ſixteenth of January. It adds, that the two ſons, to whom the work was dedicated, died of the ſame diſtemper eight days after. The date of the impreſſion at the bottom of the page is this month of March 1583.

[C] The plague had deprived him of a ſon, of great hopes, and two daughters, one of whom had already made ſome progreſs in learning.] He tells us this in the epiſtle dedicatory of the ſecond edition of his elegies. ‘Cum hoc anno, ſays he, to his two ſons, ſorores duas veſtras Urſulam & Barbaram, ac fratrem ‘Matthiam peſte acerba nobis ex oculis eripuiſſet (fatum meum) &c . . . . amiſi ego in Barbara noſtra ‘Oeconomiæ meæ fidelem adminiſtram & diſpenſatricem: amiſiſtis vos in eadem ſtudiorum veſtrorum ‘ſociam: quæ ſi diutius hujus lucis uſura frui potuiſſet, ‘aliam Cæliam (8), aliam Fulviam Moratam habuiſſemus. Jam enim puella XII ferè annorum Latinæ & ‘Græcæ Grammaticæ, aliarumque artium rudimenta ‘ita peragraverat, ut Latinè quædam ex vernaculo ‘ſermone convertere, Græce declinare & conjugare, ‘precationem Dominicam Hebraicè recitare, poëtarum ‘verſus ſcandere, Arithmeticos numeros addere & ſubducere, Muſicas melodias artificioſè canere, teſtudinem tractare poſſet. Hanc Matthias frater, puer ſeptem annorum non longe ſecutus eſt, qui qua fuit naturali indole præditus, ſororem paucis annis ſupe-

(7) Pag. m. 503.

(8) See remark [C] of the article CURION.

liſhed many books [D]. Mr Moreri has committed ſome faults (b).

‘raſſet. Is mane quamprimum è ſomno experrectus erat ſtatim ad libros ultro ſe transferebat, & aut Geographicas tabulas aut urbes, homines, animalia tam ſolerter, tamque graphicè depingebat: in abaco Pythagoræ tam ſtudioſe ſe exercebat, ut vos ad laudem puerilis & præcocis ingenii, ejus manuum monumenta conſervare ſoliti ſitis, ego vero mihi omnia ſumma polliceri de eo auſus fuerim. — When I had the ill fortune this year, to loſe, by the plague, your two ſiſters Urſula and Barbara, and your brother Matthias, &c . . . . I loſt in my daughter Barbara a faithful manager of my family concerns; and you both loſt, in her, a companion of your ſtudies, whom if heaven had thought fit to ſpare, we ſhould have had in her another Cælia, and an other Fulvia Morata. For, though but a girl of twelve years of age, ſhe had made ſuch a progreſs in Latin and Greek, and other ſciences, that ſhe could tranſlate ſome things out of the vulgar tongue into Latin, decline and conjugate Greek, repeat the Lord's prayer in Hebrew, ſcan poetry, add and ſubſtract in arithmetic, ſing according to the rules of muſic, and handle the lyre. Her brother Matthias, a boy of ſeven years of age, came not far behind her, who had ſo great a genius, that, in a few years, he would have ſurpaſſed his ſiſter. The moment he waked in a morning, he went of his own accord to his books, and ſkillfully drew either maps, or towns, or men, or animals: he ſo ſtudiouſly exerciſed himſelf in the tables of Pythagoras, that you were wont, in commendation of his youthful and forward genius, to preſerve his handy-work; whilſt I promiſed myſelf every thing from his growing wit.’ It would be injuſtice, and a kind of inhumanity, to reproach this good father with weakneſs, in ſeeking conſolation by informing the public of theſe little particulars of his family.

[D] He publiſhed many books.] The firſt of all was his Liber Triſtium, or the elegies, which I have mentioned above (9). Among the reſt, I ſhall only point out his ſupplement to the hiſtory of Paulus Emilius and Ferron down to the year 1569; his Logica Juriſconſultorum; a Latin tranſlation of the travels of Forbiſſer, and of the African war, in which Don Sebaſtian, king of Portugal, was killed; his orations of Cicero perpetuis Notis Logicis, Arithmeticis, Ethicis, Politicis, Hiſtoricis, Antiquitatis illuſtratæ, in three volumes 8vo, at Baſil, 1583. See the reſt in the abridgment of Geſner, and in Melchior Adam.

FROISSARD (JOHN), born at Valenciennes, canon and treaſurer of Chimai in Hainault, flouriſhed in the XIVth century [A]. His chief work is a hiſtory, which reaches from the year 1326 to the year 1399 (a). He took care to be well informed of things, and for that purpoſe went to the courts of ſeveral princes (b), either to collect memoirs, or to hear thoſe diſcourſe, who had had the management of affairs. He deſerved no leſs fame in quality of a poet, than in that of a hiſtorian; yet few people know his poems. Mr Menage was unacquainted with them; he, whoſe memory was filled with that ſort of works, and with an infinite number of other things. If he had known, that Froiſſard had made a great number of love verſes, he would have put him in the liſt he has publiſhed of the eccleſiaſtics, who have employed their wit in that kind of poeſy [B]. Mr Moreri ſhould not have affirmed, that John Sleidan has tranſlated Froiſſard into Latin [C]. He has committed ſome faults, which ſhall be mentioned in the firſt remark.

[A] He flouriſhed in the XIVth century.] I cannot imagine how Voſſius could miſtake here: he owns, that Froiſſard ſtayed a long while in the court of the princeſs Philippa, daughter of the earl of Hainault, and wife of Edward III, king of England (1). Should he not then have looked upon him as an old man in the beginning of the XVth century (2)? why then does he ſay, that Froiſſard began to be famous under the reign of the emperor Rupert, that is, after the year 1400? we muſt take notice, that Froiſſard went to preſent the firſt books of his hiſtory to the princeſs Philippa, wife of Edward III. Mr Moreri, deceived by Voſſius, places this hiſtorian in the XVth century. La Croix du Maine is in the other extream, in making him flouriſh in the year 1326, ſeven years before he was born (3). Mr Moreri is the more inexcuſable, in that he ſays, that this author dedicated his chronicle to Edward III, king of England: for every body knows, that that monarch died an old man, in the year 1377. Beſides, as Mr Moreri himſelf acknowledges, that this chronicle reaches to the year 1400, it is plain, that he does not expreſs himſelf right, as to that dedication.

[B] Mr Menage would have put him in the liſt he has publiſhed of eccleſiaſtics, who have written love verſes.] For the very title of Froiſſard's poems would have informed him, that they were very proper to be inſerted in that liſt. Here is what we find in Paſquier (4). He who, I find, did greatly advance that new poeſy (5), was John Froiſſard, who did alſo preſent us with that long hiſtory, we have of his, from Philip de Valois to the year 1400. And I wonder he hath not been commended for this quality of poet: for I have formerly ſeen, in the library of the great king Francis, at Fontainbleau, a great volume of his poems, whoſe title was this. ‘You are to know, that in this book are contained ſeveral ſayings or treatiſes of love and morality, which the Sieur John Froiſſard, prieſt and canon of Canay, and native of the town of Valentianes, in the county of Hainault, has dictated and compoſed, with the help of God and love, for the contemplation of ſeveral nobles and worthies, and began to make them in the year of grace 1362, and cloſed them in the year of grace 1394. The Paradiſe of Love, The Temple of Honour, A Treatiſe in Praiſe of the Month of May, The Dazie, Several amorous Lays, Paſtorals, The Amorous Priſon, Royal Songs to the Honour of our Lady, The Dictate of the Amorous Spinnet, Ballad, Virelaix, and Rondeaux, The Plea of the Roſe, and of the Violet.’ I thought fit to quote, word for word, this title; becauſe ſince that time, our poeſy conſiſted moſtly in that kind of delicacies. The liſt of Mr Menage is in the ſecond tome of the Anti Baillet (6).

[C] Mr Moreri ſhould not have affirmed that Sleidan tranſlated Froiſſard into Latin.] Sleidan contented himſelf with abridging Froiſſard; and, becauſe that hiſtorian is very prolix, and full of unneceſſary circumſtances, it happened, that Sleidan, having picked out only uſeful things, reduced a large volume into a pocket-book. I have not at preſent in my hands that Latin abridgment; wherefore I ſhall make uſe of the French tranſlation, to quote a paſſage out of the preface which will acquaint my reader with Froiſſard's method. ‘It is true, the French volume is very large; but I dare affirm, that, in this abridgment, I have left out no paſſage, contained in the ſaid volume, that deſerves to be related, or known. The reaſon is, becauſe the author recounts at large every thing: and, to ſpeak the truth, he dwells ſometimes too long, and is very redundant when he deſcribes the preparations of war, ſkirmiſhes, ſingle combats, the ſtorming of places, the diſcourſes and converſations of princes. Now becauſe the recital of ſuch things is of no great moment, I thought there was no need to inſert them, dwelling only on what is moſt material, and in which lies the advantage, which we ought to expect from that reading.’

(b) See the end of the remark [A].

(9) In remark [B].

(a) Voſſius de Hiſtor. Lat. pag. 543. Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. p. 503, is miſtaken in making that hiſtory begin in the year 1355. La Popeliniere Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, p. 434, makes it begin in 1335.

(b) See ſome curious particulars about it in Bullart, Academ. des Arts & des Sciences, Tom. I, pag. 125.

(1) Diu ſectatus eſt regum principumque familias, imprimis Philippæ .... Edvardi III, Anglorum regis, uxoris. Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 543, 544.

(2) Bullart, Academ. des Sciences, Tom. I. pag. 126, makes him then 67 years old.

(3) He was born about the year 1333, as appears by his writings. Bullart, ibid.

(4) Paſquier, Recherches de la France, livr. vii, cap. v, pag. 612.

(5) That is, Royal Cantos, Ballads, Rondeaux, and Paſtorals.

(6) Pag. 334, & ſeq.

La Popeliniere accuſes Froiſſard of beſtowing too many praiſes on the Engliſh (§ a), and too few on the French ; becauſe the latter did not pay for his labours, whereas he received a good ſalary from the former (c).

[(§a) I have not obſerved, that the Gothic editions of this hiſtorian, Paris, for John Petit, without date, and for Antony Verard, Paris likewiſe, and alſo without date, are at bottom different from thoſe of Denys Saulvage, Lyons 1559, and Paris 1574; but theſe latter are neither faithful, nor exact, the plain language of the author not even appearing in it *. As the French accuſe Froiſſard of partiality for the Engliſh nation, they have here and there maimed his hiſtory; notwithſtanding which, an entire manuſcript of it, adorned with beautiful miniatures, is preſerved in the library of St Elizabeth in the town of Breſlaw. ‘ Non nego magnam pi-‘ cturarum elegantiam eſſe: (ſays a learned man, ſpeaking of this manuſcript) Sed majora hic ſunt, quæ ani-‘ mum meum afficiunt. Putat Orbis eruditus ſe textum Froiſſardi egregie poſſidere, quem Dionyſius Salvagius ‘ Regis Henrici II. juſſu quinquageſimo nono ſuperioris ſeculi anno Lugduni publicavit; ſed fœde decipitur, ‘ dum codex hic impoſturam detegit, & Salvagii manu omnia quæ Aulæ Gallicæ diſplicebant, deleta, vixque ‘ decimam hiſtoriæ partem integram relictam eſſe manifeſtum reddit †. —— I do not deny, that the miniatures ‘ are elegant; but there is ſomething of more importance, which I am concerned at. The learned world think they ‘ are in poſſeſſion of the text of Froiſſard, which Denys Saulvage, by order of Henry II, publiſhed at Lyons in ‘ 1559; but they are ſhamefully impoſed upon, ſince this manuſcript detects the fraud, and makes it plainly appear, ‘ that the paſſages, which diſpleaſed the French court, were ſtruck out by Saulvage himſelf, and ſcarce an entire ‘ tenth part of the hiſtory left.’ REM. CRIT.]

FRONTO (MARCUS CORNELIUS) (a), a great orator, was choſen, by reaſon of his eloquence, to teach the emperors Marcus Aurelius and Lucius Verus rhetoric (b). This procured him the honour of the conſulſhip, and the erection of a ſtatue [A]. Gravity was the character of his eloquence [B]. He had a vaſt erudition, and a great maſtery of the Latin Tongue (c). There was a ſect of thoſe, who took him for the pattern of perfect eloquence, and who were called Frontoniani (d). It may be proved, by an inſcription (e), that his deſcendants were honoured with the conſulſhip: Neither is it improbable, that the civilians, of the name of Fronto (f), mentioned in the Pandects, deſcended from him: But there is no proof, that the orators of the ſame name belonged to Aquitain, and in particular to Auvergne [C]. Some pretend

[A] The honour of the conſulſhip, and the erection of a ſtatue.] Here is a paſſage of Auſonius in relation to the conſulſhip (1): ‘ Unica mihi amplectenda eſt ‘ Frontonis imitatio, quem tamen Auguſti magiſtrum ‘ ſic Conſulatus ornavit ut præfectura non cingeret. ‘ Sed Conſulatus ille cujuſmodi? Ordinario ſuffectus, ‘ bimeſtri ſpatio interpoſitus, in ſexta anni parte con-‘ ſumtus: querendum ut reliquerit tantus orator quibus ‘ conſulibus geſſerit conſulatum (2). Theſe words inform us, that Fronto was conſul only for two months; that is, that he was only ſubſtituted to the conſulſhip, in the place of one of the ordinary conſuls, who either died, or was put out, two months before the year expired. Which made a great difference between the favour of Marcus Aurelius, and that of Gratian; for Auſonius was made ordinary conſul by Gratian his diſciple. That poet was afraid, leſt, by his taking notice of this, in his acknowledgement to Gratian, he ſhould give way to the accuſation of comparing himſelf to Fronto; wherefore he ingeniouſly obviated that objection. I quote his own words, becauſe they are a proof both of Marcus Aurelius's gratitude towards Fronto, his tutor, and of the great eſteem Fronto was in. ‘ Ecce aliud quod aliquis opponat. In tan-‘ ti te ergo oratoris faſtigium glorioſus attollis? Cui ‘ talia requirenti reſpondebo breviter. Non ego me ‘ contendo Frontoni, ſed Antonino præfero Gratianum ‘ (3). —— Some one may farther object. What! do ‘ you pretend to rival ſo great an orator? to ſuch ‘ a queſtion I briefly reply: I do not cope with Fronto, ‘ but prefer Gratian to Antoninus.’ Let us give another proof of that gratitude. ‘ Multum ex his Fron-‘ toni detulit, cui & ſtatuam in Senatu petiit, (here ‘ is the erection of the ſtatue) Proculum vero uſque ‘ ad Proconſulatum provexit (4). —— He aſcribed much ‘ of this to Fronto, for whom he demanded of the ſe-‘ nate a ſtatue: as for Proculus, he raiſed him to the ‘ proconſulate.’ Since Captiolinus takes notice, that Proculus, one of the Grammarians, who had inſtructed Marcus Aurelius, was raiſed to the proconſulſhip, and does not mention Fronto's being advanced to the conſular dignity, he muſt have been ignorant of this laſt paſſage: and therefore we may charge him with a fault of omiſſion. Soſipater Chariſius quotes a letter which teſtifies Marcus Aurelius's gratitude: Mihi ſatis abundeque honorum eſt quos mihi cotidiane tribuis. —— I am thoroughly ſatisfied with the honours you daily confer upon me. Fronto writes this to the emperor.

[B] Gravity was the character of his eloquence.] This we learn from St Jerome (5): ‘ Ut poſt Quin-‘ tiliani acumina, Ciceronis fluvios, GRAVITATEM ‘ Frontonis, & lenitatem Plinii alphabetum diſcerem. ‘ —— That, after the wit of Quintilian, the flowing ‘ periods of Cicero, the GRAVITY of Fronto, and the ſoft-‘ neſs of Pliny, I might learn the alphabet. Macrobius ſays almoſt as much, though in not ſo obliging a manner, with reſpect to Fronto; for he allots him a dry eloquence: ‘ Quatuor ſunt genera dicendi, ‘ ſays he, copioſum, in quo Cicero dominatur: breve ‘ in quo Salluſtius regnat: ſiccum quod Frontoni ad-‘ ſcribitur: pingue & floridum in quo Plinius ſecun-‘ dus quondam, & nunc nullo veterum minor noſter ‘ Symmachus luxuriatur (6). —— There are four kinds ‘ of Oratory, the copious, in which Cicero excels; ‘ the conciſe, in which Saluſt is chief; the dry, which ‘ is aſcribed to Fronto; the luxuriant and florid, in ‘ which formerly Pliny the younger, and now our ‘ Symmachus, inferior to none of the ancients, abounds.’ Sidonius Apollinaris gives a very great Idea of Fronto's grave ſtyle: ‘ Nec Frontonianæ gravitatis aut pon-‘ deris Apuleiani fulmen æquiparem (7). —— Nor do I ‘ pretend to equal the thunder of Fronto's gravity, and ‘ Apuleius's weight.

[C] There is no proof, that the Orators of the ſame name belonged to Aquitain, and . . . . . . Auvergne.] Sidonius Apollinaris, in a letter (8) to Leo, counſellor to a king of the Goths (9), ſpeaks thus: ‘ Suſpende ‘ perorandi illud quoque celeberrimum flumen quod ‘ non ſolum gentilitium ſed domeſticum tibi, quod-‘ que in tuum pectus per ſucciduas ætates ab ata-‘ vo Frontone transfunditur. —— Suſpend that well-‘ known flow of oratory, ſo peculiar, not only to your ‘ country, but family, and which is transfuſed into ‘ your breaſt, through ſucceſſive ages, from your anceſtor ‘ Fronto.’ This proves nothing touching the Fronto's of Auvergne, tho' Savaro pretends the contrary; for upon theſe words of the twenty firſt letter of the fourth book, Hinc avus Fronto blandus tibi, ſibi ſeverus, he gives us this remark: ‘ Fronto ex ‘ veteri illa Frontonum familia qui in arte Rhetorica ‘ principem locum tenuere, quos ſibi ſuos Aquitania ‘ jure vendicat, quantum ex lib. 2. C. de Municip. ‘ & Originariis licet colligere, & ex Epiſt. 3. lib. 8. ‘ Sidonii Apollinaris. —— Fronto, of that ancient fa-‘ mily of the Fronto's, who excelled in the art of ‘ rhetoric, and whom Aquitain juſtly claims as her ‘ own; as far as we can collect from lib. 2. C. de ‘ Municip. & Originariis, and from epiſt. 3. lib. 8. of ‘ Sidonius Apollinaris.’ Tho' it might be proved, that he, to whom that third letter of the eighth book was written, was a native of Auvergne, there would be no reaſon to conclude, that the orator Fronto, his fourth grand father, was of the ſame country.

(c) La Popeliniere. Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, livre viii, pag. 434. See alſo Bodin, Meth. Hiſt. cap. iv pag. m. 58.

* Sorel, Bibl. Fr. cap. xi, pag. 198. Edit. of 1664.

† Gotleb Krantz, in his Memorabilia Bibliothecæ Eliſabethanæ Wratiſlavienſis. Breſlau, 1699.

(a) I know not whence Mr Moreri has taken the pretended prænomen Priſcus, which he gives him.

(b) Capitolin. in M. Aurelio, cap. ii, & in L. Vero, cap. ii.

(c) See Aulus Gellius, lib. ii, cap. xxvi; lib. xix, cap. viii, x, & xiii.

(d) Frontoniani. Sidon. Apollinaris, Epiſt. I, Libr. I.

(e) Apud Gruterum, pag. 369.

(f) See Bertrand, de Juriſperitis, lib. ii. pag. m. 290.

(1) Auſon. in Gratiarum Actione, pag. 714.

(2) See a like thought above, citation (39) of the article BALBUS.

(3) Auſonius, ubi ſupra.

(4) Capitol. in Marco Aurelio, cap. ii.

(5) Epiſt. ad Ruſticum Monachum.

(6) Saturnal. lib. v, cap. i.

(7) Sidon. Apoll. Epiſt. iii, lib. iv, p. m. 235. See alſo Epiſt. x. lib. viii, pag. 523.

(8) The third of the 8th book.

(9) He was called Evarix.

pretend, that our Fronto is the ſame, whom Pliny junior mentions, or who is ſpoken of in the fifty ſixth epigram of the firſt book of Martial. This is attended with ſome difficulty [D]. One would be greatly to blame not to diſtinguiſh him from FRONTO,

One of our moſt curious antiquaries, for whom I have an infinite eſteem, ſtops me here for ſome moments. He aſſures us (10), that Sidonius Apollinaris makes M. Cornelius Fronto, the greateſt orator of his age, deſcend from the illuſtrious family of the Fronto's of Aquitain .... Sidonius, (continues he), writing to Aper, (in the twenty firſt epiſtle of the fourth book) acquaints him, that Fronto, his grand-father by the mother-ſide, was of Auvergne, and that he might have ſerved for a pattern to thoſe that are propoſed to our imitation ..... He writes in another letter, which is the third of the eighth book, to another perſon, and gives him for great-grand-father that ſame Fronto; and tells him, he not only bears his name, but has alſo inherited his eloquence, which is natural to him, and comes to him, by lineal ſucceſſion, from that excellent orator. The author adds, I. That there was in Aquitain, in the time of the emperor Gordian, a family of the name of Fronto, as we learn from the ſecond law of the code de municip. & origin. lib. 10. where a certain A. FRONTO, having, by a feoffment of truſt, been made free by a woman, who was originally of Aquitain, and aſking whether he ſhould follow the origin of her, who made him a freeman, or of the teſtator; the emperor anſwered in favour of her, who made him free, II. That if Æmilius Fronto, who has dedicated the monument, of which he gives us the explanation, be not the ſame Fronto that was made free, we may well ſuppoſe, that he is the ſecond great-grandſon of M. Cornelius Fronto, who lived under Antoninus the philoſopher, and who was his maſter of rhetoric.

The reader may have ſeen, in the preface to my project, that there are no writers, on whom I do more freely adventure to make obſervations, than thoſe, for whom I have a particular eſteem: for if I ſhould be ſhy of propoſing my little difficulties to them, it would be a ſign that I thought them full of prejudice, which I account a very great fault. I repeat here this caution, which I deſire may ſerve for all other occaſions, when the ſame caſe ſhall happen.

In the firſt place, I ſhall be very glad, if any body would prove, that the illuſtrious Cornelius Fronto was of Aquitain; for that would be a great honour to ancient Gaul, and an ornament to the catalogue of the learned men that are come from thence. But I do not ſee how this can be proved by the two letters of Sidonius Apollinaris, which have been quoted. One of thoſe letters was written to Aper; and the other to Leo, counſellor to a king. The firſt ſhews only, that there had been, in Auvergne, a very honeſt man, called Fronto, whoſe daughter was mother of him, to whom Sidonius wrote. The other letter, as far as I can apprehend, doth not ſay, that that ſame Fronto of Auvergne, had been the great-grandfather of him, to whom Sidonius ſpeaks. Sidonius makes uſe of the word atavus, which ſignifies the father of a grand-father's grand-father; and from thence we may perceive, that the Fronto of the firſt letter is not the Fronto of the ſecond; for it can hardly happen, that a man ſhould correſpond by letter with two friends, the grand-father of one of which is atavus to the other. Beſides, it is manifeſt to me, that the Fronto of the firſt letter had been dead but a few years: he had had a ſhare in the education of his grand-ſon (11), and perhaps Sidonius Apollinaris had been acquainted with him. The ſame cannot be ſuppoſed with relation to the Fronto of the other letter; with relation, I mean, to Marcus Cornelius Fronto, tutor to Marcus Aurelius, for it is of him Sidonius ſpeaks. Now Sidonius lived in the Vth century, and Marcus Aurelius in the ſecond. This is my firſt obſervation. Here is another: I do not ſee how Æmilius Fronto, who dedicated the monument, could be at the ſame time A Fronto, made free by a woman of Aquitain, and have for his great-great-grandfather, M. Cornelius Fronto; for that orator, on whom his diſciple heaped ſo many benefits, and who was honoured with the conſulſhip, left his family in very good circumſtances. His ſon, grandſon, and great grandſon, enjoyed the firſt dignities in Rome (12); and it does not appear how any of his deſcendants could have been a ſlave to a woman of Aquitain, which was a province of the Roman empire.

[D] This is not without ſome difficulty.] He, whom Pliny ſpeaks of, was called FRONTO Catius: He pleaded for Marius Priſcus, accuſed by the Africans. The cauſe was great and noble, but difficult to maintain; both becauſe Marius was guilty, and becauſe Pliny and Tacitus pleaded againſt him. Marius's advocate made uſe of his uſual talent, which was, to move compaſſion in the judges. 'Reſpondit Fronto Catius deprecatuſque eſt, ne quid ultra repetundarum legem quæreretur, omniaque actionis ſuæ vela vir movendarum lacrymarum peritiſſimus, quodam velut vento miſerationis implevit .... (13). ——— Fronto Catius replied, and humbly beſought the judges to enquire no farther than the law againſt bribery, and as he had the art of raiſing compaſſion, he moved the court to pity the client's cauſe. Dixit pro Mario rurſus Fronto Catius inſigniter, utque jam locus ille poſcebat, plus in precibus temporis, quam in defenſione conſumpſit (14). ——— Fronto Catius again ſpoke admirably for Marius, and, as the nature of the cauſe required, ſpent more time in drawing the court to pity his client, than in defending him.' This cauſe was tried under Trajan: now our Cornelius Fronto muſt have reached an extream old age, if he be the ſame Fronto Catius, whom we juſt now mentioned: for there is a ſpace of above forty years between the death of Trajan, and the beginning of Marcus Aurelius's reign, and it cannot be ſuppoſed, that Marius's advocate was a young man. Undoubtedly he was one of the moſt famous orators of that time, when he maintained that cauſe. Add to this, that his pathetic character does not well agree with the dry and grave eloquence, which diſtinguiſhed Cornelius Fronto. I believe therefore, that Catanæus is miſtaken (15), in affirming, that the Fronto Catius of Pliny is the ſame Cornelius Fronto, who was Marcus Aurelius's tutor, and whom Juvenal has mentioned in his firſt ſatire. Catanæus, I ſuppoſe, had in view this verſe of Juvenal:

Frontonis platani convulſaque marmora clamant;

Which ſhews, that that Fronto had a fine houſe, and that he lent it to thoſe poets, who had a mind to recite their poems. Now, ſince Juvenal flouriſhed under the reign of Domitian, let the reader judge, if it be likely, that he could ſpeak ſo of a man, who was raiſed to the conſulſhip by Marcus Aurelius. According to the moſt common opinion, this verſe of Martial (16),

Clarum militiæ Fronto togæque decus,

Fronto the ornament of war and peace, is addreſſed to the ſame Fronto, to whoſe houſe the poets repaired to read their verſes. Now, in this caſe, methinks it cannot be ſaid, that Martial mentioned our Cornelius Fronto; for I do not find any where, that that orator ſignalized himſelf in the army. Some believe, that he, of whom Martial has given ſo great a character in two words, is the ſame Fronto, who was conſul with Trajan in the hundredth year of JESUS CHRIST (17). He is not therefore the tutor of Marcus Aurelius, ſince that prince's tutor enjoyed the conſulſhip only through his pupil's favour. Take notice, that Trajan's colleague in the conſulſhip, the hundredth year of JESUS CHRIST, was conſul for the third time; and that, according to Euſebius's chronicle, Marcus Aurelius's tutor flouriſhed in the year of grace 164. Therefore theſe are two different perſons according to all appearance, let the Jeſuit, who has commented upon A. Gellius, in uſum Delphini (18), ſay what he pleaſes to the contrary. How came he not to perceive, that Auſonius would not have looked upon the conſulſhip of two months, beſtowed by Marcus Aurelius on his tutor, as a ſignal favour, if that tutor had been ordinary conſul a long time before, and that

(10) The abbot Nicaiſe, in the explication of an antient monument found in Guienne, printed at Paris 1689, pag. 14, 15.

(11) Hinc avus Fronto blandus tibi.

(12) See the inſcription, in Gruterus, pag. 369, and Bertrand, de Juriſperitis, lib. ii, pag. 291. Some believe, that the father of the grandſon was only ſon-in-law to our Fronto.

(13) Plinius, lib. ii. Epiſt. 11, pag. m. 98.

(14) Ibid. pag. 105.

(15) Fuit igitur Cornelius Fronto Catius orator nobiliſſimus, Romanæ eloquentiæ non ſecundum ſed alterum decus (quamquam illi Macrobius ſiccum dicendi genus aſcribat) Antonini Philoſophi præceptor. Catanæus, in Plin. Epiſt. xi. lib. ii, pag. 98. Theſe words, Fronto Romanæ facundiæ non ſecundum ſed alterum decus, are quoted by Savaro, in Sidon. Apoll. Epiſt. x. lib. viii, p. 524, as taken out of a panegyric upon Maximian.

(16) Epigr. lvi, lib. i.

(17) This opinion does not agree with Pliny, who ſays, in Panegyr. p. m. 116, that Trajan, in his third conſulſhip, (it is that of the year 100) choſe a colleague, who was not a warrior. See Tillemont, Tom. II. pag. m. 896.

(18) In caput xxvi, lib. iii.

FRONTO, a Roman conſul, under the emperor Nerva. He uttered a very ſolid apophthegm [E]. Some pretend, that our Cornelius Fronto made a ſpeech againſt the chriſtians [F]. He was not contented to teach Marcus Aurelius rhetoric, but gave him that too with a great emperor? I obſerve, that our Fronto out-lived his conſulſhip; which appears by Aulus Gellius (19), who mentions him as a conſular man, ſpeaking of the viſit he made him with Favorinus. The Delphin ſcholiaſt ſuppoſes, that Aulus Gellius, in the eighth chapter of the nineteenth book, ſpeaks of that Fronto, who ſignalized himſelf, both in war, and at the bar, under Domitian; that is, of the ſame Fronto, mentioned by Martial. I do not think ſo: I believe Aulus Gellius ſpeaks ſtill of him, who taught M. Aurelius rhetoric, and conſequently that he does not ſpeak of a Fronto, who from Domitian's time was a great ſoldier, and a great ſcholar. William Grotius believes, that he, whom Favorinus and Aulus Gellius went to ſee, is the tutor of Marcus Aurelius; but he makes him conſul in the ſixth year of Severus (20), that is, the year of grace 199. Which error is very groſs, ſince that conſulſhip was a favour from M. Aurelius; and beſides, it is moſt falſe, that our Fronto was alive in the year 199. Was he not the firſt and moſt famous orator at Rome in the reign of Hadrian? Ἀμέλει καὶ Κορνήλιος Φρόντων, ὁ τὰ πρῶτα τῶν τότε Ῥωμαίων ἐν δίκαις φερόμενος, ἑσπέρας ποτὲ βαθείας ἀπὸ δείπνου οἴκαδε ἐπανιὼν καὶ μαθὼν παρά τινος ᾧ συνηγορήσειν ὑπέσχετο, δικάζειν αὐτὸν, ἔν τε τῇ στολῇ τῇ δειπνίτιδι ὥσπερ εἶχε ἐς τὸ δικαστήριον αὐτοῦ ἐσῆλθε. Fuit & Cornelius Fronto magnæ autoritatis, qui in agendis cauſis Romæ primum locum obtinebat. Hic cùm veſperi à cœna ſerò domum rediiſſet, intellexiſſetque ex eo cui patrocinium pollicitus erat, principem jus reddere, veſte cœnatoria indutus, ut erat, in jus venit (21). ——— Cornelius Fronto was likewiſe of great authority, who was the moſt famous orator at Rome. This man, returning home late from an entertainment, and, being informed by one of his clients, that the emperor was ſitting upon cauſes, went into court, juſt as he was then dreſſed. He was, then, at leaſt forty years old, when that prince died, in 138.

[E] He uttered a very ſolid apophthegm.] It is a great misfortune, ſaid he, to live under an emperor, who will ſuffer no body to do any thing, but it is ſtill a greater misfortune to be under a prince, who allows every body to do what they pleaſe. The abridger of Dion has preſerved us this ſentence (22); but he has ſo interrupted the thread of the narration, that one muſt divine to know to what purpoſe the conſul Fronto ſpoke ſo. It was, in all appearance, when he ſaw, that, to remedy the diſorders, which informers had cauſed under Domitian, other exceſſes were committed, which occaſioned a greater confuſion. It is probable the thing happened thus: informers were ſtrictly called to an account, and ſeverely puniſhed as they deſerved. But, under pretence of exterminating that deteſtable race of men, and thoſe public banes, every one, to get rid of his enemies, accuſed them of having been informers. The eaſy temper of Nerva, together with the hatred the people had conceived againſt the creatures of Domitian, made way for a thouſand unjuſt proceedings; inſomuch that Fronto, comparing Nerva's reign with that of Domitian, found it worſe than the other. His apophthegm did ſome good; for the emperor put a ſtop to ſeveral informations and proceedings (23).

[F] He made a ſpeech againſt the chriſtians.] This is the ground they go upon. The heathen Cæcilius, in the dialogue of Minucius Felix, charges the chriſtians with ſeveral abominations, and quotes the teſtimony of an orator, who was born at Cirtha, a town of Afric; Et de convivio notum eſt: paſſim omnes loquuntur: id etiam Cirtenſis noſtri teſtatur oratio. — It is well known what is practiſed in their feaſts: every one talks of it: our orator of Cirtha likewiſe teſtifies it. They accuſed the chriſtians of aſſembling upon certain days to eat together: every one came there without diſtinction of age or ſex; and, when they were elevated with drinking, they flung a morſel of bread to a dog, that was tied to a candleſtic. The dog, ruſhing to the bread, overturned the candleſtic, and then, the candle being put out, the two ſexes mingled according to the caprice of chance, every man indulging his luſt with the firſt woman he met with in the dark, whether his ſiſter, daughter, or mother. 'Ad epulas ſolemni die coëunt, cum omnibus liberis, 'ſororibus, matribus, ſexûs omnis homines, & omnis 'ætatis. Illic poſt multas epulas, ubi convivium caluit, & inceſtæ libidinis fervor ebrietate exarſit, canis qui candelabro nexus eſt, jactu offulæ ultra ſpatium lineæ, qua vinctus eſt, ad impetum & ſaltum 'provocatur: ſic everſo & extincto conſcio lumine 'impudentibus tenebris nexus infandæ cupiditatis involvunt per incertum ſortis: &, ſi non omnes opera, conſcientia tamen pariter inceſti; quoniam voto 'univerſorum appetitur, quidquid accidere poteſt in 'actu ſingulorum (24).' When, in the ſame dialogue of Minucius Felix, the chriſtian Octavius confutes this impudent calumny; he obſerves, that the witneſs, whoſe teſtimony had been alledged, was called Fronto; and that he ought not to be quoted as a witneſs who depoſes, but as an orator who inveighs. Sic de iſto & tuus Fronto non ut affirmator teſtimonium fecit, ſed convitium ut orator aſperſit (25). There is therefore no room to doubt, that an orator, named Fronto, made a bitter invective againſt the chriſtians; but the queſtion is, whether that Fronto, and he who taught Marcus Aurelius rhetoric, are the ſame. The civilian Francis Baudouin (26) inclines to that opinion, and chuſes rather to aſcribe that ſpeech to the orator Cornelius Fronto, and tutor of Marcus Aurelius, than to the civilian Papyrius Fronto, mentioned in the Pandects. Rigaltius (27) approves Baudouin's ſentiment. Some other commentators, as Wower and Elmenhorſt, poſitively affirm, that the orator Cornelius Fronto, Marcus Aurelius's preceptor, is he who is ſpoken of in Minucius's dialogue. Mr Daillé affirms the ſame thing without the leaſt heſitation; whereby he ſettles the true age of Minucius, and clears himſelf from the anachroniſm, that was laid to his charge; becauſe, in his narration, he had placed Minucius Felix before Irenæus and Clemens Alexandrinus. 'I am not ignorant, ſays he (28), that your 'Bellarmin places him after Tertullian; and that the 'late Rigaltius, not to mention others, is of the ſame 'opinion: But I had my reaſons to be of another opi-'nion. For that author ſpeaks * of the orator Fronto, 'a native of Cirtha in Africa, as a man of his time, 'and a friend to that heathen Cæcilius, whom Octa-'vius, in the ſame dialogue, converts to chriſtianity. 'Now it is certain, that Fronto was already living 'under the firſt Antoninus, who died in the 161ſt year 'of our Saviour; and that he was tutor to Antoni-'nus Verus †, and to Marcus Aurelius ‡, who ſuc-'ceeded the firſt Antoninus; and lived, one till the '170th year, and the other till the 180th year of 'our Saviour. I ſhall obſerve three things upon all this: I. That it is not certain, that Minucius has ſpoken of the orator Fronto, as of a man of his time, and a friend to the heathen Cæcilius; for the words, Cirtenſis noſtri, may only ſignify, that Cæcilius, and he to whom he ſpoke, were of the ſame country with that orator. A Norman, born ſixty years after the death of Malherbe, will make no ſcruple to quote him, thus; our countryman Malherbe. It is uſual for an Engliſhman or a German, and ſo of other nations, to quote an author of their reſpective countries, thus; our ſuch a one; although that ſuch a one has been dead for ſeveral ages. When Mr Daillé, in the paſſage I have quoted, ſays to Father Adam your Bellarmin, he he does not mean, that theſe two Jeſuits lived at the ſame time. II. That the expreſſion of Mr Daillé, it is certain, that Fronto was already living, under the firſt Antoninus, does not become a man, who ſhould have remembered, that Fronto held the firſt rank among the Roman advocates, under the reign of Hadrian (29). III. After all, I embrace Mr Daillé's opinion: And I believe, that our Cornelius Fronto is the ſame, whom Minucius Felix has quoted, and ſo we know, that he was of Cirtha in Numidia. Let no body object to me, that there is no likelihood, that ſo able a man, ſo famous an orator, ſhould have adopted, in a book, the ſilly ſtories, and impudent calumnies, which ſome paſſionate and ignorant men of that time ſpread againſt the chriſtians. Let us judge of thoſe ages by the XVIth and XVIIth centuries. Where are thoſe, who raiſe with more fury the moſt falſe and moſt

(19) Lib. ii, cap. xxvi. Note, that he, whom he calls here M. Fronto, and he, whom he calls Fronto Cornelius, in the eighth and tenth chapter of the nineteenth book, are the ſame perſons. He of the twenty ſixth chapter of the ſecond book has ſore feet; and ſo has he of the tenth chapter of the nineteenth book.

(20) Cujus conſulatum in annum ſextum Severi rejiciendum puto. Grotius de vitis Juriſconſ. pag. 188.

(21) Xiphilin. in Hadriano, pag. m. 265.

(22) Id. in Nerva, pag. m. 240.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Minucius Felix, pag. m. 89, 90.

(25) Ibid. pag. 503.

(26) In Prolegomenis ad Minuc. Felicem.

(27) In notis ad Minuc. Felicem, pag. m. 89. He quotes Lampridius inſtead of Capitolinus; for it is Capitolinus, and not Lampridius, who relates, that Cornelius Fronto taught M. Aurelius rhetoric.

(28) Replique à Adam & à Cottiby, Part. III, cap. viii, pag. m. 187. I tranſcribe his quotations without any alteration: I only obſerve, that that of Marc Aurel. de vita ſua, lib. xii, is not right. He ſhould have quoted lib. i, cap. viii.

* Minut. in Octav. pag. 23, & 92.

† Hier. in Melit. lib. de Scrip. Eccleſ.

‡ Marc. Aurel. de vita ſua, lib. xii.

(29) See, above, citat. (21).

him alſo very good precepts of morality (g), which had great relation to the duties of kings.

(g) M. Aurel. de Seipſo, lib. i. n. 8.

moſt heinous accuſations againſt the contrary party, than thoſe who are in the poſſeſſion of the kingdom of declamation? Was it not they, who, in the XVIth century, moſt boldly calumniated the Proteſtants? Let this inſtance ſerve for all: Sit unum inſtar omnium.

FUGGER (HULDRIC), born at Augſburg, of a family conſiderable both for it's antiquity and riches [A], deſerves a place here, by reaſon of the inclination he ſhewed to learning, and his affection for learned men. He had been chamberlain to Pope Paul III, and afterwards embraced the Proteſtant religion. He ſpent a great deal of money in collecting the good manuſcripts of the ancients, and cauſed them to be printed; and for that purpoſe he allowed, for ſome time, a ſalary to the learned Henry Stephens. His relations were ſo incenſed againſt him for ſpending his eſtate that way, that they brought an action againſt him for it, and cauſed him to be declared incapable of managing his affairs. There are ſome, who, without taking notice of the repealing of that ſentence, obſerve, that the judgment pronounced againſt him caſt him into ſuch a melancholy, as accompanied him almoſt to his grave (a). But his epitaph teſtifies, that he was unſhaken at that heavy blow; that he was reſtored to the enjoyment of his eſtate; and that he inherited that of his brother [B]. He had fixed his abode at Heidelberg, where he died, being fifty eight years old, in the month of June 1584, bequeathing his library, which was very conſiderable (b), to the elector Palatine; and a fund for the ſubſiſtence of ſix ſcholars. He made alſo ſome foundations for the poor, as may be ſeen in his epitaph. He had bought the library of a phyſician, called Achilles Gaſſarus, which proved a good bargain; for that phyſician was a true helluo librorum, if we may believe Melchior Adam (c). Huldric Fugger was not the firſt of his family, who had a fine library: For we read, in Melchior Adam (d), that Jerom Wolfius, being gone to Augſburg, was there very civilly entertained by ANTONY FUGGER, and that the famous library of JOHN JAMES FUGGER was committed to his care [C]. This JOHN JAMES FUGGER had been a great lover of learning, and cauſed ſome writings of James Ziegler to be printed (e). He was particularly eſteemed by the cardinal de Granvelle, and wrote often to him. A letter, which he wrote to him in Italian, dated the twenty firſt of July 1564, was publiſhed in 1692 (f).

Beatus Rhenanus gives us a great idea of the magnificence, and good taſte of ANTONY and RAYMOND FUGGER. He deſcribes the beauty of their houſes, and gardens; where excellent pictures were ſeen, the moſt conſiderable plants that were

(a) Patrimonii aviti ampliſſimi adminiſtratione dejectus eſt, unde mœrore contracto in melancholiæ morbum incidit, quo fere tota vita conflictatus eſt. Thuan. lib. lxxx, ſub fin.

(b) Inſignem Bibliothecam mille aliquot voluminibus manuſcriptis Græcis, Latinis, Hebraïcis ſpectatiſſimam. Gruterus, Chron. Eccleſ. lib. ii, pag. 1306.

(c) Melch. Adam. in vitis Medicor. pag. 234.

(d) Id. in vitis Philoſ. pag. 305.

(e) Thuan. lib. 71. pag. 118.

(f) See Mr Pelliſſon's Treatiſe of Toleration of Religions, pag. 96, of the additions; and below, remark [A].

[A] He was of a family conſiderable for it's antiquity and riches.] See the Supplement to Moreri's Dictionary, in the article FOUCKERS, and above, the remark [EE] of the article CHARLES V. Thuanus relates (1), that, when that emperor changed the government of Augſburg, in the year 1548, he marked the family of the Fuggers among thoſe, which, for the future, ſhould enjoy the dignity of a ſenator. Here is what the abbot Boiſot wrote to Mr Pelliſon, when he ſent him the copy of a letter taken out of the memoirs of the cardinal de Granvelle: 'He, who 'wrote it, was one of thoſe Fuggers, illuſtrious and 'famous merchants of Augſburg, who little differed 'in credit and ſplendor from thoſe, whom an univerſal commerce, which was altogether noble, and 'the great riches that attended it, have ſometimes 'raiſed to the higheſt employments in republics: He 'kept a great correſpondence with the cardinal, and 'frequently gave him ſome very good advice (2).' Rabelais, writing from Rome, in the year 1536, to the biſhop of Maillezais, tells him, That, next to the Fourques of Ausburg, Philip Stroſſi is accounted the richeſt merchant of Chriſtendom (3). Now the following hiſtorical note has been made upon thoſe words of Rabelais. 'The family of the Fouckres, or Fuggers, 'Fuggerana, is now pretty conſiderable in Germany, 'in the dioceſe of Conſtance, where they poſſeſs the 'baronies of Kirchberg and Weiſſenhorn. Their firſt 'reſidence was in the city of Augſburg; and it is about 'one hundred and fifty years ago that they were the 'richeſt merchants in Germany. By the emperor's 'gratification they were honoured with the dignity of 'barons, in the year MDX, in the perſons of Raymond 'Foucre, baron of Kirchberg and Weiſſenhorn, and 'of Antony Fugger, whoſe grandſon was James, 'biſhop and prince of Conſtance, in the year 1604. 'That which gives the greateſt luſtre to that houſe, is, 'that it is allied with the beſt families in Germany, 'viz. with the counts of Zollern, Schwartzemberg, 'Eberſteyn, Koningſeck, Montfort, Ottingen, and 'Truceſes, with the barons of Madruce, the counts of 'Lodron, and others, the moſt illuſtrious in Bavaria.' Hippolitus à Lapidè (4) obſerves, that the Fuggers were honoured with the quality of counts, but that they never were inſerted in the rolls of the empire till the year 1582. I have ſeen a book in High-Dutch, printed in the year 1560, containing the prints of thoſe of that family, both men and women, with a little diſcourſe upon every one of them. The firſt mentioned there is JAMES FUGGER, called the Old, who died the fourteenth of March 1469. All the genealogies of Germany mention this illuſtrious family; tho' they do not ſcruple to own, that it is deſcended from a weaver, who, in the year 1370 (5), obtained the freedom of Augſburg, and was of the village of Geggingen, within half a league of that city (6).

[B] His epitaph teſtifies, that he was unſhaken —— and that he ſucceeded to his brother's eſtate.] The reader may believe as much of it as he pleaſes; for the friends of a deceaſed perſon generally make no great ſcruple of an officious lie. Here is what they affirm in it. Apud Fridericum III. electorem Palatinum fortunam conſtantia & æquanimitate ſuperavit. Suis interea reſtitutus, fraternis quinetiam bonis auctior, eundem in re lauta quem afflicta vultum animumque retinuit. See Mr Teiſſier (7).

[C] Wolfius was intruſted with the care of the famous library of J. J. FUGGER.] Wolfius made ſome Greek verſes, wherein he teſtifies, that that library, furniſhed with as many books as there are ſtars in the firmament, was a place, where he ſpent whole days, gathering flowers and fruits, diverting and inſtructing himſelf; and that he preferred it to every other:

Ἀντὶ μὲν οὖν πάντων αἱρεῦμαι βιβλιοθήκων
Φουκκαρίνην, εὐχῆς κρείττονα τήνδε φιλῶ.

O Fuggere tuam, præ cunctis, Bibliothecam
Hanc amo, nam votis major & illa meis (8).

Pleas'd, I thy copious library ſurvey,
And through the various walks of learning ſtray.

[D] They

(1) Thuan. lib. v, pag. m. 99.

(2) Pelliſſon, Traité de la Tolerance des Religions, pag. 95, of the Additions.

(3) Rabel. Epiſt. pag. 9.

(4) De Rat. Stat. in Imp. Germ. Part. II, cap. vii, ſect. viii, pag. m. 458.

(5) See Hoffman's Dictionary, Tom. III, pag. 773. I cannot reconcile with the book in German, what he ſays of James Fugger, a weaver's ſon. He makes him counſellor to Maximilian I. The book in German places his death in the year 1469. Maximilian began his reign in the year 1493.

(6) Cruſ. Part. III, Annal. Suev. lib. v, cap. ix, apud Magirum Eponym. pag. 366.

(7) Elog. Tom. II, pag. 4.

(8) Script. Publ. Academ. Witteb. Tom. III, fol. 121, apud Lomeïer de Bibl. pag. 398.

were in Italy, and many monuments of antiquity [D]. See the letter, which he wrote to the phyſician of the elector of Mentz, the ſixth of March 1531. It is the fiftieth of the century of philological letters, collected and publiſhed by Goldaſtus.

[D] They had many monuments of antiquity.] Raymond Fugger ſpared no coſt to make a good collection of them: for he was both a ſcholar, and a lover of antiquity. ‘ Narrabatur vero nobis ex toto propemodum ‘ orbe convecta fuiſſe ea vetuſtatis monumenta, præcipue tamen ex Græcia atque Sicilia. Adeo nullius ‘ ſumptus Raimundum pœnitet ob amorem, quem literarum minime expers erga antiquitatem gerit, modo ‘ poſſit talibus rebus potiri. Id quod vere nobilem & ‘ generoſum hominis animum oſtendit (9). —— We ‘ are told, that he procured thoſe monuments of antiquity from almoſt all parts of the world, particularly from Greece and Sicily. And ſo great an admirer ‘ was the learned Raymund of antiquity, that he ſpared ‘ for no expence in purchaſing them. Which ſhews the ‘ truly noble and generous ſpirit of the man.’

(9) Beat. Rhenan. apud Goldaſt. Cent. Epiſt. Philolog. pag. m. 212.

FULGINAS, or DE FULGINEO (SIGISMUND), is reckoned among the learned men of the XVth century. He has written the hiſtory of what paſſed in his time. Felinus (a) refers his readers to it, concerning the differences of Sixtus IV. with Ferdinand king of Naples. Voſſius might have known better, than by that quotation, in what time Fulginas lived, if he had minded the firſt chapter of the ſixth book of the Geniales Dies of Alexander ab Alexandro; where we learn, that the latter had, from his youth, contracted a great friendſhip with Fulginas, a learned man, very much employed by the Popes, and who ſtole as much time as he could from his buſineſs, either to read good books, or to write the annals of his time. The idea which is given us of his riches, and of his table, is very mean [A], and very much inferior to that of his wit and learning. He made ſome Latin verſes upon the death of Bartholomew Platina, wherein he takes the title of Apoſtolic Secretary: They were publiſhed at the end of the works of Platina, who died in the year 1481. I only take notice of this, that my reader may the better know in what time Fulginas lived. He is little known by Bibliographers.

(a) Epitom. de Sicil. & Apul. Regib cap xxix, and not xxxix, as Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 661, has quoted.

He was ſtill alive in the year 1511, which appears by a letter that Bembus wrote to him. It is the third of the fifth book. The preceding letter, written the twenty fifth of November 1510, ſhews that Fulginas was in the ſervice of Julius II, and that he is one of the chief interlocutors in Bembus's dialogue de Urbini ducibus.

[A] The idea which is given us of his riches, and of his table, is very mean.] Judge of it by theſe words of Alexander ab Alexandro (1). ‘ Nonnunquam in ſuo ‘ prædiolo in monte Janiculo, miro proſpectu & collibus amœno, ubi ædiculas habebat, cum amicis ſe ‘ recipiebat, ibique lepidis jucundiſque ſermonibus, id ‘ quod erat laxamenti, una familiariſſime conferebat. ‘ Præſtabat nonnunquam nobis ipſe cœnulam, ut non ‘ nimis inſolentem, ſic profecto ſobriam & modeſtam, ‘ ac temporibus conſentaneam: & ut erat ipſe comis, ‘ faciliſque natura, ita facilem nobis victum, non exquiſitis valde obſoniis apparabat, ſiquidem aſparagos ‘ altiles acido vino & pipere conditos cum juſculo tepidulo, ac ferculum cucurbitæ, cum immatura uva ‘ ibidem expreſſa, & decocta largo ſucco, quibus perlibenter veſcebatur, obſonia nobis exhibebat: addebat ‘ etiam pyrum pomumque perſicum miro odore fragrantia. Poſt cœnulam, &c. —— He ſometimes ‘ retired with his friends to his little eſtate on mount ‘ Janiculum, where he had a beautiful proſpect, and a ‘ ſmall ſeat; where they unbent their minds, and diverted themſelves with chearful converſation. I have ‘ ſometimes ſupped with him there, at a ſober and moderate repaſt, and agreeable to the times; and, as he ‘ was himſelf of a courteous and eaſy diſpoſition, ſo he ‘ gave us an eaſy entertainment, not conſiſting of delicacies; for the bill of fare was, aſparagus dreſſed ‘ with vinegar and pepper, and warm ſauce, and a meſs ‘ of gourd, with the juice of unripe grapes, and ſwimming in ſauce; on which he fed very freely: he added ‘ likewiſe pears and peaches, of wonderful fragrance. ‘ After this light meal, &c.’

(1) Alex. ab Alexandro, Genial. Dier. lib. vi, cap. i, pag. m. 391, 392.

FULVIA, a Roman lady, who diſcovered Catiline's conſpiracy. See the remark [D], of the following article.

FULVIA, wife of Marc Anthony, had nothing of her ſex but the body (a); for her ſpirit and courage led her to war, and public affairs. After the battle of Philippi, wherein Brutus and Caſſius were defeated by Octavius and Marc Anthony, the latter paſſed into Aſia to ſettle the affairs of the Eaſt. Octavius returned to Rome, and ſoon fell out with Fulvia: Nor could the quarrel be decided but by the ſword. That woman took up arms, and cauſed Lucius Antonius, her huſband's brother, to take them up too [A]. This prepoſterous ſtep was only favourable to Octavius, who gained a full

(a) Nihil muliebre præter corpus ferens. Paterculus, lib. ii, cap. lxxiv. See the remark [A].

[A] That woman took up arms, and cauſed Lucius Antonius, her huſband's brother, to take them up too.] This ought to be underſtood in the moſt literal ſenſe, ſince it is certain that ſhe was ſeen with a ſword by her ſide. She was not contented to retire to Præneſte, and to make it her place of arms; ſhe not only called thither the ſenators, and knights of her party, held councils with them, and publiſhed ſeveral proclamations, according to the exigency of affairs, but ſhe likewiſe armed herſelf perſonally; ſhe gave the word to the ſoldiers, and harangued them on ſeveral occaſions: Καὶ τί ταῦτα θαυμάσειεν ἄν τὶς ὁπότε καὶ ξίφος παρεζώννυτο, καὶ συνθήματα τοῖς στρατιώταις ἐδίδου, ἐδημηγόρει τε ἐν αὐτοῖς πολλάκις. Id quidem mirandum adeo non eſt quum gladio etiam ſe accinxerit ipſa, teſſeram militibus dederit, ſæpenumero concionem apud eos habuerit (1). The Hiſtorian, who tells us theſe things, ſays, that, in the year 713, Publius Servilius and Lucius Antonius had the name of conſuls, and that the latter and Fulvia were ſo in effect. He gives us afterwards to underſtand, that Lucius Antonius had no authority, but through Fulvia's means; and that it was ſhe, who procured him the honour of the triumph: for he could not obtain the ſame, till he had engaged her, by his ſubmiſſion and cringing, to ſtir in his favour. And indeed ſhe took more pride in that triumph, than the triumpher himſelf (2). It is not amiſs to ſee what Plutarch ſays of Fulvia (3): Φουλβίαν ἀγάμενος τὴν Κλωδίῳ τῷ δημαγωγῷ συνοικήσασαν, οὐ ταλασίαν, οὐδὲ οἰκουρίαν φρονοῦν γύναιον, οὐδὲ ἀνδρὸς ἰδιώτου κρατεῖν ἀξιοῦν, ἀλλὰ ἄρχοντος ἄρχειν. καὶ στρατηγοῦντος στρατηγεῖν βουλόμενον· ὥς τε Κλεοπάτραν διδασκάλια Φουλβίᾳ τῆς Ἀντωνίου γυναικοκρασίας

(1) Dio, lib. xlviii, pag. m. 414.

(2) Id. ibid. pag. 409, 410.

(3) Plutarch in Antonio. pag. 920. D.

a full victory over his enemies; whereupon Fulvia retired into Greece, and there died of a ſickneſs, occaſioned by her grief [B]. She left two ſons (b). Womaniſh paſſions had a ſhare in the war ſhe raiſed againſt Octavius [C]. She had two huſbands before ſhe married Marc Antony: The firſt was Clodius, that great and mortal enemy of Cicero; the ſecond was Curio, who was killed in Africa, in Cæſar's cauſe, before the battle of Pharſalia. It is not true, that ſhe had been married to Catiline [D].

She

γυναικοκρατίας ὀφείλειν, πάνυ χειροήθη καὶ πεπαιδαγωγημένον ἀπ' ἀρχῆς ἀκροᾶσθαι γυναικῶν, παραλαβοῦσαν αὐτόν. Fulviam Clodii, plebis concitatoris, viduam (4) uxorem duxit, mulierem non ad lanificium aut ad rei familiaris adminiſtrationem factam, neque in virum contentam dominari privatum, ſed quæ imperanti imperare & ducem volebat ducere: ut mercedem Fulviæ, quod ancillari Antonium docuiſſet fœminis, debuerit Cleopatra, quæ plane cicurem atque à tyrocinio inſtitutum ad obtemperandum mulieribus recepit. Here is a woman, who, bating chaſtity, was not unlike the Camilla of Virgil.

> - - - non illa colo, calathiſve Minervæ
> Femineas aſſueta manus (5).

> With manlier fires her female boſom burns,
> Nor e're her hand th' unwarlike ſpindle turns.

The diſtaff, and domeſtic cares, were none of her buſineſs; neither was ſhe contented to domineer over her husband at home; ſhe was alſo ambitious to lord it over him abroad, that is, with reſpect to his great public employments. Cleopatra found no great difficulty in reducing him under obedience to a woman; for he had learned that ſubmiſſion in a good ſchool.

[B] She died in Greece of a ſickneſs, occaſioned by her grief.] Marc Antony, being informed of the diſorders in Italy, ſet forward thither, to remedy them; and, being arrived at Àthens, he found there his wife, who had been forced to fly out of Italy. He blamed extreamly the authors of that war, that is, Lucius Antonius, Fulvia, and Manius (6). When he continued his journey, he left Fulvia ſick at Sicyon (7), where ſhe died ſome time after. The news of it was brought to her husband, during the ſiege of Brunduſium, in the year 714, and it is likely he received it with joy, for he had been extreamly incenſed againſt her; and though he knew, at his departure from Sicyon, that ſhe was fallen ſick, becauſe he had chid her, he would never go to ſee her, which haſtened the death of that proud woman (8).

[C] Womaniſh paſſions had a ſhare in the war ſhe raiſed againſt Octavius.] The daughter, that ſhe had by Clodius, was married to Octavius, who ſoon after put her away, ſwearing he had not conſummated the marriage; which oath was enough to incenſe Fulvia. A mother's fondneſs ſuffers very much by the thought that her daughter bears the name of wife, without the reality; wherefore Fulvia could not think on the divorce of her dear child without grief: ſhe ſaw her deprived of the ſubſtantial pleaſures of marriage, which was a ſign of extream contempt; for Octavius was of a very amorous conſtitution. She was not ignorant, that few people would give credit to Octavius's oath; and therefore, that her daughter, thus deſpiſed by her husband, ſo far as to preſerve her virginity for ſome time, would nevertheleſs paſs for a perſon, that could afford nothing but the leavings of a firſt huſband. Fulvia might alſo conſider, that Octavius was come into her alliance with a ſpirit of diſtruſt, which had made him forbear enjoying his wiſe, that, according to what courſe affairs ſhould take, he might be at liberty to ſend her away, and to affirm, upon oath, that he had not touched her. Dion (9) obſerves, that, when Octavius made this oath, he was little concerned, whether the people would believe, that he had kept ſo long this young lady at his houſe, without meddling with her, or whether they would think, that he had abſtained from her, to make way for his divorce. Theſe captious and political precautions are not pleaſing to a mother, and conſequently a womaniſh paſſion may well have had a ſhare in the deſign, which Fulvia formed, of making war upon Octavius. Here is another paſſion of the ſame kind. Fulvia knew her husband to be enſlaved to the fair Cleopatra; jealouſy prompted her to draw Marc Antony from that new engagement; and ſhe eaſily believed thoſe who told her, that her unfaithful husband would never return to her whilſt Italy was quiet (10), but that a war in Italy would ſoon oblige him to return. Whereupon Fulvia carried things to extremity againſt Octavius (11). But if Auguſtus's epigram, which is among thoſe of Martial, were an hiſtorical account (12), we might then boldly affirm, that womaniſh paſſions engaged Fulvia in that war.

[D] It is not true, that ſhe had been married to Catiline.] The reaſon Glandorpius uſes to confute this (13), ſeems to me very good. He borrows it from the ſecond Philippic of Cicero. Cujus (P. Clodii) quidem te fatum ſicuti C. Curionem manet, quoniam id domi tuæ eſt, quod fuit illorum utrique fatale. Cicero means, that Marc Antony, having at home the ſame wife, which had been fatal to Clodius and to Curio, would not fail to have a fatal end, as they had had. He repeats the ſame thought at the end of the oration: ‘Eripiet & extorquebit tibi iſta populus Romanus: utinam ſalvis nobis: ſed quoque modo nobiſcum egeris, dum iſtis conſiliis uteris non potes (mihi crede) eſſe diuturnus. Etenim iſta tua minime avara conjux, quam ego ſine contumelia deſcribo, nimium debet diu populo Romano tertiam penſionem (14). —— The Roman people will ſnatch and extort this from you: I wiſh, with our ſafety: but deal how you will with us, whilſt you purſue theſe councils, believe me, you cannot long hold it. For that wife of your's, a woman not at all greedy after wealth, whom I deſcribe without contumely, is too long indebted a third payment to the Roman people.’ It is plain to every body, that, if Fulvia had been married to Catiline, the tragical death of that husband would have been joined, in Cicero's oration, with that of the other two: both general and particular reaſons would have engaged the orator not to forget Catiline upon that occaſion. The error, Glandorpius confutes, may proceed from not attending to the circumſtances of a narrative, which is in Salluſt. That hiſtorian informs us, that a great lady, (15), named FULVIA, diſcovered Catiline's conſpiracy. One of the accomplices, who had for a long time had a criminal commerce with her, had, by his freaks and rhodomontades, given her occaſion to find out the plot. He had, it ſeems, ſpent all he had, and thereupon the lady grew extream cold towards him. To warm her again, he boaſted, on the ſudden, of what he would do for her; promiſed her mountains of gold; adding ſwaggering to his boaſting, and threatening to kill her, if ſhe did not comply with his deſires. She penetrated into the cauſes of theſe new bravadoes, and informed ſeveral perſons of what ſhe had learned touching Catiline's deſigns. ‘Erat ei (Q. Curio) cum Fulvia, muliere nobili, ſtupri vetus conſuetudo, cui cum minus gratus eſſet, quod inopia minus largiri poterat, repente glorians, maria, monteiſque polliceri cœpit, minari interdum ferro, ni ſibi obnoxia foret: poſtremo, ferocius agitare, quam ſolitus erat. At Fulvia, inſolentiæ Curii cauſſa cognita, tale periculum reipublicæ haud occultum habuit; ſed, ſublato auctore, de Catilinæ conjuratione, quæ quo modo audierat, compluribus narravit (16).’ It is probable ſeveral readers have miſtaken here one for the other, and believed, that it was Catiline, who kept Fulvia (17). After this miſtake, nothing was more natural than to ſay, that Catiline was betrayed by Fulvia his miſtreſs, or his concubine; and afterwards it was not difficult to proceed ſo far, as to give out, that his wiſe Fulvia diſcovered the conſpiracy. Thoſe, who were acquainted with the wickedneſs of Marc Antony's wife, may eaſily have imagined, that ſhe was capable of all that is aſcribed to the other Fulvia, and ſo they may have reduced thoſe two Fulvia's into one. I muſt add in this place, the better to make the miſtreſs of Curius known, that ſhe had ſo much diſcretion and faithfulneſs towards her gallant, as not to reveal, that he was one of the accomplices, or that ſhe had learned from him what was contriving againſt the republic; neither did ſhe break

(b) See the remark [L] towards the end.

(4) Fulvia had loſt another huſband ſince Clodius; and ſo Plutarch is not exact enough.

(5) Æneid. lib. vii, ver. 805.

(6) Appian. lib. v, Bell. Civil. pag. m. 409.

(7) Ib. pag. 411.

(8) Ib. pag. 414. See alſo Dio, lib xlvii, pag. 427.

(9) Dio, lib. xlvii, pag. 410.

(10) Manius, Marc Antony's Steward. Appian, lib. v, Bell. Civ. pag. m. 395, ſays this to Fulvia, id. pag. 397.

(11) Appian. ib.

(12) See the remark [C] of the article of the firſt GLAPHYRA.

(13) Gland. Onomaſt. pag. 84.

(14) Cicero, Philipp. II, cap. xliv.

(15) Mulier nobilis, γυνὴ τῶν ἐπιφανῶν, according to Plutarch, in Cicer. pag. 868. C. From whence it appears, that Florus, who, in the firſt chapter of the fourth book, calls her Viliſſimum ſcortum, did not know her well.

(16) Salluſtius, in Bello Catil. pag. m. 63.

(17) He who made the Index of Salluſt Variorum has committed the Fault. Fulvia, ſays he, nobilis mulier cum qua Catilinæ vetus ſtupri conſuetudo fuerat, conjurationem ejus clam noctu profecta Ciceroni detexit.

She had the pleaſure of gratifying her revenge on Cicero's tongue [E], which had ſo much abuſed her huſband in the Philippics. They, who ſay ſhe was Marc Antony's firſt wife, are miſtaken [F]. If they had had the patience to examine things exactly, they break with him; but, on the contrary, it ſeems ſhe was more intimate with him than before. They made uſe of her, to win her gallant by a thouſand fair promiſes (18); and Curius employed her to diſcover to Cicero the deſigns of the conſpirators: Curius ubi intelligit quantum periculum Conſuli impendeat, propere per Fulviam Ciceroni dolum qui parabatur enunciat (19). So true it is, that every thing is of uſe in a government; and that, in particular, courtezans and ladies of intrigue ſometimes do the public great ſervice by their addreſs of ſearching out the moſt important ſecrets. It is true, that by this means they ſometimes ruin the affairs of their country, by revealing the ſecrets of the cabinet to a liberal enemy. But ſuch is the condition of human things, that what may be hurtful, may alſo be uſeful. I cannot tell whether the Fulvia, mentioned by Valerius Maximus, is the ſame that Salluſt ſpeaks of. Glandorpius is not far from that opinion; but others rather aſcribe this adventure to our Fulvia, ſo much are they inclined to believe her capable of all manner of diſorders. However it be, here is the whole ſtory. An officer of the tribunes of the people gave a feaſt to his maſters, and to the conſul Metellus Scipio, and entertained them with an infamous diverſion: he brought into their company two Roman ladies, who had each of them fathers and husbands; one of them was called Mucia, and the other Fulvia. ‘ Æque flagitioſum illud convivium ‘ quod Gemellus tribunicius viator ingenui ſanguinis ‘ ſed officii intra ſervilem habitum deformis, Metello ‘ Scipioni conſuli ac tribunis plebis magno cum rubore civitatis comparavit. Lupanari enim domi ſuæ ‘ inſtituto Muciam & Fulviam, tum à patre tum à ‘ viro utramque abductam, & nobilem puerum Saturninum in eo proſtituit (20). Metellus Scipio's conſulſhip falls in the year 701 of Rome, eleven years after Catiline's conſpiracy: now how is it likely, that Salluſt's Fulvia ſhould have, at that time, both father and husband? our Fulvia was then proſecuting the revenge of Clodius; and Milo, who had murthered Clodius, was tried for it in the year 701. How is it then likely, that his widow ſhould be married again under that conſul? we know beſides, that, in 696, her father was dead, and her mother married again to Murena (21).

[E] She had the pleaſure of gratifying her revenge on Cicero's tongue.] She ſtrangely ſeconded her cruel husband, during the maſſacres of the triumvirate; and, of her own head, either through avarice, or a ſpirit of revenge, ſhe cauſed to be put to death ſeveral perſons, ſome of whom were not ſo much as known to her huſband. Marc Antony cauſed the heads of thoſe, he had proſcribed, to be brought to him, while he was at table, and entertained his eyes a long while with that ſad ſpectacle. Cicero's head being one of thoſe, that were brought to him, he ordered it to be placed on the very pulpit, where Cicero had made ſo many ſpeeches againſt him. But, before this order was put in execution, Fulvia took that head, ſpit upon it, and, putting it in her lap, drew it's tongue, which ſhe pricked ſeveral times with her bodkin, and at the ſame time uttered a thouſand bitter invectives againſt Cicero. Ἡ δὲ δὴ Φουλβία ἔς τε τὰς χεῖρας αὐτὴν πρὶν ἀποκομισθῆναι, ἐδέξατο καὶ ἐμπικραναμένη οἱ καὶ ἐμπτύσασα ἐπί τε τὰ γόνατα ἐπέθηκε, καὶ τὸ στόμα αὐτῆς διοίξασα τήν τε γλῶσσαν ἐξείλκυσε, καὶ ταῖς βελόναις αἷς ἐς τὴν κεφαλὴν ἐχρῆτο κατεκέντησε πολλὰ ἅμα καὶ μιαρὰ προσεπισκώπτουσα. Fulvia autem id caput acceptum priuſquam auferretur, inſultanſque amarulentis verbis & conſpuens, genibus ſuis impoſuit: oriquc ejus aperto linguam extractam acubus (quales ſecum comendi capitis cauſa mulieres ferunt) compunxit, additis crebris ac turpibus opprobriis (22). Here is a ſtrange ſort of a wicked woman! there are ſome villains, whom we are in a manner forced to admire, becauſe they ſhew a kind of greatneſs of ſoul in their very crimes; but here we ſee nothing but brutality, meanneſs, and baſeneſs, and we cannot but be moved with indignation and contempt. Neverthleleſs Mr Moreri acquaints his readers, that it is affirmed, that Fulvia had ſome generoſity.

[F] They, who ſay ſhe was Marc Antony's firſt wife, are miſtaken.] Mr Moreri and Mr Chevreau have committed this fault; the firſt in the article of Marc Antony, and the other in his Hiſtory of the World, page 105 of the ſecond tome of the edition of Holland. Marc Antony's firſt wife was called Fadia, whom he married, becauſe ſhe was a fortune, without regarding, that her father was as contemptible by the blemiſhes of his perſon, as by the meanneſs of his extraction. ‘ Tuæ conjugis bonæ feminæ, locu- ‘ pletis quidem certe, Bambalio quidam pater, homo ‘ nullo numero. Nihil illo contemptius, qui propter ‘ hæſitantiam linguæ, ſtuporemque cordis, cognomen ‘ ex contumelia traxerit. At avus nobilis, Tuditanus ‘ nempe ille qui cum palla & cothurnis nummos po- ‘ pulo de roſtris ſpargere ſolebat. Vellem hanc con- ‘ temptionem pecuniæ ſuis reliquiſſet. —— One Bam- ‘ balio, a man of no account, is father of your wife, ‘ a very good woman, at leaſt a rich one. Nothing ‘ can be more deſpicable than that man, who, by rea- ‘ ſon of an heſitation of ſpeech, and ſtupidity, owes his ‘ very name to contempt. But his grandfather was no- ‘ ble, to wit, that Tuditanus, who, in his robes and ‘ buskins, uſed to fling money from the roſtra among ‘ the people. I wiſh his poſterity inherited this con- ‘ tempt of money. This is what Cicero advances in his third Philippic, at page 782 of my edition cap. VI. A little after he affirms, that this wife of Marc Antony was daughter to a freedman (23): Ipſe ex libertini filia ſuſceperit liberos. He had ſaid the ſame thing towards the beginning of the ſecond Philippic: ‘ Hoc idcirco commemoratum à te puto, ut te in- ‘ fimo ordini commendares: cum te omnes recorda- ‘ rentur libertini generum, & liberos tuos, nepotes ‘ Q. Fadii (24) libertini hominis fuiſſe. —— ‘ This I ſuppoſe you mentioned, to ingratiate yourſelf ‘ with the mob; ſince every one remembers, that you ‘ are ſon-in-law to a freedman, and that your ſons are ‘ grandſons of Q. Fadius, a freedman.’ Glandorpius (25) has reaſon to ſuſpect, that Marc Antony and Fadia's children were not long-lived, ſince neither Cicero, nor any other writer, mention them by their names. We only know, that the hoſtage, ſent by Marc Antony to Cæſar's murtherers, was ſon of Marc Antony and Fadia; for Cicero will not ſuffer us to doubt of it: Pacem haberemus quæ erat facta per obſidem puerum nobilem Marci Antonii filium, M. Bambalionis nepotem (26). Glandorpius has been ſtrangely miſtaken, in believing, that Bambalio was Fulvia's father, and that the paſſage of the third Philippic does not wholly relate to Fadia. This falſe conceit has occaſioned his raſh cenſuring Maturantius, for not having divided between two wives of Marc Antony the words of Cicero: ‘ Ex iis quæ retulimus quivis fa- ‘ cile perſpexerit quam probe Franciſcus Maturantius, ‘ vir alioquin doctiſſimus, Fadiæ Bambalionem patrem ‘ tribuat, eamque fuiſſe Tuſculanam aſſerat. Deinde ‘ quæ Ciceroni Philipp. 3. de Fulvia ſeorſim & Fa- ‘ dia dicuntur, ipſe cuncta miſcens ad unam Fadiam ‘ omnia referat (27). —— From what I have related ‘ it is manifeſt with how little ground Francis Ma- ‘ turantius, otherwiſe a very learned man, makes Bam- ‘ balio the father of Fadia, and aſſerts, that ſhe was ‘ of Tuſculum. Laſtly, what Cicero, in his third Phi- ‘ lippic, ſays of Fulvia and Fadia diſtinctly, he con- ‘ founds, and applies wholly to Fadia.’ Maturantius is in the right in all this; and I cannot ſufficiently wonder how Paulus Manucius could believe, that theſe words of the third Philippic, at avus nobilis, &c. relate to Fulvia. If they did, there would be reaſon to ſay, that Cicero has put his words and thoughts in a very ill order: But if we conſider it never ſo little, we ſhall plainly ſee, that Cicero reproaches Marc Antony only with his marriage with Fadia. He obſerves I. That that woman's father was a man of the meaneſt extraction: II. He raiſes an objection to himſelf, viz. that that woman's grand-father was nobly born: III. He relates the public extravagancies and follies of that grand-father. There had been nothing more ridiculous, than to ſuppoſe, with relation to the marriage with Fulvia, that, if Marc Antony did not marry beneath himſelf, it was becauſe Fulvia's grandfather,

(18) Neque Ciceroni ad cavendum dolus aut aſtutiæ deerant, namque à principio conſulatus ſui multa per Fulviam pollicendo effecerat, ut Q. Curius de quo paulo ante memoravi conſilia Catilinæ ſibi proderet. Salluſt. ubi ſupra, pag. 70.

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 75.

(20) Valer. Maximus, lib. ix, cap. i, n. 8.

(21) See Cicero, Orat. pro domo ſua.

(22) Dio, lib. xlvii, pag. 378.

(23) Or grand-daughter; for the word libertinus, which properly ſignified only the ſon of a bondman made free, was afterwards indifferently given to the man himſelf, who was made free, through the ill cuſtom people have of ſtretching honourable titles, and of being civil at the expence of words.

(24) He calls him Caïus Fadius, epiſt. xi, ad Attic. lib xvi. Vidi ibi Corradum, who conjectures, that the tranſcribers have changed the C into Q, or vice verſa. But what ſhall we ſay, when we ſee, that Cicero, below, citat. (26), calls him M. Bambalio? There are Manuſcripts which, inſtead of Q. Fadii, have M. Fundi.

(25) Gland. Onomaſt. pag. 83.

(26) Cicero, Philipp. II.

(27) Gland. ubi ſupra.

they would have known, that, when he married her, he had had as many wives, as ſhe huſbands [G], and that he had put away Antonia, his ſecond wife, under pretence of adultery, without having the leaſt regard to his uncle, who was Antonia's father. Neither grandfather, by the mother's ſide, was nobly born. Now it is plain, that, if the objection, which Cicero propoſes to himſelf, relates to the marriage with Fulvia, the proof of Marc Antony's not having married beneath himſelf, would be grounded on the noble extraction of the maternal grand-father of his wife (28): and therefore it is not credible, that the objection relates to that marriage. I have ſaid, that it had been very ridiculous to have had recourſe to the nobility of Fulvia's maternal grand-father, to clear Marc Antony from marrying beneath himſelf, which I thus eaſily prove. Fulvia was of one of the moſt ancient and illuſtrious families of Rome. The Fulvii traced their origin to a diſciple of Hercules in matters of religion. This was Fulvia's nobility. Glandorpius ſhould not have thruſt her father out of the family of the Fulvii: that woman had a brother, who was really of that ancient family, and who was made high-prieſt by the intereſt of Clodius his ſiſter's huſband (29), and whoſe wife was married again to Murena (30). It is from Cicero we learn all this: ' Te ad ' tuum affinem non delectum à te, ſed relictum à ' cæteris contuliſti, quem ego tamen credo, ſi eſt ortus ab illis, quos memoriæ proditum eſt, ab ipſo Hercule perfuncto jam laboribus ſacra didiciſſe, in viri ' fortis ærumnis, non ita crudelem fuiſſe, ut &c (31). ' —— You had recourſe to your kinſman, not choſen ' by you, but abandoned by the reſt; who, if he be ' deſcended from thoſe, who are ſaid to have learned ' religious rites from Hercules, after his toils were ' over, would not, I am perſuaded, have been ſo cruel, ' as to, &c. Muſt he not have been out of his wits, if he had pretended, that Marc Antony could not have alledged Fulvia's paternal nobility of extraction to thoſe who ſhould have accuſed him of having married beneath himſelf?

There remains a conſiderable difficulty. Aſconius Pedianus relates, that the laſt witneſſes that were examined againſt Milo, the murderer of Clodius, were Sempronia Tuditana, and Fulvia; the latter the widow of Clodius; the other, Fulvia's mother. Ultimæ teſtimonium dixerunt Sempronia Tuditani filia, ſocrus P. Clodii, & uxor Fulvia, & fletu ſuo magnopere eos qui adſtabant, commoverunt (32). I anſwer, that this difficulty, how great ſoever it be, cannot ſupport Manucius's opinion againſt my objections. Why could not Fadia and Fulvia both deſcend from one Sempronius Tuditanus? there might be ſeveral brothers, and ſeveral couſin-germans, who were all called Sempronius Tuditanus; being diſtinguiſhed only by their fore-names. Fadia's mother might be the daughter of one of them, and Fulvia's mother deſcend from another. At the worſt, I had rather ſay, that Cicero confounded the maternal grandfather of Fulvia with Fadia's maternal grandfather, than to ſay, that he looked upon Fulvia as an under-match for Marc Antony. I ſhall not omit ſaying, that Glandorpius condemns what he himſelf is guilty of. He finds fault, that one ſhould underſtand, of one ſingle wife of Marc Antony, the whole paſſage of the third Philippic; and yet he applies it entirely to Fulvia; for he pretends, that ſhe was Bambalio's daughter, and Tuditanus's grand-daughter; and ſo he leaves nothing in Cicero's words, that may ſuit with Fadia. For the reſt, it is a great abſurdity to pretend, that Bambalio, a man of the meaneſt condition (33), ſhould be Fulvia's father. This is no leſs than to aſcribe to Cicero the greateſt faults which a writer can commit. For thereby he muſt have retorted the reproach of an under-match (34), by accuſing Marc Antony of having married a lady of the firſt quality; for that is the character he gives of the family Fulvia (35), when he enquires into an action of Clodius's brother-in-law. This is to ſay, that he could draw no advantage from the meanneſs and folly of the father, to form prejudices againſt the conduct of the ſon; and that, among ſo many invectives, which he has uttered againſt Clodius, he has never reproached him with an alliance, which afforded ſo much room for ſatire. Let us conclude from all this, that Glandorpius did not rightly cenſure Maturantius; and here are new proofs of it. He hath not taken notice of three groſs errors of Maturantius on theſe words of Cicero, At avus nobilis, Tuditanus nempe ille. Maturantius fancies, in the firſt place, that that grand-father is Bambalio's grand father (36): 2. that that grand-father was like Tuditanus, but not Tuditanus himſelf (37): 3. that he was the grand-father of Marc Antony's wife. The laſt of theſe three faults is but a few lines diſtant from the firſt: ſo true it is, that authors are apt to contradict themſelves in the ſame page. The reaſon of it is, becauſe they ſometimes beſtow all their attention upon each period, ſo that they cannot think on what goes before.

I am much more concerned for an error, which I have found in Dion. That hiſtorian has inſerted in his work, a direct ſpeech of Cicero againſt Marc Antony; of which none can deny but he is himſelf the author, ſince we have ſtill Cicero's Philippics, and may convince ourſelves, by comparing them with Dion's words, that the ſpeech of the latter is not the tranſlation of any of the Philippics. It is therefore Dion, who has forged the ſpeech. I grant him that liberty; but, at leaſt, he ought to have ſaid nothing that was not taken from Cicero's Latin. Now here are two things, which he has manifeſtly falſified; I have not examined the reſt. He ſuppoſes, that Cicero reproached Marc Antony with not having recalled his uncle, neither during Cæſar's life, nor after Cæſar's death; and with loving Bambalio, a man ſufficiently defamed by his very name. Τίς γὰρ οὐκ οἶδε ταῦθ' ὅτι πολλοὺς φεύγοντας καὶ ἐπὶ τοῦ Καίσαρος, καὶ μετὰ ταῦτα ἐκ τῶν γραμμάτων δὴ τῶν ἐκείνου ἀγαγών, οὐκ ἐπεκούρησε τῷ θείῳ . . . . καὶ τὸν Βαμβαλίωνα τὸν καὶ ἀπ' αὐτῆς τῆς ἐπωνυμίας ἐπίβοητον ἀγαπᾷ. Id vero neminem latet, quod quum multos in exilium miſſos non Cæſare modo ſuperſtite, ſed defuncto etiam, ex libellis ſcilicet ejus in urbem reduxerit, patruo ſuo non ſubvenerit . . . . Bambalionem etiam ipſius cognomenti ratione infamem diligit (38). Cicero objected no ſuch thing to his adverſary. Does he not expreſsly ſay, that Caius Antonius was in the ſenate, when his nephew made a ſpeech againſt Dolabella? Cæſar was then alive. Neither did Cicero reproach Marc Antony with being a friend to Bambalio, who, in all probability, was dead. He contented himſelf to ſay, that he, who had married the daughter of an inhabitant of Tuſculum, the daughter, I ſay, of Bambalio, ſo called in contempt, was much in the wrong to alledge, that Octavius's mother was a native of Aricia. Should not theſe two falſifications make us ſuſpect the truth of a thouſand things, which Dion has related, and of which we have not the originals?

[G] Marc Antony had had as many wives, as ſhe huſbands.] We are going to ſee, that thoſe, who have ſaid, that Fulvia was Marc Antony's ſecond wife (39), have committed an error not much leſs than that of Mr Chevreau. Marc Antony's ſecond wife was called Antonia; ſhe was his couſin-german, and daughter of Caius Antonius, Cicero's colleague in the conſulſhip. He did not keep her long: for, upon pretence that ſhe had an amorous intrigue with Dolabella, he put her away. He was not aſhamed to publiſh himſelf before the ſenate, and before his father-in-law, the affront his wife had done him; and he mentioned that injury among the reaſons, for which he had broke with Dolabella. We muſt ſee how Cicero inveighs againſt him upon that account: Cicero, I ſay, who pretends, that Antonia was not guilty. ' Omnibus eum (Caium ' Antonium) contumeliis oneraſti, quem patris loco, ' ſi ulla in te pietas eſſet, colere debebas: filiam ejus, ' ſororem tuam, ejeciſti, alia conditione quæſita, & ' ante perſpecta. Non eſt ſatis, probri inſimulaſti pudiciſſimam feminam: quid eſt, quod addi poſſit? ' contentus eo non fuiſti: frequentiſſimo ſenatu Kalendis Jan. ſedente patruo, hanc tibi eſſe cum Dolabella cauſſam odii dicere auſus es, quod ab eo ſorori, ' & uxori tuæ ſtuprum eſſe oblatum comperiſſes. Quis ' interpretari poteſt, impudentiorne, qui in ſenatu; ' an improbior, qui in Dolabellam; an impurior, qui ' patre audiente; an crudelior, qui in illam miſeram ' tam ſpurce tam impie dixeris (40)? —— You have ' loaded him (Caius Antonius) with all kinds of reproach, ' whom, if you had any piety in you, you ought to regard as a father: you have divorced his daughter, ' your ſiſter, having before had another match in view.

' Nor

---

(28) Manucius and Glandorpius pretend, that Sempronia, daughter of Tuditanus, was Fulvia's mother.

(29) Cicero, pro domo ſua, fol. 180. A.

(30) Ibid. fol. 180. A.

(31) Id. ibid. He ſpeaks to Clodius: he had ſaid, fol. 180. A, how Clodius had employed his wife's brother, whom he had made high-prieſt. He ſays, in the oration pro Murena, fol. 148. A. That the ſon of Murena's wife is ſummo loco adoleſcens.

(32) Aſc. Pedian. Argum. Orat. pro Milone, pag. m. 192.

(33) Homo nullo numero: nihil illo contemptius.

(34) Cicero, in this paſſage of the third Philippic, confutes what M. Antony reproached Octavius with, viz. the being a country-woman's ſon, Aricinam Matrem.

(35) In Orat. pro domo ſua.

(36) Occurrit dicens Bambalionis hujus avum nobilem fuiſſe. Reſpondet, ſtultumque fuiſſe dicit, Tuditano illi ſimilem de quo Valerius Maximus. Maturantius, in Philipp. III, fol. m. 101.

A Reflexion on a falſity of Dion.

(37) Vellem ita contemneretis & vos pecuniam, ſicut ille contempſit uxoris tuæ avus. Ibid.

(38) Dion lib. xlv, ſub fin.

(39) Glandorp. Onom. pag. 83, affirms it.

(40) Philipp. II, cap. xxxviii.

Neither did he ſhew much regard to him upon other occaſions [H]. As brave, violent, and brutiſh as he was, yet he found his maſter in Fulvia; who made him ſerve ſo ſevere an apprenticeſhip of obedience (c), that Cleopatra, who found him ready broke and tamed, had no great trouble to keep him under. He had at laſt the reſolution to be terribly angry with Fulvia, and to ſhew her ſo plainly either his contempt or his hatred, that ſhe fell ſick, and died upon it (d). A rhetorician, who had rallied her upon her having one cheek bigger than the other, became thereby more acceptable to Marc Antony than he was before (e); which is a ſhrewd ſign, that ſhe had no great ſhare in her huſband's tenderneſs. She had merited it, if the imitating her huſband's eagerneſs

'Nor is this enough; you have wounded the reputation of a moſt modeſt lady. What can be added? This did not ſatisfy you: in full ſenate, and in preſence of your uncle, on the Kalends of January, you had the aſſurance to ſay, that the reaſon of your hatred to Dolabella was, that you had diſcovered an intrigue between him, and your ſiſter and wife. Shall I charge you moſt with impudence, in publiſhing your fancied diſgrace in the ſenate; with injuſtice, in imputing it to Dolabella; with immodeſty in doing it in the hearing of your father in-law; or with cruelty, in expoſing the character of an unfortunate lady?' Plutarch will help us to diſcover at what time Marc Antony was divorced from his wiſe Antonia. He ſays (41), that Dolabella, a tribune of the people, deſiring to get ſome laws enacted, intreated Marc Antony his friend to ſecond him. Marc Antony not only refuſed it; but, upon ſuſpicion that his wife Antonia had ſuffered herſelf to be debauched by Dolabella, he put her away, and took part with the enemies of that tribune, to ruin all his projects. Cæſar returned to Rome, pardoned Dolabella; and, having been made conſul for the third time, he aſſociated to himſelf, in that dignity, Lepidus, and not Marc Antony (42). From this we learn, that Dolabella's troubles happened before the year 707 of Rome (43); and therefore we may place them a year after the battle of Pharſalia, which is alſo the year of Antonia's divorce. Now Marc Antony having another match in view, before he put away Antonia (44), it is very probable, that his deſire of marrying Fulvia was one of the reaſons, which occaſioned that divorce. If we believe Plutarch, that marriage was contracted whilſt Cæſar made war in Afric in the year 707; and ſo Fulvia is Marc Antony's third wiſe. It is without any ground, that Glandorpius (45) affirms, that Marc Antony, having put her away, married Antonia; and that, being ſoon diſguſted with the latter, he was divorced from her, and then retook Fulvia.

[H] Neither did he ſhew much regard to him upon other occaſions.] I make this remark, to diſcharge my promiſe (46). We have heard Cicero reproaching Marc Antony with having been ſo barbarous as to ſet forth Antonia's leudneſs in a full ſenate, that lady's father being preſent. This was a great mortification for that poor father; but this was not the firſt time his nephew had uſed that poor man ill. Had he not left him in baniſhment, when he recalled a great number of exiles? Cicero did not forget to reproach him with it (47): 'Omnia perfecit quæ Senatus ſalva repub. ne fieri poſſent perfecerat: cujus tamen ſcelus in ſcelere cognoſcite: reſtituebat multos calamitoſos, in his patrui nulla mentio. Si ſeverus, cur non in omnes? Si miſericors, cur non in ſuos? —— He did every thing, which the ſenate, before the commonwealth was overturned, had taken care ſhould not be done: yet one vile action, which ſurpaſſed the reſt, deſerves mentioning: he recalled ſeveral miſerable exiles; but, among theſe, took no notice of his uncle. If he muſt be ſevere, why not towards all; if compaſſionate, why not towards thoſe of his own family?' There are other unſeemly things; Cicero ſets them forth, when he mentions a law for recalling exiles, which was publiſhed after Cæſar's death, and ſuppoſed to be made by him. Cicero asks, among other things, why three or four perſons were ſtill left in baniſhment (48)? 'Cur tua miſericordia ſimili non fruuntur? Cur eos habes in loco patrui, de quo ferre, cum de reliquis ferres, noluiſti? Quem etiam ad cenſuram petendam impuliſti, eamque petitionem comparaſti quæ & riſus hominum & querelas moveret. Cur autem ea comitia non habuiſti? An quia tribunus plebis fulmen ſiniſtrum nunciabat? Cum tuâ quid intereſt, nulla auſpicia ſunt, cum tuorum, tum ſis religioſus. Quid! eundem in ſeptemviratu nonne deſtituiſti? Intervenit enim: Quid metuiſti credo? ne ſalvo capite negare non poſſes. Omnibus eum contumeliis oneraſti quem patris loco, &c. —— Why do they not meet with the ſame compaſſion from you? Why do you deal with them as you did with your uncle, whom you excepted out of the general law? whom likewiſe you perſuaded to demand the cenſorſhip, and procured him ſuch competitors, as excited the laughter and complaint of the people. But why did you not hold that election? Was it becauſe the tribune of the people denounced an unlucky omen? when your own intereſt is concerned, you diſregard omens; when that of your relations, you are then ſuperſtitious. What! did you not forſake him likewiſe as to the ſeptemvirate? you loaded him with all kind of injuries, whom, as a father, &c.' You will find above (49) the ſequel of this paſſage. Manucius has found this full of obſcurity. 'Hic mihi, quod aiunt, tenebræ ſunt. Non enim video, quo modo C. Antonius Kalendis Jan. vivo Cæſare in ſenatu eſſe potuerit: cum eum poſt Cæſaris interitum, id eſt, poſt latam ab Antonio de exſulibus legem, exſulare, ex iis verbis intelligatur; cur eos habes in loco patrui? De quo ferre, cum de reliquis ferres, noluiſti (50). —— This is to me very obſcure: for I cannot ſee how Caius Antonius could be in the ſenate, during Cæſar's life, on the kalends of January; when we underſtand by theſe words, cur eos habes, &c. that, after Cæſar's death, that is after Antony's law concerning exiles, he was in baniſhment.' There is, on one ſide, Caius Antonius neglected by his nephew, when, after Cæſar's death, all the exiles, excepting three or four, are recalled; and, on the other ſide, he is among the ſenators, when Marc Antony makes a ſpeech againſt Dolabella, before Julius Cæſar's death. It is thus Manucius conceives the thing, and therefore it is no wonder he finds ſome contradictions in it: but it is eaſy to remove them, by ſhewing him the cauſe of his pretended obſcurity. He fancies, that, when Marc Antony, after Julius Cæſar's death, alledged a pretended law of that emperor for recalling the exiles, Caius Antonius was left in baniſhment. This is not what Cicero means; but only that Marc Antony had excluded from the benefit of that pretended law, three or four wretches. Cicero asks him the reaſon of it: and, to remind him of other faults, he maliciouſly compares the exception of theſe three or four perſons, with the exception which he, Marc Antony, had made of his uncle during his tribuneſhip. Why do you uſe thoſe three or four perſons, ſays he to him, as you did your uncle, whom you did not offer to recal, when you propoſed the recalling of others? This ought to be referred to Marc Antony's tribuneſhip, which he exerciſed, whilſt Cæſar was in Spain, againſt Pompey's lieutenants, before the battle of Pharſalia. In a word, this is the ſame thing with what we have ſeen above in theſe words of Cicero; Reliquæ partes Tribunatus principiis ſimiles . . . . reſtituebat multos calamitoſos: in his patrui nulla mentio. We muſt not therefore wonder that the ſame Cicero ſhould ſay, that Caius Antonius heard in the ſenate-houſe his nephew's invectives againſt Dolabella, in which his daughter was ſo invidiouſly mentioned. I own that this is a proof of his being returned from baniſhment before Cæſar's death, ſince that invective was publickly ſpoken, to hinder the deſign Cæſar had formed of reſigning his fifth conſulſhip to Dolabella. 'Επεὶ δὲ τὸ πέμπτον ἀπεδείχθη Καῖσαρ ὕπατος, προσείλετο μὲν εὐθὺς συνάρχοντα τὸν 'Αντώνιον, ἐβούλετο δὲ τὴν ἀρχὴν ἀπειπάμενος Δολοβέλλα παρεγγυῆσαι. καὶ τοῦτο πρὸς τὴν σύγκλητον ἐξήνεγκεν. 'Αντωνίου δὲ τραχέως ἀντιπεσόντος, καὶ πολλὰ μὲν εἰπόντος κακὰ Δολοβέλλαν, οὐκ ἐλάττονα δὲ ἀκούσαντος, τότε μὲν αἰσχυνθεὶς τὴν ἀκοσμίαν ὁ Καῖσαρ ἀπηλλάγη. Creatus Cæſar quintum conſul, illico cooptavit

(c) See the remark [B].

(d) See the remark [B].

(e) Ejuſdem uxorem Fulviam cui altera bucca inflatior erat, acumen ſtili tentare dixit, nec eo minus, immo vel magis ob hoc Antonio gratus. Sueton. de claris Rhetor. cap. v.

(41) Plut. in Anton. pag. 919.

(42) Ibid. pag. 920.

(43) It is the year of Cæſar's third conſulſhip.

(44) Alia conditione quæſita & ante perſpecta Cicero, ubi ſupra.

(45) Gland. ubi ſupra, pag. 86.

(46) See, above, remark [A] of the article ANTONIUS (CAÏUS the firſt).

(47) Philipp. II, cap. xxii.

(48) Ibid. cap. xxxviii.

(49) In citat. (40).

(50) Manucius, in Philipp. II, pag. 761.

eagerneſs to get money, by the moſt unjuſt means, could have made her worthy of it. It was in Fulvia's chamber that kingdoms and provinces were ſold by auction [I]. Some think that ſhe perſuaded Marc Antony to put away his ſecond wife [K]; nevertheleſs, it does tavit collegam Antonium. Intendit autem abdicare ſe magiſtratu, & cedere Dolabellæ, idque ad ſenatum retulit: verum repugnante aſpere Antonio, multaque maledicta in Dolabellam congerente, nec pauciora audiente, illius indignitatis Cæſar pudore rem in præſentia omiſit (51). But there does not reſult from thence any juſt reaſon to cenſure Cicero; for there is nothing in his Philippics which imports, that Marc Antony left his uncle in baniſhment after Cæſar's death. That which is certain, is, that Caïus Antonius muſt have been recalled in the time which elapſed between the beginning of Cæſar's dictatorſhip, and his fifth conſulſhip, which fell in the year 709; and he was made dictator, upon his return to Rome, after the defeat of Pompey's lieutenants. He began the functions of his dictatorſhip with recalling the exiles (52): I know not whether Caïus Antonius was at that time comprehended amongſt them; but I know that Dion (53) affirms, that Milo alone was not recalled. Glandorpius ſays, that Caïus Antonius, after Julius Cæſar's death, was reſtored by Marc Antony his nephew, who was conſul. This is not true, with relation to Caïus Antonius's return to Rome, and his privilege of going to the ſenate-houſe, ſince he ſat with the ſenators, and heard his nephew's invective againſt Dolabella, during the life of Julius Cæſar. We learn from Strabo, that that exile remained in the iſland of Cephalonia, and kept it under his obedience. He was building there a city, but had not time to finiſh it; for, having obtained leave to return home, he formed greater deſigns, and died before he put them in execution (54).

I have read a French tranſlation of the ſecond Philippic (55), where the author has ſomewhat confounded the paſſage I have cleared in this place. He ſays, in the 166th page, that Caïus Antonius was among thoſe three or four wretches, whom his nephew had left in baniſhment; and yet, in the 168th, he affirms, that he was preſent at the ſpeech, which Marc Antony made in a full ſenate upon the firſt of January. It is needleſs to ſhew, that theſe two things are contradictory: every body is ſenſible of it; and I have already ſaid how this difficulty may be removed. Maturantius (56) is guilty of more faults than that tranſlator. Firſt, he believes, that Caïus Antonius was exiled by Julius Cæſar, for having followed Pompey's party: than which nothing is more falſe. Caïus Antonius was accuſed, in 694, of two crimes, viz. of being Catiline's accomplice, and of extortion (57). Cicero, who pleaded for him, loſt his cauſe. Secondly, Maturantius affirms, that Marc Antony, when he recalled the exiles after Cæſar's death, did not endeavour to get Caïus Antonius recalled. Thirdly, he affirms, that Marc Antony, having at laſt recalled his uncle, perſuaded him to ſtand candidate for the cenſorſhip, and raiſed againſt him very mean competitors, in order to expoſe him to laughter. This is to aſcribe a nonſenſical impertinence to Cicero: for if he had ſaid, that Caïus Antonius was not recalled from baniſhment, when his nephew, after Cæſar's death, recalled moſt exiles, he had ſaid two contradictory things in the ſame harangue, viz. I. that, at the time he ſpoke, Marc Antony had not yet recalled his uncle; for it is plain, that the three or four wretches, whom Marc Antony had deprived of the benefit of the pretended law of Julius Cæſar, were actually in exile, when Cicero pronounced the ſecond Philippic. II. That Marc Antony, having recalled his uncle ſome time before, had faudulently engaged him him to ſue for the cenſorſhip. If I was not convinced of it by experience, I could never have believed, that thoſe, who have commented upon claſſic authors, ſhould not perceive the contradictory abſurdities, which they ſometimes put together.

[I] It was in Fulvia's chamber, that kingdoms were ſold by auction.] Every one knows what revolutions happened among the Romans upon Cæſar's death. At firſt, Marc Antony did not think himſelf ſafe in Rome; and, not many days after, it was he who was dreaded there; it was for fear of him, that Cæſar's murtherers fled. It cannot be expreſſed how many unjuſt things he did to heap up money, under the falſe pretence, that Cæſar had ordered ſuch and things to be done. He forged theſe orders, and took care to be well paid for it: It was in that manner he cheated Dejotarus's embaſſadors. He forged a pretended order of Cæſar, by virtue of which Dejotarus was to be reſtored: but he cauſed the embaſſadors to ſign, in his wife's chamber, a bond for a great ſum (58). Cicero has deſcribed, with his uſual eloquence, the prodigious venality, which Marc Antony and his wife introduced into the commonwealth: and, when we know beſides, Fulvia's character, we are apt to fancy, upon reading Cicero's words, that we ſee her ſelling, in her chamber, provinces and kingdoms, with the ſame greedineſs of gain, which is natural to women, that ſell, in a ſhop, ribbons, or cloth by the yard. ‘ Quid illi immanes quæſtus? ſerendi ne? quos M. Antonii tota exhauſit domus. Decreta falſa vendebat: regna, civitates, immunitates in æs accepta pecunia jubebat incidi. Hæc ſe ex commentariis Cæſaris, quorum ipſe auctor erat, agere dicebat. Calebant in interiore ædium parte totius reipubl. nundinæ: mulier ſibi felicior, quam viris, auctionem provinciarum, regnorumque faciebat (59). —— Can we bear with the extravagant gains of Marc Antony's whole family? He ſold unjuſt decrees: he bartered kingdoms, ſtates, and immunities for money. All this he pretended to do by virtue of Cæſar's brief inſtructions, which he himſelf had forged. In the innermoſt apartments of his houſe was held a general mart of the commonwealth; where his wife, more ſucceſsful for herſelf, than her husbands, put up kingdoms and provinces to auction.’ I think that both husband and wife were equally, like Catiline, Alieni appetens, ſui profuſus (60); and knew as well how to ſquander away money, as to get it. Fulvia was not worth a groat, a year after thoſe rich auctions: ſo that Pomponius Atticus was obliged to paſs his word for her every where, and to lend her great ſums (61).

[K] Some think, that Fulvia perſuaded Marc Antony to put away his ſecond wife.] They ground their opinion on theſe words of Cicero; Filiam ejus ſororem tuam ejeciſti alia conditione quæſita & ante perſpecta. Which ſignifies, that, before Antonia's divorce, her husband had ſo well concerted meaſures, that he was well acquainted with the woman he was to marry next. It is, at leaſt, very likely, that Cicero had ſome ſhrewd meaning in his ante perſpecta; and that, when he mentioned a certain deſign, contrived by Marc Antony in the houſe of Clodius (62), he meaned, that he had endeavoured to lie with Fulvia, Clodius's wife. Nevertheleſs, I reject Manucius's thought about the word conditio, employed by Cicero. That learned commentator believes, that Cicero meant, that Marc Antony had viewed, or cauſed another to view for him, all the parts of the body of the woman he deſigned to marry. He thinks, that the Latin phraſe, quærere conditionem, does not only ſignify to look for a match, but likewiſe to inſpect the moſt ſecret parts, which are the object of love, and make a ſtrict review of them, in order to avoid the ſurprize of miſreckoning, to which they may be expoſed, who buy a pig in a poke, if I may uſe that proverbial expreſſion. How long ſoever Manucius's paſſage is, I think myſelf obliged to tranſcribe it, that my reader may not object to me, that it is eaſy to reject and confute a man's opinion, when we either ſuppreſs or enervate his reaſons. ‘ Invenio apud veteres uſurpari ſolitum hoc loquendi genus, condiciones quærere, de iis, qui mulieres ad concubitum appetentes, prius vel ipſi, vel per amicos inſpiciebant quales eſſent, num candor in corpore, num lævitas, num ſucci plenæ; denique num appetentis libidini reſponderent, ut eas ne acciperent, aut admitterent, niſi prius hoc tanquam experimentum cepiſſent. Id, ut dixi, vocabant, condiciones quærere. Itaque exprobravit Antonius Auguſto, id, quod Suetonius litteris prodidit, condiciones quæſitas per amicos, qui matres familias, & adultas virgines denudarent, atque perſpicerent, tamquam Thoranio mangone vendente. Et, quod apud eundem Suetonium ſcriptum eſt, Cæſar ad retinendam Pompeii neceſſitudinem, ac voluntatem, Octaviam, ſororis ſuæ neptem, condicione ei detulit: facta ſcilicet inſpiciendi poteſtate, ut niſi probatam, non acciperet. Arnobius quoque, ſcriptor in primis eruditus & reconditarum rerum notitia refertus, libro iv, adverſus REFUTATION of Manucius's opinion about the phraſe, quærere conditiones.

---

(51) Plutarch, in Antonio, pag. 921. A.

(52) Id. in Cæſare, pag. 725. D.

(53) Lib. xli, pag. 191.

(54) Strabo, lib. x, pag. 314.

(55) Made by F. P. G. an advocate in the parliament of Paris; and printed at Paris, in 1685.

(56) In Philipp. II, fol. 82.

(57) See Dion, lib. xxxviii, pag. 71, & Cicero, in Orat. pro Cœlio & in Vatinium.

(58) Syngrapha H S centies per legatos viros bonos, ſed timidos & imperitos, ſine Sexti, ſine reliquorum hoſpitum regis ſententia facta in Gynæceo: quo in loco plurimæ res venierunt & veneunt. Cicero, Philipp. II, cap. xxxvii. See alſo Ep. ad Att. xii, lib. xiv.

(59) Id. Philipp. v, cap. iv.

(60) Salluſt. in Catilin.

(61) Corn. Nepos in vita Attici, cap. ix.

(62) Intimus eſt in tribunatu Clodio . . . . cujus etiam domi jam tum quiddam molitus eſt: quid dicam ipſe optime intelligit. Philipp II, cap. xix. Maturantius ſays thereupon, Fulviam credo Clodii uxorem de coitu appellavit, aut eam adulteravit. Manucius ſays, De ſtupranda ejus uxore.

does not ſeem probable, that he married her immediately after his divorce: It is rather apparent,

‘ adverſus gentes, Dei uxores, inquit, ducunt condicionibus ante quæſitis. Sic de Fauſtina quærente ſibi condiciones in viris, ut cum iis, quorum condiciones probaſſet, concumberet, dixit Capitolinus in Antonino Philoſ. multi ferunt, Commodum omnino ex adulterio natum: ſiquidem Fauſtinam, ſatis conſtet, apud Cajetam condiciones ſibi & nauticas, & gladiatorias elegiſſe. Et Lampridius in Heliogabalo: Romæ denique nihil egit aliud, niſi ut emiſſarios haberet, qui bene vaſatos (ſic. n. lego, non naſatos) perquirerent, eoſque ad aulam perducerent, ut eorum condicionibus frui poſſet. Nec multo poſt: Lavacrum publicum in ædibus aulicis fecit, ſimul & palam populo exhibuit, ut ex eo condiciones bene vaſatorum hominum colligeret. Nec alio ſenſu accipiendum illud pro Cœlio: habes hortos ad Tiberim: ac diligenter eo loco præparaſti, quo omnis juventus natandi cauſſa venit, hinc licet condiciones quotidie legas. Quibus adductus exemplis, Quæſita, & Perſpecta, ad condicionem malo, quam ad mulierem referre: ut ſit: quæſiviſti, & ante perſpexiſti aliam condicionem, non contentus ea, quam in ſorore tua jam perſpexeras. Jam enim conſtat, condicionem eſſe partem corporis, quam vel in muliere vir, vel in viro mulier explendæ libidinis cauſſa quærit, & qua inventa fruitur (63). —— The ancients, I find, applied this phraſe Condiciones quærere to thoſe, who, before marriage, examine, either in perſon, or by their friends, the beauties or defects of their intended wife; as, whether ſhe be fair, of a ſmooth skin, or juicy; in ſhort, whether ſhe anſwers the deſires of the lover; refuſing to have any thing to ſay to her without this previous experiment. This, as I ſaid, they termed Condiciones quærere. Thus Antony, as Suetonius informs us, reproached Auguſtus, that he did, by his friends, Condiciones quærere, that is, that he employed them to ſtrip matrons and young women naked, and thoroughly examine them, as if they were expoſed to ſale by the bawd Thoranius. And we read in the ſame Suetonius, that Cæſar, to keep up his relation and friendſhip with Pompey, offered him Octavia, his ſiſter's neice, condicione, that is, with liberty to examine her, and, if not approved of, to reject her. Arnobius likewiſe, a very learned writer, and well verſed in antiquity, in his fourth book adverſus Gentes, ſays, the gods marry condicionibus ante quæſitis, having firſt examined their miſtreſſes. So likewiſe Capitolinus, in the life of Antoninus the philoſopher, ſpeaking of Fauſtina, who examined the men, (condiciones quærebat) with whom ſhe had a mind to lie, ſays, it is reported by many, that Commodus was the offspring of an adulterous bed; ſince it is ſufficiently known, that Fauſtina, at Cajeta, made choice of Sailors and Gladiators, having firſt examined them —— condiciones nauticas & gladiatorias elegiſſe. And Lampridius, in the life of Heliogabalus ſays; all he did at Rome, was, to keep emiſſaries, who looked out for proper perſons, and brought them to court, that he might examine whether they were for his purpoſe —— eorum condicionibus frui. And a little farther he ſays; he built a public bath in the palace, and admitted the people in general to it, that he might have an opportunity of examining, and ſelecting thoſe, whom he liked beſt —— condiciones colligeret. Nor are we otherwiſe to underſtand thoſe words of Cicero, in his oration pro M. Cœlio: you have gardens on the banks of the Tyber, whither all the young men repair to ſwim, and where you may every day make your choice —— condiciones legas. From which inſtances I am induced to refer the words Quæſita and Perſpecta rather to condicio, than mulier: ſo that it will be; you have made a freſh examination, (quæſiviſti & perſpexiſti aliam condicionem), not ſatisfied with what you had already found in your ſiſter. For now it is plain, that condicio means a part of the body, which a man looks for in a woman, and a woman in a man, and which both enjoy when found.’ Among all theſe paſſages, I ſee none that hinders me from being fully perſuaded, that the words Quærere condiciones ſignified the ſame thing, and no more, with our phraſes, to look out for, to chuſe a match, a lover, a miſtreſs. The firſt example Manucius alledges plainly ſhews it; for if his opinion took place, it had not been neceſſary for Suetonius (64) to add to conditiones quæſitas per amicos, theſe other words, qui matres familias & adultas virgines denudarent atque perſpicerent tanquam Thoranio mangone vendente. This addition ſhews, that the preceding words imported no more than this, he charged his friends to look out for miſtreſſes for him; and becauſe that did not expreſs the beaſtlineſs Suetonius had a mind to reproach, it was neceſſary to deſcend to the particular explanation of the enquiries, which Auguſtus impoſed upon his friends. Thus, to repreſent the cuſtom of Moſcovy, with relation to the choice of the maid, whom the Czar is to marry, it would not be enough to ſay, that people are ſent into all the provinces, with orders to look out the moſt charming and moſt lovely maids; but it would be neceſſary to go further, and to ſay how thoſe maids are viewed, ſearched, and examined. ‘ Solent autem Moſchovitæ, quum de uxore ducenda deliberant, omnium toto regno puellarum Virginum delectum habere, ac forma virtuteque, animi præſtantiores ad ſe perduci jubere, quas demum per idoneos homines fideleſque Matronas inſpiciunt, ita diligenter, ut ſecretiora quoque ab iis contrectari explorarique fas ſit. Ex iis vero, magna atque ſolicita parentum expectatione, quæ Principi ad animum reſponderit, Regiis Nuptiis digna pronunciatur. Cæteræ vero, quæ de formæ pudicitiæque & morum dignitate contenderant, ſæpe eadem die in gratiam Principum, proceribus atque militibus nubunt; ſic ut mediocri loco natæ plerumque, dum principes regiæ ſtirpis clara ſtemmata contemnunt, ad ſummum Regalis thori faſtidium, uti & Turcas Ottomannos ſolitos eſſe videmus, pulchritudinis auſpiciis evehantur (65). —— The Moſcovites, when they think of marrying, ſelect the moſt beautiful and virtuous maids, whom, by proper men and matrons, they examine ſo carefully, that they are allowed to handle and inſpect the moſt ſecret parts. She of theſe, who pleaſes the prince moſt, is declared worthy of the royal nuptials. Her competitors, in complaiſance to the prince, are often married, on the ſame day, to the grandees and officers. Thus a maid of mean extraction is often raiſed, by her beauty, to the monarch's bed, who deſpiſes high birth.’ I cannot ſufficiently wonder that Manucius ſhould have paraphraſed his ſecond example as he has done: how could he think that Cæſar ever had ſo little ſpirit, or ſo little honour? for, without mentioning the violence, which muſt have been offered to Octavia's modeſty, would it not have been a baſe condeſcention in Cæſar, and ſuch as would have expoſed him to contempt, to give Pompey, when he offered him his grand-niece, the liberty to refuſe her, if he did not like her, after he had ſeen her ſtark naked? but, to ſhew how very abſurd Manucius's opinion is, I need but refer him to theſe words of Suetonius in the ſixty third chapter of the life of Auguſtus: ‘ Hoc (Agrippa) quoque defuncto, multis ac diu etiam ex equeſtri ordine CIRCUMSPECTIS CONDITIONIBUS, Tiberium privignum ſuum elegit. —— Agrippa being dead, after conſidering of many matches among thoſe of Equeſtrian rank, he made choice of Tiberius for his ſon-in-law.’ We ought to ſay, according to Manucius, that Auguſtus, having a mind to marry again his daughter Julia, Agrippa's widow, ſpent a conſiderable time in cauſing ſeveral Roman knights to be ſtripped and examined quite naked, and that at laſt he choſe Tiberius. I ſhall not take the trouble to ſhew the extravagance of ſuch a ſuppoſition; neither ſhall I relate a hundred paſſages of good writers, which prove, that Conditio, in matter of marriage, ſignified nothing but what we call a match: Bona Conditio, a good match. I ſhall only quote ſome words out of the 257th declamation of Quintilian, which are as good as a definitive ſentence againſt Manucius: ‘ Sed neque in me ille (ſocer) probabit aliud quam pietatem; vidit fletus meos, vidit totius animi atque etiam corporis defectionem: ſic homini inter principes noſtræ civitatis numerando cœpi bona eſſe CONDITIO.—He will approve of nothing in me but my piety; he ſaw my tears, he ſaw my extreme grief: thus I began to be thought a good match by one, who is deſervedly ranked among the principal perſons of our city.’ See Gronovius's obſervations, in the ſixth chapter of the firſt book,

(63) Paulus Manucius, in II Philipp. pag. m. 759, 760.

(64) In Auguſt. cap. lxix.

(65) Paulus Jovi. in Moſchovia, pag. m. 32, 33.

apparent, that he continued for ſome time in love with a concubine [L]. Several dictionaries (f) have affirmed, that he put away Fulvia in the beginning of the triumvirate, in book, pag. 62 and 65. It muſt be confeſſed, that Manucius aſcribes a very obſcene form to the ancient ſtyle of lawyers, who, in matter of divorce, uſed this phraſe, Conditione tua non utor. Conſult Torrentius's commentary upon Suetonius, in the twenty ſeventh chapter of Cæſar's life. I am very much ſurprized, that a learned Jeſuit did not find the falſity of that criticiſm of Manucius, after he had given us ſo many examples of the ſignification of the word Conditio. ‘Quid ſit autem ante perſpicere conditionem, malo te ex Pauli Manucii in hunc locum quam ex meis verbis addiſcere. —— What the meaning of ante perſpicere conditionem is, I had rather you ſhould learn from Paulus Manucius on this paſſage, than from my words. Thus ſpeaks father Abram, in his commentary on the ſecond Philippic of Cicero, pag. 725.

But, to come to the point, are we to believe, that Cicero means, that Marc Antony caſt his eyes upon Fulvia before he put away Antonia? I am inclined to be of that opinion, tho' there ſeems to be no ſmall diſtance between Fulvia's wedding and Antonia's divorce. That is the ſubject matter of the following remark. Maturantius and Lambinus are both miſtaken here: the firſt fancying, that Marc Antony had a deſign upon Calpurnia; and the other, that he had Octavia in view. I know not who that Calpurnia may be: but, as for Octavia, I know, that ſhe was Auguſtus's ſiſter; and that ſhe did not marry Marc Antony till after Fulvia's death.

[L] . . . Marc Antony continued ſome time in love with a concubine.] That concubine was a player. Cicero calls her Cytheris, and obſerves that Marc Antony carried her with him in an open litter. ‘Hic tamen Cytheridem ſecum lectica aperta portat, altera uxorem: ſeptem præterea conjunctæ lecticæ amicarum ſunt, an amicorum? vide quam turpi leto pereamus (66). —— Yet here he carries Cytheris with him in an open litter, and his wife in another: with theſe are joined ſeven litters, carrying his miſtreſſes, or ſhall I call them his friends? behold how ſhamefully we periſh.’ Cicero wrote this whilſt Cæſar went into Spain againſt Pompey's lieutenants, that is, the firſt year of the war. Marc Antony was then tribune of the people, and had been left at Rome to keep Italy in awe, and in Cæſar's intereſt. This is the equipage, with which he travelled. Theſe are the men, to whom God thought fit to deliver up, as a prey, the moſt illuſtrious perſons in the Roman commonwealth. But that is not the queſtion. This equipage of Marc Antony was objected to him, to his very face, in the ſecond Philippic, cap. 23, and 24, in theſe fine words: ‘Ecquid enim unquam in terris tantum flagitium exſtitiſſe auditum eſt? tantam turpitudinem? tantum dedecus? vehebatur in eſſedo tribunus plebis: lictores laureati antecedebant: inter quos aperta lectica mima portabatur: quam, ex oppidis municipales homines honeſti obviam neceſſario prodeuntes, non noto illo, & mimico nomine, ſed volumniam conſalutabant. Sequebatur rheda cum lenonibus (67), comites nequiſſimi: rejecta mater amicam impuri filii, tamquam nurum, ſequebatur. O miſeræ mulieris fœcunditatem calamitoſam. Horum flagitiorum iſte veſtigiis omnia municipia, præfecturas, colonias, totam denique Italiam impreſſit. ——— Was there ever heard of ſo ſhameful a behaviour? ſuch baſeneſs? ſuch diſgrace? a tribune of the people was carried in a chariot: Lictors, crowned with lawrel, marched before him; among whom an actreſs was carried in an open litter, who was ſaluted, by the honeſt burghers of the ſeveral towns, who were obliged to come out and meet her, not by her well-known theatrical name, but by that of Volumnia, forſooth. A chariot followed with a ſcandalous retinue of cock-bawds: the poor neglected mother followed her ſon's miſtreſs, as if ſhe had been her daughter-in-law. O the unfortunate fruitfulneſs of the wretched lady! ſuch marks as theſe of his villany did he leave in every Borough, Prefecture, and Colony, in ſhort over all Italy.’ Note, that, among other indignities, Marc Antony is here reproached with having obliged his mother to follow the litter of Cytheris. In the letter I have quoted, Cicero ſays this not of Marc Antony's mother, but of his wife (68). It is hard to conceive, why Cicero ſhould ſay nothing of the indignities done to the wife, in an oration, wherein he made it his buſineſs to load his adverſary with ſhame. He might have ſaid in three words, that Marc Antony allowed no place in his own coach, either to his mother, or his wife; and that he had confined them to other coaches, which followed the litter, in which he had put his concubine. The treatment of the wife ſerved no leſs, than that of the mother, to render Marc Antony's behaviour odious; and therefore all that can be ſaid in favour of the orator's ſilence, is, that Marc Antony's wife did not accompany him in his progreſs; and that, inſtead of reading, in the letter to Atticus, altera uxorem, we muſt read, alteram uxorem: and ſo the ſenſe will be, that that tribune carried Cytheris with him, as if ſhe had been his wife; as if ſhe had been his ſecond wife. Boſius (69) and Lipſius (70) have adopted this correction. Popma maintains the contrary (71): and pretends, not only that Cytheris, and the lawful wife, were in different litters or coaches; but alſo that the lawful wife was Fulvia; which is alſo Manucius's opinion. They quote to no purpoſe (72) the ſecond Philippic, ſince the orator does not inform us, that Marc Antony placed his wife among the attendants of Cytheris. Mr Grævius has preferred Popma's opinion to that of Lipſius (73). It is certain, that Fulvia was not then Marc Antony's wife: for I have already ſhewn, that he did not marry her till after Antonia's divorce. Now Antonia was ſo far from being divorced, when Marc Antony went his progreſs through the towns of Italy with his Cytheris, that it is very likely, that ſhe was not yet his wife. He put her away when he oppoſed the deſigns of Dolabella; that is, ſome time after he was returned to Rome, after the battle of Pharſalia (74). Now the progreſs he made with Cytheris was before that return to Rome; and therefore it is probable, that, when he went upon that progreſs, he was not yet married to his couſin Antonia; for he did not keep her long. We may add, that Fulvia was not a woman that would bear, that a concubine ſhould have the honours, due to a lawful wife, paid her, during her huſband's progreſs. She had too much pride to follow, in a coach, alone, the litter of the favourite Cytheris. Let us confirm the conjecture of Boſius and Lipſius. If it had been ſaid, in the letter to Atticus, Cytheridem portat alteram uxorem, this would agree with other expreſſions, which are found in the ſecond Philippic. ‘At etiam quodam loco facetus eſſe voluiſti: quàm id te, dii boni, non decebat: in quo eſt tua culpa nonnulla, aliquid enim ſalis ab Uxore Mima trahere potuiſti (75). ——Once you endeavoured to be witty; good GOD! how ill it became you? in which you are ſomething to blame, ſince you might have borrowed a little wit from your theatrical wife.’ When Cicero relates, that, at laſt, Marc Antony broke with Cytheris, he uſes the terms, that were employed in putting away one's wife (76). Therefore it is probable, that we ought to read alteram uxorem in the letter to Atticus. Let us not forget, that the diſmiſſing of Cytheris was poſterior, not only to the battle of Pharſalia, but alſo to the war of Alexandria. Marc Antony, after the battle of Pharſalia, was ſent back into Italy, to keep the people under the yoke of the conqueror, whilſt Cæſar was in purſuit of Pompey. The actreſs Cytheris went to meet her gallant as far as Brunduſium, and returned with him to Rome, with much the ſame equipage, which Cicero has above deſcribed. ‘Veniſti Brunduſium, in ſinum quidem, & in complexum tuæ mimulæ: quid eſt? num mentior? quam miſerum eſt, id negare non poſſe, quod ſit turpiſſimum confiteri. Si te municipiorum non pudebat, ne veterani quidem exercitus? Quis enim miles fuit qui Brunduſii illam non viderit? Quis qui neſcierit veniſſe eam tibi tot dierum viam gratulatum, quis, qui non indoluerit tam ſero ſe, quam nequam hominem ſecutus eſſet, cognoſcere? Italiæ rurſus percurſatio, eadem comite mima (77). —— You arrived at Brunduſium, to throw yourſelf into the very arms of your actreſs: what! do I belie you? how wretched is it, that you cannot deny what it is

‘the

(f) That of Charles Stephens, that of Lloyd, that of Hofman, and that of Calepinus.

(66) Cicero, Epiſt. xi. lib. x, ad Atticum. In the ſixteenth letter of the ſame book, he ſpeaks thus: Hoc quidem melius quam collega noſter Antonius, cujus inter lictores lectica mima portatur. See alſo the twenty ſecond letter of the fifteenth book, where hic autem noſter Cytherius, is Marc Antony, according to the interpreters.

(67) Some famous critics pretend, that we ought to read Leonibus, becauſe it is certain, that, in that progreſs, Marc Antony had a chaiſe drawn by lions. See the article LYCORIS, rem. [C].

(68) Cytheridem ſecum lectica aperta portat, altera uxorem. Cicero, Epiſt. xi, lib. x, ad Atticum.

(69) In Epiſt. ſupra dictam Ciceronis ad Attic.

(70) Epiſtolicar. quæſt. xi, lib. iv.

(71) In eam Epiſtolam Ciceronis.

(72) It is Popma that quotes it.

(73) Sed rectius Popma cui adſtipulantur, &c. In Cicer. ad Atticum, Tom. II, pag. 164.

(74) This is plain, ex Plutarcho, in Antonio, pag. 919.

(75) Philipp. II, cap. viii.

(76) Frugifactus eſt: illam ſuam ſuas res ſibi habere juſſit ex duodecim tabulis: claves ademit: exegit. Quam porro ſpectatus civis, quam probatus, cujus ex omni vita nihil eſt honeſtius, quam quod cum mima fecit divortium. Ibid. cap. xxviii.

(77) Ib. cap xxv.

in order to marry Octavia. Which is falſe; for he did not marry the latter till after the death of Fulvia. It is not true, that Joſephus ſpeaks of this Fulvia [M].

'the greateſt diſgrace to confeſs? if you were not aſhamed of your behaviour before the corporation towns, did not your veteran forces put you to the bluſh? for what ſoldier was not a witneſs of this at Bruncuſium? which of them knew not, how many days journey ſhe came to congratulate you? which of them was not, at laſt, aſhamed of following ſo ſcandalous a leader? you traverſed Italy again, in company with the ſame actreſs.' Whilſt Cæſar was at Alexandria, inveſted the ſecond time with the dictatorſhip, Marc Antony, who was made general of the horſe, committed a thouſand extorſions at Rome: and by degrees proceeded to the audaciouſneſs of ſelling Pompey's goods by inch of candle. By that means he purchaſed the houſe and furniture of that great man, and ſoon waſted, in that very houſe, the money he got by that ſale; for he abandoned himſelf daily to the moſt expenſive debaucheries. He had ſtill his Cytheris: and he had already lodged in Pompey's houſe, when he diſmiſſed that ſtrumpet (78). Which I obſerve, to ſhew, that it is very probable that he kept her ſome time after Antonia's divorce; for Pompey's goods were not ſold, till after Cæſar was gone from Alexandria (79). Plutarch, deſcribing Marc Antony's debaucheries, his paſſion for Cytheris, &c. manifeſtly inſinuates, that thoſe diſorders continued after the battle of Pharſalia: and, becauſe he tells us, that Cæſar, being returned to Rome, ſhewed Marc Antony a great diſcontent, which produced two notable effects; he gives us room to believe, that ſome time paſſed between Antonia's divorce, and Fulvia's marriage. For, the two effects I ſpeak of, are, firſt, that Marc Antony would not follow Cæſar in his expedition into Africa; and ſecondly, that he renounced his debaucheries, changed his courſe of life, reſolved to marry, and made choice of Fulvia. Ἔοικε μέντοι τὸ πολὺ τῆς ἀβελτηρίας αὐτοῦ καὶ ἀσωτείας ἀφελεῖν ὁ Καῖσαρ, οὐκ ἀναισθήτως τὰ πλημμελήματα δεξάμενος, ἀπαλλαγεὶς γὰρ ἐκείνου τοῦ βίου, γάμῳ προσέσχε, Φουλβίαν ἀγάμενος. Apparet tamen multum de Antonii amentia & intemperantia Cæſarem, peccata ejus non diſſimulando, detraxiſſe. Siquidem explicuit ſe illa vita, animoque ad nuptias applicato Fulviam duxit (80). However, I would not deny, that, when he put away his ſecond wife, he had not already taken meaſures to marry the third; for an engagement with a courtezan does not hinder great lords from marrying: but it is probable, he made no great haſte towards that match, till Cæſar's diſcontent ſpurred him to it. Therefore I do not cenſure thoſe, who apply to Fulvia theſe words of Cicero. Sororem tuam (i. e. Antonia) ejeciſti, alia conditione quæſita & ante perſpecta.

I know ſome learned men, who apply them to Cytheris. But they are miſtaken; for there is no likelihood, that Marc Antony ever thought of marrying that woman. They were both contented to do all that married folks do, eat, drink, and lie together: and, as for concubinage, and all the exceſſes of complaiſance, which a gallant may ſhew to a miſtreſs, Marc Antony could add nothing, after Antonia's divorce, to what he had already practiſed before the battle of Pharſalia. Father Abram has ſtumbled in that place: Marc Antony, according to his opinion, when he put away his ſecond wife, had a mind to marry Cytheris, and married her in effect; and afterwards put her away, and then married Fulvia. Certe cum, ut ex Plutarcho & Cicerone conſtat, ſtatim poſt repudiatam Antoniam, Italiæ Oppida obierit cum illa mimula, non videtur adhuc de Fulviæ nuptiis cogitaſſe, ne recentem uxorem iis flagitiis offenderet. Quare nihil obſtat quo minus ille Cytheridem vere tum uxorem acceperit, ut loquitur orator, à qua tamen paulo poſt fecit divortium, & Fulviam duxit uxorem (81). Father Abram's proofs are very bad. He pretends, that Cicero and Plutarch affirm, that Marc Antony, ſoon after Antonia's divorce, went upon a progreſs, with Cytheris, through the towns of Italy; and concludes from thence, that he had not yet married Fulvia, it being improbable that he would have given, ſo ſoon, ſuch a mortification to his new bride. But he ſhould have taken notice, that Cicero gives us clearly to underſtand, that Marc Antony's progreſs with Cytheris, through the towns of Italy, preceded Antonia's divorce. Cicero obſerves, that that miſtreſs went twice upon ſuch a progreſs with her gallant: firſt, before the battle of Pharſalia; ſecondly, when Marc Antony, being returned to Rome, after that memorable action, met at Brunduſium his concubine Cytheris, who was come there to receive him. It is certain, that the quarrels of Marc Antony and Dolabella did not break out till after that ſecond progreſs of Cytheris through the towns of Italy: and it is likewiſe certain, that Antonia's divorce, and her huſband's quarrel with Dolabella, happened in the ſame time. The author, whom I confute, ought not to have laid a ſtreſs upon the word uxor, employed by Cicero with reſpect to Cytheris; for the words, we find a little after in Cicero, Rejecta mater AMICAM impuri filii TANQUAM nurum ſequebatur, evidently ſhew, that this was not a true marriage.

I do not doubt, but the reaſon, which obliged Marc Antony to diſmiſs Cytheris, was, becauſe he ſaw, that, without that, he could not conclude his marriage with Fulvia. I place that marriage in the 707th year of Rome, when Cæſar was in Africa. Two years after there was reaſon to ſuſpect, that Marc Antony continued to be in love with Cytheris; for the letter, he delivered himſelf to Fulvia, and which he pretended to bring as a meſſenger from Marc Antony, contained little elſe beſides aſſurances and proteſtations, that he was no more in love with that player, and that all the paſſion he had had for her was now turned towards Fulvia. 'Confeſtim ad eam, cujus cauſſa venerat, deducitur, eique epiſtolam tranſdidit, quam cum illa legeret flens, (erat enim amatoriè ſcripta: caput autem literarum, ſibi cum illa mima poſthac nihil futurum, omnem ſe amorem abjeciſſe illinc, atque in hanc transfudiſſe) cum mulier fleret uberius, homo miſericors ferre non potuit, caput aperuit, in collum invaſit (82). —— He is immediately introduced to her, upon whoſe account he came, and delivered her the letter; which when ſhe read with tears (for it was written in very affectionate terms, and chiefly imported, that he had quite abandoned that actreſs, and had transferred all his love to her); when, I ſay, the lady could not forbear tears, my gentleman took pity on her, diſcovered himſelf, and fell upon her neck.' He was then returning from Narbonne, whither he was gone to meet Julius Cæſar, who had defeated Pompey's ſons in Spain. Cæſari ex Hiſpania redeunti obviam longiſſime proceſſiſti (83). We ſhall ſee in the article LYCORIS, that he little remembered his promiſe. What Plutarch obſerves, touching the time of Marc Antony's marriage with Fulvia, is confirmed by the obſervation Dion has made, that Antyllus, their eldeſt ſon, received the virile gown, after his father, who was defeated at Actium, was returned into Egypt (84). According to Plutarch, the marriage was concluded in the year 707; and Dion affirms, that Antyllus received the virile gown in the year 724, when he might be ſixteen years old. He had been betrothed to Auguſtus's daughter (85); but they cauſed him to be murdered: and it was his virile gown, which expoſed him to that fatal misfortune (86). Auguſtus thought he ought not to ſuffer him to live, ſince the Egyptians might look upon him as grown to man's eſtate. Marc Antony had by Fulvia another ſon, whom I have mentioned in another place (87).

[M] It is not true that Joſephus ſpeaks of this Fulvia.] Glandorpius (88) has committed two faults in this: he refers us to the fifth chapter of the eighteenth book of the Jewiſh Antiquities, to be informed concerning Fulvia, Marc Antony's wife: and he ſays, in the ſame page, that Joſephus ſpeaks, in that place, of one Fulvia, who lived in Tiberius's time. This is a double impoſition upon the reader, by making him believe, that the Jewiſh hiſtorian has ſpoken of two Fulvia's in the ſame chapter; and that the one is ſhe, who was married to Marc Antony. The truth is, he ſpeaks but of one Fulvia, a Roman lady, married to Saturninus, who had embraced the Jewiſh religion, at the ſollicitation of four villains. She gave them all they aſked of her under the fair pretence of religion; but, when her huſband was informed, that they had kept for themſelves all the preſents, which ſhe intended ſhould be ſent to the temple of Jeruſalem, he complained of it to Tiberius; who, without diſtinguiſhing the innocent from the guilty, commanded all the Jews to depart from Rome.

---

(78) See Cicer. Philipp. II, cap. xxv, & ſeq.

(79) Cæſar Alexandria ſe recepit . . . haſta poſita pro æde Jovis Statoris, bona Cn. Pompeii . . . voci acerbiſſimæ ſubjecta præconis. Ibid. cap. xxvi.

(80) Plut. in Antonio, pag. 920. C.

(81) Abram, in Cicer. Oration. Tom. II, pag. 553.

(82) Cicer. Philipp. II, cap. xxxi. See alſo Plutarch. in Antonio, pag. 920.

(83) Cicero, Ibid. cap. xxxii.

(84) Dio, lib. li, pag. 511.

(85) Ibid. pag. 519.

(86) Ibid. pag. 511.

(87) Article ANTONY (MARC JULIUS).

(88) Onomaſt. pag. 358.

FUNCCIUS (JOHN), a Lutheran preacher, ſon-in-law to Oſiander, and his ſecond in the diſputes about Imputative Juſtice, took upon him to diſturb the public repoſe another way, that is, by politic cabals; which at laſt brought him to the ſcaffold, at Konigſberg in Pruſſia, the twenty eighth of October 1566 (a); being then in the forty ninth year of his age (b). See, in Moreri, the two verſes, which he is ſaid to have compoſed the day that he died. They contain a Greek word, which Mr Moreri has put into French (c); but, having tranſlated that word only, he has made nothing of it but perfect nonſenſe. He ſhould therefore have ſaid, that thoſe two verſes contained an exhortation to all men to grow wiſe by Funccius's example, and to avoid, as one would the plague, the curſed itch of meddling with too many things. Mr Moreri has committed another fault [A]. Voſſius is miſtaken as to the age of Funccius [B].

(a) Melchior. Adam. in Vitis Theolog. pag. 412.

(b) See the remark [B].

(c) Πολυπραγμοσύνη, de qua voce vide A. Gellium, lib. xi, cap. xvi.

[A] Mr Moreri has committed another fault.] He ſays, that Funccius carried down his chronology as far as 1352, and then to 1560. He ſhould have ſaid, that, in the year 1544, Funccius printed the firſt part of his chronology, which reached from Adam to the birth of JESUS CHRIST (1); and that, in the year 1554, his whole chronology was publiſhed, which began with the creation of the world, and ended with the year of grace 1552. In a new edition, reviſed and corrected, he went down as far as the year 1560.

[B] Voſſius is miſtaken as to the age of Funccius.] He ſays, that Funccius was beheaded in the fortieth year of his age (2). But let us rather lay the fault on his printers, and content ourſelves to cenſure his having ſent to them a very needleſs addition. He had ſaid, in the 231ſt page, that Funccius, born in the year 1518, loſt his life, being forty eight years old; and he ordered, that, in the 454th page, they ſhould print an addition, which ſhould inform us, that Funccius was beheaded in the year 1566. Could any thing be more needleſs than that? did not all his readers plainly ſee, by the 231ſt page, that Funccius died in the year 1566? the only way to excuſe him, would be to ſay, that he had a mind to ſhew, by his addition, that Funccius was beheaded in the forty ninth year of his age; but that the printers put 40 inſtead of 49. It is certain, that Melchior Adam is not exact. For, having placed the birth of Funccius in the month of February 1518, and his execution the twenty eighth of October 1566, he ſhould have placed his death in the forty ninth, and not in the forty eighth year of his age.

(1) See the epiſtle dedicatory of that chronology.

(2) Voſſius, de Scient. Mathemat. pag. 454.

FURIUS (FREDERIC) ſirnamed Cæriolanus, becauſe he was born at Valentia in Spain [A], flouriſhed in the XVIth century. He ſtudied at Paris under Audomarus Talceus, Hadrian Turnebus, and Peter Ramus (a); and afterwards came to Louvain, where he publiſhed a treatiſe of rhetoric, and maintained, againſt a doctor of divinity (b), that the holy Scripture ought to be tranſlated into the vulgar tongue (c). He wrote thereupon a very fine treatiſe [B] in the ſame city, and went to print it in Germany. This brought him into trouble (d); but his learning, piety and candour, being made known to the emperor Charles V, he was preſerved from the ſtorm. That prince ſent him back into the Low-Countries, and placed him near Philip his ſon (e), where he had the character of hiſtorian (f). Furius devoted himſelf all the reſt of his life to the ſervice of that maſter; and, having accompanied him to the ſtates of Arragon, he died at Valladolid, in the year 1592 (g). I cannot ſet down his age exactly [C]. He endeavoured heartily to pacify the troubles of the Low-Countries (h) [D]. He was never married (i). Neither was he ever chancellor to the king

(a) Andreas Schottus, Bibl. Hiſpan. pag. 615.

(b) He was a Sicilian, called Bononia, who was divinity-profeſſor at Louvain. Thuan. lib. civ, pag. 486. I have made an article concerning him.

(c) Idem. Schottus, ubi ſupra.

(d) Thuan. ubi ſupra.

(e) Id. ibid.

(f) Schottus, ubi ſupra.

(g) Id. ibid.

(h) Thuan. ubi ſupra.

(i) Ubi ſupra.

[A] Sirnamed Cæriolanus, becauſe he was born at Valentia in Spain.] Nicolas Antonius (1) ſays, that the inhabitants of the kingdom of Valentia are vulgarly called Seriols; and that, for this reaſon, our Furius has the ſirname of Seriolanus. He does not ſpell that word ſo, at the beginning of his book, intituled, Bononia, where he writes Cæriolanus. In the catalogue of Thuanus's library (2), he is miſcalled Coriolanus.

[B] He wrote thereupon a very fine treatiſe.] It is intituled, Bononia, ſive de libris ſacris in vernaculam linguam convertendis, libri duo ad Franciſcum Bovadillium Mendozium, Cardinalem Burgenſem, and which was printed at Baſil by John Oporinus, in the year 1556, in 8vo. It contains 365 pages. The reading of it was forbid by the Index Expurgatorius of the council of Trent.

[C] I cannot ſet down his age exactly.] Theſe words of Thuanus are not preciſe: Ad meliorem vitam haud paullum Montano ſenior hoc anno migravit (3). For they only inform us, that Furius died much older than Montagne, who lived but ſixty years (4). Thoſe words were not underſtood in the elogies of Mr Teiſſier, where it is ſaid, that Furius was about ſixty years old, when he died.

[D] He endeavoured . . . . to pacify the troubles of the Low-Countries.] You will find, in Thuanus, the ſubſtance of a project of peace, which Furius publiſhed in the year 1575. The conditions, he propoſed to the provinces that had revolted, ſeemed very reaſonable; but the prince of Orange anſwered, that they came too late, and could not be depended upon: and ſo he preferred war to ſo ſuſpicious a peace (5).

Note, that Furius aſſured them, that the king of Spain would ratify the conditions, contained in his project; and that, if it was thought neceſſary to bind more ſtrongly that monarch to the obſervation of the treaty, he would cauſe it to be ſigned by the grandees of Spain, both eccleſiaſtical and ſecular, by the princes of the empire, and by ſome of the moſt conſiderable cities in the Low-Countries. The author of the project promiſed, that the inquiſition ſhould not be eſtabliſhed; that the impoſition of the tenth-penny ſhould be taken away; that the edicts againſt the new religion ſhould be mitigated by certain proviſo's, as ſhould be amicably agreed on by both parties; and that ſuch as would not be contented with thoſe mitigations, ſhould be at full liberty to go and ſettle elſewhere, without forfeiting any of their goods; that foreign ſoldiers ſhould be disbanded, and ſent out of the Low-Countries, if the malecontents did deſire it, &c. Furius offered to go poſt, to carry immediately to the king of Spain the acceptance of theſe propoſals of peace: but there was no need that he ſhould take that trouble upon him; for the propoſals were rejected. ‘ Ad ea Arauſionenſis, quoniam jam conventus ‘ delegatorum diſſolutus erat, pridie Non. Maias re‘ſpondet, quæ in pacis formula proponantur, de ‘ promiſſis ſervandis cautiones, qua in re totius negotii ‘ cardo vertitur, eas non ita prudenti viro tutas videri, ‘ quin P. R. ſi non ſerventur, diſpenſare poſſint, & ‘ violatores abſolvere: ea diffidentia fieri, & quoniam ‘ formula hæc ſerius tranſmiſſa ſit, ut ipſe abjecta om‘ni meliori ſpe certum licet dubii eventus bellum in‘certæ atque adeo inſidioſæ paci præferendum duxe‘rit (6). —— The prince of Orange, becauſe the aſſem‘bly of the delegates was diſſolved, anſwered, on the ‘ ſixth

(1) Nicol. Antonius, Biblioth. Hiſpan. Tom. I, pag. 277.

(2) In the 500th page of the firſt part.

(3) Thuan. lib. civ, pag. 486.

(4) Montanus haud ſexagenario major vitæ ultimum diem clauſit. Id. ibid.

(5) Ex Thuano, lib. lx. pag. m. 108, 109, ad ann. 1575.

(6) Id ibid. pag. 109. C.

king of Poland, as ſome pretend (k). His Treatiſe of the Counſellor has been much eſteemed [E].

'ſixth of May, that a prudent man could not depend on the promiſes in the plan of peace, on which the hinge of the whole affair turned, ſince the Pope could diſpenſe with the obſervance of them; beſides, that the project was tranſmitted too late; ſo that, rejecting all better hopes, he thought a certain war, tho' of doubtful event, preferable to an uncertain and therefore treacherous peace.'

It fares with hiſtorians as with travellers: they meet now and then with certain matters, ſome of which are like mires, or like an even, broad, well paved road, &c. Furius's project is a favourable paſſage for the hiſtorians, that write on the ſide of Spain; and diſadvantageous to the hiſtorians of the other party. It is bright and fair for the firſt, and dull and ſad for the latter: for after all, what finer field can a hiſtorian deſire, to diſplay the clemency of a prince, and to caſt an odium on the ſtubbornneſs of his revolted ſubjects, than that ſtep of Furius, and what followed thereupon? what greater perplexity, than for people to be obliged to ſay, that they cannot truſt a maſter, who promiſes to redreſs all their grievances, and to ſuppreſs whatever forced them to take up arms? Nevertheleſs, in this caſe, the prince of Orange had good reaſons for not truſting the king of Spain: for things were come to that paſs, that he was compelled to practiſe, as he did, the maxim, that whoever draws his ſword againſt his prince muſt throw away the ſcabbard.

[E] His Treatiſe of the Counſellor has been much eſteemed.] He intituled it, Del conſeio y conſeiro. Simon Schardius was the firſt that tranſlated it into Latin; and his tranſlation was publiſhed at Cologne by Andreas Schottus, in the year 1618, with the treatiſes of Peter Magnus, and Hippolytus à Collibus, on the ſame ſubject. Chriſtopher Warſevicius made another Latin verſion of it, and publiſhed it with his treatiſe De Legato & Legatione. It was publiſhed at Dantzic in the year 1646, if we believe Nicolas Antonius. But undoubtedly he is miſtaken: for Warſevicius was not then alive; and we have ſome things of his printed in the year 1582, and an edition of his treatiſe De Legato & Legatione in 1595. Nicolas Antonius has miſtaken, for an edition procured by that Pole, that which was made after his death. However it be, this is the praiſe which Warſevicius has given to Furius's book. 'Hoc opus multis multorum vel longiſſimis commentationibus eſt præferendum. Sic enim reſpondet acumen ingenii pectoris candori, & diſputandi ſubtilitas ſententiarum gravitati, ut tales Ceriolæ Conſiliarii omni ævo optari quam ſperari videantur mihi magis potuiſſe (7). —— This work is preferable to all comments whatever, even the longeſt. For the author's wit is ſo anſwerable to his candor, and the ſubtilty of his reaſoning to the gravity of his ſtile, that ſuch counſellors are rather to be wiſhed for, than expected, in every age.' There is a Latin tranſlation of that work, printed at Baſil in the year 1563, in 8vo, and at Straſburg in 12mo (8). For the reſt, Gaſpar Eſcolanus, who has ſaid, in his hiſtory of Valencia, that Furius had the dignity of chancellor to the king of Poland (9), has, perhaps, been led into this miſtake by ſome book, that contained both the Treatiſe of the Counſellor, and ſome other diſſertation, dedicated to the chancellor of Poland.

(k) See the laſt remark.

(7) Warſevicius apud Nicol. Antonium, ubi ſupra.

(8) See the Catalogue of Thuanus's library, pag. 500, Tom. I.

(9) See Nicolas Antonius, ubi ſupra.

G.

GABRIEL (GILES) licentiate of the univerſity of Louvain, prieſt, monk of the third order of St Francis, definer general, and apoſtolical commiſſary in the Low-Countries, is a Liegeois, who publiſhed, at Bruſſels, in 1675, a book intituled, Specimina Moralis Chriſtianæ & Moralis Diabolicæ. This title alarmed the court of Rome, and obliged the author to go thither, to juſtify his doctrine, which being found to be ſound, he thought he ought to communicate it to the public again, reforming a little the title (a). He therefore got his work reprinted, intitling it Specimina Moralia. This ſecond edition is of Rome, 1680. There was a third in French, reviſed, corrected, and augmented. It is intituled, Les Eſſais de la Theologie Morale .... Eſſays of Moral Divinity, and contains 316 pages, in 12mo. This author approaches infinitely nearer to ſevere, than relaxed morality. I believe he is no friend to the Jeſuits, nor, conſequently, is beloved by them.

(a) Journal. des Sçavans, April. 14, 1681, pag. 139. Edit. Holl. See alſo Mr Baillet, Jugem. des Sçavans, Tom. I, pag. 506.

GAFFAREL (JAMES), one of the learned men, who has been much talked of in the XVIIth century, was a Provençal (a). He underſtood the oriental languages, and ſeveral others; and pretended to know almoſt every thing, but principally the occult and cabaliſtic ſciences. Cardinal Richelieu choſe him for his library-keeper (b), and ſent him into Italy, to collect the beſt manuſcripts and printed books that could be found (c). Mr de la Thuillerie, Ambaſſador of France to Venice, deſired to have him near him, as a learned companion [A]. Gaffarel publiſhed a book, intituled, Curioſitez Inouïes, (unheard of curioſities) which made a great noiſe, and which the Sorbonne cenſured [B]. He was obliged to retract it; for being poſſeſſed of eccleſiaſtical benefices [C], he could not with impunity bring his orthodoxy into queſtion. Before that time, he had been expoſed to many untoward ſuſpicions [D], and it is very likely he held particular opinions. It is pretended, that cardinal Richelieu intended to employ him in his grand deſign

(a) He was born at Mannes, in Provence. Mercure Gallant, January, 1682, pag. 159.

(b) Ib. pag. 160.

(c) Father Jacob, Traité des Biblioth. pag. 479. See alſo pag. 704, where he quotes what Gaffarel has ſaid, in the preface to the Hiſtory of the War of Conſtantinople, of Paul Ramnuſio.

[A] Mr de la Thuillerie .... deſired to have him near him as a learned companion.] Gaffarel did not pretend to be in the embaſſador's houſe (1) upon the foot of a man, that was only proper to divert him at his leiſure hours by his learned converſation. He did not believe politics to be out of his ſphere; but thought he might be uſeful to Mr de la Thuillerie, even in the buſineſs of his embaſſy: wherefore he deſired Mr Naudé, his good friend, to ſend him a catalogue of the authors, that have written on politics. That is the occaſion, that gave birth to the Bibliographia Politica of Gabriel Naudé, which has been printed ſo often. In order to prove it, let us quote the beginning of that book: ‘ Quæris à me, mi Gaffarelle eruditiſſime, atque etiam ‘ frequentibus literis vehementius urges, ut pro ea, ‘ quam in me non ſemel deprehendiſti, diverſorum li‘ brorum ac ſcriptorum cognitione, eorum nomencla‘ turam aut potius œconomiam ad te tranſmittam, quos ‘ inſtituendis tractandiſque cum recta ratione & me‘ thodo politicæ ſtudiis, non inutiles fore cenſeo. Quan‘ doquidem ipſa tibi in præſentiarum maximopere eſſe ‘ neceſſaria, vel te ipſo tacente cæteri omnes facilè ‘ intelligunt, quos minimè fugit, te unum præ multis, ‘ non ut liberalibus modo diſciplinis excultum, im‘ butumque ſanctioris linguæ facultate præclariſſima, ‘ ſed tanquam ad reliquas omnes diſciplinas factum à ‘ naturâ, & diligenti arte expolitum, ab illuſtriſſimo, ‘ ſapientiſſimoque viro domino THUILLERIO, ‘ chriſtianiſſimi noſtri regis, ad ſereniſſimam rempub‘ licam Venetam oratore excellentiſſimo, ſelectum ‘ fuiſſe; quo cum de rebus graviſſimis communicare, ‘ & ſubciſivis horis ſermones literarios miſcere poſſet (2). ‘ —— You deſire of me, my learned friend Gaffarel, ‘ and earneſtly requeſt of me by repeated letters, that, ‘ as you have often found me acquainted with a great ‘ variety of books and authors, I would tranſmit to you ‘ a catalogue, or rather compleat ſeries, of thoſe whom ‘ I think will be uſeful in rightly purſuing and me‘thodizing the ſtudies of politics. How very ſervice‘able they will be at preſent to you, every one knows, ‘ without your confeſſion, who are apprized, that the ‘ illuſtrious and wiſe Mr de la Thuillerie, embaſſador ‘ to the Serene Republic of Venice, has made choice of ‘ you, not only only on account of your great knowledge ‘ in liberal arts, and acquaintance with the Hebrew ‘ tongue, but as being formed by nature, and cultivated ‘ by art, for all other kinds of knowledge; with whom ‘ he may communicate the moſt important affairs, and ‘ fill up his leiſure hours with learned converſation.’

[B] He publiſhed a book ..... which the Sorbonne cenſured.] Here is the whole title: Curioſites inoüies ſur la Sculpture Taliſmanique des Perſans, Horoſcope des Patriarches, & Lecture des Eſtoiles. That is, Unheard of Curioſities about the Taliſmanic Sculpture of the Perſians, Horoſcope of the Patriarchs, and Reading of the Stars. The author ‘ pretended to ſhew, that the ‘ Taliſmans, or conſtellated figures, had the efficacy ‘ to make a man rich and fortunate; to free a houſe ‘ and a whole country from certain inſects and venc‘ mous creatures, and from all the injuries of the ‘ air (3).’ Sorel, diſguiſed under the name of the Sieur de l'Iſle, confuted Gaffarel's work; and his confutation was well received. You will find in it (4) Gaffarel's recantation. The firſt edition of the Unheard-of Curioſities was printed at Paris in 1629. There was another printed at Roan in 1631; and two others, without the printer's name, or the place where they were printed, in the year 1637 and 1650, in 8vo. The laſt has additions to it. This work was printed in Latin, at Hamburg, in 1676, with Gregory Michael's notes.

[C] Being poſſeſſed of eccleſiaſtical benefices.] I ſhall ſet down, in this remark, all the titles, which I find were given him. He was doctor of divinity and canon-law, protonotary of the holy apoſtolic ſee, and prior, in commendam, of St Giles's (5). When he died, he was dean of the canon-law in the univerſity of Paris, prior of Reveſt de Brouſſe, in the dioceſe of Ciſteron, and commander of St Omeil (6). Konig calls him, Sigonciæ apud Gallos Abbas.

[D] Before that time, he had been expoſed to many untoward ſuſpicions.] This appears by the preface to the Unheard-of Curioſities. ‘ A perſon of quality, ſays he ‘ whoſe

(1) It appears by Peireſc's Life, that Gaffarel was at Venice in the year 1633.

(2) Naudæus, in Bibliographia Politica, init.

(3) See Sorel's Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. 415.

(4) In page 3, teſte Colomeſio, Gall. Orient. pag 154.

(5) See Father Jacob's Traité des Biblioth. pag. 704, 705.

(6) Mercure Galant, for January, 1682, pag 159.

ſign of re-uniting religions; and that, in order to feel the pulſe of the Proteſtants, he authorized him to preach againſt the doctrine of purgatory [E]. Gaffarel died at Sigonce in the year 1681, being eighty years old (d). He had almoſt finiſhed the work, which he had been upon a good many years [F]: I know not whether his friends will publiſh it. I ſhall not give an exact liſt of his works [G].

(d) Mercure Galant, ubi ſupra, pag. 160.

' whoſe deſires cannot be refuſed without a crime, has ' drawn them out of my cloſet, where they ſhould have ' always remained, ſince I had taken the reſolution, ' after I had undergone ſo many calumnies, never to ' expoſe any thing more to the public: having a thouſand times breathed out theſe words, formerly familiar ' to a Roman prince, Utinam neſciſſem literas.' How many authors are there, who would make the ſame wiſh, but that they have ſo much ſpirit as to deſpiſe the unjuſt cenſures of certain people.

[E] It is pretended, that cardinal Richelieu . . . . . authorized him to preach againſt the doctrine of purgatory.] ' When, in one of the cities of Languedoc, ' the miniſters of the place had the honour to wait ' upon him (7), and being fallen into diſcourſe about ' a re-union in matters of religion, which he ſeemed ' to wiſh, ſince it had been happily reſtored in matters of ſtate; they told him, that they ſaw but little ' probability of effecting it, ſo long as the Pope would ' ſo ſtiffly maintain his infallible authority. To which ' he anſwered mildly, that means would be found ' to bring the Pope to reaſon. And, as the Gazettes ' publiſhed then what the Sieur Gaffarel, a man of ' known erudition and reputation, authorized by his ' Eminence, had publickly preached in Dauphiné againſt ' purgatory; ſo we knew, in it's proper time, the ' ſecret negociations, which, by his order, were entered upon by Father Audebert, a famous Jeſuit, ' with ſome of our moſt celebrated miniſters, to agree ' upon ſome propoſitions, which might be adjuſted ' between both parties, about their chief differences.' This I extract out of a preface of Samuel Des-Marets (8).' I know, that Gaffarel publiſhed a book about the pacification of religions.

(7) That is, cardinal Richelieu.

(8) Prefixed to the Summary Anſwer to the method of cardinal Richelieu. That anſwer was printed at Groningen in 1564. A new convert, couſin to Father Maimbourg, was the author of it. He takes, in it, the name of the Sieur R. de la Ruelle.

[F] He had almoſt finiſhed his work, which he had been upon a great many years.] ' He had for many ' years been buſy about a Hiſtory of the Subterranean ' World, wherein he treated of caves, grottos, mines, ' vaults, and catacombs, which he had obſerved for ' thirty years in his travels through all the parts of the ' world. He had almoſt finiſhed that work; the plates ' were already engraven, and it was going to the ' preſs, when death prevented the execution of his ' deſign. . . . . We are put in hopes, that thoſe two ' learned friends (9) who out-live Gaffarel, and with ' whom he entruſted his deſires, will not deprive the ' public of ſo rare and curious a piece (10).'

(9) That is, the abbot Pecoil, a great traveller, and Mr Chorier, advocate at Grenoble.

(10) Mercure Galant, ubi ſupra, pag. 161, 163.

[G] I ſhall not give an exact liſt of his works.] Here is only the title of ſome; Abdita divinæ cabalæ myſteria contra Sophiſtarum logomachiam defenſa, Paris 1623, in 4to. Ars nova & perquam facilis legendi Rabbinos ſine punctis. De muſica Hebræorum ſtupenda libellus. In voces derelictas V. T. centuriæ duæ. De ſtellis cadentibus opinio nova. Quæſtio Hebraico-Philoſophica, utrum à principio mare ſalſum exſtiterit. Mr Colomiés (11) refers us to the Apes Urbanæ of Allatius, from whence he has taken thoſe titles, and where he has left many others. The Widow of Sarepta, and a Treatiſe of the Good and Evil Genius's are alſo two pieces of Gaffarel (12).

(11) Colomeſ. Gallia Orient. pag. 260, 261.

(12) Mercure Galant, ubi ſupra, pag. 161.

GAIGNEUR (WILLIAM LE)

GAIGNEUR (WILLIAM LE) was of Angers (a), and lived at the beginning of the XVIIth century. We have ſeen his name (b) among thoſe, who have excelled in the art of writing. I have read, in a deſcription of France, that he was the firſt of all the writers of the kingdom, and that he paved the way for an infinite number of perſons, who at that time profeſſed the art of writing (c). There are ſome verſes in his praiſe, in the poems of Peter le Loyer, who ſtyles him ſecretary to monſieur the king's brother (d).

(a) François des Rues, Deſcript. de la France, pag. 283, Edit. of Conſtance, 1608.

(b) In the remark of the article ROCCO.

(c) Fr. des Rues, ubi ſupra.

(d) See the works and poetical miſcellanies of P. le Loyer, fol. 248, verſo, Edit of Paris, 1579.

GALÉS (PETER)

GALÉS (PETER), in Latin Galeſius, a learned Spaniard [A], ' who having ' been put to the rack in Rome, upon ſuſpicion of being a Proteſtant, loſt one of his ' eyes. Being afterwards come to Geneva, he taught philoſophy there, and was ſome ' time after rector of the college of Guienne at Bourdeaux. Being gone from thence, ' by reaſon of the envy they bore to him, he left France, to go into Flanders; where, ' having been diſcovered to be a Proteſtant, and put into the hands of the Spaniards, ' his countrymen, the moſt favourable treatment he received was, to be burnt by virtue ' of a decree of the Inquiſition. This Galés had good books, and alſo ſome manu' ſcripts (a) [B].' It was the Leaguers that took him, and delivered him up to the Spaniards. See Meurſius (b).

(a) Tranſcribed from Colomiés, Melanges Hiſtoriques, pag. 73, 74, who, without doubt, had copied Meurſius, Athenæ Batav. pag. 333.

(b) Meurſius, ubi ſupra.

[A] A learned Spaniard.] Florimond de Remond (1) makes him an Italian; but he is miſtaken.

(1) Traité de l'Antechriſt, cap. xviii, apud Colomiés, Mêlanges Hiſtoriques, pag. 73.

[B] He had ſome manuſcripts.] ' Caſaubon, who had ' known him at Geneva, ſpeaks, in his writings (2), ' of ſome, which he had communicated to him, and ' likewiſe commends his conjectures. Cujacius, in his ' obſervations (3), calls him, Doctiſſimum & acutiſſimum virum, upon occaſion of a privilege of the em' peror Juſtinian, which he had furniſhed him with: ' and Father Labbé, in his Bibliotheque of manuſcripts, ' quotes (4) Orientii Monita in Bibliotheca Galeſiana ' reperta (5).'

(3) Lib. x, cap. xi, apud Colomiés, ibid.

(4) Pag. 63, apud eumdem ibid.

(5) Colom. ibid.

(2) On Theocritus, of the Geneva edition. On Diogenes Laërtius, pag. 59 93, 105, 118 and 119, of the edition of 1594. On Suetonius, pag. 9, and in his preface to Athenæus, apud Colomiés, ibid In his preface to Athenæus we muſt read, Ejus etiam codicem vidimus nos inter alios neutiquam vulgares Petri Galeſii Hiſpani libros, and not Gelaſii.

GALLARS (NICOLAS DES)

GALLARS (NICOLAS DES), in Latin Gallaſius, a miniſter of Geneva, was one of thoſe, who aſſiſted at the conference of Poiſſy. Thoſe of Geneva lent him to the church of Paris, when they were deſired to give them a miniſter in the year 1557. The deputy (a), who conducted him, was ſtopped at Auſſonne with him, and ſome ſuſpicious and prohibited books having been found in his portmanteau, he was carried to Dijon, where he ſuffered martyrdom. Des Gallars was permitted to purſue his journey, becauſe they found neither books nor letters about him, that might render him ſuſpected (b). He is the author of ſome works [A], and of an edition of St Irenæus

(a) He was called Nicolas du Rouſſeau. Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. ii, pag. 137.

(b) Beza, ibid. See alſo the Hiſtory of Martyrs, lib. vii, fol. 412. verſo.

[A] He is the author of ſome works.] He publiſhed, at Geneva, in the year 1545, an Apology for Farel, and his colleagues, againſt Peter Charles. He tranſlated into Latin ſeveral treatiſes of Calvin. His book of the divinity of JESUS CHRIST, againſt the new Arians, was printed at Orleans in the year 1565. Calvin's næus [B]. He was miniſter at Orleans in 1564 (c). We ſhall ſee, below, the date of ſome of his works [C]. Calvin had a great eſteem for him, and was ſo much eſteemed by him, that he found in him a tranſcriber of what he wrote (d). La Croix du Maine ſpeaks of another N. DES GALLARS [D], who was miniſter of the French church in London, in the year 1561.

(c) Beza's preface to Calvin's Commentary on Joſhua, pag. m. 10.

(d) See the remark [D], citat. (11).

vin's commentary upon Iſaiah is but an abſtract of the lectures and ſermons of Calvin upon that prophet, which was made by des Gallars. He has alſo made a Commentary upon the book of Exodus, and an Apology for Calvin againſt Cochleus. The abridgment of Geſner's Bibliotheque, where we learn this, does not mention the years, wherein thoſe works were printed; which fault is too frequent in that abridgment of Geſner, and, in moſt compilations of that nature. Note, That the commentary upon Iſaiah was afterwards reviſed by Calvin, and therefore that des Gallars's edition is not the beſt. I prove this by Theodore Beza, who, having ſaid, That Calvin, though ſick in the year 1558, had not, for all that, given over working, goes on thus: ‘Ejus rei teſtes ſunt ultima Chriſtianæ inſtitutionis editio tum Latina tum Gallica, & Commentarii in Eſaïam ab eo non tam emendati (quales illos Galaſius ex ore prælegentis exceptos ediderat) quam novi prorſus emiſſi (1). —— Witneſs the laſt edition of his Chriſtian Inſtitute, both Latin and French, and the Commentary on Iſaiah, not ſo much corrected (as thoſe, which Gallars had publiſhed from his mouth) as new drawn up.’ Some believe (2) that des Gallars compoſed, with Beza, the Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Reformed Churches; but I believe they are miſtaken (§ α).

[(§ α) They aſcribe to him the ſhort prayers at the end of each Pſalm of Marot and Beza, in ſeveral old editions. REM. CRIT.]

(1) Beza, in vita Calvini, ad ann. 1558.

(2) See Placcius de Anonymis, n. 429, pag. 102.

[B] And of an edition of St Irenæus.] Geſner's abridgment is very good in this particular; for we find there, not only where, and in what year (3), the miniſter des Gallars publiſhed that edition, but alſo wherein it differs from others.

(3) At Geneva, 1570.

[C] We ſhall ſee, below, the date of ſome of his works.] In the year 1545, he tranſlated into Latin a ſmall treatiſe, which Calvin had publiſhed in 1540, on the Lord's-Supper. Des Gallars was then miniſter of the church of Geneva (4). Some time after, he made a Latin tranſlation of what Calvin had publiſhed, in 1544, againſt the Anabaptiſts and Libertines (5). He made, in 1548, a Latin verſion of the inventory of relics, publiſhed by Calvin in 1546 (6). He publiſhed, in 1551, the commentary, which he had extracted from the lectures and ſermons of Calvin on the prophet Iſaiah (7).

(4) Beza, Pref. of Calvin's Commentary on Joſhua, pag. m. 10.

(5) Ibid. pag. 15.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ibid. pag. 18.

[D] La Croix du Maine ſpeaks of another N. Des Gallars.] Nicolas des Gallars, whom he mentions in the 344th page, and N. des Gallars, of whom he ſpeaks in the 363d page, are the ſame miniſter, and therefore he makes two authors of one. He has written in Latin, (thus he ſpeaks touching the latter) and ſince tranſlated into French, the form of the eccleſiaſtical government, ſettled in the French church in London, printed in the year 1561, at which time he reſided in the ſaid city of London (8). It may be objected, that, if La Croix du Maine is not miſtaken as to the time, it is probable, that there are here two miniſters; for Nicolas des Gallars was at Geneva in the year 1560 (9), and in France in 1561, at the time of the conference of Poiſſy. I anſwer, that this proves nothing. That miniſter was ſent to London in the year 1560, to ſettle there a French church; that is certain: but at the ſame time, that does not hinder, that a year after des Gallars might have been in France at the conference of Poiſſy (10). ‘Eodem tempore quum non pauci pii Galli poſt Mariæ reginæ mortem ſingulari Sereniſſimæ reginæ Elizabethæ pietate & humanitate freti in Angliam refugerent, peterentque reverendi viri Edmundi Grindalli epiſcopi Londinenſis aſſenſu ut Geneva mitteretur qui eccleſiam Gallicam illic conſtitueret, miſſus eſt eo Nicolaus Galaſius familiariſſimus à multis jam annis Calvini collega, & cujus plurimum opera in excipiendis dictatis utebatur. Sed Calvino nihil antiquius eccleſiarum ædificatione fuit (11). —— At the ſame time, when not a few pious Frenchmen, after the death of queen Mary, depending on the ſingular piety and humanity of the moſt ſerene queen Elizabeth, fled into England, and petitioned, with the aſſent of Edmund Grindall, biſhop of London, that ſome one might be ſent from Geneva, to eſtabliſh a French church there, Nicolas Gallars was ſent thither, an intimate acquaintance and colleague for many years of Calvin, and whom he chiefly employed in taking down what he dictated. But Calvin had nothing more at heart than the edification of the churches.’

(8) He had ſaid, that N. des Gallars was miniſter of the French church in the city of London, in England.

(9) The epiſtle dedicatory of his Commentary on Exodus, is dated that year from Geneva.

(10) Beza, Hiſt. Eccleſ. lib. iv, pag. 490, puts him among the miniſters who were at that conference.

(11) Beza, in vita Calvini, ad ann. 1560.

GALLIGAI (LEONORA),

wife to the marſhal d'Ancre, was daughter of a Joiner, and of Mary de Medicis's nurſe (a). That princeſs lov'd her tenderly, and brought her into France, when ſhe came there to be married to Henry IV. Galligai, under the title of bedchamber-woman to that Princeſs, governed her entirely. She was extremely ugly, but had an infinite deal of wit. She married Concino Concini, a domeſtic of the ſame queen, and raiſed with him a prodigious fortune. They were more united by intereſt, than by affection [A]. They had fomented the diviſion between Henry IV, and the queen (b); for their artifices and falſe reports occaſioned the domeſtic jars, which made that great prince weary of his life. After his death, they found it ſtill more eaſy to govern their miſtreſs, and engroſs all the riches and beſt places of the kingdom [B], and were puffed up with unheard-of and monſtrous pride

(a) Le Grain, Decade de Loüis le Juſte, lib. iv, pag. 154. Hilarion de Coſte, Tom. II, des Dames Illuſtres, pag. 477, denies that ſhe was that nurſe's daughter.

(b) See Mr de Perefixe, Hiſtoire de Henry le Grand, pag. m. 399, ad. ann. 1603, and Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. VI, pag. m. 301, 367.

[A] They were more united by intereſt, than by affection.] The marſhal d'Ancre's wife heard, without ſhedding tears, that her huſband was murdered; and her firſt care was to ſave her jewels, which ſhe put in the ſtraw of her bed, and, cauſing herſelf to be undreſſed, ſhe went to bed (1). The provoſtmen, that went into her chamber, not finding the jewels, made her (2) riſe, to ſearch her bed, where they were found (3). She ſaid afterwards to thoſe, who guarded her, well, they have killed my huſband; is not this enough to ſatisfy them? Let them ſuffer me to go out of the kingdom (4). When they told her, they had hanged the corps of the mareſchal, ſhe ſeemed very much moved at it, ‘without weeping however; but yet ſhe ſaid, that he was a proud, inſolent, man: that he had nothing but what he deſerved: that ſhe had not lain with him for three whole years laſt paſt: that he was an ill man; and that, to part from him, ſhe had reſolved to retire into Italy this ſpring, and had made every thing ready for her journey; which ſhe offered to juſtify (5).’ When meſſieurs Aubri and le Bailleul went to interrogate her about her rings and other goods, ſhe ſpoke to them with as much aſſurance, as if ſhe had no manner of fear (6); and even told them, ſhe hoped to come again into favour.

(1) Relation of the death of the mareſchal d'Ancre, in the ſequel of The Hiſtory of Favourites, by Mr du Puy, pag. m. 28.

(2) Ibid. pag. 30, 31.

(3) She meant, without doubt, thoſe jewels, when ſhe ſaid to meſſieurs Aubri and le Bailleul, That ſhe had ſent to the king, the day before, a ſtrong box, wherein were jewels to the value of two hundred thouſand livres. Ib. p. 61.

(4) Ib. pag. 31.

(5) Ib. pag. 55.

(6) Ib. pag. 61.

[B] They engroſſed all the riches and beſt places.] See, above, the article CONCINI, and conſider only, that they found in the mareſchal's pockets (7), in aſſignments from the treaſury, in notes of receivers, or in bonds, the ſum of 1985000 livres. They found in his houſe good aſſignments for 2500000 livres more (8). His wife ſaid to the commiſſaries, that ſhe had ſtill her pearls, to wit, a necklace of 40 pearls of 2000 livres a-piece, and a chain of five turns of pearls of 50 livres a-piece, and that in all they amounted to above 120000 crowns (9). She had already ſent jewels to the king, to the value of 200000 livres. The provoſtmen had not ſo well ſearched, but that ſhe had ſtill a box of jewels left: for, when they carried her to the Baſtile, they asked her ‘before they went . . . if ſhe had no more rings? She ſhewed a box, that had not been taken from her, wherein there were

‘drawers

(7) Ib. pag. 48.

(8) Ib. pag. 62.

(9) Ib. pag. 61.

pride [C]. But the end of this was extreamly tragical. I have ſaid elſewhere how the huſband was uſed, and now I am going to relate what was done to the wife. She was committed to the Baſtile, and afterwards to the priſon of the parliament. She was tried by the parliament, and ſentenced to be beheaded and burnt; which was executed the eighth of July 1617. She took up at laſt a good reſolution, and died with conſtancy enough, and like a chriſtian (c). She was convicted, among other crimes, of having not only judaized [D], but likewiſe of having uſed magical arts [E] to compaſs her ends. She was condemned for high-treaſon againſt God and the only ſome chains of amber: and being asked, if ſhe had none about her, ſhe took up her coats, and ſhewed as high as near her breaſts, having on drawers of red Florence friſe. They told her, laughing, that then they muſt put their hands to her drawers. She anſwered, that, at another time, ſhe would not have ſuffered it, but now all was permitted; and ſo du Hallier (10) felt a little about the drawers (11).’ This great wealth was a ſufficient proof of their crimes.

[C] They were puffed up with unheard-of and monſtrous pride.] ‘ She would not even allow the princes, princeſſes, and the greateſt perſons of the kingdom, to come into her chamber, nor ſuffer people ſo much as to look her in the face; ſaying, that ſhe was frighted when people looked upon her, and that they might bewitch her by looking upon her: Which was the reaſon that ſhe would no longer ſee ſeveral of her ſervants, only for having looked on her; and, towards the end of her favour, ſhe had even baniſhed from her chamber, on that account, Mr de Luſſon, and Faydeau, who had been the laſt in her favour (12).’ Her ſuperſtition, as to witchcraft, and her uglineſs, were the reaſon of this, more than her vanity.

[D] She was convicted of having not only judaized.] This was alſo laid to her husband's charge. It was proved,

I. By the care they took to bring into France a Jew, famous for fortune-telling, being a phyſician called Montalto. They employed Vincencio Ludovici, their ſecretary, in this negociation. This was verified ‘ by letters, written from Venice to the ſaid Vincencio, the twenty ſixth of April, 1611, by which they give him hopes of the ſaid Montalto's coming into France (13); and by letters of the ſaid Montalto himſelf, written, the ſixth of May following, to the ſaid Leonora Galligai, by which he aſſures her, that he is ready to come, by the means of ſo gracious and ſingular a protectreſs; not meaning however to diſguiſe or conceal his profeſſion, but freely to exerciſe his Jewiſh religion, ſince he had refuſed great offers made him from Bologna, Meſſina, Piſa, and even to ſucceed the great phyſician Mercurialis, under the moſt gracious protection of the great duke Ferdinand; and that the firſt profeſſorſhip of Padua had alſo been offered him; adding, that by one ſingle act they might know his intention, to wit, that he ſhall receive no money on the day he is uſed to obſerve, that is, the Sabbath-day. Theſe letters have been ſeen in the proceſs in the literal production againſt the ſaid Galligai, under the letter K: and it is to be obſerved hereupon that la Place, gentleman of the horſe to the ſaid Galligai, maintained to her, in the the confrontation, that, ſince the coming of the ſaid Montalto, ſhe went no more, either to church, or confeſſion, but ſpent her time in making little wax balls, which ſhe put in her mouth (14).’

II. It was alledged (15), that by their converſation with that Montalto, the priſoners diſuſed the obſervation and practice of the chriſtian religion, and accuſtomed themſelves to judaiſm; and that it was the reaſon, that there were found in their houſe two books, one of which is intituled CHEINUC, that is, in Hebrew, Cuſtom, which is a kind of catechiſm; the other is intituled Machazor, that is, Revolution of the annual ſervice, for the uſe of the Jews of Spain, printed at Venice.

III. It was alledged (16), that ‘ from that converſation and catechiſing followed their apoſtacy and deſertion of the chriſtian religion, to embrace, as they did, judaiſm, practiſing the ſacrifices, oblations, and exorciſms, uſed among the Jews. This is verified in the proceſs, both by the teſtimonial and vocal proof, and by the confeſſion of the ſaid Galligai; and among other depoſitions, that of her coachman is obſervable, by which it appears how they made uſe of ſeveral churches in Paris, to commit, in them, in the night, thoſe impieties, found out by the cries and howlings heard in the ſame, when the ſaid Galligai ſacrificed a cock, which is an oblation uſed by the Jews in the feaſt of reconciliation, offering a cock for their ſins. And that this oblation of a cock is Jewiſh, and that the Jews are uſed to practiſe the ſame in the places, where they are ſuffered to reſide, appears by two books, produced by the king's attorney-general, when the trial was depending; the one inſcribed Baal Hatturim, that is, the chief and patron of orders; in the firſt part of which, intituled Grachchaüm, that is, The way and path of life, or The way of living which one ought to obſerve, or, The way of ſpending this life, that oblation is mentioned; and of which book, Rabbi Jacob, who pretends to be a Gaul, is the author. Aud the other, intituled The Jewiſh ſynagogue *; in the twentieth chapter whereof is written what is done in that feaſt of reconciliation during ten penitential days: and that, on the ninth, the Jews riſe very early, frequent the ſchool, ſing, and rehearſe ſeveral prayers; and as ſoon as they return home, each male, both young and old, takes a cock in his hand, and the female a hen, and the big-bellied women a cock and a hen together, and rehearſe theſe words out of the pſalm of David: † The fooliſh, by reaſon of their prevarication, and for their iniquities, are afflicted, ſo that their ſoul loaths all meat, and they are come even to death's door. This oblation of a cock does not only argue judaiſm, but heatheniſm alſo, and declares the accuſed to be apoſtates, and conſequently ſacrilegious; for an apoſtate is accounted guilty of ſacrilege by the imperial conſtitutions ‡, which puniſh ſuch capital crimes with forfeiture of all their eſtate. As to what the ſaid Galligai has ſaid in her excuſe, That ſhe had made that oblation of a cock for her health, and to be cured of a diſeaſe ſhe laboured with; it was anſwered to her, that ſuch an impiety is puniſhed with death, although it be practiſed by way of remedy *.’

IV. They alledged, as a proof of their affection to judaiſm, the endeavours they uſed to bring Jews into France, having ſent to Amſterdam in Holland, where there are many of them, to invite ſome of them to Paris (17).

[E] .... but likewiſe of having uſed magical arts.] This accuſation affected alſo both the husband and wife. It was proved (18),

I. ‘ By a letter of a woman called Gondy, and others of the ſaid Galligai, the priſoner, to the lady Iſabella, a reputed witch; by which ſhe deſires her to ſend her word, if ſhe knows any thing BY HER ART which regards any way her perſon, or the intereſt of her houſe.

II. ‘ By three books of characters, with another little character, found in the room of the ſaid Galligai, and a box, wherein are five round pieces of velvet, of which characters the priſoners made uſe to get an aſcendant over the WILLS OF THE GREAT ONES: which is verified by the depoſitions of Melon, Charton, and Nicolas Viart, confronted to the ſaid Galligai. And as for the books of characters, found in her houſe, they are mentioned in the verbal proceſs of Meſſieurs de Maupeou, and Arnauld, intendants of the Finances, containing the deſcription of the moveables and papers found in the ſaid houſe.

III. ‘ By the depoſition of Philip Dacquin, formerly a Jew, and at preſent a Chriſtian, who ſays, that he being at Molins, in the lieutenant-criminal's houſe, the priſoners ſent him word, that they had made uſe of the Cabala, and of the books of the Jews, which ſerves againſt judaiſm and witchcraft; it being to be obſerved what Dacquin depoſes, that (c) Le Grain, lib. x, pag. 419.

(10) He was captain of the guards.

(11) Ubi ſupra, pag. 65.

(12) Ibid. pag. 83, 84.

(13) He died in the year 1616, and foretold that Galligai ſhould die the next year. Le Grain, Decade de Louïs le Juſte, lib. x, pag. 419.

(14) Ibid. pag. 404.

(15) Id. ibid. pag. 405.

(16) Id. ibid.

* Synagoga Judaica, edita Hanoviæ, anno 1514.

† Pſalm cv.

‡ Tot. tit. C. de Apoſtatis.

* Novel. Conſt. Leonis Imp. 65.

(17) Le Grain, ibid. pag. 406.

(18) Id ibid. pag. 406.

the king, and for ſeveral other particular crimes. There was alſo in her proceſs an article, by which ſhe was charged with high-treaſon both againſt God and the king [F]. Her mouth was ſoon ſtopped, when, to prolong her life, ſhe pleaded her belly [G].

‘ Concini, in the preſence of his wife, had removed out of his chamber an urinal, by reaſon of it's uncleanneſs, and carried out of the ſaid chamber the image of the crucifix, for fear they ſhould hinder the effects, which Concini and his wife expected from the reading of ſome verſes of the fifty firſt Pſalm in Hebrew: which reading they deſigned ſhould be performed by Dacquin, in the ſame way it had formerly been performed before them by Montalto.’

IV. Becauſe ‘ they ſent for ſome ſorcerers, who pretended to be monks, called Ambroſians, from Nancy in Lorrain, who aſſiſted the mareſchal's wife in the offering of the cock.’

V. Becauſe there were found ‘ in their houſe divers things, which they uſed to hang about their necks (19) after the manner of the preſervatives, called by the Jews, Kamea; by the Greeks, Philacteria, and Periapta; and by the Latins, Amuleta, and Ligaturæ; which are things condemned by the holy councils, particularly by the ſixty firſt canon of the ſixth ſynod in Trullo, and by a Roman council under Pope Gregory III, and by another of Agatho, quoted by Gratian *, and by Yvo biſhop of Chartres †, quoting a council of Arles, cap. v, which condemns Philacteria diabolica, and Caracteres diabolicos.’

VI. It was proved againſt them, that they made uſe of images of wax, and kept them in coffins.

VII. And that they conſulted magicians, and employed aſtrologers, who profeſſed judicial mathematics; and that, among the reſt, they made uſe of the diabolical ſcience of Coſmo Ruger, an Italian.

VIII. ‘ (20) But, above all, it is to be obſerved, that the ſaid Galligai invited to Paris one Matthew de Montenay, as a greater and more experienced magician than the ſaid Ambroſians; by whom ſhe cauſed her ſelf to be exorciſed in the church of the Auguſtins, in the chapel of the Epiſames, and in the night, as has been depoſed by ſeveral monks of the ſaid monaſtery, moſt of whom have been confronted to her, without being excepted againſt by her. It being to be noted, that the exorciſm was performed in another manner than among chriſtians; which was alſo done in the churches of St Sulpice in the ſuburb St Germain, and in the little St Antony in the city. She anſwered to that, that her cauſing herſelf to be thus exorciſed in the night, was, leſt it ſhould be known for what diſtemper ſhe did it; ſaying, that ſhe was ſometimes poſſeſſed. But this ought to have been done by men having the true character, as either by the biſhop, or his vicar, that is, the curate of her pariſh, and not by unknown, griſly, men, who have diſappeared, and were no more ſeen; ſuch as were thoſe pretended Ambroſians.

IX. ‘ It is alſo to be noted, that, when theſe Ambroſians had a mind to perform any ceremonies of their art in the houſe of the ſaid Galligai, they cauſed all the ſervants to go out, burnt frankincenſe in the garden, and made ſeveral things in form of benedictions upon the earth; and the ſaid Galligai did eat, then, only cocks combs, and rams kidneys, which ſhe cauſed to be bleſſed; of which there is a teſtimonial proof in the proceſs.

X. ‘ It is alſo to be noted, that, every year, on the eve of the Epiphany, or Twelfth-day, ſhe cauſed father Roger to bleſs the water, which ſhe uſed, for luſtral, or holy-water; which was not without ſome myſtery and deſign. And, being asked for what reaſon ſhe did it, ſhe would give no anſwer.’

[F] She was charged with high-treaſon both againſt GOD and the king.] For both huſband and wiſe enquired after the king's life and health from ſome perſons, who profeſſed judicial aſtrology. This was proved by the depoſition of John du Chatel, called Cæſar, who was a ſoothſayer and fortune-teller, confronted to the priſoners, &c. (21)

[G] She pleaded her belly.] Having heard her condemnation read to her, ſhe ſaid, I am big with child. But it was anſwered to her, that ſhe had ſaid, being a priſoner, and during her tryal, that ſhe had not had her huſband's company for two years before; ſo that this could not be, but to the prejudice of her honour: to which ſhe anſwered nothing, and inſiſted no more thereupon (22).

(19) Ibid. pag. 407.

* Si quis ariolos, 26, q. 5.

† Part XI, cap. i, liv, and lviii.

(20) Le Grain, ubi ſupra, pag. 407.

(21) Id. ibid. pag 408.

(22) Ibid pag. 418.

GALLONIUS (Antony), a prieſt of the Oratory at Rome, hath compoſed, among other works, a treatiſe de Martyrum Cruciatibus, which is very curious. There is to be ſeen in it the figure of the inſtruments uſed by the heathens againſt the martyrs of the primitive church. He died in the year 1605 (a). I give the titles of ſome other works he compoſed [A].

A little book, printed in Holland in the year 1699, informs me of a thing, which, I think, deſerves to be inſerted in this Dictionary. It relates to the diſpute, wherein Gallonius made himſelf a party, to defend Baronius againſt the monks of mount Caſſin [B].

(a) Ludovicus Jacob in Bibliotheca Pontificia, pag. 263.

[A] I give the title of ſome other of his works.] He wrote the life of Philip Neri, the founder of the prieſts of the Oratory, and an apology pro aſſertis in annalibus Eccleſiaſticis Baronianis de monachatu ſancti Gregorii Papæ adverſus D. Conſtantinum Bellottum Monachum Caſinatem, Rome, 1604. in 4to. ex typographia Vaticana. See the Bibliotheque of Proſper Mandoſio; wherein he has not forgot Gallonius, who was a native of Rome.

[B] He defended Baronius againſt the monks of mount Caſſin.] The little book, which furniſhes me here with a commentary, is intituled, Critique du livre publié par les Moines Benedictins de la Congregation de S. Maur, ſous le titre de Bibliotheque divine de St Jerome. It contains but ſixty ſix pages in 12mo. The advertiſement of the bookſeller informs us, that we are beholden for that criticiſm to Mr Simon's nephew, who wrote it from his uncle's Latin Memoirs. What I am going to copy from that book, is not the leaſt curious paſſage in it (1). The monks of mount Caſſin, ‘ are ſo liberal of their habit, that, having beſtowed it on St Gregory the Great, they could not endure what that cardinal (2) had advanced in his annals, that it was falſe, that St Gregory had been a Benedictin monk; and publiſhed thereupon a book with this title, Gregorius magnus inſtituto Sanctiſſimi Patris Benedicti reſtitutus. But Antony Gallon, a prieſt of the Oratory at Rome, eſpouſing the cauſe of his brother Baronius, wrote a very ſmart anſwer to them; and becauſe it is grown very ſcarce, I ſhall ſend you ſome paſſages out of it, which may ſerve you till the whole be reprinted, with ſome other pieces on the ſame ſubject. It is printed at Rome, in 4to, with this title Apologeticus Liber... (3) I confeſs to you, that, if father Gallon's piety, as well as that of Baronius, were not otherwiſe known, one would be apt to think, that there is a great deal of paſſion in that anſwer; wherein the monks are charged with producing, to maintain their cauſe, ſome pieces, whoſe authors deſerve the ſame puniſhment as Cicarella. Strange compariſon! that Cicarella was hanged for his forgeries, by the order of Pope Pius V. It is true that the ſame Gallon owns, that he reveals things, which ought never to have come to the knowledge of the public; but he adds at the ſame time, that the extream impudence of thoſe monks had engaged him to publiſh them. He reproaches them with a great number of donations, which had been forged in mount Caſſin under the names of Popes and Princes. All thoſe deeds were printed at Venice, in 4to, in 1513, at the end of the chronicle of that monaſtery. By

‘ theſe

(1) Critique de la Biblioth. divine de St Jerome, pag. 64. & ſeq. See alſo Mr Simon's Critical Letters, publiſhed by a German gentleman, pag. 118, & ſeq.

(2) That is, Baronius.

(3) See the ſequel of that title in the remark [A]

'theſe falſe donations ſeveral poſſeſſions, and even whole towns, are given to the monks of mount Caſſin. It is true, that the monk Conſtantine, in defence of his monaſtery, produces records, which were found in his library, written in Lombardic characters, and which, by conſequence, could not have been newly forged. But Gallon, who knew to the bottom the practices of the Benedictin monks, anſwers, that all the papers they have, written in in thoſe ancient characters, ought not to be credited, as if they were ſealed with the ſeal of the Revelation; it being well known that they do not want writers, who have a hand good enough to imitate Lombardic characters: Ac ſi quidquid eo caractere (Longobardico) exaratum invenitur tanquam ſigillo Apocalypſis ſit conſignatum in dubitationem non liceat revocare, & deſint hodie quoque ſcriptores qui eorumdem formam elementorum valeant imitari, ut plus apud te probat genus caracteris, quàm veritas manifeſtis rationibus confirmata.'

I have not ſeen the anſwer, which has been made to that little book of Mr Simon's nephew, by the Benedictins of Paris. If I had ſeen it, I would have extracted out of it all that could ſerve towards the clearing of this diſpute, and I would have faithfully related what both parties have alledged.

GALLUTIUS (JOHN PAUL), a learned Italian aſtronomer, lived in the XVIth century. He invented an inſtrument to obſerve the celeſtial Phœnomena (a); and publiſhed ſeveral books of aſtronomy, and ſome of phyſic [A]. He was a fellow of the academy at Venice.

(a) Quo inſtrumento nove excogitato cuncta cœli phænomena una cum horis omnis generis obſervantur ex ſole, luna, ac ſtellis, non longe ab ecliptica diſtantibus. Voſſius de Scient. Mathem. pag. 386.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] The following are thoſe that are come to my knowledge: Della fabrica & uſo di diverſi ſtromenti di Aſtronomia & Coſmografia, Venice, 1597. Speculum Uranicum, Venice, 1593. Cœleſtium corporum & rerum ab ipſis pendentium explicatio, Venice, 1605. This work has been wrongfully fathered upon Paulus Galvicius, in the catalogue of Thuanus's library (1). Theatrum mundi & temporis, Venice, 1589. De Themate erigendo, parte fortunæ, diviſione Zodiaci, dignitatibus Planetarum & temporibus ad medicandum accommodatis. Extat cum Job. Haſfurto de cognoſcendis & medendis morbis ex corporum cœleſtium poſitione, cui argumenta & explicationem inſcripſit, Venice, 1584.

(1) Part. II, pag. 113.

GALLUTIUS (TARQUIN), born in Italy in 1574, entered himſelf in the order of the Jeſuits in the year 1590, and became very famous among them. He taught rhetoric in the Roman college for ten years, and morals for four. He died at Rome, the twenty eighth of July 1649, in the Grecian college, of which he had been director for eighteen years (a). He is the author of ſeveral works [A].

(a) Nathan. Sotuel. in Bibl. Scriptor. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 753.

[A] He is the author of ſeveral works.] He pronounced ſome orations before the Pope, that were printed. It was he, who made cardinal Bellarmin's funeral oration, which was alſo printed. Several other orations of his, collected into two volumes, and ſeveral of his poems, in three books, have been publiſhed. We have alſo of his two volumes of commentaries on Ariſtotle's Morals, printed (1) at Paris for Sebaſtian Cramoiſi, in Folio. His book, intituled, Vindicationes Virgilianæ, & Commentarii tres de Tragœdia, de Comœdia, de Elegia, printed at Rome in the year 1621 (2), is very curious. His deſign 'was to juſtify Virgil at any rate. In order to that, he ſets down all the objections, which he thought could be made to ſeveral places of that poet: but there are ſeveral, which he has not propoſed with all their force, leſt he ſhould have found too much difficulty in anſwering them. Nevertheleſs, among ſome weak arguments, there are others rational enough, attended with a great deal of literature, and ſeveral fine maxims concerning the art of poetry (3).' Mr Baillet ſhews here a piece of cunning, which is but too common in all ſorts of diſputes, but eſpecially with controverſiſts about religion. When they find themſelves unable to anſwer an objection, they leave out of it the principal difficulty; that is, they diſarm their adverſary before they attack him. Father Gallutius publiſhed, at Rome, in the year 1633, the revival of the ancient tragedy, and Criſpus's defence; which work is in Italian (4).

This JESUIT is, without doubt, the ſame author whom Balzac commends in the words you are going to read: I had learned in Italy, ſays he (5), that for a man to write well, he muſt propoſe good patterns to himſelf; and that good patterns were contained in a certain circle of years, out of which every thing was either in the imperfection of infancy, or in the corruption of old age. With this principle I happened to aſſiſt at cardinal Bellarmin's funeral oration, and I conſidered that great and admirable Jeſuit, who, with the dignity of his geſtures, the graces of his pronunciation, and the eloquence of his whole body, which accompanied that of his mouth, tranſported my ſoul into the ancient republic.

(1) The firſt in the Year 1632, and the other in 1645.

(2) Nath. Sotuel. ubi ſupra.

(3) Baillet, Jugemens ſur les Poëtes, Tom. I, n. 1067, pag. 51.

(4) Sotuel, ubi ſupra.

(5) Balzac, OEuvr. Diverſes, pag. m. 404.

GALLUTIUS (ANGELUS), a native of Macerata in Italy, became a Jeſuit in the year 1606, being thirteen years old, and got a reputation by his eloquence and poetry. He taught rhetoric in the Roman college for twenty four years, and died at Rome the twenty eighth of February, 1674, being above eighty years old (a). He is the author of ſome works [A].

(a) Sotuel, Bibl. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 61.

[A] He is the author of ſome works.] To wit, of ſome Latin orations, and of a Hiſtory of the wars in the Low-Countries, from the year 1593, till the truce concluded in 1609. This hiſtory is in Latin, and was printed at Rome in 1671, in two volumes in folio; and reprinted in Germany, in 4to, in the year 1677.

GAMACHE (PHILIP), in Latin Gamachæus, doctor of the Sorbonne, and profeſſor of divinity in the univerſity of Paris, was accounted one of the moſt learned divines of the XVIIth century. He was born in the year 1586, and died the twenty firſt of July 1625 (a). His commentaries upon Thomas Aquinas, intituled Summa Theologica (b), are very much eſteemed. See above (c) what he ſaid of St Auguſtin.

(a) Paulus Freherus, in Theat. pag. 423.

(b) Printed at Paris. in 1627, in three Volumes, in folio.

(c) Remark [C] of the article ADAM (JOHN).

GAMBARA (LAURENCE), a native of Breſcia in Italy, was one of the good Latin poets of the XVIth century. He lived a long while at Rome, in cardinal Alexander Farneſe's houſe (a). He publiſhed in the ſame city a collection of poems, of which which Giraldus, who was a good judge, and a ſevere critic, gives a great character [A]. Manucius has commended yet more fully Gambara's poems [B], but we muſt remember, that he beſtows thoſe great praiſes in the letters he writes to the author. Muret went into another extream [C]; for he ſpoke of that poet's works with the utmoſt contempt. It is reported (b), that Gambara had made ſome verſes too free, and ſomewhat obſcene; but that, being raiſed to the prieſthood, he committed them to the flames in the preſence of ſeveral perſons, though the public was extreamly impatient to ſee them. He compoſed a work, wherein he lays a heavy yoke upon poets [D]; for he will not allow them to meddle with heatheniſh fables. He tranſlated into Latin verſe ſome Idylls of Bion; but did not ſucceed well in it, if we rely upon Barthius's judgment (c). He died at Rome, towards the end of the year 1586, being ninety years old (d).

(a) Thuan. lib. lxxxiv, p. m. 76.

(b) See Mr Teiſſier, Elog. Tom. II, pag. 71. He quotes Poſſevin's Apparatus.

(c) Barth. in Statium, Tom. III, pag. 1635.

(d) Thuan. ubi ſupra.

[A] He publiſhed a collection of poems, of which Giraldus .... gives a great character.] Let us quote his words: ‘Vivit adhuc Laurentius Gambara Riulanus ex Brixia, cujus poëmata nuper legi Romæ excuſa, non indigna illa quidem lectione bonorum, nam & numeris poëticis, ac figuris, & varia eruditione habetur inſignis. Romæ verſatur Baſilio noſtro Zancho cariſſimus amicus, ut ex ejus carmine facile cognoſcimus, & Zanchi ipſius epiſtolis (1). —— There is ſtill living Laurentius Gambara Riulanus of Breſcia, whoſe poems, printed at Rome, I lately read; indeed they deſerve the reading, the author being famous for poetical numbers and figures, and variety of learning. At Rome, he is in great friendſhip with our Baſil Zanchius, as we eaſily perceive by his poetry, and Zanchius's letters.’ You ſhall ſee, in the following remark, the confirmation of what you have juſt now read, touching the friendſhip of Gambara and Baſil Zanchius.

[B] Manucius has commended yet more fully Gambara's poems.] He wrote to him a letter (2), ſoon after the death of Baſil Zanchius, at which he ſuppoſes him to be much afflicted, conſidering the intimacy that was between them. He takes notice, that they were looked upon as the two firſt poets of that time; but it was ſtill undecided which of the two carried the prize: ‘Fuit uterque veſtrûm ad poeticam facultatem natura propenſus, ac mirè factus, ingenio verò ita pares, ut, cum nemo tam bonus poeta ſit, quin vobis primas in componendis verſibus partes tribuat, quam confeſſionem etiam ab invitis exprimit poematum comparatio, uter tamen utri præſtet, nondum ſatis judicare quiſquam poſſit (3). —— Nature formed you both for poetry, but ſo equal in genius, that, when all other poets, how good ſoever, give place to you both, which confeſſion a compariſon between your poems and theirs extorts from them, whether they will or no, no one can determine which of you both deſerves the pre-eminence.’ In another letter he exhorts him to continue the poem, of which he had ſeen the beginning with extream admiration: ‘Patavii dum eras, habebas in manibus egregium illud poëma de novis inſulis à Columbo inventis: cujus ego cùm exordium, multis præſentibus, legiſſem, admiratus gravitatem, & elegantiam carminis, exclamavi, Cedite Romani, in quo, adhuc qui à me diſſentiret, inveni neminem, quo magis te hortor, quamquam, ut ſperò, currentem, ut approperes, habeaſque rationem non exſpectationis modò noſtræ, verùm etiam gloriæ tuæ, cujus habes à natura præclarum ſeminarium, quod etiam ſtudio excolis, ingenium tuum. Urge igitur, nec inſtitutum dimitte (4). —— When you were at Pavia, you had in hand that excellent poem concerning the new Iſlands diſcovered by Columbus; the beginning of which when I had read in the preſence of many, admiring the dignity and elegance of the poetry, I cried out, give place, ye Roman authors: in which I have yet found no one, who diſſents from me. Wherefore I exhort you to make haſte, and conſider, not only our expectation, but your own glory, of which nature has furniſhed you with an excellent ſeminary, which you even improve by ſtudy, I mean, your wit.’ Mr Teiſſier affirms that Gambara has publiſhed this Deſcription of the Diſcovery of the New World (5). If that be true, Manucius's exhortation was not fruitleſs.

[C] Muret went into another extream.] There is, without doubt, a blameable hyperbole in Paulus Manucius's flatteries; but the oppoſite exaggeration of Muret is ſtill more faulty. He wrote theſe two verſes at the head of his book of Gambara's poems:

Brixia, veſtratis merdoſa volumina vatis
 Non ſunt noſtrates tergere digna nates (6).

Breſcia, the ſh — n volumes of your poet are not worthy to wipe my br — h.

Father Sirmond had ſeen that book in the library of the Jeſuits at Rome (7). Mr Menage oppoſes, to that Judgment of Muret, the praiſes Thuanus has given to Gambara (8). If he had thought on Giraldus and Manucius, he would have made uſe alſo of their authority againſt the diſtich he has quoted.

[D] He compoſed a work, wherein he lays a heavy yoke upon poets.] Read theſe words of Mr Baillet: ‘he has wrote a Latin treatiſe, concerning the method of advancing poetry to perfection, printed at Rome, in 4to, the year he died. He pretends to ſhew in that work, that there lies an indiſpenſible obligation upon all poets, or all verſifiers and rhimers pretending to poetry, to retrench, not only all that is obſcene, wanton, and free in verſes, but likewiſe all that belongs to fables, and the worſhip of falſe deities (9).’ I refer you to the reflexion, which Mr Menage makes hereupon (10).

(1) Gyrald. de Poët. ſuor. Tempor. Dial. III, pag. m. 573. E.

(2) It is the 28th of the 4th book.

(3) Paulus Manucius, Epiſt. xxviii, lib. iv, pag. m. 226.

(4) Id. Epiſt. xlviii, lib. iv, pag. 261.

(5) Teiſſier, Elog. Tom. II, pag. 71. He only quotes Manucius's letter.

(6) Menage, Anti-Baillet, Tom. II, pag. 9.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Id. ibid.

(9) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poëtes, Tom. I, n. 1091, pag. 112.

(10) Menage, ubi ſupra, pag. 4, & ſeq.

GAMON (CHRISTOPHER DE) is no otherwiſe known to me than by a work, which he publiſhed in 1609, entituled La Semaine ou Création du Monde, contre celle du Sieur du Bartas. —— The Week or Creation of the World againſt that of du Bartas. See the remark [A].

[A] See the remark.] Mr Bullart, after having much commended du Bartas's Week, adds this: ‘but becauſe men's opinions are various, Chriſtopher Gamon, a perſon famous for his learning, pretended to ſhew faults in that book, and to leſſen it's merit by another he compoſed on the ſame ſubject, and which he publiſhed ſome time after du Bartas's death. However he contended for the prize with him with ſome reſpect; nor could he, after all, refuſe to the memory of that great man the praiſes, which he acknowledged to be ſo juſtly due to him (1).’

(1) Bullart, Academie des Arts & des Sciences, Tom. II, pag. 354.

GANYMEDE, ſon to a king of Troy [A], was the fineſt boy in the world. Jupiter was charmed with him; and, having carried him away, made him his cup-bearer, in [A] Son to a king of Troy.] Tros, ſon of Erichthonius, and grand-ſon of Dardanus, was father of Ilus, Aſſaracus, and Ganymede. Here are ſome Greek verſes, which inform us of it, and which deſerve to be quoted, ſince they are a teſtimony both of the beauty of this boy, his rape, and of his office of cup-bearer to Jupiter.

Δάρδανος

in the room of Hebe (a), and employ'd him to other criminal uſes [B]. Some ſay, he cauſed him to be carried away by an eagle; others affirm, that he ſtole him away himſelf,

---

(a) You will ſee, in the remark [D], the accident which was the pretence of Hebe's being turned out. Charles Stephens relates it, and quotes Servius: Cum Jove, ſays he, apud Æthiopas cœnante, Hebe pocula illi adminiſtrans, perque lubricum minus cautè incedens, cecidiſſet, revolutiſque veſtibus obſcœna ſuperis nudaſſet, ab officio eſt amota, ejuſque loco Ganymedes ſubrogatus. Hæc Servius. - - - - As Jupiter was feaſting with the Æthiopians, Hebe, his cup-bearer, happening to ſtumble, diſcovered her nakedneſs to the gods; for which ſhe was turned out of her office, and Ganymede put in her place. This Servius tells us.

Δάρδανος αὖ τέκεθ' ὑιὸν 'Εριχθόνιον βασιλῆα (1).
- - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Τρῶα δ' 'Εριχθόνιος τέκετο Τρώεσσιν ἄνακτα·
Τρωὸς δ' αὖ τρεῖς παῖδες ἀμύμονες ἐξεγένοντο,
Ιλος τ', Ασσάρακός τε, καὶ ἀντίθεος Γανυμήδης,
Ος δὴ κάλλιςος γένετο θνητῶν ἀνθρώπων,
Τὸν καὶ ἀνηρείψαντο θεοὶ Διῒ οἰνοχοεύειν,
Κάλλεος εἵνεκα οἷο, ἵν' ἀθανάτοισι μετείῃ (2).

Dardanus rurſus genuit filium Erichthonium regem
- - - - - - - - - - - - - -

Troem autem Erichthonius genuit Trojanis regem,
Ex Troe vero rurſum tres filiĭ inculpati nati ſunt,
Iluſque Aſſaracuſque & divinus Ganymedes,
Qui ſane pulcherrimus fuit mortalium hominum:
Quem etiam rapuerunt dii, Jovi ut pocillator eſſet, Pulchritudinem ob ſuam, ut immortalibus intereſſet.

- - - - - From Erichthonius came
The ſacred Tros, of whom the Trojan name.
Three ſons renown'd adorn'd his nuptial bed,
Ilus, Aſſaracus, and Ganymede:
The matchleſs Ganymede, divinely fair,
Whom heav'n enamour'd ſnatch'd to upper air,
To bear the cup of Jove (etherial gueſt)
The grace and glory of th'ambroſial feaſt.

POPE.

Note, that, in theſe verſes, Homer does not ſay, as he does elſewhere (3), that Jupiter carried away Ganymede; but that the gods carried him away, to make him cup-bearer to Jupiter. He adds, that Ilus, Ganymede's eldeſt brother, begot Laomedon, who was Priamus's father. I obſerve this, becauſe it is neceſſary to examine whether Cicero be juſtly cenſured by thoſe, who charge him with a ſlip of memory, when he ſays, that the boy, who was carried away, was ſon to Laomedon: 'Trois igitur fuit filius Ganymedes non Laomedontis, ut videtur ſenſiſſe Cicero 1. Tuſcul. lapſus videlicet memoria (quo nomine ſolent magni viri laborare, qui gravioribus impediti curis, cùm citant vel autores, vel autorum teſtimonia, toto, quod aiunt, cœlo aberrant: id quod diligens lector ſæpe in Ariſtotelis deprehendet libris, preſertim de moribus). Verba Ciceronis hæc ſunt: Nec Homerum audio, qui Ganymedem à Diis raptum ait propter formam, ut Jovi pocula miniſtraret: non juſta cauſa, cur Laomedonti tanta fieret injuria. Fingebat hæc Homerus & humana ad deos transferebat, divina mallem ad nos (4). —— Ganymede therefore was the ſon of Tros, not of Laomedon, as Cicero ſeems to have thought, I. Tuſcul. plainly by a ſlip of memory, to which great men are very ſubject, who, being taken up with affairs of importance, when they quote authors, or the teſtimonies of authors, err very widely: which the careful reader will often diſcover in Ariſtotle's books, eſpecially his Ethics. Cicero's words are theſe: nor do I regard Homer, who ſays that Ganymede was carried away by the gods, becauſe of his beauty, to be Jupiter's cup-bearer. This great injury is unjuſtly offerred to Laomedon: Homer feigned the ſtory and transferred human things to the gods; I had rather he had transferred divine things to us.' Tanaquillus Faber pretends, that that cenſure is unjuſt; and, to prove it, he alledges (5) a paſſage of Euripides's Scholiaſt, wherein an ancient writers teſtifies, that Ganymede was Laomedon's ſon. This ſhews, that, there being different opinions about the matter, Cicero might enjoy the liberty, either to follow Homer, or not to follow him; and therefore, that it is not thro' inadvertency or forgetfulneſs, but by choice, that he ſaid, that Ganymede was Laomedon's ſon. With the apologiſt's leave, methinks the cenſure is very well grounded; for Cicero relates in that place a tradition, which came from Homer, whom he alſo quotes. Therefore it is not likely, that he meant to contradict him, with reſpect to the father of the fine boy, who had been taken away; and ſo we may ſay, he believed that Homer made him the ſon of Laomedon, and conclude that his memory failed him.

Note, that, when I uſed the indefinite expreſſion, ſon to a king of Troy, I had in view the variations, which are to be found in authors, as to this matter. Hyginus affirms, in the 224th chapter, that Ganymede was ſon of Aſſaracus; and in the 271ſt, that he was ſon to Erichthonius. Some (6) make him Laomedon's brother, and conſequently Ilus's ſon: others (7) make him the ſon of Dardanus. Homer's opinion is the moſt common.

[B] Jupiter . . . . made him his cup-bearer, ... and employed him to other criminal uſes.] The verſes of Homer, which I have quoted in the preceding remark, do not intimate, that Ganymede was ſtolen away out of any laſcivious motive. They only ſhew, that the beauty of that young man prompted the gods to tranſlate him into heaven, that he might be Jupiter's cup-bearer, and live among immortal beings. It is as much as if we ſhould ſay, that they thought him ſo handſome, that he ought to be an ornament to the celeſtial court, and that, the earth not deſerving to poſſeſs ſo great a treaſure, they ought to procure him an habitation more worthy of him; that is, a good place in the country of immortal bleſſedneſs. All this denotes no laſciviouſneſs: and Homer keeps exactly within the ſame bounds, when he ſpeaks of Ganymede in the hymn to Venus. He changes indeed ſome other circumſtances; for he ſuppoſes, that Jupiter carried him away, in order to make him cup-bearer to the gods; but he does not alter the reſt.

Η τοι μὲν ξανθὸν Γανυμήδεα μητίετα Ζεὺς
Ηρπασ' ἑὸν διὰ κάλλος, ἵν' ἀθανάτοισι μετείῃ,
Καί τε Διὸς κατὰ δῶμα θεοῖς ἐπιοινοχοεύοι,
Θαῦμα ἰδεῖν, πάντεσσι τετιμένος ἀθανάτοισι,
Χρυσέυ ἐκ κρητῆρος ἀφύσσων νέκταρ ἐρυθρόν.

Hic quidem flavum Ganymedem conſultor Jupiter
Rapuit ſuam propter pulchritudinem, ut cum diis converſaretur,
Et Jovis in domo Diis vinum effunderet,
Mirabile viſu, ab omnibus honoratus immortalibus,
Aureo ex cratere hauriens nectar rubrum.

The thunderer, ſmit with Ganymede the fair,
Snatch'd the lov'd Phrygian boy to upper air,
Preferr'd with deities to dwell above,
And fill the goblet to the gueſts of Jove.

Apollonius follows the ſame notion: and it would argue too ſuſpicious a temper to think otherwiſe, under pretence of the laſt words he has made uſe of; ſince they are reducible to the ſame ſenſe which Homer had expreſſed:

Μετὰ καὶ Γανυμήδεα, τόν ῥά ποτε Ζεὺς
Οὐρανῷ ἐγκατένασσεν ἐφέστιον ἀθανατοῖσιν,
Κάλλεος ἱμερθείς.

Sed cum Ganymede, quem aliquando Jupiter
In cœlo locarat, & deorum fecerat contubernalem
Pulchritudinis cupidus (8).

(1) Homer. Iliad. lib. xx, ver. 219.

(2) Id. ibid. ver. 230.

(3) In the Hymn for Venus. See the following remark.

(4) Commentar. in Emblemata Alciati, pag. m. 20, col. 1. Claudius du Verdier, Cenſ. in Author. pag. 105, has criticized on that fault of Cicero.

(5) Hinc animadvertere potes ſatis improſpere Ciceronem à multis reprehenſum fuiſſe, qui Ganymedem Laomedontis filium faciat. Tan. Faber. Epiſt. lviii, lib. ii, pag. 153.

(6) Tzetzes ad Lycophron. pag. 10.

(7) Lucian. in Charidemo, Oper. Tom. II, pag. 1019.

(8) Apollon. Rhodius, Argonaut. lib. iii, ver. 115, pag. m. 278.

himſelf, in the ſhape of that bird [C]. He deified that young boy, and made a very fine preſent to his father [D]. There are different opinions as to the place, from whence Ganymede

With Ganymede, the thunderer's beauteous prize,
Preferr'd to grace the banquet of the skies.

The other poets have not been ſo cautious: for they have frankly told us, that Jupiter fell in love with Ganymede, and ſtole him away, to gratify his pederaſty. See the two verſes of Plautus, which I have cited above (9), and the tenth book (10) of Ovid's Metamorphoſis. If we believe the grammarian Servius, rapti Ganymedis, in Virgil, is the ſame thing with ſtuprati, corrupti (11). I omit ſeveral places in Martial, and particularly theſe four verſes.

Deprenſum in puero tetricis me vocibus uxor
Corripis, & . . . . te quoque habere refers.
Dixit idem quoties laſcivo Juno tonanti?
Ille tamen gracili cum Ganymede jacet (12).

Caught with a boy, you chide me, rage, and ſwell,
And vow, that you can pleaſe me full as well.
Juno the ſame to wanton Jove may ſwear,
Yet Jove ſtill lies with Ganymede the fair.

I lay no ſmall ſtreſs on Lucian's authority; for though he was a libertine, whoſe greateſt delight was to turn religion into ridicule, yet his banters and jeſts muſt have had ſome foundation; elſe he had made himſelf ridiculous, if he had jeſted upon opinions and ceremonies forged in his own brain, and calumniouſly fathered them upon the pagans. He therefore took out of the traditions, and worſhip of the Gentiles, the ſubject matter of his ſatires, and ſo, ſince he has ſuppoſed, that Ganymede was both the cup-bearer and darling of Jupiter (13), we muſt conclude, that this opinion was pretty common among the heathens. But we have no need of his authority, as long as that of Plato alone is ſufficient. That great philoſopher has condemned the fiction, the Cretans had broached about Ganymede, that they might have a great example to countenance their pederaſty. Now the fable of Ganymede was very proper for their purpoſe, becauſe their laws were thought to proceed from Jupiter (14). And therefore they taught, that that deity made uſe of Ganymede, to indulge his infamous paſſion. I cannot forbear quoting here Seneca, who has ranked this action of Jupiter among the extravagances, ſung by the poets, about that god, and which ſerved only to remove all ſhame of ſin from thoſe, who ſhould entertain ſuch an idea of the divine nature. 'Sic veſtras hallucinationes fero, ſays he (15), quemadmodum Jupiter optimus maximus ineptias poëtarum: quorum alius . . . . adulterum ipſum induxit . . . . alius raptorem ingenuorum corruptoremque & cognatorum quidem . . . . quibus nihil aliud actum eſt quàm ut pudor hominibus peccandi demeretur ſi tales deos credidiſſent. —— I ſuffer by your miſtaken notions, juſt as the great Jupiter does by the impertinence of the poets . . . . of whom one . . . . . makes him an adulterer . . . another, a raviſher and debaucher of youth, even of thoſe related to him . . . . by which they have no other deſign than to free thoſe from all ſhame of offending, who entertain ſuch notions of the gods.' There is no doubt but he had in view the fiction of Ganymede's rape, which was the more injurious to Jupiter, in that he was great-great-grandfather to that youth. This conſanguinity made ſome ſay, that Dardanus, Ganymede's great-grandfather, was not ſon of Jupiter; for, if he had been ſo, how could Jupiter have committed ſuch an inceſtuous action? 'Sed authores quidam tradunt, Dardanum, & Jaſium Coriti filios fuiſſe, non Jovis; nec enim (ſi ita fuiſſet) ad uſus impudicos Ganymedem pronepotem ſuum habere potuiſſet (16).'

This juſtifies the fathers of the church, who have reproached the heathens with this villany of the greateſt of their gods (17). This point admits of no controverſy; nor can Clemens Alexandrinus, Arnobius, Lactantius, and others, be ſuſpected of having uſed any artifice or calumny againſt the heathens. They have objected againſt a tradition well eſtabliſhed, and which extended to public worſhip: for the ſame Jupiter, who was adored in the temples, was repreſented there with Ganymede, and with the eagle, which carried away that young boy. Read theſe words of Lactantius (18): 'Nam quod aliud argumentum habet imago catamiti, & effigies aquilæ, cum ante pedes Jovis ponuntur in templis, & cum ipſo pariter adorantur, niſi ut nefandi ſceleris, ac ſtupri memoria maneat in æternum? —— For what elſe can we think of the image of the catamite, and the eagle, placed at the foot of Jupiter in temples, and adored together with him, but that it is deſigned to perpetuate the memory of a ſcandalous action and rape?' Conſult alſo Tatian (19). I have ſeen ſomething in Juvenal, which ſignifies, that there was, in Rome, either a temple of Ganymede, or a temple which contained the ſtatue of that cup-bearer of Jupiter. The commentators do not well clear that paſſage:

Nuper enim, ut repeto, fanum Iſidis & Ganymedem
Pacis, & advectæ ſecreta palatia matris,
Et Cererem (nam quo non proſtat fœmina templo?)
Notior Aufidio mœchus celebrare ſolebas (20).

Thy luſt, more ſhameleſs than Aufidius', dares
Pollute each fane; nor Iſis' temple ſpares,
Nor Ganymede, nor Berecynthia's ſhrine,
Nor, Peace, thy temple, nor even, Ceres, thine.
For where's the place ſo ſacred, as to be
From wanton, proſtituted, women free?

Pauſanias mentions a ſtatue of Jupiter and Ganymede, which a certain man of Theſſaly, named Gnothis, dedicated in the famous temple of Olympia (21).

[C] Some ſay, he cauſed him to be carried away by an eagle . . . . others, that he ſtole him away himſelf in the ſhape of that bird.] Horace and Hyginus (22) are of the firſt opinion; Ovid and Lucian of the ſecond. Theſe are Horace's words:

Qualem miniſtrum fulminis alitem,
Cui Rex Deorum regnum in aveis vagas
Permiſit, expertus fidelem
Jupiter in Ganymede flavo (23).

The royal bird, to whom the king of heav'n
The empire of the feather'd race has given,
For ſervices already done,
The rape of Priam's ſon.

As for Ovid, he has expreſſed himſelf thus:

- - - - Nulla tamen alite verti
Dignatur, niſi quæ portat ſua fulmina terræ.
Nec mora: percuſſo mendacibus aëre pennis
Arripit Iliadem, qui nunc quoque pocula miſcet, Invitaque Jovi nectar Junone miniſtrat (24).

No other feather'd ſhape he deigns to wear,
Than his, who bears his thunder thro' the air.
He darts, in borrow'd plumage, from the skies,
And bears from earth to heav'n his Trojan prize;
Who now the cup nectareous fills, above,
And miniſters, tho' Juno frown, to Jove.

You will find Lucian's words in the dialogue of Jupiter and Ganymede (25).

[D] He deified that young boy, and made a very fine preſent to his father.] Tros was inconſolable upon the loſs of that dear ſon; but, after having received ſome compenſation, and upon the news, that he, for whom he mourned, ſhould ever live amongſt the gods, and ſhould never grow old, he took comfort at laſt. Jupiter preſented him with ſome very ſwift race-horſes, which were ſome of thoſe that the gods mounted (26). Note, that Laomedon, ſon of Tros, promiſed to Hercules the horſes, which Jupiter had given by way of compenſation (27); but, not having performed his promiſe, he was beſieged in Troy, and there loſt his life. Hercules had demanded thoſe horſes as a recompence

---

(9) Citat. (8) of the Article ADONIS.

(10) Verſu 155, & ſeq.

(11) Servius in hæc verba, Æneid. lib. i, ver. 28, & rapti Ganymedis honores.

(12) Martial. Epig. xliv, lib. xi. See alſo the 27th Epigram of the ſame book.

(13) See his Dialogue of Juno and Jupiter, Oper. Tom. I, pag. m. 128. I quote a paſſage out of it in the remark [D] of the article LONGUS.

(14) Plato de Legib. lib. i, pag. m. 776. E.

(15) Seneca, de Vita Beata, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 639.

(16) Lactant. lib. i, ſub fin.

(17) See, above, remark [B] of the article CHRYSIPPUS, natural ſon of Pelops. And St Auguſtin, de Civitate Dei, lib. vii, cap. xxvi.

(18) Lactan Div. Inſtitut. lib. i, cap. xi, pag. m. 34.

(19) See the remark [G], in the Margin, citat. (59).

(20) Juven. Sat. IX, ver. 22.

(21) Pauſan. lib. v, cap. xxiv, pag. m. 440.

(22) Hygin. Poët. Aſtron. lib. ii, cap. xvi. See alſo Apollod. lib. iii, pag. m. 221.

(23) Horat. Od. iv, lib. iv.

(24) Ovid. Metamor. lib x, ver. 157.

(25) Lucian. Oper. Tom I, pag. 124, & ſeq.

(26) Taken out of Homer's hymn, in Venerem.

(27) Δῶχ' υἷος ποινὴν Γανυμήδεος. Dedit pro filio compenſationem Ganymede. Homer, Iliad. lib. v, ver. 266.

Ganymede was carried away, and what he was then doing [E]. Some ſay, he was on mount Ida; others place him elſewhere: Some pretend he was a hunting; and others, that he kept a flock. I ſhall not loſe time in relating the allegorical explanations that have been given (b): For thoſe are only conceits, which may be multiplied in infinitum, and by the help of which one finds in every thing whatever he pleaſes: But I ſhall not paſs over in ſilence, that ſome writers have related this as hiſtorical matter of fact. They pretend, that Ganymede was really ſtolen away by a prince, who was in love with him [F]. Thoſe Painters, who repreſent him as carried away on the back of an eagle, compence for the ſervice performed by him in delivering Heſione, Laomedon's daughter, who was expoſed to a ſea-monſter (28). Note alſo, that, unknown to Laomedon, Anchiſes was ſo cunning as to get of theſe horſes a breed (29). Laſtly, note, that, according to ſome authors (30), the preſent, which Jupiter made to Ganymede's father, was a golden vine, wrought by Vulcan. For the reſt, if the authorities before-mentioned (31), touching this young man's deification, ſhould not ſuffice, we might add to them the teſtimony of Pindar (32), and that of Lucian (33), beſides this commentary of Servius: 'Honores dixit, 'vel propter miniſterium poculorum, ad quod receptus 'eſt, remota Hebe filia Junonis, quæ Jovi bibere miniſtrabat, vel ob hoc quod inter ſydera collocatus, 'aquarii nomen accepit, & non ob hoc tantum iraſcitur Juno, ſed quod violatus ſit ut divinos honores 'conſequeretur (34).' You ſee, in theſe words of Servius, two remarkable things: firſt, that Hebe, whoſe office it was to fill drink to the gods, was deprived of that employment, and that Ganymede was preferred to her place: ſecondly, that he was placed among the ſtars, and was that ſign of the zodiac, which is called Aquarius. This is obſerved by Hyginus (35). What a mortification was it for poor Juno, to ſee her husband's darling fill the place from which her daughter Hebe was turned out! The miſhap, which had befallen Hebe, was indeed the pretence, for which ſhe was turned out, but not the true cauſe. She happened to fall, and ſhew all ſhe had, whilſt the gods were at table (36): whereupon Jupiter, who deſired paſſionately to make Ganymede his cup-bearer, improved this opportunity to turn away that unfortunate maid.

(b) See the commentators upon the fourth emblem of Alciatus.

[E] There are different opinions as to the place, from whence Ganymede was carried away, and what he was then doing.] Lucian (37) ſuppoſes, that Ganymede was a ſhepherd on mount Ida, when Jupiter ſtole him away. Virgil ſuppoſes, that he was a hunting there:

Intextuſque puer frondoſâ regius Idâ
Veloces jaculo cervos, curſuque fatigat,
Acer, anhelanti ſimilis: quem præpes ab Idâ
Sublimem pedibus rapuit Jovis armiger uncis (38).

There, interwov'n, the royal youth is ſeen:
He hunts the flying ſtag along the green,
On Ida's ſhady top: with eager pace
He ſeems to run, and pant along the chace:
Whom the wing'd herald of his maſter's love
Snatch'd from th' Idean hill, and bore to Jove.

Valerius Flaccus (39), and Statius (40), have imitated this paſſage of the Æneid. But Strabo (41) affirms, that it was reported, that Ganymede had been carried away from a place called Harpageia, and which was ſeated on the borders of the territory of the town of Priapos, and of the town of Cyzicus; and that, according to others, he had been carried away from the promontory of Dardanium. The Chalcidians (42) maintained, that this rape happened amongſt them; that is, in the iſland of Eubœa; and they ſhewed the place, where Jupiter had committed that rape. It was a place full of myrtle-ſhrubs, and called Harpagium. Note, that they were people immoderately inclined to the ſin againſt nature. Περὶ τὰ παιδικὰ δαιμονίως ἐπτόηνται. Prodigioſe in amore puerorum flagrant (43). It is therefore very likely, that they broached this tradition, the better to countenance their brutality by the authority and example of the greateſt of the gods. This is what Plato thought of the inhabitants of the iſle of Crete, as I have ſaid before (44). Suidas has preſerved to us another hypotheſis touching the place, where the rape was committed: ſee the following remark.

[F] Some writers pretend, that Ganymede was really ſtolen away, by a prince who was in love with him.] Herodian relates, that the place called Peſſinus in Phrygia, was ſo called, either becauſe the image of the mother of the gods was dropt down there from heaven; or becauſe the combat, which was fought there between Ilus and Tantalus, coſt many people their lives. Thoſe two princes, the one a Phrygian, the other a Lydian, made war upon one another, either becauſe they could not agree about the boundaries of their dominions (45), or rather becauſe Tantalus had ſtolen away Ganymede. The latter loſt his life in the field of battle, in the hands of his brother, and thoſe of his raviſher, the one pulling him one way, the other another. His body not being found, his adventure was repreſented as ſomething marvellous and divine; and from thence was framed the fable of his being carried away by Jupiter (46). We read in Euſebius's chronicle (47), that, upon the account of Ganymede's rape, there aroſe a war between Tros, the father of that young boy, and Tantalus: which is affirmed upon the credit of a writer named Phanocles. He was an Erotical author (48), or, to explain myſelf, a compiler of amorous adventures. Oroſius has ſpoken of that action of Tantalus in theſe words (49): 'Nec 'mihi nunc enumerare opus eſt Tantali & Pelopis facta 'turpia, & fabulas turpiores: quorum Tantalus rex 'Phrygiorum Ganymedem Trois Dardaniorum regis 'filium cum flagitioſiſſimè rapuiſſet, majore concerti 'certaminis fœditate detinuit, ſicut Phanocles poeta 'confirmat, qui maximum bellum excitatum ob hoc 'fuiſſe commemorat: ſive quia hunc ipſum Tantalum, 'utpote aſſeclam deorum, videri vult raptum puerum 'ad libidinem Jovis familiari lenocinio præparaſſe, qui 'ipſum quoque filium Pelopem epulis ejus non dubitarit impendere. —— Nor need I mention the ſcandalous actions, and more ſcandalous ſtories, of Tantalus and Pelops, of whom Tantalus, king of the Phrygians, having moſt wickedly raviſhed Ganymede, ſon of Tros, king of the Dardanians, detained him for a more ſhameful purpoſe, as is confirmed by Phanocles the poet, who relates that this was the occaſion of a very great war; becauſe, perhaps, he thought, that Tantalus, as being an attendant on the gods, might have prepared the boy for Jupiter's luſt, ſince he made no ſcruple to ſerve up his own ſon Pelops at that god's table.' Euſtathius (50) having ſaid, that, according to ſome authors, Tantalus had raviſhed Ganymede, adds, that others charged Minos with that rape. If we conſult Suidas, we ſhall learn many circumſtances of that attempt of Minos. There we ſhall ſee, that that king of Crete went to pay a viſit to Tros; and, being informed, that that prince's three ſons were a hunting, he declared, he had a mind to hunt with them. He had no ſooner ſeen Ganymede, than he conceived a moſt violent paſſion for him; and, having cauſed him to be carried away, he put him on board one of the ſhips he had ſent before into the Granicus, and returned into Crete. Ganymede was ſo concerned at his misfortune, that he ran himſelf through with his own ſword. Minos buried him in a temple; and for that reaſon it was given out, that this young man converſed with the gods (51). Euſtathius (52) relates the particulars in another manner. He ſays, that Ganymede, having been raviſhed, hanged himſelf; and that they made his father believe, that a whirlwind and a cloud had carried him away, to be Jupiter's cup-bearer. You will find, in Athenæus, that Echemenes, who wrote a book touching what concerned the iſle of Crete, affirmed, that Ganymede was not raviſhed by Jupiter, but by king Minos. Ludovicus Vives affirms, that Tantalus, having ſtolen that young boy, tranſported him into the iſle of Crete, and gave him to Jupiter

(28) Ex Apollod. lib. ii, pag. m. 123, 137.

(29) Homer. ubi ſupra.

(30) See Tanaq. Faber, ubi ſupra. He quotes the ſcholiaſt upon Euripides in Oreſt.

(31) In the remark [B], and in the preſent remark, citat. (26).

(32) Pindar. Od. X, Olymp.

(33) Lucian. in Jove Tragœdo, Oper. Tom. II, pag. 205, & in Charidemo, Ibid. pag. 1019.

(34) Servius, in Virg. Æneid. lib. i, ver. 28.

(35) Hygin. cap. 224, & Poët. Aſtron. lib. ii, cap. xvi, & xxix.

(36) See, above, citation (a).

(37) Lucian. in Dialog. Jovis & Ganym. Oper. Tom. I, pag. 124.

(38) Virgil. Æneid. lib. v, ver. 252.

(39) Valer. Flaccus, Argon. lib. ii, ver. 414.

(40) Statius, Theb. lib. i, ver. 548.

(41) Strabo, lib. xiii, pag. 404. See alſo Stephan. Byzant. voce Ἁρπαγία.

(42) Athen. lib. xiii, pag. 601.

(43) Id. ibid.

(44) In remark [B], citat. (14).

(45) There is in Herodian περὶ ὁδῶν de viis, but according to Meziriac's conjecture, Comment. on Ovid's Epiſt. pag. 884, we muſt read περὶ ὅρων de finibus.

(46) Herodian. lib. i, cap. xi. See alſo Lycophron's ſcholiaſt, pag. 50.

(47) Euſeb. n. 654.

(48) See Scaliger, in Euſebium, pag. 41. He quotes Plutarch, lib. iv, cap. v, Συμπος.

(49) Oroſius, lib. i, cap. xii, pag. m. 4, 45.

(50) Euſtath. in lib. xx. Iliad.

(51) Taken out of Suidas, in Μίνως.

(52) Euſtath. ubi ſupra.

eagle, are miſtaken, and do not conſult antient authors [G]. Some pretend, that Cicero was not well acquainted with Ganymede's father (c). Time out of mind, the Phliaſians paid a particular worſhip to a deity, which at firſt they called GANYMEDA, and afterwards Hebe: This Pauſanias tells us, in his ſecond book, page 140.

ter (53). Which is a meer paraphraſe of Oroſius. But St Auguſtin (54) has acknowledged, that the fable only ſuited with Jupiter, and that the reality belonged to Tantalus. Suidas on the Word Ἴλιον, and Cedrenus alſo, relate, that king Tros, having ſubdued ſeveral princes, his neighbours, ſent his ſon Ganymede, attended by fifty men, to make a ſacrifice of thankſgiving, in a certain temple of Jupiter, which was in the dominions of Tantalus. But Tantalus, ſuppoſing that Ganymede came as a ſpy, to view the ſtrength of his kingdom, made him priſoner; whereupon Ganymede fell ſick and died (55).

[G] The painters, who repreſent him as carried away on the back of an eagle, are miſtaken, and do not conſult ancient authors.] Salmaſius (56) has cenſured that miſtake: for he ſays, that, according to the ancient poets, the eagle took up Ganymede by the hair between his talons. The author whom he explains (57) ſays the ſame. Note, that Martial ſuppoſes, that the eagle was afraid of hurting Ganymede.

Ætherias aquila puerum portante per auras
 Illæſum timidis unguibus hæſit onus (58).

As with the boy Jove's eagle ſoar'd away,
His cautious talons bore, unhurt, the prey.

An ancient carver repreſented this wonderfully well (59). A learned Engliſhman has followed the common error of painters, in a book, whoſe French tranſlation was printed at Roan in the year 1656, with the title of, Le Monde dans la Lune; that is, the world in the Moon. This is what he obſerves (60): If there ‘ be ſo great a bird in Madagaſcar, as Paulus Venetus ‘ relates *, the feathers of whoſe wings are twelve foot ‘ long, and which can take up into the air a horſe ‘ with his rider, as eaſily as one of our kites could ‘ take up a little mouſe; it were then but inſtructing ‘ one of theſe birds to carry a man, and he might ‘ ride as far on his back as Ganymede did on an ‘ eagle.’

(c) See the remark [A].

(53) Lud. Vives, in Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. vii, cap. 26, & lib. xviii, cap. xiii.

(54) Auguſt. ibid. lib. xviii, cap. xiii.

(55) Meziriac. Comment. on Ovid's Epiſtles, pag. 885.

(56) Salmaſ. Not. in Achill. Tatium, pag. 583.

(57) Achill. Tatius, pag. m. 144.

(58) Mart. Epig. vii, lib. i.

(59) Leochares aquilam ſentientem quid rapiat in Ganymede, & cui ferat parcentem unguibus etiam per veſtem. Plin. lib. xxxiv, cap. viii, pag. m. 125. That piece of work was much eſteemed. Τίνος δὲ χάριν διὰ Λεωχάρȣς, Γανυμήδη τὸν ἀνδρόγυνον, ὡς τι σπȣδαῖον ἔχοντες κτῆμα, τετιμήκατε. Cur propter Leocharis ſculptoris artificium Ganymedem illom effœminatum, tanquam eximium aliquid habentes, colitis? Tatian. Orat. ad Græc. pag. 170.

(60) Le Monde dans la Lune, Part. I, pag. 267.

* Lib. iii, cap. 40.

GARASSE, (FRANCIS), a native of Angouleſme, became a Jeſuit in the year 1601 (a). He made himſelf much talked of by the zeal he ſhewed againſt libertine wits, and againſt the enemies of his ſociety: But he inveighed principally againſt the poet Theophile, and againſt Paſquier. He wanted neither genius, nor reading; and having a great deal of fire, a fruitful imagination, and good lungs, he paſſed for a great preacher. He was very proper to maintain a cauſe in the pulpit; for his turns of wit, and his way of delivery, made very ſtrong impreſſions, conſidering the taſte of that age: But he ought not to have meddled with writing; or, if he could not renounce the title of author, he ought to have made only Latin verſes, or have exerciſed himſelf on ſome ſubject of little importance: For, having adventured to write on the moſt ſublime truths, which libertines may call in queſtion, he has contributed leſs to convert that ſort of people, than to confirm them in their errors [A]; becauſe, he perpetually departed from the gravity, which becomes ſuch matters, and becauſe he made uſe of bad proofs, and falſe quotations. He found himſelf expoſed to the criticiſm of ſeveral formidable pens. Paſquier's ſons vindicated their father with great ſtatelineſs [B]. But he, who wrote with moſt vehemence againſt this Jeſuit, was the abbot

(a) Alegambe, in Biblioth. Script. Societ. Jeſu, pag. 124.

[A] He contributed leſs to convert the Libertines, than to confirm them in their errors.] This is the title of a book he publiſhed at Paris, in the year 1623. The curious doctrine of the wits, or would be ſuch, of this age; containing ſeveral maxims pernicious to the ſtate, religion, and good manners; confuted and overthrown by father Francis Garaſſus, of the ſociety of JESUS. He thought he had quite confounded thoſe libertines; but he was ſoon acquainted, that, according to the judgment of the public, his book was much more proper to foment atheiſm, than to deſtroy it. The judgment and cenſure of that work was addreſſed to the Jeſuits (1); and the author tells them, that people could not believe, that they, who were the firſt and ſtrongeſt champions of truth, ſhould have choſen father Garaſſe to defend it. That man, being better qualified for a ſatirical poet, or a farce-writer, than for a catholic doctor, has lately written a book, which carries a ſpecious title, againſt Atheiſts; but which, to ſpeak ſincerely, and as it were in the preſence of GOD, is a ſink of impiety, a common ſewer of prophanations, a collection of buffoonries and facetious jeſts, a malicious and ſlanderous ſatire againſt many men of probity and merit (2). After having ſaid ſeveral things, in the ſame ſtrain, to characteriſe that book, he asked the Jeſuits, whether thoſe be the means to defend the venerable truths of our religion; whether thoſe be the true weapons to combate atheiſm; or whether thoſe be not rather the inſtruments of the ruin of ſouls, and the inventions of the father of lies, to render truth ridiculous and more contemptible amongſt his wretched ſupporters. The ſame year 1624, Naudé publiſhed a book (3), wherein we find theſe words (4): As for father Garaſſe, it is true, he has taken ſome of their articles out of father Robert, which he has ſo aptly brought into a parallel with the ways of the libertines of our days, that, both upon that ſcore, and for the induſtriouſneſs of his wit, and variety of his learning, I am ſorry he ſhould undergo the cenſure, which is paſſed upon all thoſe, who have ſhewn their learning in that matter: that is, that no body ever wrote better againſt the atheiſts, than the recorders, who draw up the ſentence of their condemnation: if, however, according to the ſaying of Tertullian, the church, full of mercy, Non quærat potius pudorem ſuffundere, quam ſanguinem effundere. He returns to the charge in the laſt chapter of his book, in this manner: ‘ I have ‘ ſome monſters to encounter, ſays he (5), ... who, ‘ through an abominable induſtry, draw impiety out ‘ of the book of the Curious Doctrine; which, by an ‘ unparallelled impudence and temerity, they brand ‘ with the moſt pernicious title of the Art of Atheiſm: ‘ which gives me occaſion to deplore the misfortune ‘ of our age, which has attained to that degree of ‘ malice, that it deprives us even of the liberty of ‘ oppoſing the greateſt impieties, and of confuting ‘ them by the moſt common and lawful means; ‘ ſince corruption is ſo very great, that, when a reli‘gious ſociety, jealous of the honour and integrity ‘ of their religion, Voluerunt, as Lactantius ſays, ‘ †, poſteris etiam approbare, quanta pietate defende‘rint religiones, auctoritatem religionum ipſarum teſtan‘do minuerunt.’

[B] Paſquier's ſons (6) vindicated their father with great ſtatelineſs.] They made no noiſe, till Garaſſe had ſhewn his obſtinacy in falling foul upon him (7). He had written a book (8) againſt his Recherches in the year 1622. The next year, he abuſed him in a hundred places of his Curious Doctrine; and went on in the ſame ſtrain, in the year 1624, in his anſwer to the prior Ogier. Thereupon they loſt all patience, and publiſhed a very violent book againſt that Jeſuit, which they addreſſed to him, wherever he might be. The reaſon of this addreſs was, becauſe Francis Garaſſe had dedicated his book to the late Stephen Paſquier, wherever he might be; for, (ſaid he) having never been able to know your religion, I was at a loſs which way you were gone at your departure from this

(1) The prior Ogier is the author of the book, that came out in the year 1623, under the title of Jugement & Cenſure du livre de la Doctrine Curieuſe de François Garaſſe. — A Judgment and Cenſure of the book of the Curious Doctrine of Francis Garaſſe.

(2) In the epiſtle dedicatory.

(3) Intituled, Inſtructions à la France ſur la verité de l'Hiſtoire des Freres de la Roze-Croix.

(4) Cap. vi, pag. 60.

(5) Ibid. page 113, 114.

† Lib. i, de falſa religione.

(6) The one was called Nicolas Paſquier, Sieur de Minxe, and had been Maſter of the Requeſts: the other was called Guy Paſquier, Sieur de Buſſy, and was Auditor of Accounts. See the licence of their book.

(7) See the epiſtle dedicatory of the book intituled, Defenſe pour Etienne Paſquier, printed at Paris, in 1624.

(8) Intituled, Les Recherches des Recherches & autres Oeuvres d'Etienne Paſquier.

abbot of St Cyran [C]. Some pretend, that, upon that ſcore, father Garaſſe was the Helen of the war between the Jeſuits and Janſeniſts [D]. The laſt action of his life was very fine. He preſſingly aſked leave of his ſuperiors to tend upon the infected with the plague, during a diſmal peſtilence, which raged in Poictiers; and, having obtained it, and contracted the diſeaſe in that charitable office, he died at the hoſpital, among the infected [E], the fourteenth of June 1631, being forty ſix years old (b). He had reconciled himſelf with a good grace to the prior Ogier [F], and to Balzac [G]. Placcius has been led into a miſtake by the title of his Rabelais Reformed [H].

He

this life, and therefore I am conſtrained to write to you at a venture, and to direct this packet, WHEREEVER YOU BE. To pay him in the ſame coin, they accoſted him thus (9). This has made me uſe the ſame freedom with you, and has forced me to direct this packet to you, IN WHAT PLACE SOEVER YOU MAY BE: for, not knowing whether you be at the ſervice-tree, (which you call a tavern of honour, and where you own you have had many a belly-full at free-coſt) or at the town of Clamar, in the ſuburb of St Germains, (where your name is written in ſo fair characters on all the mantle-trees of the chimnies) or in ſome other place of that nature; I am conſtrained to ſend you this book at a venture, and to addreſs it to you, in what place ſoever you be.

[C] He who wrote with moſt vehemence againſt this Jeſuit, was the abbot of St Cyran.] He attacked the volume in Folio, which Garaſſe had publiſhed, in 1625, with the title of, La Somme Theologique des Veritez capitales de la Religion Chreſtienne: His criticiſm (10) is intituled, La Somme des Fautes & Fauſſetez capitales contenues en la Somme Theologique du Pere François Garaſſe. It was to contain four volumes: I have only ſeen the two firſt, and an abridgment of the fourth, and, if I am not miſtaken, that is all that was printed. The firſt tome contains the faults, which Garaſſe had committed in quoting the ſcripture, St Auſtin, and St Baſil of Selucia. The ſecond contains the faults in the quotations of the other fathers, and ſecular authors. The third was to contain the faults in divinity, philoſophy, chronology, coſmography, &c. The fourth was to contain ſeveral hereſies, errors, impieties, irreverences, buffoonries, and inſupportable boaſtings. The author dedicates his book to cardinal Richelieu, and ſays, in his epiſtle dedicatory, that he honours the ſociety of the Jeſuits, as one of the ſtrongeſt companies of the ſon of God's army, and which ſurpaſſes in courage, on days of battle, both the invincible ſquadron of Macedonia, and the inſeparable band of lovers, who died together for the public good in Lacedæmon (11). He gives himſelf, in the king's licence, the name of Alexander de l'Excluſſe (12). I do not think it eaſy to find ſo good a criticiſm as that is. We ſee in it an exact and profound learning, a ſolid judgment, and a wonderful ſagacity in diſcovering the faults of a writer. It is the moſt uſeful book a man can read, eſpecially if he deſigns to ſet up for an author, that ſupports his reaſonings by authorities, alluſions, compariſons, &c.

[D] It is pretended, that . . . . father Garaſſe was the Helen of the war between the Jeſuits and Janſeniſts.] It is what the Janſeniſts pretend: for here is what one of them has publiſhed (13). ‘In the year 1626, it (14) began with the book of a Jeſuit called Garaſſe, intituled, Somme des Veritez capitales de la Religion Chrêtienne. The late abbot of St Cyran, having found in it a prodigious number of falſifications of the ſcripture, and of the fathers, and of heretical and impious opinions, thought that the honour of the church required of him, that he ſhould take upon him to confute it, tho' at the ſame time his modeſty made him reſolve to conceal his name as he always did in his other books. The firſt part of that work being in the preſs, the noiſe it made every where gave occaſion to people to examine more nicely Garaſſe's book. The rector of the univerſity made complaints about it to the Faculty, who named commiſſioners to examine that book. But this noiſe having given the alarm to the Jeſuits, they made it appear, that it is no eaſy undertaking to cenſure the book of a Jeſuit: for their cabal prevailed ſo far with the magiſtrates, that the book of St Cyran was a long time ſtopped.’ The author adds, that Garaſſe picked out himſelf fifty three propoſitions in his book, the moſt eaſy to maintain that he could find, and of which not three of them were of the number of thoſe, which the abbot of St Cyran found fault with in his work; and, having afterwards formed a cenſure to his fancy, he confuted it at his eaſe; and by that artifice he dazzled, for ſome time, the eyes of the world, and perplexed the examination of his book, on which the Sorbonne was intent. So that ‘the abbot of St Cyran had much ado to remove the ſtop, which the Jeſuits had put to the publication of his confutation, and to undeceive the world, who had ſuffered themſelves to be impoſed upon by the artifice of Garaſſe. However, he compaſſed it at laſt, and, in ſpite of all the cabal of the ſociety, and the long delays, which were granted to father Garaſſe, to retract what he had advanced, his book was cenſured, as containing ſeveral heretical, erroneous, ſcandalous, and raſh propoſitions; ſeveral falſifications of paſſages of ſcripture, and of the holy fathers, falſly quoted, and wreſted from their true ſenſe; and an infinite number of expreſſions unworthy to be written and read by chriſtians and divines. The Jeſuits ſhewed . . . . ſome ſort of prudence in this affair . . . . they were not obſtinate in ſupporting their father Garaſſe, but confined him far from Paris to one of their houſes, where he was no more heard of; and ſo they terminated that affair. And happy had they been, if, by ſtifling that difference, they had alſo ſtifled in their hearts the reſentment they conceived thereupon againſt the abbot of St Cyran, which has ſince engaged them in ſo many horrible and violent proceedings.’

[E] He died among the infected.] ‘Cum Pictavii ſæva lues graſſaretur, multis precibus exoravit Moderatores ſuos, ut ſibi liceret tabe infectis inſervire; quod cùm obtinuiſſet, in iis demum piis officiis in hoſpitali domo inter infectos, quos verbo & exemplo etiam moriens hortabatur, ſanctiſſimè & religioſiſſimè conſumptus eſt (15).

[F] He was reconciled . . . to the prior Ogier.] As ſoon as Garaſſe's apology was publiſhed, the prior prepared himſelf to reply; but there were mediators of peace, who terminated the diſpute. The Jeſuit prevented his antagoniſt by a letter full of civilities: Which Ogier anſwered in the ſame ſtrain. The public was preſented with thoſe letters, as ſoon as they were written (16). Father Alegambe has committed here a fault; for which Monſieur Ogier would have demanded reparation, if he had been as nice as Janſenius's relations (17); for it plainly reſults from Alegambe's narrative (18) that Ogier had been an heretic, and was converted to the church of Rome. Southwell has not corrected Alegambe's fault.

[G] . . . . and to Balzac.] The account of their reconciliation, and the letters they wrote one to another, are to be ſeen at the beginning of the Somme Theologique of father Garaſſe.

[H] Placcius has been led into a miſtake by the title of his Rabelais Reformed.] That author has wrote a book, de Scriptis & Scriptoribus anonymis atque pſeudonymis. He had reaſon to put Francis Garaſſe among the anonymous authors; for there are ſeveral works of that Jeſuit, to which he did not put his ~~his~~ name. Such was the book he intituled, Rabelais Reformed. Mr Placcius fancies, that Garaſſe did by Rabelais, what many have done by Martial and Catullus, which they have publiſhed, after they had expunged all obſcene expreſſions from them. The works of Rabelais, ſays he (19), Ut ut jucunda, ſic obſcœnis aliiſque ſcandaloſis plena, caſtigata, imo caſtrata, titulo Rabeleſii Reformati, Pictavii & Bruxellis, in 8vo, nomine reformantis Franciſci Garaſſi, ſcriptis aliis notiſſimi Jeſuitæ Galli, non adjecto prodiere, docente Alegambe, pag. 124. The truth is, that the Rebelais Reformed of father Garaſſe is a book of controverſy; wherein he ſpeaks ſatirically of ſeveral miniſters,

---

(b) Alegambe, ubi ſupra.

(9) Epiſtle dedicatory of the Defence pour Etienne Paſquier.

(10) It is in quarto, and printed at Paris in 1626.

(11) I think he ought to have ſaid Thebes, and not Lacedaemon. See Plutarch in the Life of Pelopidas.

(12) See Colomiés, Mêlanges Hiſtoriques, pag. 26.

(13) The author of the Imaginaires, letter iii, pag. m. 47.

(14) That is, the war between the Jeſuits and Janſeniſts.

(15) Alegambe, ubi ſupra, pag. 124. See alſo Leſcalopier, in Cicer. de Nat. Deor. lib. i, n. 64.

(16) In the year 1624.

(17) See their caſes againſt the Jeſuit Hazart.

(18) He reckons among the books of Father Garaſſe, Litteræ ad Dominum Ogier, & hujus ad illum de ſua cum Eccleſia reconciliatione. Alegambe, pag. 124.

(19) Placcius, de Anonymis, cap. xiv, n. 463, pag. 111.

He employ'd againſt poets a maxim which is very good at the bottom, but which was turned againſt himſelf [I]. He pretended, that it is not a good excuſe for prophane thoughts, to ſay, that they are not written in proſe, but in verſe.

I ſhould have ſaid, that he is author of a diffamatory libel, intituled, The Banquet of of the wiſe Men, compoſed againſt the honour of one of the firſt magiſtrates of France (c). He, did not put his name to it; but however, he was diſcovered to be the author of it: Alegambe does not deny it (d). He was ſharply cenſured for publiſhing the tale of the tapeſtry of Joan d'Albret, which I have related in the article of that queen (e). It was pretended, that his calumny in that reſpect was an injury done to Henry the great, and Lewis XIII (f). They affirmed, that he had called that princeſs libertine, prophane, ridiculous, a wanton, and that he had loaded her with a thouſand other calumnies (g). The accuſation was groundleſs, and he ſufficiently juſtified himſelf (h). He was miniſters, particular of Peter du Moulin, whom he accuſes of being an imitator of Rabelais, and a Rabelais riſen from the dead. See what a man expoſes himſelf to, when he ſpeaks of a book, which he knows only by it's title.

[I] He employed againſt poets a maxim, which is very good at the bottom, but which was turned againſt himſelf.] See how he begins in the confutation of a ſonnet of Theophile: ‘To anſwer theſe impieties, I muſt, by way of anticipation, enervate a fooliſh and weak defence, which many have in their mouths, touching the impieties of that writer; for, provided they may ſay, that ſuch things are ſaid in verſe, they think the crime is advantageouſly palliated, becauſe it is not in proſe; as if rhime could blot out all impieties, and authorize wits to pronounce blaſphemies. It is true, thoſe impieties and impertinences, which I am to confute, are in verſe; I am ſenſible of it: but, for that very reaſon, I look upon them to be more criminal, than if they were written in bare proſe; for they are thereby the more ſtudied, enquired after, and conſequently delivered in more efficacious, forcible, and elaborate terms, which make a greater impreſſion on the minds of the readers. Was not Cleanthes uſed to ſay, that the voice, which comes out of a flute, and a trumpet, hath a greater force, than that, which comes barely out of one's mouth; and that the thoughts, which are darted by a well turned verſe, are more forcible, more durable, and ſtronger, than thoſe, which are expreſſed by a period in proſe, wherein the words are generally languiſhing. I have fully anſwered this ridiculous objection, in the twentieth chapter of my apology; wherein I have ſhewn, that an impiety in verſe is the more pernicious (20).’ Pray obſerve, that I have ſaid, that, at the bottom, that maxim is very good: for I do not pretend to adopt it in ſo great a latitude as that Jeſuit has done, nor for all the reaſons which he alledges. I am thoroughly perſuaded, that, upon a thouſand occaſions, it is not ſo great a ſin to broach looſe maxims of morality in verſe, as to propoſe them in proſe, and that we ought to abate much of the weight of our cenſures, when it is a poet who ſpeaks. A man, who ſhould maintain dogmatically heretical propoſitions, would be a thouſand times more criminal, than if he ſhould convey them in a piece of poetry. There is many a poem, wherein the author advances a thouſand things, which he does not believe, and which he would never reduce into a formal diſputation, and would not even ſay in verſe, if he thought, that his readers would look upon them, not as witty conceits, but as tenets, and articles of faith. He takes more pains, I confeſs, in turning and poliſhing them, than if he wrote them in proſe; his mind is therefore more intent upon them; he meditates more deeply upon them; but yet, after all, this is not always the true picture of what paſſes in his heart; he does not pretend to give either his confeſſion of faith, or a model of belief to thoſe that read him: and it muſt be acknowledged, that men are not ſuch fools, as to let themſelves be as eaſily perſuaded of an hereſy delivered by a poet, as of an hereſy delivered in a pulpit, or in a dogmatical work. Therefore I do not adopt father Garaſſe's reaſons, though I agree with him in the main part and bottom of his hypotheſis, that an ill maxim, either againſt ſound morals, or againſt ſpeculative doctrines of faith, is very criminal, in what ſort of poetry ſoever it be propoſed. I own alſo, that the licentiouſneſs of a poet, in advancing ſeveral thoughts againſt morality and religion, may produce ill effects. And I even acknowledge, that the beauties and charms of poetry ſometimes render a poiſon more pernicious than it would be in proſe. One cannot too much lament the miſchiefs, which the poetical impieties of Homer, and his imitators, introduced among the heathens. Men of ſenſe and penetration were ſenſible of it, and loudly complained of it. They murmured with reaſon againſt the poet's aſcribing to the gods the ſame crimes, which are committed upon earth (21). I have quoted elſewhere (22) a paſſage of Plato; and here is a fine one out of Cicero: ‘Nec enim multo abſurdiora ſunt ea, quæ poëtarum vocibus fuſa, ipſa ſuavitate nocuerunt, qui & ira inflammatos, & libidine furentes induxerunt deos, feceruntque ut eorum bella, prælia, pugnas, vulnera videremus: odia præterea, diſſidia, diſcordias, ortus, interitus, querelas, lamentationes, effuſas in omni intemperantia libidines, adulteria, vincula, cum humano genere concubitus, mortaleſque ex immortali procreatos (23). —— Nor are thoſe things much more abſurd, which, uttered by the poets, have done miſchief by the very pleaſingneſs of the fiction; ſuch as introducing the gods inflamed with anger, or raging with luſt, and deſcribing to us their wars, combats, and wounds; as alſo their enmities, diſſenſions, quarrels, births, deaths, lamentations, intemperate luſts, adulteries, bonds, intercourſe with women, and mortals ſprung from an immortal ſire.’ The dramatic pieces, wherein the gods were ſo unworthily repreſented, excited a thouſand irregular paſſions. Cicero confeſſed it; and St Auguſtin made uſe of his teſtimony. ‘Quomodo tanta animi & morum mala, bonis præceptis & legibus, vel imminentia prohiberent, vel inſita extirpanda curarent Dii tales: qui etiam ſeminanda & augenda flagitia curaverunt, talia vel ſua, vel quaſi ſua facta per theatricas celebritates populis innoteſcere cupientes: ut tanquam autoritate divina ſua ſponte nequiſſima libido accenderetur humana: fruſtra hoc exclamante Cicerone, qui cùm de poetis ageret, ad quos cùm acceſſiſſet, inquit: Clamor & approbatio populi, quaſi magni cujuſdam & ſapientis magiſtri, quas illi obducunt tenebras? quos invehunt metus? quas inflammant cupiditates (24)? —— How can ſuch gods prohibit, or extirpate, ſuch great vices by wholeſome precepts or laws, who take care even to implant and propagate them, deſiring to have their own vices repreſented on the theatre to the people: ſo that human luſts are ſpontaneouſly ſet on fire, as it were by divine authority; Cicero exclaiming after this manner to no purpoſe, when he is ſpeaking of the poets; what darkneſs do the applauſe and approbation of the people induce? what fears do they excite? what luſts do they inflame?’ Cicero complains, in one of his books, that the reading of the poets effeminates the heart, and weakens all the nerves of virtue. ‘Videſne poëtæ quid mali afferant? Lamentantes inducunt fortiſſimos viros. Molliunt animos noſtros; ita ſunt deinde dulces, ut non legantur modo ſed etiam ediſcantur. Sic ad malam domeſticam diſciplinam, vitamque umbratilem, & delicatam quum acceſſerunt etiam poëtæ, nervos omnis virtutis elidunt. Recte igitur à Platone educuntur ex ea civitate, quam finxit ille, quum mores optimos, & optimum reip. ſtatum exquireret (25). —— Do you ſee the miſchiefs ariſing from poets? They introduce whining heroes: they effeminate our minds: beſides they are ſo pleaſing, that they are not only read, but learned by heart. Thus when to bad domeſtic diſcipline, and a luxurious life, the reading of the poets is added, there is an end of all virtue. Juſtly therefore has Plato baniſhed them from that ſtate, which he formed, when in ſearch of the beſt manners,

---

c) Ogier, Jugem. du Livre de la Doctrine Curieuſe, pag. 23.

(d) He reckons among his works Septem Sapientes.

(e) See rem. [R] of the article NAVARRE (Joan d'Albret, queen of).

(f) Ogier, ubi ſupra, cap. xi, pag. 143, & ſeq.

(g) Defence pour Etienne Paſquier, livr. iv. §. i, pag. 644.

(h) *See the xxth chapter of the A*pology for Garaſſe, p. m. 17, &c.

(20) Garaſſe, Somme Theol. pag. 370.

(21) See, in the Anti-Baillet of Mr Menage, pag. 227, of the firſt Tome, ſome verſes of Xenophanes, quoted by Sextus Empiricus, pag. 57, and 341, adverſ. Mathematicos See alſo Forcatulus de Gallorum Imperio & Philoſophia, lib. iv, pag. m. 537.

(22) In the remark [I] of the article JUNO.

(23) Cicero de Natura Deorum, lib. i, cap. xvi.

(24) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. ii, cap. xiv, pag. m. 188. What Cicero ſays here, is not to be found in the works of his that are extant; but ſee what he ſays againſt dramatic pieces, Tuſcul. Quæſt. lib. iv, cap. xxxii.

(25) Cicero, Tuſcul. Quæſt. lib. ii, cap. xi.

was likewiſe very highly cenſured for having quoted indecent paſſages [K]. We ſhall ſee how 'manners, and the beſt form of government.' Preſently after, he obſerves, as a great abuſe, the cuſtom of cauſing ſuch authors to be learnt by heart by the Roman youth. 'At vero nos, docti ſcilicet è Græcia, 'hæc à pueritia legimus & diſcimus; Hanc eruditionem liberalem & doctrinam putamus (26). ——— 'Greece has taught us to read and learn theſe from 'our childhood, and this we call a liberal education 'and learning.' Plutarch was of another opinion: he thought, that reading of the poets might be very uſeful (27); but he is forced to own, that it is only becauſe they contradict themſelves (28). Their tenets, ſays he, are ſometimes good, and ſometimes bad; ſometimes impious, and ſometimes pious: that is the reaſon why their authority is doubtful, and has not weight enough to do harm; and it is our duty to pick out what they advance for the good cauſe. Αἱ δὲ τῶν ποιητῶν ὑπεναντιώσεις πρὸς αὐτοὺς ἀνταναφέρουσαι τὴν πίστιν, οὐκ ἐῶσιν ἰσχυρὰν ῥοπὴν γενέσθαι πρὸς τὸ βλάπτον· ὅπου μὲν οὖν αὐτοῖς τὸ τιθέναι συνέγγυς ἐκφανεῖς ποιεῖ τὰς ἀντιλογίας, δεῖ τῷ βελτίονι συνηγορεῖν. Poëtarum quoque contradictiones quibus fidem dictorum dubiam faciant, non ſinunt ea ad nocendum ſatis momenti habere. Ubi ergo juxta ſe poſita contraria dicta apud illos evidenter ſunt, meliori parti adſtipulandum eſt (29). This expedient of Plutarch is not a very good remedy: for the depravity of our nature prompts us rather to chuſe what the poets advance in favour of vice, than to pick out what they ſay in praiſe of virtue. Beſides, their contradictions lead us to believe, that their graveſt and moſt devout maxims are only ſtarts of fancy, of which they themſelves are not perſuaded. We imagine that they deliver them only becauſe they have found them ſuſceptible of all the beauties and majeſty of poetry. And, indeed, there are poets, who, having no piety, or belief, have nevertheleſs made magnificent and admirable verſes on the moſt ſublime truths of religion. They choſe that ſubject, becauſe it gave them an opportunity to diſplay the fineſt phraſes, and the moſt ſhining figures of their art. Another time, they would chuſe a ſubject quite oppoſite, provided it ſhould favour the enthuſiaſms of their fancy; that is, provided it ſhould furniſh them with ſuch Ideas, as they ſhould think themſelves capable to expreſs well. Now what weight can the ſound doctrine have, which we find in authors, whom we believe to be of that temper?

Let us take notice, by the way, that modern poetry has excited many murmurings. I have related elſewhere (30) the complaints, which Thuanus and Mezerai have made againſt the poets of Henry the ſecond's court. I might alſo have quoted the Sieur de la-Planche; for here is a fine paſſage out of his book: 'What aggravated, in that matter, the wrath of God 'was, that the knowledge of humane learning (a 'ſingular means, ordained by GOD to teach us to 'know him rightly, and conſequently for the preſervation of human kind), having been brought again 'into France by king Francis, more famous for that, 'than for any other thing done in his reign, was turned, by malicious and curious wits, into an occaſion 'of all manner of wickedneſs; which was found principally in certain great wits addicted to French 'poetry, who, at that time, appeared in ſhoals; 'whoſe writings, impure and obſcene, and full of 'blaſphemies, are the more deteſtable, as they carry 'with them ſuch ſoft allurements, as may entice, not 'only to all manner of laſciviouſneſs, but alſo to all 'manner of horrible impiety, all thoſe, who have 'them in their hands (31).' Add to all this, the bitter complaints of Gabriel de Puy Herbeau (32); and the reaſons, which engaged Pope Hadrian VI not to favour poets (33). If you would have inſtances of their prophanations, do but read Sorel's commentary on the Extravagant Shepherd (34).

Let us now ſee how father Garaſſe's principle was made uſe of againſt him. He was cenſured (35) for having made verſes, which contained an impiety; and he was put in mind of his own words: That rhime does not blot out impieties .... and that an impiety in verſe is thereby the more pernicious. St Cyran (36) blames the Latin verſes, which he made in praiſe of the ſun, and wherein he had uſed the moſt idolatrous expreſſions: neither does he ſpare the verſes, wherein he addreſſes himſelf to Neptune and Thetis, whom he calls Numina, and where he addreſſes himſelf to nature as to a goddeſs. The ſame author refers him to his own maxim, and to St Auſtin's retractations. That great ſaint was ſorry (37) that he had given to the muſes the name of goddeſſes, though he did it only as a witticiſm. The ſame Garaſſe is cenſured for having excited heatheniſh and laſcivious ideas, in the poem he had made, in the form of an Epithalamium, on the divine and humane nature of CHRIST. I omit that he was cenſured for his prayers in proſe; wherein he ſpoke of the wanderings of Ulyſſes, of the laurels of Thrace, and of his talent for poetry.

[K] He was cenſured .... for having quoted indecent paſſages.] He pardoned no obſcenities, ſays an author (38), which he could not ſo perfectly know without having practiſed them. He replied (39), that this was to reaſon wrong, and ſhewed it, among other inſtances, by that of the lawyers, who write down at length robberies, that have been judged and condemned by the court (40), and neither approve, nor practiſe them; and by that of the caſuiſts, who write down minutely all kinds of immodeſty, from ſimple thoughts to inceſt and beaſtiality: which they know only by theory, and by the report of the guilty (41). 'It was urged 'againſt him (42), that St Auſtin ſays very elegantly, 'that de pudendis rebus, cogit neceſſitas loqui; boneſtas, 'circumloqui: That the weakneſs and neceſſity of man 'often oblige him to ſpeak of leud and immodeſt 'things, but that decency requires him to ſpeak of 'them with circumlocution and periphraſis.' Here is his apology (43): 'To ſay nothing of an hundred inſtances of this incomparable doctor, in which he 'ſpeaks of the god Stercutius and his relation Cloacina, 'he expreſſes himſelf in terms much more material than 'thoſe they reprehend in me, who never dreamed 'of any impurity in them. Let them anſwer me as 'to this obſervation of St Auſtin, in the fourteenth 'book of his Civitas Dei, cap. xxiv. Non nulli ab 'imo ſine pudore ullo tam numeroſos edunt ſonitus, ut 'etiam ex illa parte cantare videantur: And thoſe, 'who relate the pretty obſervations of Vives concerning the aſs, who had drank the moon, to ſhew me 'my pretended impertinence, let them take the pains to 'read what Vives ſays on this head, concerning the 'young German, who did wonders that way.' He had ſaid, in his book (44), that, publiſhing theſe impious maxims, he had done nothing but what had been practiſed by the ſaints and fathers of the primitive church againſt the Gnoſtics and Carpocratians (45). His cenſor (46) found three diſparities in this compariſon: the firſt is, that the Gnoſtics and Carpocratians taught, as articles of faith, what the fathers attribute to them. It was therefore neceſſary to refute, and conſequently to relate, thoſe impious doctrines. But the prophanations, recited by Garaſſe, are barely actions and words of wicked and debauched minds, who never affirmed they had either ſaid or committed them (47). The ſecond is, that the fathers never relate, but with regret, the impure hereſies, which they are obliged to refute. Garaſſe, on the contrary, has raked together an heap of ordure (48). In the third place, the fathers wrote for learned men (49). St Irenæus, biſhop of Lyons, wrote in Greek, which was neither the language of the weſtern empire, nor that of Gaul in particular (50). At that time, books could not be communicated ſo eaſily as they are at preſent, through the convenience of printing (51), and the Chriſtians and Catholics led an angelical life..... They would have ſeen and heard theſe impieties and prophanations with an incredible deteſtation and averſion (52). None of theſe circumſtances could excuſe Garaſſe. He did not reply with exactneſs: he ſuppoſed, that the firſt diſparity conſiſted in this, that the fathers were under a neceſſity of publiſhing theſe abominations; inaſmuch as they were public, and as it were authorized by the world (53); and he replied, that 'the immodeſt actions of Carpocras were never ſo known in the towns of Greece, 'as the impudences of Theophile, the blaſphemies of 'Vannini, and the impieties of Charron, are known 'by France (54).' You ſee, he forgets the principal point of the difference; for the impieties and obſcenities of Theophile were by no one maintained as tenets of religion. This did not take away a right to refute them, and I wonder Garaſſe did not ſay, that a faction how he defended himſelf (i).

---

(26) Id. ibid.

(27) See Plutarch's treatiſe, De audiendis Poëtis.

(28) This calls to my mind what Mr Saurin has ſaid, pag. 372, of his Examen de la Theologie de Mr Jurieu, viz. There is nothing, for which Mr Jurieu ought to congratulate himſelf more heartily, than for his perpetual contradictions, by the favour of which only he is orthodox.

(29) Plut. ubi ſupra, pag. 20. C.

(30) In the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, n. 126, pag. 366.

(31) Hiſtoire de l'Eſtat de France, tant de la Republique que de la Religion, ſous le Regne de François II, pag. 7, Edit. 1576, in 8vo.

(32) Gabriel Putherbeus in Theotimo, ſive de tollendis & expurgandis malis libris, lib. i, pag. 77. Edit. Pariſ. 1549, in 8vo. See Voëtius Diſputat. Theol. Tom. II, pag. 1274.

(33) See the remark [D] of the article HADRIAN VI.

(34) Pag. 644, 732, & alibi.

(35) By the abbot of St Cyran, in his Sommes des Fauſſetez capitales, contenues en la Somme de Garaſſe, Tom. IV, pag. 34.

(36) Ib. pag. 102.

(37) Auguſt. Retractat. lib. i, cap. iii.

(38) Jugem. de la Doctrine Curieuſe, in the extract of the letter of L. R. L.

(39) Garaſſe, Apol. cap viii, pag. m 90.

(40) Ib. pag. 92.

(41) Ibid.

(42) Jugem. de la Doctrine Curieuſe, cap. iv, pag. 39, 40.

(43) Garaſſe, Apol. cap ix, pag. 109, 110.

(44) See the Doctr. Curieuſe, liv. ii, §. xv.

(45) Apol. de Garaſſe, chap. xii, pag. 151.

(46) Jugem. de la Doctrine Curieuſe, chap. ix, pag. 106, &c.

(47) Ib. pag. 108.

(48) Ib pag. 112.

(49) Ib. pag. 114.

(50) Ibid. pag. 115.

(51) Ibid. pag. 117.

(52) Ibid. pag. 118.

(53) Garaſſe, Apology, chap. xii, pag. 151.

(54) Ibid. pag. 152.

(i) In the remark [K].

a faction of debauchees, who impudently publiſh prophane and impure maxims, to corrupt youth, do not deſerve more countenance, than dogmatizing heretics; that therefore the books of theſe debauchees ought to be cried down, and the paſſages cited, to avoid the imputation of calumniating them. He has ſaid nothing upon the ſecond diſparity, and he even affirms (55), that his cenſor has alledged but two. Nevertheleſs, he might defend himſelf two ways, by denying, that, purpoſely, he had raked together an heap of filth, and by maintaining, that the reluctance, with which the ancient fathers diſplayed them, could not free them from blame, if, at the bottom, it was a pernicious and ſinful thing. He ſtrongly attacked the third diſparity: it is there he triumphs. It is falſe and ridiculous, ſays he (56); for the cenſor 'ſays, that the ancient fathers, 'who have made public, by their writings, the abominable and ſcandalous actions of the Carpocratians, 'did it, not in their mother-tongue, but in a language 'unknown and little uſed in the world, and that it 'was only for the learned: and of his reaſon he gives 'us a wonderful inſtance, ſince, ſays he, St Irenæus, 'biſhop of Lyons, did not write in Latin, which was 'the language then known in France; but he wrote 'in Greek, that he might not be underſtood by the 'vulgar, nor expoſe the vileneſs of heretics to the 'knowledge of all the world. Now that St Irenæus 'wrote in Greek I will not diſpute; I know it very 'well, thank God: but I ſay, it was not for the reaſon 'alledged by our prior, but becauſe he was a Greek 'born, as his name witneſſes, and that he was better 'acquainted with this language than the Latin: for, if 'the reaſon, alledged by our prior, were admitted, it 'would follow, that St Epiphanius and Theodoret, who 'were Greeks by nation, and who wrote, among the 'Greeks, the impieties and turpitudes of the atheiſts 'and heretics of their time, ought to have written in 'Latin or in German, not to have been underſtood by 'the vulgar: yet, for all this, they wrote in Greek, 'a language familiar to all the people of that country, 'more abominations, than there are in fifteen volumes 'as large as mine. But what would my gentleman 'ſay to doctor Cochleus, who has written, in German, 'a book intituled, Luther with ſeven Heads, which was 'afterwards tranſlated into Latin, in which he relates, 'like an honeſt German, ſpeaking to Germans, all the 'impurities, which Luther had ſowed in Germany, 'ſo far as to produce infamous proverbs, and horrible 'ſayings, which the immodeſt women had in their 'mouths; nay, he goes ſo far as to ſay, that in all the 'towns of Germany they now only talked a certain 'Jargon peculiar to bawds and pimps; the particulars 'of which he cites, which I ſorbear to produce, tho' 'I am not ignorant of them, having read them in the 'book of this doctor, not without horror, ſo prophane are they and filthy.'

(55) Ibid. pag. 151.

(56) Ibid. pag. 153, &c.

Note, He denies that he has made uſe of the word lavement in a new ſenſe (57). 'At this word, ſays he (58), my enemies write, that I have indecent 'words in my mouth, and that I am void of ſhame; 'to whom I reply . . . . in juſtification of myſelf, that 'they make me more knowing and leſs innocent than 'I am; for they imagine, that I am converſant in the 'language of phyſicians and apothecaries; but thank 'God I know no more of it than the vulgar. By the 'word lavement I underſtand only what I have learned 'groſly from vulgar uſage, and ancient books of 'phyſic, which are not ſo delicate as the modern; for, 'in the old French verſions of Leonardus Fuſchius, I 'ſee, that the word lavement ſignifies only gargles; as 'when he ſays in the fifth, that, for the tooth-ach, 'we ſhould take a gargle of water of plantain, and 'gargle our mouth with it. That, if the modern 'apothecaries be ſo finical to have prophaned this word, 'I am not obliged to make uſe of it in their indecent ſenſe: for, otherwiſe, when I talk of hypoſtaſis, 'in divinity, I muſt be cautious how I uſe this term, 'ſince the apothecaries have prophaned it, applying 'it diſhononrably to the urine of their patients; and, 'conſequently, if I borrow a compariſon from the hypoſtaſis, I ought to be accuſed of expreſſing myſelf 'with impurity.' This is to pretend great delicacy and innocence, to deny that we underſtand the modern ſenſe of the word lavement; a word invented only to ſucceed other terms too groſs. It has been a long time in faſhion among the moſt polite perſons. They begin not to be ſo fond of it (59).

(57) We do not find the word lavement in the ſenſe of clyſter in Nicod, nor in Monet, of whom I have the edition of 1635.

(58) Garaſſe, Apolog. cap. ix, pag. 106, 107.

(59) See at the end of the fourth volume, the explanation concerning obſcenities, paragr. IX.

GARDIE (PONTUS DE LA), great marſhal of the armies of Sweden, under king John III, was a French gentleman, of a more illuſtrious birth than ſome authors have ſaid [A]. He (a) was deſtined by his father to the church, in the monaſtery of Montoliou,

---

(a) Mezerai, apud Claudium Arrhenium Oernhielm, in Vita Ponti de la Gardie, pag. 11.

[A] He was of a more illuſtrious birth than ſome authors have ſaid.] It may be proved for certain, that he was deſcended from RORERT DE LA GARDIE, lord of Ruſſol and la Gardie, who, in 1382, married Anne de l'Eſtandart. The ſucceſſors of that Robert, down to JAMES DE LA GARDIE, father to our Pontus, and huſband of Catherine de Sainte Colombe (1), were married into very noble and ancient families; and namely into that of Bellegarde, from which, by the woman's ſide, ſprung the marſhal de Bellegarde, governour of the marquiſate of Saluces under Henry III (2). You will find the particular circumſtances of all this in the life of Pontus de la Gardie, compoſed by Mr Oernhielm, hiſtoriographer of Sweden, and publiſhed in the year 1690. He quotes Thuanus, who ſays, Pontus Gardius nobili loco apud nos in Petrocoriis natus (3); and Mezerai, whoſe words he tranſlates thus: Pater ejus (Ponti de la Gardie) illuſtri domo ortus prope Rueſium in Septimania. He believes, without reaſon, that the Petricorii of Thuanus are now a part of Languedoc (4): He had done better to cenſure that famous hiſtorian, who, without doubt, meant, that Pontus de la Gardie was born in Perigord, which is not true. Perhaps his miſtake proceeds from his having heard, that Pontus was born at Peiregoux; which is a lordſhip in the dioceſe of Caſtres, that belonged to the family of la Gardie, and was always the ſhare of the eldeſt ſon (5). Mr Oernhielm takes notice of it (5); and adds, that la Gardie is ſituate between Caſtres and the Albigeois. This is an error, pardonable in one, who is ſo far diſtant from that country. Caſtres is in the Albigeois; and ſo the ſituation of la Gardie was not well marked; and it ought to have been placed in the dioceſe of Carcaſſonne. However this be, it cannot be denied, that this author quotes two very illuſtrious French hiſtorians, who aver, that Pontus de la Gardie was of a good family. It is alſo moſt certain, that he juſtly cenſures Father Maimbourg, who has ſaid, That fortune took pleaſure in raiſing Pontus de la Gardie, from a mean birth, to the firſt employments of the kingdom of Sweden: for, having left the village, where he was born, near Rieux in Languedoc, he followed arms, to which his inclination led him, and went as a common ſoldier into Scotland, under the lord d'Orſel, lieutenant of Francis II (6). There is no body, who, from theſe words, will not imagine, that our Pontus was at the moſt the ſon of a tradeſman, or country attorney: for there is nothing intimating that his father was a gentleman. Therefore we may ſay, that Maimbourg is guilty of a groſs fault; which is not the only one he has committed. Mezerai affirms, that Pontus commanded ſome companies of horſe in Scotland; and therefore he was not there as a common ſoldier. His general was called Oyſel, not Orſel; and, becauſe Oyſel was ſent into Scotland by Henry II, Maimbourg had done well not to have mentioned Francis II; for that makes one loſe the true thread of chronology. Note, that all theſe faults have been blindly copied out of Florimond de Remond (7). If Mr Varillas had copied them with the ſame exactneſs, he had not encreaſed the number of them; but adventuring to walk ſome ſteps without a guide, he has loſt his way. 'La Gardie, ſays he (8), was a French'man, born in the province of Languedoc, and in a 'village of the biſhopric of Rieux, near that little 'town. He had dedicated himſelf very young to the 'profeſſion of arms, and had ſerved a long time as a 'common ſoldier. He was ſtill in that condition,

(1) He married her in 1511.

(2) Monſieur Oernhielm, in vita Ponti de la Gardie, pag. 8, ſays, that he had been ſo before under Francis I, and Henry II, and that he obtained from Henry III, the office of great maſter of the horſe. I believe he is miſtaken; and that, as to the laſt point, he takes the ſon for the father.

(3) Thuan. lib. lxxxiii, pag. m. 57.

(4) Nunc partem facientibus Septimaniæ vulgo Languedociæ. Oernhielm, ubi ſupra, pag. 11.

(5) Id. ibid. pag 10.

(6) Maimbourg, Hiſt. du Luther. lib. vi, pag. 251. Edit. Holl.

(7) Pontus de la Gardie, a native of a village near Rieux, in Languedoc, a poor ſoldier of fortune, being deſirous to ſee the world, went into Scotland, under the command of the Sieur d'Orſel, lieutenant for king Francis II. Flor. de Remond, Naiſſance & Progrez de l'Hereſie, lib. iv, cap. xvi, pag. m. 495.

(8) Varillas, Hiſt. de l'Hereſie. liv. xxx, pag. 265. Dutch Edit.

Montolieu, in the dioceſe of Carcaſſonne; but the ardour of his courage did not ſuffer him to live long in that cloiſter; he ſoon left it to go to the wars. He bore arms firſt in Piedmont, under the marſhal de Briſſac; afterwards he went into Scotland, with the troops, which Henry II ſent thither, under the conduct of Henry Clutin d'Oyſel, to ſuccour the queen-mother againſt her ſubjects. That Scotch war being at an end, he went into Denmark, and ſignalized himſelf in the armies of king Frederic II, againſt Eric king of Sweden. He changed his maſter ſome time after; for, having obtained a very honourable diſcharge from the king of Denmark, he betook himſelf to the ſervice of the king of Sweden (b). This happened in the year 1565. He was ſent into France the following year, with another ambaſſador, to aſk of Charles IX leave to raiſe men in his kingdom; which negociation was ſo well managed, that they carried into Sweden three thouſand foot, and as many horſe (c). They found at their return the affairs of that kingdom in a very ill ſituation, both on account of the war, which the Danes, the Poles, and the city of Lubec, had declared againſt Sweden, and by reaſon of the miſunderſtanding between the king, and John duke of Finland, his brother. This fire, having been concealed for ſome time, broke out at laſt. The duke, and his wife, ſiſter to Sigiſmund Auguſtus, king of Poland, had been committed to priſon; ſeveral perſons were ill uſed upon ſuſpicion of favouring them: The king flew into great exceſſes of cruelty; but, being informed, that people began to ſay, that, of right, he had forfeited the crown (d), he affected to give a great inſtance of clemency, by reſtoring his brother to his former ſtate, and by placing near him a lord, who was a man of ſenſe and courage [B], and who, upon all occaſions, might be ſerviceable to him. This lord was our Pontus de la Gardie. Some time after, it was thought, that the king deſigned to make away with all his brothers during the ſolemnity of his nuptials: Wherefore they were exhorted not to aſſiſt there, and to free the kingdom from oppreſſion [C]. They followed that advice, took a progreſs into

(b) Oernhielm, ibid.

(c) Id. ibid. pag. 14, 15.

(d) Certe, poſt patratas innocentium multorum cædes, jam non obſcuræ ferebantur voces populi, regnandi jure excidiſſe immitem principem. Id. ibid. pag. 26.

'when d'Oyſel, whom king Francis II ſent into Scot-'land with troops, carried him thither. He ſtayed 'there till the peace of Caſteau-Cambreſis, by which 'being disbanded, he was reduced to liſt himſelf, with 'twenty of his comrades, under a captain, who car-'ried them into Denmark.' It is an untruth to ſay, that he was born in a village near the epiſcopal city of Rieux. Thoſe hiſtorians, who ſay, that he was born at Rieux, or thereabouts, do not mean that city, but a place in the dioceſe of Narbonne, or ſome other. Varillas ſhould not have ſaid, that Francis II ſent troops into Scotland before the peace of Caſteau-Cambreſis; for Henry II, his father, ſurvived that peace, and it was properly he, who ſent Clutin d'Oyſel to the queen-regent of Scotland, mother-in-law to the dauphin, who had married the heireſs of Scotland. Beſides, the peace of Caſteau-Cambreſis did not put an end to the diviſions of Scotland; for ſome new troops were ſent to the regent, ſoon after the concluſion of that peace.

All the proofs of Mr Oernhielm againſt father Maimbourg are not good. If Pontus de la Gardie, ſays he (9), had not been nobly deſcended; or had been born in a village, Charles IX, and Henry IV, would not have uſed the ſtyle they employed, when they wrote to him. The ambaſſadors of France, not to mention the emperor Rodolphus, Mary his mother, Frederic king of Denmark, Radziwill, or Zamoyski, would not have paid him all the honours which appear in their letters, with extream eagerneſs to cultivate his friendſhip. This reaſon is frivolous; for, as ſoon as a man enjoys the greateſt employments in a ſtate, and the favour of his maſter, every body reſpects him: foreign princes do all they can to gain him; his extraction is not regarded, but only his preſent condition, and his ability to ſerve or hurt. Who is ignorant of the flatteries of Charles V towards cardinal Wolſey, the ſon of a butcher?

(9) Oernhielm, ubi ſupra, pag. 23.

Let us conclude, by ſaying, that moſt of the gentlemen in France come from a village: they are born in ſome caſtle, ſeated near ſome ſmall lordſhip belonging to their father. And there are ſeveral families without a title, and who never appeared at court, nor ever had any conſiderable employment in their province, who nevertheleſs are of a moſt ancient nobility, can produce pedigrees of three or four hundred years ſtanding, and are related, tho' perhaps at a great diſtance to houſes, that bear the moſt magnificent titles. This is what might be ſuppoſed of that of our Pontus. I take notice, that neither the place, nor the time, wherein he was born, could be marked by Mr Oernhielm; which is very ſurprizing.

[B] By placing near him a lord, who was a man of ſenſe and courage.] Theſe are Mr Oernhielm's words (10): 'Hujus (populi) iram ut mulceret inſigni aliquo ſpecimine clementiæ, fratrem Johannem Ducem, deterſo carceris ſqualore, libertati dignitatique priſtinæ reſtituit. 'Eidemque, præter cætera argumenta duraturæ in poſterum benevolentiæ PONTUM DE LA GARDIUM concedit, virum in negotiis pacis ac belli 'ſpectatæ induſtriæ, ut ejus uteretur opera, ubicunque rerum magnitudo poſceret.' Soon after he quotes this paſſage out of a hiſtory of Sweden in manuſcript (11). 'Duke John, a prince prudent and wiſe, 'who was well acquainted with the humour, temper, 'and infirmities of the king his brother, yielded at laſt 'to his commands, and accepted the burthen of that 'great and painful office; to wit, of viceroy, lieutenant-general, and governor of Sweden, and of both 'the Gothlands. But he ſincerely remonſtrated to 'him, that his long confinement had made him loſe, 'not only all his faithful ſervants, but likewiſe the 'good and ancient acquaintance he had at court; and 'therefore he moſt earneſtly beſought his majeſty to 'give him ſome truſty counſellor, and worthy ſecond, 'in whom his majeſty might entirely confide, and 'who might be an illuſtrious witneſs and companion 'of his actions and behaviour. His requeſt being juſt, 'Eric readily gave him Pontus de la Gardie, or de 'la Garde, a French gentleman, whom he loved exceedingly, both for his wit and courage, and had raiſed him ſo high in his dominions, that he followed 'his wholſome counſels in all great and important 'affairs.' Florimond de Remond relates the ſame thing, tho' with a circumſtance, which Jolivet has omitted. 'The king, ſays he (12), who, during this 'diſcourſe, ſaw, that the duke kept his eyes fixed upon a Frenchman, whom he loved, called Pontus 'de la Gardie, told him, through the ſuggeſtion of 'his evil genius, (for Pontus was the author of his 'ruin) brother, I give you Pontus, make uſe of him, 'and truſt to his courage and loyalty, of which I 'have had many proofs.'

(10) Id ibid. pag. 16.

(11) Id. pag. 17. He quotes Jolivet, author of a Hiſtory of Sweden.

(12) Florimond de Remond, ubi ſupra, pag. 495.

[C] They were exhorted ...... to free the kingdom from oppreſſion.] They could not uſe a more preſſing motive to prompt them to it, than that which they employed: for they had intelligence ſent them from all parts, that the king deſigned to deſtroy them: 'Adferuntur ad principes amicorum ab omni parte literæ, 'monentes, caverent ſibi à futuris inaugurandæ Reginæ 'elocandæque ſororis ſolemnibus epulis, quibus haud 'aliter uſurus ſit rex quam retibus, capturis everſuriſque haud dubiè ſuſpectos fratres Regnique Proceres, operoſâ aliàs conquirendos indagine. Ad hæc 'adjungunt ſe Ducibus aliquot, de ſuâ ipſorumque jam 'ſalute ſolliciti, decretam adſerentes omnium necem, 'certumque debere opprimi, ni opprimant. Fruſtra 'adhiberi fidem promiſſis totiens juratis violatiſque into all the provinces, raiſed men up and down, and put themſelves in a condition to dethrone the king. They marched directly to Stockholm, entered the city, and, after ſome parleys, and ſkirmiſhes, wherein la Gardie, one of the commanders of the troops of John duke of Finland was wounded in the arm, they brought their deſign about. King Eric was dethroned, and committed to priſon in the year 1568. John, his brother being choſen to ſucceed him, gave immediately to la Gardie the place of high-ſteward of his houſhold, and committed to him all the care of his coronation, which was not performed till the tenth of July 1569. No man had more contributed than la Gardie to the ſucceſs of this revolution; wherein his vigilance, addreſs, and reſolution, ſhone wonderfully. The new king, not having been able to conclude an honourable peace with the king of Denmark, marched againſt him. A battle was fought, wherein la Gardie, having received a great wound, was made priſoner: He did not recover his liberty, till the treaty of peace, ratified the ſixteenth of March 1571. He had been made a knight (e) on the coronation day; and he had a new title conferred on him the twenty ſeventh of July 1571, to wit, that of baron of Eckholm, to which a great eſtate was annexed. At the ſame time, he was ſent (f) upon an embaſſy, with two others, to ſome imperial cities, to the biſhop of Munſter, the count of Eaſt-Frieſland, the duke of Alva, the king of France, the king of Navarre, and the king of Spain: And, ſoon after his return, he was employed in military affairs; for he was ſent into Livonia in the month of Auguſt 1573, to ſtop the progreſs of the great duke of Muſcovy (g). He was recalled three years after, to be entruſted with an embaſſy of great importance, which he diſcharged very well. He negotiated at firſt with ſome imperial cities, &c. and afterwards at the court of Rodolphus, lately made emperor. Afterwards he paſſed the Alps, to go to Rome, where he had ſeveral audiences of Pope Gregory XIII, and then went to Naples, to receive what was due to his maſter (h) for his ſhare of the eſtate of Bonna Sforza, mother to the queen of Sweden. He came back to Rome, and there had ſome conferences with cardinal

‘Erici, ludentis jam perjuriis, ut ſolent pueri aſtragalis (13). —— The princes received friendly admonitions, from all hands, to beware of the enſuing inauguration of the queen, which the king would certainly make uſe of as a ſnare, to entrap and deſtroy his brothers, and the nobles of the kingdom, whom he ſuſpected, whom it would be difficult otherwiſe to draw into his net. They join themſelves likewiſe to certain leaders, already ſollicitous for their own and their ſafety, affirming that they deſerved to be oppreſſed, unleſs they prevented it by firſt deſtroying the oppreſſor: that it was in vain to truſt to the promiſes, ſo often ſworn to, and yet broken, of king Eric, who played with perjuries, as children at cockall.’ Upon theſe occaſions, people muſt do nothing by halves: the diſcontented ought not to ſay only, that there is ſome danger; they muſt poſitively aſſure a preſumptive heir, that he is undone without recovery, unleſs he gets his adverſary out of the way; and that he has no other reſource, than to be beforehand with the tyrant, with out regarding the fair promiſes, or ſubmiſſions, which danger might extort from him. You ſee, that the managers of that intrigue in Sweden made uſe of this machine. Our Pontus, who was the principal director, bethought himſelf of a fine ſtratagem, which was, to ſtir up to that enterprize the ducheſs, who was to be queen, in caſe it ſhould ſucceed; well knowing, that ambition cauſes more violent motions in the heart of a woman, than in a man. See in what manner he ſpoke to her. ‘Madam, all the court wonders, that my lord your husband does not pity this miſerable kingdom, where every body, being infinitely offended at, and weary of, the inſolent cruelties and tyranny of the king his brother, he alone can eaſily remedy them. I do aſſure you, that all, both great and ſmall, caſt their eyes upon him, to put the crown upon his head, if he pleaſes to accept of it. He deſerves it as juſtly as that barbarous prince, who, in the judgment of all, is unworthy of it. If my lord your husband pleaſes, it is eaſy to make him maſter of this kingdom, and to render him a great prince from a duke, as he is now, who undoubtedly cannot avoid either death or perpetual impriſonment; from which, both he and you have already been freed, as it were by a miracle, when you leaſt expected it. I know for certain, from all the captains, that the ſix thouſand Scotchmen, whom Eric keeps in his pay, are diſcontented, and deſire no better than to change their maſter, for want of pay. Beſides, it is certain, that the dukes Magnus and Charles, his brothers, with the greateſt men in the kingdom, are extreamly offended and grieved, that ſo great a king, as their brother, ſhould have married the daughter of a man, whoſe profeſſion is odious, a wretched bum-bailiff. Therefore, madam, take this favourable occaſion, which preſents itſelf, by the forelock, for the good of the ſtate, the quiet of the people and provinces, and the advancement of your dear husband and family (14).’ Mr Oernhielm, who relates this diſcourſe, confeſſes, that he finds nothing like it in the hiſtory of that nation; but he might have read them in Florimond de Remond, with the anſwer of the ducheſs: Theſe are fine diſcourſes, Pontus, ſaid ſhe, but difficult to be put in execution: however, be wiſe and diſcreet; I'll ſpeak of it to the duke my husband (15). Florimond declares (16), that he found theſe words in the manuſcript memoirs of the embaſſador of France, ſent into Sweden in the year 1566, who was eye-witneſs of the ſtrange changes which happened in that country (17). We muſt not forget the circumſtance. Whilſt all things were preparing to celebrate the nuptials, a report was ſpread among the people, that the deſtruction of the king's brothers, and of the grandees of the kingdom, was reſolved upon. It was not known at firſt, whether that report was chimerical or well-grounded; but it became likely enough ſome time after, through the king's mad freaks; and, at laſt, the letters, which were written from all parts to his brothers, put it out of all queſtion (18). ‘Dum hæc parantur, manat in vulgus ſtruendarum in Principes fratres Proceresque Regni inſidiarum rumor, verus an vanus, ab initio non ſatis ſciebatur: Quem tamen ſimilimum vero mox fecerunt, ingenium Erici ſuſpicax, infidum, in modum Euripi æſtuans, & mobili ſemper ad obſequia pravè conſulentium..... (19) Tot rebus adſtructâ primo rumori fide.’

Theſe are commonly the preparatives towards revolutions; at firſt, news and reports are ſpread, and handed about from ſtreet to ſtreet, from town to town. There are ſpeculative men at hand to lay a ſtreſs upon them; and at laſt, grave men to confirm them by their letters. I do not pretend to ſay, however, that this is always done with a deſign; for it ſometimes happens, that ſuch reports are both true, and confirmed by a laudable zeal for the public good: and I do even obſerve that it is ſo in the preſent caſe. Florimond de Remond was concerned in king Eric's juſtification, to render more odious the behaviour of Pontus de la Gardie, whom he treats very ill, becauſe he looks upon him as one, who hindred Sweden from returning to the obedience of the Pope; yet, nevertheleleſs, he relates a thouſand abominable crimes committed by that king, and affirms that he advances nothing but what he had from very good hands (20). He quotes particularly (21) the letter, which

(e) Eques auratus. Id. pag. 19.

(f) Id. ibid. pag. 23.

(g) Id. ibid. pag. 111.

(h) Id. ibid. pag. 164.

(13) Oernhielm, ubi ſupra, pag. 16, 17.

(14) Id. ibid. pag. 17. He quotes an Hiſtory of Sweden, in manuſcript, written by Jolivet, advocate in the parliament, and bought of the author's ſon by count Magnus de la Gardie: It is in the library of Upſal.

(15) Florimond de Remond, ubi ſupra, pag. 497.

(16) Id. ibid. pag. 496.

(17) Id. ibid. pag. 494.

(18) Oernhielm, ibid. pag. 16.

(19) Id. ibid. pag. 17, 18.

(20) Florimond de Remond, ubi ſupra, pag. 499.

(21) Ibid. pag. 499.

cardinal Hoſius; but it is not known what affairs he treated on with the Pope (i) [D]. Nineteen months paſſed before he returned to Stockholm. He married, in January 1580, a natural daughter of the king of Sweden; and he was ordered, not many months after, to make an inroad into the dominions of the great duke of Muſcovy, with all the troops he ſhould find in Finland, and in the neighbouring provinces. He went upon this expedition in the quality of general (k); and his inſtructions were, among other things (l), to do no hurt to ſuch Muſcovites as ſhould ſubmit; and to allow the monks and nuns full liberty of conſcience, without taking from them their images or other religious utenſils [E]. He made himſelf maſter of the province of Carelia in a very little time (m). He was made (n) governor of Livonia and Ingria the following year, and continued his conqueſts upon the Muſcovites with great ſucceſs and prudence. He took from them the important place of Nerva, and ſeveral others, and (o) obliged them, in 1583, to agree to a truce of three years, without recovering any of the towns they had loſt. During this truce, he beſtowed his thoughts on the moſt effectual means to make his government proſperous. He was alſo (p) the ſecond plenipotentiary of Sweden, in the conferences held at Pernaw, in the year 1585,

(i) Id. ibid. pag. 165.

(k) Summi militiæ præfecti titulo. Id. ibid. pag. 174.

(l) Id. ibid. pag. 175.

(m) Id. ibid. pag. 176.

(n) Ibid. pag. 178.

(o) Id. ibid. pag. 190.

(p) Id. ibid. pag. 196.

---

which the new king wrote to Charles IX. Now after that, does he not make himſelf ridiculous by concluding with theſe words? But oftentimes falſe reports are raiſed againſt princes, to make them odious to their ſubjects, and ſtir up the latter to rebellion, as was done againſt Eric, who died miſerably in priſon (22).

Mr Oernhielm has made a good reflexion: to wit, that a prince, who follows nothing but the dictates of his paſſions, without regarding what is due to GOD, and his ſubjects, deprives himſelf of the moſt neceſſary ſupports of his greatneſs: for he does not find in his people that loyalty, which might check thoſe that attack him. ‘ Prævenit adventum Ducum fama collecti in Regem exercitus, ad quam ille excitus, implorat opem civium, quorum plerique pertæſi acerbi regiminis, ſurdas obvertunt aures precanti, hilares, adveniſſe tempus, quo jugi in dies ingraveſcentis leventur onere, antequam ſuccumbant penitus interituri. Itaque ſubnixus ope paucorum, in quorum animis nondum obſoleverat Majeſtas ſui Principis, congreſſuſque eum pluribus ac fortioribus, non poterat non redigi ad anguſtias. Atque tum præferoci Regi adparuit, & favore civium, & ſucceſſu fulciendæ potentiæ deſtitui potentes rerum, cum exutâ reverentiâ Numinis, ex amplâ poteſtate uſurpant nil præter trucem quidvis in ſubjectos agendi licentiam. Id Erico Regi accidit. Quem ſolio ſublimem vidit ſol oriens, eundem occidens vidit provolutum ad aliena genua (23). —— The king received news of the arms raiſed againſt him, before the arrival of the dukes; at which being alarmed, he implores the aid of the citizens; moſt of whom, weary of his tyranny, turn a deaf ear to his entreaties, rejoicing that the time was come, in which they ſhould be eaſed of a burthen, which grew every day more heavy before they quite ſunk under it. Relying therefore on the aſſiſtance of a few, who ſtill preſerved ſome loyalty towards their prince, and engaging with men ſuperior in number and courage, he could not but be reduced to ſtraits. The haughty monarch then became ſenſible, that kings deprive themſelves of the only ſupport of their royalty, the favour of their ſubjects, when, throwing off all regard to the deity, they employ their power only in oppreſſing their ſubjects. This was the fate of king Eric: the ſame perſon, whom the riſing ſun ſaw ſeated on a throne, the ſetting beheld groveling at another's feet.’ The number of princes, that have been either aſſaſſinated or impriſoned for their tyranny, is ſo great; and, on the other hand, the number of thoſe, that have been able to maintain their male-adminiſtration, and have not haſtened the coronation either of a ſon, a brother, &c. by their violent conduct, is ſo very ſmall, that one cannot ſufficiently wonder, how there can be any, who do not take warning by thoſe examples.

Ad generum Cereris ſine cæde & ſanguine pauci
Deſcendunt reges & ſicca morte tyranni.

Few tyrants without blood reſign their breath,
Or ſink maturely in the arms of death.

As for the reſt, the revolutions of ſtates, whereby crowns are transferred from one head to another, have always been ſo frequent, that it is matter of wonder they have not been more ſo: for, after all, the worſt that, can happen, is to miſs one's aim; whereas, if a man ſucceeds, he will find a thouſand ways to defend himſelf againſt all imputations of injuſtice; and he will never want approvers, or alliances.

[D] It is not known what affairs he treated on with the Pope.] Mr Oernhielm owns, that he could not find it out. Quid Regis nomine cum Pontifice egerit non perinde liquet, cum regiorum mandatorum nihil ea de re videre contigerit (25). He looks upon as a fable what father Maimbourg relates (26); that Pontus de la Gardie was inſtructed to treat with Pope Gregory XIII, about the reduction of Sweden to the obedience of the church, upon certain conditions; which where (27), I. That the nobility ſhould freely enjoy the church-lands they were poſſeſſed of: II. That the biſhops and prieſts ſhould keep the wives they married: III. That the laity ſhould be admitted to receive the ſacrament in both kinds: IV. That divine ſervice ſhould be performed in the vulgar tongue. This is taken out of Florimond de Remond; who adds (28), that la Gardie, at his return, found the king alarmed being apprehenſive, leſt, by meddling with religion, theſe very men ſhould take the crown, from off his head, who had placed it there: that poor king, not being able, or not daring, to reſtore intirely the catholic church, compounded with the Lutheran archbiſhops and biſhops, who were the principal lords, by leaving them, during their lives, their wives, the communion in two kinds, and the maſs in the vulgar tongue. The eccleſiaſtics might have been gained, ſince they were allowed their bedfellows; but thoſe, who wore a ſword by their ſides, would not let go their holds. Thus that deſign came to nothing; not without ſuſpicion, that la Gardie himſelf had put a ſtop to it, being particularly concerned, by reaſon of the great eſtate he enjoyed, through the favour of his maſter, whom he governed entirely.

[E] Without taking from them their images, or other religious utenſils.] This prohibition was neceſſary; for it had been ill obſerved before. ‘ Omninò autem vis omnis ac injuria abeſſe deberet à corporibus ac bonis ipſorum, qui ſe ritè huic Regno ſubmitterent, præcipuè verò ab his, qui peculiari ſolitoque ei genti ritu, etiamſi à ſacris penes nos receptis nonnuſquam recederent, ſexu utroque incolerent monaſteria, quorum ornamenta, imagines, cæteramque ſacram ſuppellectilem intacta inviolataque eis linqui præcipit, SECUS QUAM FACTUM HACTENUS (29).’ However, this order of the king's was not regarded; for they took out of the church of Carelgrod the images, ſtatues, and prieſtly veſtments, and tranſported them into Finland, for the uſe of the pariſhes there. The king was diſpleaſed with it, and threatened to puniſh with death, for the future, ſuch as ſhould violate his prohibition. Let us hear once more the Swediſh hiſtorian. ‘ Utcunque non probârit, quod, privato auſu, ſculptas pictaſque tabulas aris impoſitas, ſtolaſque, quibus ſacra peracturi ſacerdotes amiciuntur, templo arcis Kexholmenſis detractas, nonnulli in vicinam Finlandiam, ad earum, in quibus habitârunt, parœciarum templa iis exornanda, avehi curaverint, quas reductas in ſacrario templi arcis Viburgenſis locari præcepit, donec ipſe de eis aliter conſtitueret: interminatione mortis prohibens, ne quis regno ſe ſubmittens ex hoſtibus, ulla adficeretur injuria, aut horum devictorum templis ac monaſteriis ulla vel minima vis fieret (30).’

[F] He

(22) Ibid.

(23) Oernhielm, ubi ſupra, pag. 18.

(24) Juvenal. Sat. X, ver. 112.

(25) Oernhielm, ubi ſupra, pag. 165.

(26) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra.

(27) Id. ibid. pag. 253.

(28) Flor. de Remond, ubi ſupra, cap. xvii, pag. 502.

(29) Oernhielm, pag. 175.

(30) Id. ibid. pag. 176.

1585, with the ambaſſadors of Poland, about the peace between the two kingdoms. Theſe conferences were ſoon broken up: After which, a negotiation was ſet on foot with the ambaſſadors of Muſcovy, either for the prolonging the truce, or for a treaty of peace. He periſhed unfortunately in a river [F], during the courſe of theſe negociations, the fifth of November 1585 (q). He was interred at Revel, where four years after they erected to him a marble tomb (r). His poſterity is ſtill very flouriſhing in Sweden [G]. I ſhall ſay, in another place (s), ſomething relating to this Article.

(q) Id. ibid. pag. 213.

(r) Id. ibid. pag. 214.

(s) In the article TYPOT, remark [A].

[F] He periſhed unfortunately in a river.] He and his colleagues had parted with the embaſſadors of Muſcovy, without having agreed upon any thing, ſave only a truce of fifteen days. He embarked on the river for Nerva; but, when the ſhip was come within half a league of that city, ſome pieces of cannon being diſcharged, a plank happened to ſtart, and, the water getting in through that hole, the moſt timorous threw themſelves on the other ſide, ſo that the ſhip was over-ſet: La Gardie was one of thoſe, who were drowned (31). This is the account Mr Oernhielm gives of that accident. There is in that part of his book a marginal note, wherein the narrative of Father Maimbourg is cenſured. As Pontus de la Gardie, theſe are that father's words (32), returning from his embaſſy of Muſcovy, was ready to enter into the port of Revel, the capital city of the Swediſh Livonia, of which he was viceroy, the bark, in the ſtern whereof he ſat in an arm-chair, having ſtruck with great force againſt a rock, the head was lifted up ſo high with the blow, that two of his gentlemen, who ſtood up before him, being thrown down, and falling on his chair, cauſed the ſtern to ſink yet lower, ſo that they fell all three together in an inſtant into the ſea, and were no more ſeen. Florimond de Remond, the original author of this account, has added to it two falſities, which Maimbourg has not copied: 1. That la Gardie had a conference with the great duke: 2. That, having ended his negociation, he put to ſea with his ſhips. In the marginal note, Father Maimbourg is accuſed of not underſtanding geography: for he ſuppoſes, that, on the frontiers of Muſcovy, there is a river, that goes down to Revel; which is falſe. He is blamed for ſaying, that Revel is the capital city of Livonia; he ſhould have ſaid, of Eſthonia: and he is blamed likewiſe for ſaying, that Pontus was governour of Livonia: for, ſays Mr Oernhielm, that province did not then belong to Sweden, having been conquered ſince by Guſtavus Adolphus. Methinks this laſt cenſure is not reaſonable, ſince Mr Oernhielm ſays expreſly, that Pontus de la Gardie was made governour of Livonia and Ingria in the year 1581 (33). I ſhould have been contented with cenſuring the word viceroy, which Maimbourg has borrowed from Florimond de Remond.

n Odd sort of a Bank
t three man child — er ballance, sideways rely full as small that represented
Raphael in his rtoon of the Miraculous aught of Fishes —

The article GARDIE, in the Supplement to Moreri, being taken out of Father Maimbourg, you will eaſily find in theſe remarks, wherein that is defective.

(31) Id. ibid. pag. 213. Confer Thuanum, lib. lxxxiii, pag. 57, & Jolivet, apud Oernhielm, pag. 214.

(33) Maimb. Hiſtoire du Lutheran. Tom. II, pag. 260, 261.

(33) Etiam auſpicio novo ſupremi per Ingriam ac Livoniam Gubernatoris titulo ac munere loca priora repetiit. Oernhielm, ubi ſupra, pag. 178.

[G] His poſterity is ſtill very flouriſhing in Sweden.] He left two ſons and one daughter. JOHN DE LA GARDIE, the eldeſt ſon had none but daughters, who were very advantageouſly married. JAMES DE LA GARDIE, the younger brother, was made count (34), ſenator, and great conſtable of the kingdom, preſident of the council of war, &c. His eldeſt ſon, MAGNUS GABRIEL DE LA GARDIE, married the ſiſter of Charles Guſtavus, king of Sweden, and was father to GUSTAVUS ADOLPHUS DE LA GARDIE, ſenator of the kingdom, and preſident of the ſupream council of Sweden. Gabriel Magnus's brothers had alſo great employments, and left children behind them. See the pedigree of that family at the beginning of our Pontus's life. The latter left two brothers in France, who were married; but their male iſſue is extinct (35).

(34) Maimbourg, and, after him, the author of the Supplement to Moreri, are miſtaken in giving that quality to Pontus de la Gardie.

(35) Oernhielm, pag. 5.

GARISSOLES, (ANTONY) paſtor and profeſſor of divinity at Montauban, his birth-place, was a very eminent divine. He was born about the year 1587, admitted into the miniſterial function at the age of twenty three, or twenty four, years, and appointed one of the miniſters of the church of Puylaurens. He was ſettled in the profeſſorſhip of divinity at Montauban in the year 1627, after having been appointed for that employment by ſeveral ſynods of his province, and charged particularly by a national ſynod, held at Caſtres, to go and exerciſe that function; which he diſcharged glorioufly 'till the year 1650, in which he died. He compoſed a great many books, ſome of which have been publiſhed [A], and the others have moſt of them periſhed in the late perſecution. He took a great delight in Latin poetry, and had the ſatiſfaction to ſee in print the epic poem he had made, to ſing the great exploits of Guſtavus Adolphus [B]. I ſhall ſpeak of it below (a). He was moderator in the national ſynod held at Charenton in the year 1645 (b) (§ α).

(a) In the remark [B].

(b) Taken from a manuſcript memoir.

[(§ α) On that occaſion, they ſay, upon ſome miſconduct of the famous Milletiere, Gariſſoles the moderator rebuffed that falſe brother with theſe terrible words of our Saviour: That thou do'ſt do quickly. You take me then for a Judas, ſaid Milletiere to him. Not entirely ſo, replied Gariſſoles; for Judas had the purſe, but you ſeek for it. REM. CRIT.]

[A] He compoſed many books, ſome of which have been publiſhed.] He publiſhed a volume of ſermons, intituled, La Voye de Salut — The way to Salvation. His other printed books are in Latin; ſome theſes of divinity; a treatiſe De Imputatione primi peccati Adæ; another, De Chriſto Mediatore; The Explanation of the Catechiſm. This laſt work was begun by Mr Charlés, Mr Gariſſoles's colleague. It is to be obſerved concerning the book, De Imputatione primi peccati Adæ, that the author compoſed it by order of his ſynod, after he had had an amicable conference upon that ſubject with Mr Amyrault, in the preſence of the national ſynod held at Charenton. Mr Amyrault did not defend his own opinions, but only thoſe of Mr de la Place (1), who had deſired him to ſtand proxy for him, and to explain and defend his ſentiments before the aſſembly. Mr Gariſſoles, having dedicated his book to the four evangelical cantons, cauſed it to be preſented to them by his eldeſt ſon, who was honourably received every where. A year after, they made a fine preſent to the father; to whom they ſent four great ſilver gilt cups, exquiſitely wrought, accompanied with a letter in Latin, full of encomiums, and ſigned by the four ſyndics of the four cantons (2).

(1) See the article AMYRAULT, between citations (g) and (h).

(2) Taken from a manuſcript memoir.

[B] He ſaw printed the epic poem he had made for . . . . Guſtavus.] It is called Adolphis. The author had dedicated it to queen Chriſtina, and to the five grandees of the kingdom; but he was obliged to alter the epiſtle dedicatory, becauſe his eldeſt ſon wrote to him from Stockholm, that it would not be poſſible to preſent that work, unleſs it were dedicated to the queen alone. He therefore made a new epiſtle, addreſſed only to that princeſs, and ſo the poem was preſented. The queen received it in a moſt gracious and obliging manner, and ſhewed a great deal of civility to the author's ſon. She told him, that certain people had endeavoured, more than once, to give her an ill opinion of the poem, and of the poet: But that, having peruſed it, ſhe was extreamly pleaſed with it, and was filled with veneration and admiration for it's author. Theſe were her very words. Grotius was ſuſpected of having endeavoured to do that ill office; though, having been desired to give his opinion of that piece, even before it was printed, he had given a great character of it, as wanting little of being perfect. However, the book was greatly commended by the queen; the author was honoured with a fine gold medal; and his eldest son had the expences of his journey largely repaid him (3). Note, that Mr Gariſſoles made a poem on the coronation of that queen.

GARNACHE (Francis de Rohan, Lady de la), was daughter of Renatus de Rohan, firſt of the name, and of Iſabella d'Albret, daughter of John d'Albret, king of Navarre. She was conſequently couſin-german to Joan d'Albret (a), mother of Henry the great. Neither ſuch powerful and illuſtrious relations, nor the moſt ancient nobility of the houſe of Rohan, were able to ſecure her againſt the moſt grievous injuſtice, that can be done to a perſon of her ſex. The duke of Nemours had promiſed her marriage, and thereupon had obtained all the favours he could expect from her: To be plain, he got her with child. When he was called upon to perform his promiſe, he laughed at it with the greater confidence, in that he ſaw, that Antony, king of Navarre, though firſt prince of the blood, had neither courage nor authority enough to force him to repair the honour of the lady. It was ſtill worſe, after the king of Navarre, who had ſome ſort of credit during the triumvirate, was killed. The duke of Nemours, who had left France at the beginning of the troubles, becauſe it had been diſcovered, that he had a mind to ſteal away the duke of Anjou, brother of king Charles IX (b), was ſoon recalled, and ſerved ſucceſsfully againſt thoſe of the reformed religion: This, together with the death of the king of Navarre, encouraged him to preſs the court of Rome to declare his engagement void. He obtained all he deſired (c): The juſt right of the lady Rohan was entirely oppreſſed, becauſe ſhe had declared herſelf for the Huguenot party [A]; ſo that ſhe was forced to undergo the diſgrace of being a mother, without being married, and the grief of ſeeing her faithleſs gallant enter into wedlock with the widow of the duke of Guiſe, and as much reſpected every where, and careſſed by the ladies, as if he had been the honeſteſt man in the world. All the comfort ſhe had left, was the title of prince of Genevois, which ſhe gave her ſon [B]; and as for herſelf, ſhe was called the lady de la Garnache (d), or the ducheſs of Loudunois (e). She maintained herſelf dexterouſly in her eſtate during the civil-wars [C]. It is likely that Brantome ſpeaks of her adventure

[A] She declared for the Huguenot party.] If you will not truſt d'Aubigné, we muſt ſtrengthen his teſtimony by that of Thuanus. 'The clandeſtine marriage between the duke of Nemours, and Frances de Rohan, was again mentioned, but only with a deſign to caſt the plantiff, in hatred of her religion, and to put the other in a capacity to marry the dowager of Guiſe (1).' Let us now hear Thuanus. 'Eodem tempore, that is, in 1566, lis olim agitata inter Franciſcam Roanam & Jacobum Sabaudum Nemoroſium, & ſuperſtite Navarro qui Roanæ cognatæ patrocinabatur intermiſſa demum renovata, & prævalente hinc Nemoroſii gratia, inde ODIO RELIGIONIS PROTESTANTIUM cui Roana addicta erat, prægravante, interventu Pontificis deciſa eſt, ſchedula Nemoroſii de matrimonio præſentibus verbis contracto irrita pronunciata (2). —— At the same time, the cause between Frances de Rohan, and the duke de Nemours, which lay dormant during the life of the king of Navarre, who favoured his kinſwoman de Rohan, was again ſet on foot, and, through the duke's intereſt on one ſide, and HATRED OF THE PROTESTANT RELIGION, to which the lady de Rohan was addicted, on the other, was decided by the intervention of the Pope, who diſannulled the duke's promiſe of marriage.'

[B] All the conſolation, ſhe had left, was the title of prince of Genevois, which ſhe gave to her ſon.] If I had followed Virgil's notions, I ſhould have ſaid, that that lady's grief for the infidelity of her gallant was alleviated by the ſon he left her; but it is a long time ſince our ladies are no more of the ſame temper with the Dido of that great Roman poet. That good princeſs's greateſt ſorrow was, that her perfidious lover went from her without leaving one of his race behind him; and, if ſhe had had a little babe, or at leaſt had found her ſelf with child by him, her affliction had been a great deal leſs.

Saltem ſi qua mihi de te ſuſcepta fuiſſet
Ante fugam ſoboles, ſi quis mihi parvulus aulâ
Luderet Æneas, qui te tantum ore referret;
Non equidem omnino capta aut deſerta viderer (3).

Oh! that ——
E'er from my ſight for ever thou wer't gone,
Thy kind embrace had bleſs'd me with a ſon;
Some young Æneas, in whoſe lovely face
His father's features fondly I might trace.
Some comfort in thy abſence this would be,
Nor were poor Dido quite undone by thee.

Such a tender ſentiment would now-a-days be exploded, even in a romance, it is ſo contrary to cuſtom. The greateſt ſorrow of thoſe kind-hearted ladies, to whom a gallant breaks his promiſe, is, not for having granted him more than they ought, but for not having been able to prevent the conſequences. A big-belly, or a child, are ſuch convictions of diſhonour, as no chicanry can elude: they are ſpeaking proofs, & luce meridiana clariores: they are witneſſes without reproach, & omni exceptione majores. That is therefore the principal ſource of a lady's misfortune and deſpair, Queſto e quel che piu inaſpri i miei martiri. And indeed, I believe, thus Brantôme ſpeaks (4) of the ladies he had ſeen at court, that the beſt time they ever had, (I put it to their conſciences) was, when they were maids; for they had their free will to be nuns, and votaries, as well of Venus, as of Diana; provided they could have been ſo wiſe and cunning as to know how to preſerve their bellies from ſwelling. In ſome reſpects, it muſt be confeſſed, that the fate of the lady Garnache was pretty like that of Dido: for her gallant pretended, as well as Æneas, that he never intended to marry.

- - - Nec conjugis unquam
Prætendi tædas, aut hæc in fœdera veni (5).

I never dreamt of marriage, witneſs heav'n!
Nor for ſuch purpoſe to theſe ſhores was driven.

[C] She maintained herſelf dexterouſly . . . during the civil-wars.]. I ſhall quote here no other author than d'Aubigné. 'We muſt add, ſays he (6), that the lady de la Garnache, ſiſter to the duke of Rohan, held the town of la Garnache, and the caſtle of Beauvois on the ſea, in neutrality, preſerving her ſelf by the ſubmiſſions and artifices, which cannot be adventure [D]. Mr Varillas has mentioned it at large, not without committing many faults [E]; ſome of which are ſo very groſs, that one cannot but wonder at it.

---

(3) Taken from the ſame memoir.

(a) Henry d'Albret, king of Navarre, ſon of John, and brother of Iſabella d'Albret, was father of that Joan d'Albret.

(b) Le Laboureur, Addit à Caſtelnau, Tom. I, pag. 808, Tom. II, pag. 34.

(c) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, Tom. II, pag 34, ex Thuano, lib. xxxix.

(d) It is the name of a town in Poictou.

(e) This duchy was erected in 1579.

(1) D'Aubigné, Tom. I, lib. iv, cap vi, ad ann. 1566.

(2) Thuan. lib. xxxix, pag. m. 795.

(3) Virgil. Æn. lib. iv, ver. 327.

(4) Diſcours de Cather. de Medicis, pag. 100.

(5) Virgil. Æn. lib. iv, ver. 338.

(6) D'Aubigné, Tom. III, cap. xiii, ad ann. 1587, pag. 65.

‘ be blamed in her ſex and condition. Her ſon (called the prince of Genevois, upon pretence of his mother's marriage with the duke of Nemours) having made himſelf maſter of la Garnache, by the help and contrivance of the ſervants, that depended upon him, hoped to make it a place of arms for his party, and thereby to provide for his own neceſſities. He attempted alſo upon Beauvois, by intelligence; but his mother, being an artful woman, he found himſelf her priſoner. The iſſue of all this was, that the king of Navarre, ſolliciting his liberty, obtained it, and, by the ſame means, the town, when the lady of the place, who was alſo called the ducheſs of Loudunois, ſaw the affairs of the country pretty favourable for the religion ſhe profeſſed; becauſe, by this time, there were reckoned eight places, that held for the reformed.’ He ſpeaks at large of the ſiege of la Garnache (7); the Proteſtant garriſon whereof was at laſt forced to ſurrender to the duke of Nevers. One may confidently reckon, among the ſubmiſſions and artifices of that lady, the letters ſhe wrote to her brother, when beſieged in Luſignan (8). She did all ſhe could to perſuade him to accept of the honourable terms, which the duke of Montpenſier offerred him; but all in vain.

[D] It is likely that Brantôme ſpeaks of her adventure.] He ſays, that he has ‘ known a gentlewoman of high degree, who happened to be with child by a very brave and gallant prince . . . King Henry was the firſt who knew it, and was extreamly troubled at it; for ſhe was ſomewhat related to him . . . . One night, at a ball, he danced with her the dance of the Torch, and afterwards made her dance, with another, the Gaillard, and other dances, wherein ſhe ſhewed her diſpoſition and dexterity better than ever, with her ſhape, which was very fine, and which ſhe fitted ſo well that day, that her big-belly did not in the leaſt appear; inſomuch that the king . . . . . came and whiſpered to one of his moſt intimate familiars, thoſe people are very wicked, and wretched, that have invented the report, that that poor lady was big with child . . . . They have reported a falſehood, and are much to blame. Thus that good prince excuſed that fair and honourable lady, and ſaid as much to the queen that night, being in bed with her: but the queen, not truſting to that, cauſed her to be ſearched the next morning, in her own preſence, and found her to have gone ſix months with child; the lady confeſſing that all this had been done upon a promiſe of marriage. Therefore the king, who was very good-natured, cauſed the whole myſtery to be kept as ſecret as could be, without expoſing the lady, though the queen was very angry at it. They ſent her, without noiſe, to her neareſt relations, where ſhe was brought to bed of a fine boy, who nevertheleſs was ſo unhappy as never to be owned by his ſuppoſed father; and the law-ſuit about it was long depending, but the mother never got any thing by it (9).’ It is eaſy to know, by this account, the lady de la Garnache, who was maid of honour to Catherine de Medicis, when that accident befel her (10). She was not the only lady, who got a big-belly in that queen's ſervice.

[E] Mr Varillas . . . . has committed many faults.] Theſe are his words (11): ‘ James, firſt duke of Nemours, ſirnamed the fair and gallant knight, by way of excellence, had been in love with Frances de Rohan, who appeared at court under the name of Mademoiſelle de Leon . . . . He had given her a promiſe of marriage in due form. That lady added, that he had pronounced the matrimonial vow, and that the marriage had been conſummated. No iſſue was come from it; and things ſtill remained in an uncertainty, when Poltrot killed the duke of Guiſe. The duke of Nemours's paſſion for the ducheſs of Guiſe was preſently rekindled, as ſoon as ſhe was a widow, and he married her before Mademoiſelle de Leon had taken all her meaſures to put a ſtop to it. Her relations, who had but indifferently aſſiſted her before the infidelity of the duke of Nemours, grew incenſed when they ſaw him married; and the king of Navarre, her ſecond couſin, thoſe of the houſe of Rohan, and all the other lords of the kingdom, that were related to them, let the duke of Nemours know, that, unleſs he gave ſatisfaction to Mademoiſelle de Leon, he muſt fight them all in a ſingle combat, one after another. This was a terrible extremity. And, tho' the duke of Nemours was one of the moſt valiant men in the world, it was not poſſible for him to ſatisfy ſo many perſons, without loſing his life at laſt in the quarrel. This made him uſe precautions, which for ſome years exempted him from fighting. . . . . The ducheſs of Nemours was brought to bed of two ſons . . . . and the lady Leon took upon her to prove, that they were not legitimate. Things were prepared for a trial with great ſolemnity. The moſt famous profeſſors of the civil-law in Europe were conſulted, as well as the moſt celebrated lawyers of the parliaments of France; and the majority of them anſwered, that the queſtion appeared difficult, and that the beſt way was to accommodate the matter. The quarrel about religion, which immediately followed the other about marriage, did but inflame it; for, on one ſide, the houſe of Rohan turned Calviniſt. . . . . . The lady Leon was a younger ſiſter of Bretagne, and by conſequence had but a ſmall portion. She loved expence; and it was by furniſhing her wherewithal to maintain it, that the duke of Nemours had gained her eſteem. They attacked her on that weak ſide; and the queen-mother offerred her, that, provided ſhe did not inſiſt upon her pretenſions, the town of Loudun, and it's juriſdiction, ſhould be diſmembered from the royal demeſne; and, if the whole was not worth fifty thouſand livres a year, the adjacent lands ſhould be bought, and added to it, to make up that ſum; that the whole together ſhould be erected into a duchy and peerdom: and that the patent ſhould import, in expreſs terms, that that duchy and peerdom ſhould paſs from the lady Leon to her iſſue, male and and female for ever, ſuppoſing ſhe had any: and, in caſe ſhe had none, to all the males and females of the houſe of Rohan alſo for ever. Mademoiſelle de Leon rejected at firſt the propoſal of the queen-mother . . . . She was ſo teazed by her relations, that ſhe durſt no more openly oppoſe an accommodation. But freſh obſtacles were ſtill raiſed, when they thought they had overcome the former. The parliament of Paris, who were to regiſter the patent for erecting Loudun into a duchy and peerdom, made a ſcruple of it, alledging, that, to make a lawful ſettlement of a duchy and peerdom, there muſt be found an eſtate, of which the future duke and peer be incommutable lord; that is, that he ſhould be ſo abſolutely poſſeſſed of it, that none ſhould have a right to deprive him of it; which could not be with reſpect to the lordſhip of Loudun, ſince it was of the royal demeſne; and that whatſoever precautions ſhould be taken to divide it from it, it would ſtill be lawful for the king to re-unite it; and though his majeſty ſhould neglect it, he being but uſufructuary of his kingdom, his ſucceſſors would nevertheleſs be in a capacity to do it. It was difficult to confute this reaſon by an oppoſite one of equal ſtrength: but the queen-mother would have over-ruled it by all her credit, and the authority of the king her ſon, if the change, which happened in the perſon of the duke of Nemours, had not hindered her. That prince . . . . . was afflicted with the palſy . . . . and died, after having languiſhed in his bed for two whole years (12). Every body compaſſionating his indiſpoſition, the lady Leon ſuperſeded her proſecution, and the judges would never hear it mentioned, after the death of him, who had given ground for it. The king was extreamly glad he had no more occaſion to alienate his demeſne, and to create a new duchy and peerdom upon ſo unworthy an occaſion . . . And, having conſented to the alienation of Loudun, out of meer complaiſance to the queen-mother, he was glad he was diſpenſed with the performance of his promiſe by the death of the duke of Nemours.’

CENSURE of that paſſage of Varillas.

In the firſt place, I take notice, that the lady in queſtion is called by Brantôme Mademoiſelle de Rohan (13), not Mademoiſelle de Leon. II. I have ſhewn (14) by the teſtimony of Thuanus, that the law-ſuit of the lady was definitively determined, to her prejudice, in

(7) Ibid. lib. ii, cap. xii, & xvi.

(8) Thuan. lib. lix, ad ann. 1574, pag. 99.

(9) Brant. Dames Gal. Tom. II, pag. m. 370.

(10) Brantome, in the diſcourſe of Catherine de Medicis, puts the lady de Rhoan at the head of the maids of honour, whom he had ſeen at the court of France.

(11) Varill. Hiſt. de Henry III, lib. v, pag 18, & ſeq. Dutch Edit.

(12) He died at Anneſſi, in the county of Foucigny, the nineteenth of June, 1583. Hilarion de Coſte, Elog. des Dames, Tom. I, pag. 79.

(13) Diſcours de Catherine de Medicis, pag. m. 100.

(14) In the remark [A].

in the year 1566. The promiſe of marriage, which ſhe produced, was declared void. Mr Varillas knew it well enough, when he compoſed his hiſtory of Charles IX. See the words, which I quote in the margin (15), they poſitively declare, that the duke of Nemours's marriage with the ducheſs of Guiſe was preceded by the ſentence, which made void the pretenſions of the lady Rohan (16). Why then does he ſay, in this place, that, before this lady had taken all her meaſures to put a ſtop to it, the duke of Nemours had married the widow of the duke of Guiſe? III. How is it likely, that that lady renewed her proſecution after the birth of the two ſons of the duke of Nemours by that widow? That marriage was concluded after the definitive ſentence, which ruined the pretenſions of the lady Rohan, and therefore nothing could be alledged againſt the iſſue of that marriage. IV. And therefore thoſe conſultations of profeſſors in civil-law, and of lawyers, thoſe ſolemn Preparations for a trial, touching the quality of the duke of Nemours's two ſons, are meer chimeras. V. The quarrel about religion was not ſubſequent to the birth of thoſe two children; for that duke did not marry the dowager of Guiſe till after the law-ſuit with the lady Rohan had been determined in the year 1566, before which time there had been a moſt bloody war about religion. VI. The houſe of Rohan did not turn Calviniſt after the birth of the duke of Nemours's two ſons; for Mr Varillas remarks (17), that, in the year 1562, the viſcount de Rohan embraced Calviniſm, in hopes of marrying the heireſs of Soubize. VII. That compaſſion, which, we are told, prevailed with the lady Rohan to ſuperſede her proſecution againſt the duke of Nemours, who was ſick of the palſy, is alſo another chimera. VIII. According to Mr Varillas, king Henry III did not erect Loudun into a duchy; the duke of Nemours's death exempted him from the performance of his promiſe. Nevertheleſs it is certain, that that erection was made in favour of the lady Rohan. IX. The moſt enormous fault of that author, is, his ſaying, that the duke of Nemours had no children by that lady. See, above (18), the paſſage of the Sieur d'Aubigné (19).

(15) As ſoon as the definitive ſentence was ſignified to the lady Rohan, the duke of Nemours married the dowager of Guiſe. Varillas, Hiſtoire de Charles IX, Tom. II, pag. 34, ad ann. 1566.

(16) See Hilarion de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 76.

(17) Hiſtoire de Charles IX, lib. iii, at the beginning.

(18) In the remark [C].

(19) See alſo Le Laboureur, Additions aux Memoires de Caſtelnau, Tom. I, pag. 808.

GARONNE, in Latin Garumna, one of the four great rivers of France. Papyrius Maſſo (a) will furniſh you with ſeveral paſſages of the poets concerning this river. Add to that, the pretty and pleaſant fiction of Meſſieurs Chapelle, and Bachaumont (b), about it's flux and reflux. I content myſelf to mark ſome faults of Moreri [A].

(a) In Deſcriptione Franciæ per Flumina.

(b) In the relation of their travels.

[A] I content myſelf to mark ſome faults of Moreri.] I. He ſays, that the Garonne croſſes the plain of Aran, in the county of Comminges. This ſhews he did not underſtand the Latin he copied; for theſe are the words of Mr Baudrand, whom Mr Moreri has falſely tranſlated: Oritur (Garumna) in montibus Auræ in Arania valle Hiſpanicæ ditionis in confinio Aragonicæ. Mr Baudrand does not ſpeak of the plain of Aran, but of the valley of Aran, and ſays, that it belongs to Spain, in the borders of Arragon; but not that it is a part of the country of Comminges. II. He ſhould not have ſaid, that the Garonne paſſes through Rieux, but near Rieux. The Sieur Coulon has avoided that fault, by ſaying, that it runs along the biſhopric of Rieux in the county of Foix (1). Theſe laſt words are falſe, ſince the city of Rieux is not of the county of Foix; and that part of the dioceſe of Rieux, along which the Garonne runs, is not in the county of Foix. III. It is not true, that the Garonne receives, at Toulouſe, the Little Lers, which runs into it far below that city. IV. He ſhould not have forgot, that, a league above Touloule, it receives a river much more conſiderable than the Little Lers, I mean the river Ariege. Inde patentes & fertiles campos rigans duobus milliaribus à Tholoſa in vinculo (2) S. Crucis Aurigeram (3) fluvium excipiens, arenulis aureis intermicantem, jam ſuis aquis & externis valentior Tholoſam Tectoſagum Metropolim alluit: Theſe are Papyrius Maſſo's words (4). V. To ſay, as Mr Moreri does, that the Garonne comes near Bourdeaux, ſhews as if he would have the readers fancy, that it does not waſh the walls of that city; which would be a moſt falſe imagination. VI. He ſays, the Garonne and the Dordogne form one ſingle channel of the Garonne, which paſſes by Blaye: Which is a phraſe ſo barbarous, that the moſt ignorant Walloon would have expreſſed the thing better. VII. He ſhould not have ſaid, that there is on the right ſide of the Garonne, and on the ſhore of Xaintonge, a town called Marmande, but a town called Mortagne. VIII. Inſtead of Pavillac and of Soulac, he ſhould have ſaid Paulliac and Souillac. The ſecond and fifth faults are found in Mr Baudrand's Geographical Dictionary.

(1) Traité des Rivieres de France, Part. I, pag. 475.

(2) It ſhould be vinculo, a little village.

(3) The author does not well tranſlate this word by that of La Riege.

(4) In Deſcriptione Franciæ per Flumina, pag. 433. Edit. Pariſ. 1685.

GEDDICCUS (SIMON), doctor of divinity, and miniſter at Magdeburg, is only known to me by the anſwer, he publiſhed, in the year 1595, to a little book, wherein the author pretended to prove, that women do not belong to human kind, Mulieres non eſſe homines [A]. This is much more happily expreſſed in Latin, than in [A] The author pretended to prove ..... mulieres non eſſe homines.] I have ſpoken elſewhere (1) of the great noiſe and ſtorms, that were raiſed againſt poor Acidalius, who had given his bookſeller a copy of that diſſertation; and I have advertiſed my reader in that place, that I ſhould ſpeak here of that little book. I queſtion very much, if Gediccus has underſtood the true intention of the author. He has beſtowed great pains in making a formal apology for the fair ſex; which ſhews he thought he confuted a book, the principal deſign of which was to abuſe the women: wherein, in my opinion, he has ſhewn no great penetration. The author of the Diſſertation does not principally aim at the women; and it is only by accident, and very indirectly, that he abuſes them. His principal deſign is to turn into ridicule the ſyſtem of the Socinians, and their method of playing with the moſt formal and expreſs texts of the word of GOD, touching the divinity of Chriſt. This has been obſerved long ago by a Journaliſt. Theſe are his words (2): 'Why ſhould not every body be allowed to convince themſelves, that the Socinians make uſe of trifling and wretched cavils; and that it has been proved, that, by their gloſſes, one might elude all the paſſages of ſcripture, which prove that women are human creatures, I mean, of the ſame ſpecies with men. This was the ſubject-matter of a little book, which was publiſhed towards the end of the laſt century, mulieres homines non eſſe; to which one Simon Gediccus, a miniſter in the country of Brandenburgh, made a very ſerious anſwer, not being aware of the deſign of the author, which was to write a violent ſatire againſt the Socinians: For how can one turn them into ridicule, or mortify them more effectually, than by letting them ſee, that the gloſſes, whereby they combate the conſubſtantiality of the ſon of GOD, are ſufficient to hinder us from proving by ſcripture, that women are humane creatures?' Cochleus made uſe of the ſame machine, but to very little purpoſe, againſt Luther. He wrote ſome books, wherein, after the Lutheran way, he pretended to prove, by paſſages of ſcripture, that JESUS CHRIST is not GOD; that GOD ought to obey the devil; and that the Bleſſed Virgin did not preſerve her virginity. 'Cùm Lutherani ſcripturis ad ſuas nugas aptatis luderent, Cocherus (3) in actis Lutheri anno 1527, ſe librum ex Scripturis malè conſertis conſarcinaſſe teſtatur, ad probandum, quòd Chriſtus non ſit Deus, additque anno 1528 ſe item ſimili arte ac ſcopo, ſcripſiſſe de obedientia Diabolo debita à Deo, & de B. Virginis integritate violata. Unde liquere volebat, nihil eſſe adeò ſanctum, ad quod impugnandum non poſſent obtorqueri Scripturæ (4). —— It being uſual with the Lutherans to quote

(1) Above, in remark [G] of the article ACIDALIUS.

(2) Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, July, 1685, pag. 802.

(3) It is an error of the preſs, marked in the Errata. We muſt read Cocleus, or Cochleus. Mr Baillet, Jugem. des Sçavans, Tom. I, pag. 103, not having perceived this error of the preſs, thought that Theophilus Raynaud had quoted one Cocher.

(4) Theoph. Raynaudus, de bonis ac malis Libris, Part. III, Erotem. III, n. 528, pag. m. 296.

in Engliſh ; for as it is very ridiculous to maintain in Latin, Mulieres non eſſe homines, it is no leſs ridiculous, in our tongue, to aver, That women are men. That little book has been reprinted ſeveral times [B], and ſome people have maintained, in earneſt, the poſition, which is to be ſeen in the title page [C]. I could not find queen Elizabeth mentioned in that book [D].

There are thoſe who believe, that the author of the Eccleſiaſticus has confuted the paradox, That women have no ſouls. If they were in the right, we muſt conclude, that the Italian Author, who has maintained that paradox, has revived a very obſolete chimera [E]. To make, in that ſenſe, an old decrepit young again, is no very difficult ‘ quote the ſcriptures in proof of their chimerical notions, Cochleus, in the acts of Luther, ann. 1527, confeſſes, that he patched up a book with ſcraps of the ſcripture ill put together, to prove, that CHRIST is not GOD; and he adds, ann 1528, that, with the ſame artifice and deſign, he had written concerning the obedience due from GOD to the devil, and of the violated honour of the Bleſſed Virgin. Whence he would make it plain, that nothing is ſo ſacred, but the ſcriptures may be wreſted to overthrow it.’ The author, from whom I borrow theſe words, had juſt before given a great inſtance of the power of chicanry and cavilling: for he had ſhewn, that, if one ſhould ſcan the creed, according to the principles of ſome critics, not one of it's articles could ſtand the teſt. He complains, that Petrus Aurelius had lately cenſured that example of chicanry (5); but I cannot approve his complaint, after having read in Mr Baillet what follows. ‘ Father Theophilus Raynaud . . . . ſhews, that there is no book, how perfect and pious ſoever it may be, wherein a man may not find ſomething to cenſure, right or wrong, when once he has undertaken to pervert all, and to find fault with every thing. But it was not very neceſſary, that he ſhould give ſuch ſenſible and effectual proofs, by endeavouring to perſuade us that he underſtood, as well as any other, the art of tricking and cavilling, when he has publiſhed a looſe and impious cenſure of the Apoſtles Creed; wherein, either himſelf, or he to whom he aſcribes it, and whom he calls a moſt Catholic and moſt learned man, wreſts, in effect, the ſenſe of all the words of that Creed, to ſhew that every one of them is in ſome ſenſe ſuſpicious, dangerous, captious, impious, and heretical. That is indeed a ſpecimen of what chicanry may produce: but I cannot well ſee what game that moſt catholic author had a mind to play, by playing thus with our profeſſion of faith. I know not whether it was for the ſimple, and ſuch as are eaſily offended, or for the pretended Eſprits-forts (wits), that he wrote that piece; and whether he had a mind to ſerve the Socinians, or Deiſts (6).’ Conſult the article POZA.

[B] That little book has been reprinted ſeveral times.] The edition I make uſe of is of the Hague, 1638, in 12mo. I do not mark the others. I cannot poſitively tell whether the work, condemned by the congregation of the Index, at Rome, the eighteenth of June, 1651, is a tranſlation of this. That work is intituled, Che le donne non ſiano della ſpecie de gl'huomini: Diſcorſo piacevole, tradotto da Horatio Plata, Romano (7).

[C] Some have maintained in earneſt the poſition in the title.] You will ſee the proof of it in this remark; tho' all the examples, I ſhall inſtance in, are not proper to ſhew, that that poſition was maintained in earneſt. I believe with Voſſius that Cujacius affirmed it only by way of jeſt (8): Eoque cum Cujacius contenderet, mulieres non eſſe homines, credo à ſeriis animum remittens (prope amittens in tali negotio dixerim) pauxillum voluit nugari, quod poſt magnum virum aliis etiam nugandi præbuit occaſionem. That queſtion was much debated in Holland, whilſt Sorbiere was there. Mr Beverovic, ſays he, has written ‘ a book of the excellency of women, upon occaſion of a diſpute about a theſis, advanced, in form of a paradox, by a ſtudent, who had a mind to exerciſe his wit; mulieres non eſſe homines. That diſpute has paſſed from the ſchools into the converſation of the beſt companies, and much has already been written pro and con about it. At laſt Monſieur de Beverovic has entred the liſt, and has given us as genteel and learned a piece as can be written upon that ſubject. He has forgot nothing that could be ſaid to the advantage of the fair ſex; and he has verified, by a thouſand examples, what he has endeavoured to prove methodically, and by good reaſons, that women were not inferior to men in any qualities, either of mind or body (9).’ I wiſh Voſſius had made as ſound a judgment of Ariſtotle's opinion, as of that, which Cujacius undertook to maintain: but ſuch a thing was not to be expected from him; for Ariſtotle's authority was yet too much reſpected. That great philoſopher has maintained a ſtrange doctrine; that nature made no women, but when, through the imperfection of matter, it could not arrive at the ſex which is perfect. Voſſius (10) commends Cajetan for having owned this with reſpect to particular nature, and for having denied it with reſpect to univerſal nature. Therefore, in the judgment of thoſe two doctors, human nature aims not at engendering women; it's deſign is always to get males: but becauſe, if it ſhould always compaſs that end, the univerſe would ſuffer too much by it, there is an univerſal nature, which remedies it. What a pitiful jargon! what an odd idea of wiſdom! what ſtrange philoſophy here is! human nature would labour to preſerve itſelf; and yet it ſhould not aim at producing that being, without which it cannot be preſerved. This is the groſſeſt of abſurdities, and neverthele∫s, there is an infinite number of phyſicians and philoſophers, who have aſſerted, that nature makes females only when it is out of it's road; and ſo that it produces none, but by chance, by accident, by force. Let us hear this foolery in Italian: ‘ Huomini ſapientiſſimi hanno laſciato ſcritto, che la natura, percio che ſempre intende, & diſegna far le coſe piu perfette, ſe poteſſe, produrria continuamente huomini: & quando naſce una Donna, è difetto, o error della natura, & contra quello, ch'eſſa vorrebe fare: come ſi vede ancor d'uno, che naſce cieco, zoppo, o con qualche altro mancamento, & ne gli arbori molti frutti, che non maturano mai. Coſi la Donna ſi puo dire animal produtto à ſorte, & per caſo (11). —— The moſt learned men have left in writing, that nature, which ever aims at perfection, would always produce men; and that, when a woman is born, it is, as it were, by miſtake, and an error of nature; as when any one is born blind or lame, or with any other natural defect, or like the fruit of ſome trees, which never ripen. Thus a woman is an animal produced by accident.’ What I find moſt ſtrange, is, to ſee, that, in a council (12), the queſtion was gravely put, whether the women were human creatures, and that it was not carried in the affirmative, but after a long debate.

[D] I could not find queen Elizabeth mentioned in that book.] Here is what we find in the life of that queen, publiſhed by Mr Leti. ‘ I always looked with indignation, ſays he (13), upon a wretched book, intituled, That Women are not of the ſame ſpecies with men; wherein the author has the boldneſs to mention the example of that great queen, to laugh at thoſe, who have commended her capacity for the management of affairs; and to ſay, that, during her reign, her favourites, her council, and the parliament, managed all the buſineſs, and that ſhe only lent them her name.’ It being likely, that there are other diſſertations upon the theſis mulieres non eſſe homines, beſides the treatiſe, which Gediccus has given himſelf the trouble to confute, it would be very raſh in me to deny what Mr Leti ſays; for I own I have read nothing concerning that ſubject, except the book Gediccus has confuted. However I may ſay, that Mr Leti would have obliged his readers, if he had deſcribed the book (14), wherein he had read that ſlander againſt queen Elizabeth.

[E] That the Italian author, who has maintained that paradox, has revived a very obſolete chimera.] ‘ A Spaniard cult piece of work, and ſuch as can be done without the help of Medea's art. However, this new author, not having been in a capacity to make uſe of the arguments of thoſe, that are confuted in Eccleſiaſticus, he may claim the honour of invention, in ſome reſpects. You will find below (a) a paſſage out of the Mêlanges d'Hiſtoire & de Littérature, by Mr de Vigneul-Marville.

---

(5) Non me latet nuper Petrum Aurelium in hanc ſcriptionem vomuiſſe pleraque virulenta, quaſi id ſit illudere verbo Dei. Sed hæc eſt planè frivola criminatio, hujuſmodi enim ad hominem recriminationes à viris piis in non diſſimili materia ſunt adhibitæ. Sic cum Lutherani, &c. The Sequel is in the body of this remark.

(6) Jugemens des Sçavans, Tom. I, pag. 202, 203.

(7) See the Index of Alexander VII, n. 55, pag. 255.

(8) Voſſius, de Orig. Idolol. lib. iii, cap. xlviii, pag. m. 984.

(9) Sorbiere, in a letter to Guy Patin, written from Leyden about the year 1650. It is the ſixty third. See page 437, of his letters in 4to.

(10) Ubi ſupra.

(11) Count Balthaſſar Caſtiglione, in his Corteggiano, lib. iii, pag. m. 382.

(12) Held at Mâcon. See Polygamia Triumphatrix, pag. 123, where you will find theſe words: Cum inter tot ſanctos patres Epiſcopus quidam . . . ſtatueret non poſſe nec debere mulieres vocari homines, res tanti eſt habita, ut in timore Dei publice ibi ventilaretur, & tandem poſt multas vexatæ hujus quæſtionis diſceptationes concluderetur quod mulieres ſint homines.

(13) Tom. I, pag. 6.

(14) He ſhould have marked in what language, country, and time, that book was printed.

(a) In remark [E].

' A Spaniard has ſaid, that beaſts have no ſoul: a Frenchman has ſaid it alſo: but an Italian is gone beyond them, by maintaining, that women have no ſouls, and are not of the ſame ſpecies with the men: Che le donne non habbino anima, & che non ſiino della ſpetie de gli huomini, e vienne comprobato da molti luoghi della Scrittura ſanta: Which the author endeavours to prove by ſeveral paſſages of the holy ſcripture, which he adapts to his fancy. As long as this book was printed only in Latin, the Inquiſition was ſilent; but, as ſoon as it was tranſlated into Italian, they cenſured, and prohibited it. The ladies of Italy put various conſtructions upon that ſyſtem: ſome were ſorry for having no ſouls, and for being ranked ſo much below men, who, for the future, would uſe them little better than apes: others were indifferent upon the matter; and, looking now upon themſelves as meer machines, deſigned to move their wheels ſo well, as to make the men mad. It was very reaſonable to ſtop the courſe of that hereſy, which is ſo very ancient, that the preacher ſeems to have confuted it, when he ſays, that God had created for Adam a companion like unto him; and had given them both a tongue, eyes, ears, and, over and above all that, a ſoul, to think and govern themſelves. The author of the commentary upon St Paul's epiſtles, falſly aſcribed to St Ambroſe, ſays plainly, upon the eleventh chapter of the firſt to the Corinthians, that the women are not made after the image and likeneſs of GOD: Fœminas ad ad imaginem Dei factas non eſſe (15). Touching this laſt queſtion, ſee Giſbert Voëtius, in the third tome of the Politica eccleſiaſtica (16). He proves in few words, by three reaſons, that the woman was made after the image of GOD; and anſwers the objection, which might be grounded upon a paſſage of St Paul (17). He confutes alſo (18) as briefly the falſe poſition, mulieres non eſſe homines; and obſerves that Ariſtotle's opinion, mentioned here above (19), was adopted by Thomas Aquinas, and by ſeveral other ſchoolmen, with the ſame modification, that we have ſeen (20) that Cajetan added to it. An mulier ſit ἁμάρτημα erratum naturæ & mas occaſionatus, & per accidens generetur, atque adeo ſit monſtrum? Reſp. Talè quid excidit Ariſtoteli lib. 2. de generat. animalium cap. 3. & lib. 4. cap. 2. Hànc opinionem adoptavit Thomas part. 1. qu. 92, art. & lib. 3. c. Gentes cap 94. Ejuſque ſequaces, Viguerius Inſtitut. cap. 21. §. 2. v. 4. Et Commentatores ad Thomæ Summam Cajetanus, Medices, Alagona, & Ferrarienſis ad 3. c. Gentes cap. 94. Inſuper ex ſententiariis Bonaventura, Ægidius, Richardus ad 2. diſt. 20. Sed panacæâ diſtinctionis emolliri putant crudam hanc opinionem, quod fœmina ſit occaſionativè, non per ſe, reſpectu agentis particularis .... ſed quod ..... ſit per ſe ex intentione agentis univerſalis, & naturæ (21).

(15) Mêlanges d'Hiſt. & de Literat. recueillis par Monſ. de Vigneul Marville, pag. 16, & ſeq. Roan Edit. 1699.

(16) Giſb Voëtius, Politicæ Eccleſiaſticæ, Parte II, Lib I, pag. 185, 186.

(17) 1 Cor. xi, 7.

(18) Voëtius, ib. pag. 179, 180.

(19) In remark [C].

(20) Ibid.

(21) Voëtius, ib. pag. 181.

GELDENHAUR (GERARD), in Latin Geldenhaurius, a native of Nimeguen [A], held a conſiderable rank among the learned men of the XVIth century. He ſtudied claſſic learning at Deventer, under very good maſters (a), and went through his courſe of philoſophy at Louvain ſo ſucceſsfully, that he became qualified to teach that ſcience there. It was in that illuſtrious univerſity that he contracted a very ſtrict friendſhip with ſeveral learned men, and particularly with Eraſmus. He ſtayed ſome time at Antwerp, from whence he was called to the court of Charles of Auſtria, to be reader and hiſtorian to that prince (b): But, becauſe he did not like to change often his habitation, and did not think it convenient to accompany him into Spain, he diſ-engaged himſelf from him, and betook himſelf to the ſervice of Philip of Burgundy, biſhop of Utrecht. He was his reader and ſecretary for twelve years [B], that is, till the year 1524, when that prelate died; after which he performed the ſame functions with Maximilian of Burgundy. He was ſent to Wittemberg in the year 1526, to examine the ſtate of the ſchools, and the church. He reported ingenuouſly what he had obſerved there; and owned, he could not diſapprove a doctrine ſo conformable to the prophets and apoſtles, as that he had heard there: Therefore he renounced Popery, and retired towards the Upper Rhine. He married at Worms, and taught there the youth for ſome time: Afterwards he was called to Augſburg [C], for the ſame employment; and at laſt, in the year 1534, he went to Marpurg,

(a) Alexander Hegius, and John Oſtendorp.

(b) See remark [B] towards the end.

[A] He was a native of Nimeguen.] He was better known by the name of his country, than by that of his family; for he was commonly called Gerardus Noviomagus: nor does Eraſmus call him otherwiſe in the letters he wrote to him. Konig (1) mentions him only under the word Noviomagus. Some other Bibliographers (2), for want of examining things, have ſplit one author into two, and diſtinguiſhed Gerardus Geldenhaurius from Gerardus Noviomagus. La Popeliniere's error is not leſs groſs; Gerard de Noyon Noviomagun, ſays he (3), has written the hiſtory of Holland, 1530. Does he not ſeem to make Noviomagun his family-name? It is certain, at leaſt, that he believes him to be a native of Noion in Picardy. We find a like miſtake in the firſt tome of the Bibliotheque Univerſelle. Mr Matthæus ſhews, that Eligius had already preached the goſpel to the Frieſlanders .... and that he was the firſt biſhop of Nimeguen (4). There are three errors in theſe words. The Latin word Eligius out to have been tranſlated by that of Eloi; and the term of Noviomagus, by that of Noion; for it was of Noion that St Eloi was biſhop. Nimeguen never was an epiſcopal ſee.

(1) In Bibliotheca veteri & nova.

(2) The abbreviators of Geſner and Draudius.

(3) Hiſtoire des Hiſtoires, lib. ix, pag. 483.

(4) Biblioth. Univerſ. Tom. I, pag. 89.

[B] His reader and ſecretary for twelve years.] Theſe are the words of the author, who has furniſhed me with this article (5); Se ad Philippum Ultrajectinum præſulem contulit, eique à Secretis in Latina lingua, & in cubiculo à lectionibus fuit per annos XII. I wonder Paul Freherus does not ſay, that Geldenhaur was employed in religious functions by that biſhop, as we are aſſured by Valerius Andreas (6); Philippo Burgundo, Epiſcopo Ultrajectino a ſacris. This is Valerius Andreas's expreſſion, which Mr Moreri has tranſlated by chaplain to Philip of Burgundy: and indeed there is no doubt but Geldenhaur, who was a monk, aſſiſted his prelate in his devotions. Valerius Andreas is not the only author, that informs us of the monaſtical profeſſion of Geldenhaur (7): for I find it in one of Eraſmus's letters. Quod ſi vera prædicas mea ſententia nec aula dignus es, nec cucullá (8): that is, if it be true that you are of ſo baſhful a temper (9), you are neither fit for the court, nor for the cowl. Note, that this monk was alſo chaplain to Charles of Auſtria, if we may believe Voſſius (10).

[C] He was called to Augsburg.] Melchior Adam (11) relates, that, in 1531, the magiſtrates of that city having erected a ſchool, which they called St Ann's, ſent

(5) Paul Freher. in Theatro, pag. 114.

(6) Valer. Andr. in Biblioth. Belgic. pag. 273.

(7) Ordinis Cruciferorum Monachus. Id. ibid.

(8) Eraſm. Epiſt. xlii, lib. iii.

(9) Eraſmus had ſaid juſt before, Sed heus tu, rem oppido novam ex tuis literis accipio. Neſciebam te tam virgineo pudore præditum ut ad me non auſis ſcribere. - - Your letter informs me of a new thing. I knew not, that you were ſo baſhful that you had not the courage to write to me.

(10) Cæſari Carolo V à ſacris fuit. Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. pag. 654.

(11) In vitis Theologor. Germanorum, pag. 92.

purg, where he taught hiſtory two years, and then divinity, 'till his death. He died of the plague, the tenth of January, 1542, being ſixty years of age (c). He had been a Monk (d). His changing his religion, and ſome writings he publiſhed againſt the church of Rome, made him fall out with Eraſmus [D], who ſpeaks very ill of him; and who, inſtead of aſſiſting him in his poverty, jeſted upon it [E], and called him a man of a ſeditious ſpirit: A reproach, which deſerves no leſs to be taken notice of, than the ſent for Geldenhaur to be the maſter of it. See what I quote out of Eraſmus, towards the end of the following remark.

[D] His changing his religion and ſome writings made him fall out with Eraſmus.] Read Eraſmus's letter in Pſeudevangelicos (12), which he wrote to Geldenhaur, whoſe name he changed into that of Vulturius. He blames him for having publiſhed ſcoffing books, which did but exaſperate princes againſt Luther's followers. 'Parum erat evulgaſſe epiſtolam ad Spirenſe Concilium; non magno intervallo proſiliit nobis ridiculus ille Cometes Carolo Cæſari dicatus. Quum iterum te meis ſcriptis admonuiſſem, ut à talibus jocis temperares, qui & Principum animos ad ſævitiam irritarent, & adeo nihil juvarent cauſam, à cujus victoria veſtra pendet incolumitas, ut etiam graviſſimè lædant, placidè quidem reſpondiſti: ſed perinde quaſi te fuiſſem hortatus, ut ſimile quiddam iterum deſignares, ita rurſus ad concilium Spirenſe, cui tum rex Ferdinandus præſidebat, miſſus eſt libellus, nomen Eraſmi literis bene magnis præſerens (13). —— It was not enough that the letter was made public at the council of Spires; ſoon after came out that ridiculous Comet dedicated to The Emperor Charles. When I again admoniſhed you, by letter, to avoid ſuch jeſting, which might exaſperate the minds of princes, and, inſtead of ſerving, greatly injure the cauſe, upon whoſe ſucceſs your own ſafty depends, you returned indeed a civil anſwer; yet, as if I had exhorted you to attempt the like again, another writing was ſent to the council of Spires, in which king Ferdinand then preſided, ſigned with the name of Eraſmus in pretty large characters.' He blames him alſo for having prefixed the name, and ſome notes of Eraſmus to ſome letters, the drift of which was to prove, that heretics ought not to be puniſhed: which expoſed Eraſmus to the hatred of the court of Rome, and to the indignation of ſuch princes as perſecuted Lutheraniſm; for it was as good as to ſay, that Eraſmus furniſhed the innovators with weapons to fight their enemies. That learned man could not bear, that any ſhould do him that ill office; for age had made him a coward in that reſpect. His complaints againſt Geldenhaur, and the Lutherans, are very bitter, and were anſwered in writings, which he thought very violent. He took Geldenhaur to have been the chief promoter of them, and therefore he ſticks not to compare him to the treacherous Judas (14). 'Sed nondum commigrarat Argentoratum, ille (15) mirabilis concitandæ ſeditionis, & mox turbatis rebus, alioque profugiendi artifex: ille qui loca ex omnibus epiſtolis meis ad calumniam idonea enotaret, moxque fingeret ſibi librum à fratribus clam ereptum. Qui adeò flagrabat impotenti odio, ut hunc librum è mendaciis & conviciis non aliter contextum, quàm cento contexitur ex pannis, non potuerit expectare, ſed furtim emiſit inſulſiſſima ſcholia, & interim mihi ſcribebat blandas epiſtolas: Eram dominus ac præceptor, à quo libenter admoneretur, qui ſine imagine mei non poterat vivere, qui proximis ad me literis etiam conſolatus eſt me, hortans ut læto eſſem animo, contemnens rabulas loquaces & ſcribaces: denique jamdudum editâ epiſtolâ meâ, quòd me facturum ſcripſeram, in ſuis ad amanuenſem meum literis volebat mihi commendari, & interim hæc parabantur, tantâ arte mordacia, ut magis lædar laudatus, quàm convitiis affectus. Et hi ſe cum apoſtolorum ſanctimonia conferunt, quum hoc Vulturii factum propiùs accedat ad exemplum Judæ proditoris, quàm CHRISTI. —— This artiſt at raiſing ſedition, and afterwards ſlipping his neck out of the collar, was not yet gone to Strasburg: He, I ſay, who marked the paſſages in all my letters, which might give a handle to calumny, and afterwards pretended that the book was ſtolen from him by his brothers: who was ſo maliciouſly ſet againſt me, that he could not wait for that book, that patch-work of calumny and lies, but publiſhed, underhand, moſt ſtupid comments; and, in the mean time, wrote complaiſant letters to me: I was, forſooth, his maſter and preceptor, whoſe admonitions he willingly received, he could not live without my picture, and, in his very next letter to me, he endeavoured to comfort me, adviſing me to be chearful, and expreſſing a contempt both for talking and ſcribling brawlers: laſtly, after my letter was already publiſhed, he wrote to my amanuenſis, recommending to me what I had declared in writing I intended to do; in the mean time all theſe things were carry'd on with ſuch malicious cunning, that I was more injured by praiſes, than affected by calumnies. And theſe are the men, who pretend to apoſtolical ſanctity, when this action of Vulturius comes nearer to the example of the traitor Judas, than of CHRIST.' By this we learn, that Geldenhaur was at Strasburg in the year 1530, where he ſhewed a very turbulent ſpirit; which however neither Melchior Adam nor Paul Freherus mention. Eraſmus ſays in another place, that no man in Strasburg attempted any thing againſt him before Geldenhaur came there. He wrote this when Geldenhaur was profeſſor of poetry at Augſburg: 'Argentorati nemo quicquam in mea molitus eſt, priuſquam eò commigrâſſet Noviomagus, qui nunc agit Auguſtæ, profiteturque poëticam ſalario, ut aiunt, ſexaginta florenorum (16).'

[E] .... who inſtead of aſſiſting him in his poverty, jeſted upon it.] After having repreſented to him ſeveral things, which hindered him from relieving his friends in their indigence, he tells him, that poverty is no misfortune to thoſe, who devote themſelves to the purity of the goſpel; that they ought to relieve one another; and that, by being contented with little, and reducing themſelves to bread and water, they will always find wherewithal to live: 'Porrò, quod ſignificas tibi moleſtam egeſtatem, equidem nec tam ſum inops, ut non poſſim; nec tam parcus, ut graver amiculo aureos aliquot impartiri; ſed hæc benignitas quantulum haberet momenti ad tuam egeſtatem ſublevandam? Res mihi ſanè mediocris eſt, minimumque ſupereſt meis neceſſitatibus: multum impendii requirit hoc corpuſculum .... jam bona pars mihi deciditur in famulos, &c. ..... Verùm poſtquam, mi Vulturi, induxiſti in animum Evangelicam vitam profiteri, miror paupertatem eſſe moleſtam, quum beatus Hilarion, ubi non inveniret quod pro naulo ſolveret, gloriandum duxerit, quòd inſciens ad tantam Evangelii perfectionem perveniſſet. Gloriatur & Paulus, quod ſciat abundare, & penuriam pati, quòd nihil habens omnia poſſideat. Idem collaudat Hebræos quoſdam Evangelium amplexos, quòd rapinam bonorum ſuorum cum gaudio ſuſcepiſſent .... Adde ſi Judæi non patiuntur inter ipſos eſſe pauperes, quanto magis convenit ut qui jactant Evangelium, fratrum inopiam mutua benignitate ſublevent: præſertim cum Evangelica frugalitas minimo ſit contenta. Si panis cibarius adſit & aqua, non deſiderant Attica bellaria qui ſpiritu vivunt. Neſciunt luxum, jejunio paſcuntur. Ipſi Apoſtoli confrictis manu ariſtis famem ſedâſſe leguntur. ..... Fortaſſis hic tibi videbor cavillis ludere, at aliis non idem videtur (17). —— As to what you hint, that poverty is become burthenſome to you, I am not ſo poor, that I cannot, nor ſo ſtingy, that I grudge to beſtow a few pieces on my dear friend: but what will this bounty avail towards relieving your wants? My circumſtances are but narrow, and I can ſpare but very little from my neceſſities: I am at no ſmall expence in maintaining this body of mine .... Then a good part goes in ſervants wages, &c. ... But, my dear Vulturius, ſince you have reſolved to profeſs an evangelical life, I wonder you ſhould complain of poverty, when St Hilarion, not being able to pay the hire of a boat, valued himſelf upon arriving unexpectedly to ſo much goſpel perfection. St Paul likewiſe boaſts, that he knew how to abound and how to want, and that, having nothing, he poſſeſſed all things. The ſame apoſtle commends certain Hebrews, who had embraced the goſpel, that they took the ſpoiling of their goods with joy .... Add, that if the Jews ſuffer no poor among them how much more is it the duty of thoſe, who profeſs the goſpel, mutually

(c) Taken from Paul Freherus's Theatrum, pag. 114, where the manuſcripts of the univerſity of Marpurg are quoted.

(d) See remark [B].

(12) It is the 47th of the 31ſt book, dated Novemb. 4, 1529.

(13) Eraſ. Epiſt. xlvii, lib. xxxi.

(14) Id. Epiſt. ultima Libri ultimi, pag. 2137, dated Auguſt 1, 1530.

(15) The following words teſtify ſufficiently that he ſpeaks of Geldenhaur, which is confirmed by this paſſage out of the 52d letter of the 30th book: Quidam G. N. è Brabantia profugus & ex amiciſſimo ſubito factus capitalis hoſtis novam tragœdiam movit Argentorati, nebulo ſeditioni natus. Is eſt ficto nomine Vulturius. He ſpeaks again of him in the 56th letter of the ſame book: Jam & Evangelici quidam, quorum magiſter ſceleroſus ille Gelrius, miris technis hoc agunt, ut Cæſaris ac Ferdinandi animum in me irritent.

(16) Id. Epiſt. lxvi, lib xxx, pag. 1941, dated the fourteenth of December, 1531.

(17) Id. Epiſt. xlvii, lib. xxxi, pag. 2049, 2050.

the care Eraſmus took to deny, that he condemned the puniſhment of heretics [F]. Mr Moreri has committed ſome conſiderable faults [G]. Paul Freherus has not been ſo to relieve the wants of their brethren; eſpecially ſince the goſpel-frugality is content with a little. Thoſe, who live by the ſpirit, if they have bread and water, want not delicacies. They are ſtrangers to luxury; they feed on faſting. We read, that the apoſtles themſelves ſatisfied their hunger with ears of corn rubbed in their hands . . . . . Perhaps you may take all this for jeſt; but others will think I am in earneſt.'

[F] A reproach, which deſerves no leſs to be taken notice of, than the care Eraſmus took, to deny, that he condemned the puniſhment of heretics.] Eraſmus's diſpute with Geldenhaur has made me take notice of two things with ſome ſurprize.

The firſt is, that, according to Eraſmus, the exhorting princes, and men in power, to take away from the monks the great eſtates they poſſeſſed, and not to reſiſt the goſpel, was ſeditious and ſcandalous: 'Niſi forte non videtur ſeditioſum hortari Principes, ut facultates ſacerdotibus ac Monachis adimant, & in bonos veſtri ſimiles conferant: aut non offenduntur illorum animi, quum audiunt, Noli occidere innocentes, Noli tuo periculo recalcitrare Evangelio, Sine verbum Dei in tua ditione prædicari. Hæc quid aliud ſunt quàm atrociſſima convitia nondum perſuaſis, imò in diverſum perſuaſis. Quos tu vocas innocentes, illi habent pro ſeditioſis & hæreticis; & quod tu vocas Evangelium, illis perſuaſum eſt eſſe doctrinam Satanæ. Priùs igitur erat illis perſuadendum: Quod ſi non potes, aliis rationibus tractandus erat illorum animus (18). —— Unleſs, perhaps, you do not think it ſeditious to exhort princes to rob the prieſts and monks of their goods, and beſtow them on good men like yourſelves; or that their minds are not offended, when they hear, Kill not the innocent; ſpurn not at the goſpel to your own peril; ſuffer the word of God to be preached in your juriſdiction. What are theſe but the keeneſt reproaches on thoſe, who are not yet brought over, nay are perſuaded of the contrary? Thoſe, whom you call innocent, they conſider as ſeditious and heretical; and what you call the goſpel, they are perſuaded is the doctrine of ſatan. The firſt ſtep therefore ſhould have been to convince ſuch perſons themſelves: if you failed of this, they ſhould have been treated after another manner.' It is what he repreſents to Geldenhaur, who had publiſhed ſome letters addreſſed to princes, and written in that ſtrain, which is cenſured in this place. This diſcourſe of Eraſmus is a true Janus, with a double face; for it is reaſonable in ſome reſpects, but it appears unjuſt, when one views it another way. Thoſe, who believe, that it is neceſſary to convert the world to a new doctrine, and to deſtroy reigning errors, muſt needs deſire to be heard, and beg to have no violence offerred them: and therefore they are unreaſonable to demand, that thoſe of another opinion be perſecuted, diſpoſſeſſed of their goods, and hindered from ſpeaking and appearing in public. It ſeems therefore, that Geldenhaur went too faſt, in asking, that the eſtates of the monks ſhould be taken from them; and that Eraſmus had reaſon to tax him with raſhneſs. We muſt ſuffer that to be granted to others, which we ask for ourſelves; for every one pretends to maintain truth. To ſay to princes, who perſecute us, that they oppreſs the kingdom of God, is certainly very abuſive: It ſeems therefore, it would be better to ſoften one's ſtile, and not to ſuppoſe ſo poſitively the very thing, which is in queſtion. We ſhould, in the firſt place, make people reliſh our maxims and proofs; and if we could compaſs that, we might afterwards qualify our opinions, and thoſe of our adverſaries. Thus far Eraſmus's obſervations appear very judicious: But when we conſider on the other hand, that, unleſs we repreſent to the world, that they are undone without recovery, unleſs they reform, unleſs they ceaſe to make war ~~againſt~~ againſt God by oppoſing the reformers, we make no great progreſs, nor ſufficiently excite the attention of the public; when, I ſay, we conſider this, we find, that Eraſmus acted too much the philoſopher, and was ignorant of the ſmall efficacy of reaſon, when weakly aſſiſted by the paſſions. However it be, it does not ſeem very poſſible, that great revolutions in religion may be accompliſhed, unleſs people ask at firſt for themſelves a toleration, which they are ready to refuſe to their neighbours as ſoon as they ſhall be able to force them. Non aliter hæc ſacra conſtant.

Reflexion on puniſhment of heretics.

The ſecond thing I was ſurprized at, is to ſee, that Eraſmus looked upon it as a black and odious calumny, to impute to him, that he had taught, that heretics ought not to be put to death. He confeſſes, indeed, that he has exhorted princes not to hearken raſhly to the complaints of all ſorts of divines and monks (19), and to diſtinguiſh errors; but he denies he ever maintained that heretics ought not to be puniſhed with death, and complains (20), that thoſe, who accuſe him of that falſe doctrine, expoſe him to the reſentment of princes, as if he had deſigned to take from them the ſword, which God has put into their hands (21). 'Hoc atrocius eſt, quòd nuſquam id doceo, non eſſe ſumendum capitis ſupplicium de hæreticis, nec uſquam adimo gladii jus Principibus, quod illis non ademit Chriſtus nec apoſtoli . . . . (22) ut peccant qui ob quemvis errorem pertrahunt homines ad ignem: ita peccant qui in nullos hæreticos arbitrantur prophano magiſtratui jus eſſe occidendi . . . . nec ulla res erat quæ poterat illos magis alienare, quàm ſi illis gladium excutiam è manibus, eaſque ſectas defendam, quas illi velut execrabiles radicitùs evulſas cupiunt, & facerent, niſi rerum motus aliò vocaret illorum animos. ——— This is the more flagrant, in that I no where teach, that heretics are not to be put to death, nor do I any where deprive princes of the right of the ſword, which neither CHRIST nor his apoſtles have taken from them . . . . . As they are to blame, who drag men to the flames for every kind of error, they are no leſs, who think the civil magiſtrate has no power to put any ſort of heretics to death . . . . nor could any thing more incenſe them againſt me, than to ſtrike the ſword out of their hands, and to defend thoſe ſects, which they wiſh to extirpate as execrable, and would do it, did not the unſettled ſtate of affairs call off their attention to other things.' I wonder, that Eraſmus, who was ſo well read in the fathers, did not know, that, during the three firſt centuries, they did loudly maintain the poſition, from which he is ſo ſollicitous to purge himſelf. They did not pretend, by that, to take from princes the power of the ſword, which they hold from God; but meant only, that that power does not reach the errors of one's conſcience, and that ſovereigns have no commiſſion from God to perſecute religions. This is the true ſtate of the queſtion. All princes in the world own, that they have not the power of the ſword againſt the true ſervants of God, or againſt orthodoxy, but only againſt the enemies of truth. It is upon this foundation that the heathen emperors puniſhed the ancient chriſtians, and that now-a-days the inquiſition puts Proteſtants to death. It is therefore altogether needleſs to prove to perſecutors, that they ought not to put the faithful to death; for it is what they do not pretend to, and they are not ſuch fools as to believe, that, by being deprived of that power, they loſe any thing of their own. The only queſtion therefore is to know, whether they may puniſh thoſe who ſerve God according to the dictates of their conſciences? The fathers of the three firſt centuries have denied it: why then did not Eraſmus dare to imitate them? And, what is ſtill more ſurprizing (23), what is the reaſon that, within theſe few years, a miniſter of Holland has endeavoured to render thoſe that are for toleration odious, becauſe they rob ſovereigns of one of their greateſt prerogatives (24)? Does not this argue more malice and injuſtice than the heathens ſhewed againſt the fathers of the primitive church, whom they did not charge with that pretended attempt againſt the ſtate? But, to ſhew the illuſion of that miniſter, it is ſufficient to ask him, why he takes from Catholic princes the power of the ſword, with relation to Proteſtants? Why does he think that to be lawful in himſelf, which he condemns in others as high-treaſon? I ſpeak in behalf of truth, will he anſwer: But it is what every body pretends to.

[G] Mr Moreri has committed ſome conſiderable faults.] I. He ſhould not have given to Philip of Burgundy the title of archbiſhop of Utrecht, but that of biſhop; for Utrecht was not yet an archbiſhopric.

II. Marpurg

---

(18) Idem Epiſt. in Pſeudevangelicos, pag. 2051. See alſo Epiſt. LIX. lib xxxi, pag. 2107.

(19) Tantum admoneo locis aliquot, ne ſit hîc præceps Principum ſeveritas, nec facile præbeant aures quorumlibet Theologorum aut Monachorum delationibus. Eraſm. Epiſt. xlvii, lib. xxxi, p. 2051.

(20) Ut lector parum exiſtimaret meam eſſe ſententiam, non eſſe fas in quenquam hæreticum pœna capitis animadvertere: eaque res Cæſarem Ferdinandum, alioſque Principes, atque etiam Romanum Pontificem in meum caput irritaret. Id. ibid.

(21) Id ibid.

(22) Ibid. pag. 2052.

(23) We muſt ſuppoſe, that in Eraſmus's time they did not know as people have known ſince, the force of the proofs againſt perſecution.

(24) See the Tableau du Socinianiſme, Lett. viii.

ſo exact as he ſhould have been [H]. I ſhall ſet down the title of ſome works of Geldenhaur [I]. He underſtood well poetry and oratory (e).

The emperor Maximilian judged him worthy of the bays, in the year 1517. This was after he had read with attention about twenty Latin verſes made in his praiſe by Geldenhaur (f). Note, that this writer ſuppreſſed a truth in one of his hiſtories [K]. The conditions, on which he was made hiſtoriographer, may ſometimes be an occaſion of lying [L].

There is, in the theatrum of Freherus a ſmall contradiction, which I muſt not paſs in ſilence. I have obſerved, that we find there, that Geldenhaur was not called to Marpurg till the year 1534; but I have not ſaid, that we find there, in another place, that he taught at Marpurg from the year 1526 [M].

II. Marpurg is not the firſt town of Germany, wherein Geldenhaur taught. III. He never taught at Wittemberg. IV. Nor was he murdered by robbers in 1542. Valerius Andreas has furniſhed Mr Moreri with half of theſe falſities. Theſe are his words: ‘ Turpi ‘ Apoſtaſia à Catholicis Belgis ad Germanos Marpurgenſes transfugit: ubi poſtquam annos aliquot hiſtoriam explanaſſet, dum Wittembergam verſus iter inſtituit à latronibus fiſſo ſecuri capite miſere periit, An. ſalutis CIϽ. IϽ. XLII. die X. Januarii, ut refert Reinhardus Lorichius Hadamarius, ſcholiis ad Aphthonii Progymnaſmata. ——— By a ſcandalous apoſtacy, he went over from the Catholics of Holland to the Germans at Marpurg; where after he had explained hiſtory for ſome years, as he was journying towards Wittemberg, he died miſerably by the hands of robbers, his head being ſplit with an ax, on the tenth of January 1542; as we learn from Reinhardus Lorichius Hadamarius, in his comment on the Progymnaſmata of Aphthonius.’ There are ſeveral faults in theſe words: 1. Geldenhaur did not retire to Marpurg, when he abjured the Romiſh religion; for he did not go thither ’till after he had reſided at Worms, Strasburg, and Augsburg; ſee nevertheleſs the remark [M]. 2. He did not take a journey to Wittemberg, after he had taught hiſtory for ſome years at Marpurg; for he went upon that journey in the year 1526, whilſt he was yet a Roman Catholic, and in the ſervice of Maximilian of Burgundy. 3. He did did not die of the wounds he received from aſſaſſins, but of the plague, ſixteen years after he had been ſet upon. 4. The author, whom Valerius Andreas quotes, ſays expreſsly, that Geldenhaur recovered of his wounds. If the words he has made uſe of (25) had been known, theſe falſities had been avoided; which ſhews how much it imports to conſult the authors one has a mind to quote. Swertius (26) relates only this falſity, that Geldenhaur, going from Marpurg to Wittemberg, was killed by highwaymen, the tenth of January 1542.

[H] Freherus has not been ſo exact as he ſhould have been.] He ought not to have ſaid, that Geldenhaur retired from the imperial court, relicta imperatoria aula, and betook himſelf to the ſervice of Philip of Burgundy, in the year 1512; for the court of Charles of Auſtria, which he left, was not yet an imperial court. It is a groſs error in reckoning, to ſay, that a man, who goes to Marpurg in the year 1534, and dies there the tenth of January 1542, taught there hiſtory two years, and afterwards divinity nine years. Hiſtoriam primùm biennium, ac poſtmodum novennium ſacras literas . . . . . interpretatus eſt. This would be falſe, though we ſhould ſuppoſe, that he began to teach divinity the firſt year.

[I] I ſhall ſet down the titles of ſome works of Geldenhaur.] I take them from Valerius Andreas. Hiſtoria Batavica cum Appendice de vetuſta Batavorum nobilitate, Strasburg, 1533. But Voſſius mentions an edition of the year 1520 (27). De Batavorum Inſula. Germaniæ inferioris Hiſtoriæ, Strasburg, 1532. Vita Philippi à Burgundia Epiſcopi Ultrajectini. See the following remark. Catalogus Epiſcoporum Ultrajectinorum. Epiſtola ad Guilielmum Geldriæ principem gratulatoria de principatuum ſuorum adeptione. Epiſtola de Zelandia. Satiræ octo, printed at Louvain, 1515 (28).

[K] He ſuppreſſed a truth in one of his hiſtories.] This he did in the hiſtory of Philip of Burgundy, natural ſon of duke Philip the good. He did not forget to relate, that that baſtard was ſo handſome in his youth, and ſo capable to fire a woman’s heart, that ſome of that ſex were ſo luſtful and ſhameleſs as to run after him: but, inſtead of adding, that ſome of them found him ſo kind, as to have had three baſtards by him; he repreſents him as endowed with a maiden modeſty, which was like to coſt him his life. ‘ Moribus ‘ & converſatione ita compoſitus ut magis Parthenius quam Philippus adpellari potuiſſet. Quare non tam amabat quam amabatur, laſciviores enim quædam matronæ in tantum eum, ſepoſita omni verecundia, deperibant ut harum cauſa fere in vitæ periculum incidiſſet, niſi is qui ei mortem intentaturus putabatur, occiſus fuiſſet (29). ——— He was of ſo modeſt a behaviour, that he deſerved the name of Parthenius, rather than that of Philip. Wherefore he was not ſo much a lover, as an object of love; for ſome luſtful matrons, laying aſide all modeſty, were ſo fond of him, that upon their account he ran a risk of his life, had not the perſon, who threatened him with death, been killed.’ Here follows the note Mr Matthæus makes thereupon: ‘ Nec exemplo deſtitutus, præſertim patris Philippi, ſuſcepit ſpurios non paucos. Tres etiam ex una Philippum, Joannem, & Oliverium, ut obſervavi ex adverſariis Gisberti Lappii à Waveren (30). —— After the example of his father Philip, he had ſeveral baſtards; three by one woman, Philip, John, and Oliver, as I have learned from the Adverſaria of Gisbert Lappius à Waveren.’ Let us learn from hence not to truſt hiſtories, written by domeſtics, that have received great favours. They ſuppreſs what is injurious to the memory of their maſters. Let us confeſs nevertheleſs, that Geldenhaur does not pretend, that the chaſtity of his Philip was of long continuance; for he owns, that that biſhop of Utrecht loved the fair ſex; and that he treated with greater rigour drunken prieſts, than thoſe that were laſcivious (31). Note, that he was openly a Proteſtant, when he publiſhed that hiſtory (32), and that is altogether heretical, if we believe Valerius Andreas (33). Note alſo, that Suffridus Petri, who has taken from it the life of Philip of Burgundy, which he has inſerted in his appendix of Beka, has left out all that was not favourable to the church of Rome. Mr Matthæus (34) makes this obſervation in the notes he has added to the new edition of that little book of Geldenhaur, inſerted in his Veteris ævi Analecta (35).

[L] The conditions on which he was made hiſtoriographer, may ſometimes be an occaſion of lying.] Philip of Burgundy charged Geldenhaur to make a collection of all the memorable things, that ſhould happen, either in the dioceſe of Utrecht, or in the neighbouring countries, and to read both to him, and his counſellors, his collections every month. Geldenhaur obeyed that order, and was warned to alter every thing that was amiſs in his narrative; which caution reached not only falſities, but alſo indiſcretions: that is, if he happened to mention any thing in ſuch a manner as did not ſeem diſcreet to the prince’s council, he was ordered to change it. Now how many truths are comprehended in that claſs of things? it muſt be owned indeed, that an hiſtorian may rectify a great many paſſages, when ſtateſmen take the trouble to examine his writings; but, at the ſame time, there are ſome paſſages, whoſe publication they blame, only becauſe they are true. ‘ Voluit ille (Philippus Burgundus) per me notari ſi quid in ſua ditione aut in finitimis regionibus memoratu dignum actum eſſet, ſed ea conditione ut ſingulis menſibus quæ annotaram, ipſi & à conſiliis prælegerem: quod cum facerem, admonebant ſi quid perperam, ſi quid parum conſiderate ſcriptum audiſſent, id mutarem. (36).’

[M] Freherus ſays, that he taught at Marpurg from the year 1526.] Freherus relates (37), that the univerſity of Marpurg was opened the firſt of July 1526, when profeſſor Johannes Ferrarius Montanus was made the firſt rector, and aſſociated among other colleagues

(e) Celebris Poëta, celebrior Orator, celeberrimus Theologus (Lovanii) ſalutatus. Reinh. Lorichius, Scholiis in Aphthon. pag. m. 302.

(f) Geldenhaur, in Vita Philippi à Burgundia, circa fin. You will find that little poem there.

(25) Quænam verba Gerhardus Noviomagus ex lipothymia ad ſeſe rediens, olim potuiſſet dicere, cujus Witebergam profecturi caput latrones ſecuri diffiderant, ipſum apud Brunonis vicum humi ſtratum ſpoliaverant, & fugitivi mortuum credentes in ſylva reliquerant. R Lorich. Scholiis in Aphthon. pag. m. 300.

(26) Athen. Belg. pag. 279.

(27) Voſſius, de Hiſt. Lat. p. 654.

(28) Taken from Val. Andreas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 273, 274.

(29) Geldenhaur, in Philippo Burgundo, pag. m. 220. I make uſe of Matthæus’s edition.

(30) Antonius Matthæus veteris ævi Analect. pag. 243, 244.

(31) Ebrioſos præſertim qui cereviſia ſe ingurgitare ſolent, deteſtabatur, ſcortationibus minus infeſtus. Ipſe enim in Venerem propenſior inque adoleſcentularum amoribus ardentior erat. Geldenh. in Philippo Burgundo, pag. 230.

(32) At Straſburg, 1529.

(33) Libellus hic totus hæreticus eſt. Val Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 273.

(34) Matthæus, ubi ſupra, pag. 247.

(35) Printed at Leyden in 1697, tho’ the title bears 1698.

(36) Geldenhaur, in Præfat. Opuſc. illuſtratæ Germaniæ, apud Voſſium de Hiſt. Lat pag. 654.

(37) Freher. in Theatro, p. 104.

colleagues with Francis Lambert and Gerardus Noviomagus. This Francis Lambert died in the year 1530, as I have ſaid in his article. This circumſtance alone would ſuffice to ſhew the contradiction of Freherus; for Geldenhaur could not be profeſſor at Marpurg at the ſame time with Lambert, if he begun only to be ſo in the year 1534. But on what narrative of Freherus can we depend? I believe we ought to ſay that Geldenhaur was profeſſor at Marpurg in the year 1529, that he quitted his poſt to go to Worms, that he went afterwards to Strasburg, and next to Augsburg, and that laſtly, through this profeſſorial inconſtancy, of which I have ſpoken elſewhere (38), he returned to Marpurg in the year 1534. On this footing, my firſt critical note (39) againſt Valerius Andreas Deſſelius is not good; but who would not have thought it ſo, ſince I founded it on a writer (40), who has cited the manuſcript regiſter of the univerſity of Marpurg? he has cited them likewiſe, where he ſays, that Geldenhaur was profeſſor at Marpurg in the year 1526. Is this to know how to make uſe of a book? note, that Melchior Adam knew nothing of this firſt profeſſorſhip of Geldenhaur.

(38) In remark [G] of the article ALCIATUS (Andrew).

(39) See the remark [G].

(40) i. e. Paul Freherus.

GELENIUS (Sigismund), born of a very good family at Prague [A], was one of the learned men of the XVIth century. He began very early to travel in Germany, France, and Italy, and learned eaſily the languages of thoſe three countries. He confirmed himſelf, in Italy, in the knowledge of the Latin tongue, and learned Greek there under Marc Muſurus. As he returned to Germany, he paſſed through Baſil, and made himſelf known to Eraſmus, who conceived an eſteem for him, and adviſed John Frobenius to make him corrector of his printing-houſe. Gelenius accepted the place, as troubleſome and painful as it was; for he had many Hebrew, Greek, and Latin books to correct, which Frobenius printed. He diſcharged well that employment till his death, that is, during thirty years; and did not content himſelf with correcting the work of the Printers, but ſet up for a tranſlator and a critic. Few learned men have tranſlated ſo many works out of Greek into Latin as he [B]. He was a tall, bulky man. He had a good memory, a ready and ſubtle wit; was very ſeldom

[A] He was of a very good family.] Let us ſee what Curio ſays about it: ‘ Gelenia familia antiqua ‘ & honeſta, à cervis nomen traxit, quos ipſi Gelenos ‘ vocant, ita ut Latina lingua cervina dici poſſit. Patrem habuit ſummo apud regem loco & honore, ‘ hominem minimè illiteratum, nam & Moriam Eraſmi in patriam linguam convertit, & lepidum ſalſumque opus cum ſuis communicavit. Matre ejus fœmina primaria & nobili, propter mulieris prudentiam ‘ & probatos mores, regina plurimum & familiariter ‘ utebatur. Talibus parentibus ortus Gelenius, parem ‘ quoque, hoc eſt, ingenuam & liberalem habuit educationem (1). —— The Gelenian family, an ancient ‘ and honourable one, took it's name from Stags (Cervi) ‘ which they call Geleni; ſo that in Latin it may be ‘ called Cervina. His father had a poſt of great honour under the king, a man by no means illiterate, ‘ for he tranſlated Eraſmus's Praiſe of Folly into his ‘ native tongue, and communicated that witty and ſatirical work to his countrymen. His mother, a ‘ lady of high birth, was in great favour with the ‘ queen, on account of her prudent conduct. Gelenius, ‘ ſprung from ſuch parents, had an education anſwerable ‘ to his birth, that is, an ingenuous and liberal ‘ one.’

[B] Few learned men have tranſlated ſo many works out of Greek into Latin as he.] After having publiſhed a dictionary in four languages (2), he made notes upon Pliny and Livy, and publiſhed them. He tranſlated the Jewiſh antiquities of Joſephus, and corrected the other works of that author, by collating together ſeveral manuſcripts. Afterwards he turned into Latin ſome homilies of St Chryſoſtom, and then the Roman hiſtory of Dionyſius Halicarnaſſeus; the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of Evagrius; Origen's work againſt Celſus; the works of Philo, and thoſe of Appian. After that he undertook the tranſlation of the works of Juſtin Martyr, and had tranſlated moſt of them when he died. This is what I find in the preface of Curio before Appian. I do not find there any mention of what Gelenius had done upon Ammianus Marcellinus, a work, which Henry Valeſius has much commended; theſe are his words (3): ‘ Erat quidem ‘ in utroque horum virorum (4) magna doctrina, ut ‘ ſcripta utriuſque teſtantur. Sed in Gelenio major ‘ quædam ingenii vis, & judicium acrius fuit. Quod ‘ cùm multi præclari labores illius viri teſtantur, tum ‘ maximè interpretationes Latinæ Dionyſii Halicarnaſſenſis, Appiani, Philonis item ac Joſephi, Origenis ‘ & aliorum. Ex quibus apparet eum excellenti ‘ ingenio & ſingulari doctrina præditum fuiſſe. Sed ‘ & Ammiani Marcellini hiſtoriæ ab eo editæ id ipſum abunde teſtantur. In quibus plurima acutè & ‘ ingenioſe emendavit; & inſignem paginarum tranſpoſitionem, quæ in Mſſ. omnibus codicibus reperitur, & in Editione exſtat Accurſii, mira dexteritate ‘ reſtituit. Quamobrem ejus viri nomini libenter hoc ‘ laudis teſtimonium impertimus, neminem adhuc extitiſſe, qui de hiſtoria Marcellini melius meritus ſit. ‘ —— Both theſe men were very learned, as appears ‘ from their writings. But Gelenius had a greater ‘ force of genius, and a more diſcerning judgment. This ‘ appears from many labours of that great man, but ‘ particularly from his Latin verſions of Dionyſius ‘ Halicarnaſſenſis, Appian, Philo, Joſephus, Origen, ‘ and others. All theſe diſcover his uncommon abilities and learning. As does likewiſe his edition of ‘ Ammianus Marcellinus; in whom he has made ſeveral ingenious emendations, and, with wonderful dexterity, reſtored the remarkable tranſpoſition of pages, ‘ which is to be found in all the manuſcript copies, ‘ and is extant in the edition of Accurſius. Wherefore I willingly give this teſtimony of applauſe to ‘ ſo great a man, that no one has deſerved better of ‘ Marcellinus's hiſtory.’ Eraſmus does not ſpeak ſo well of Gelenius's performance upon Pliny; for, on the contrary, he gives a very ill character of it: ‘ Sigiſmundus Gelenius tuo nomini (5) dicavit Annotationes in Plinium jam tertiò ab ipſo caſtigatum. Sed ‘ mire impoſuit illi codex manu deſcriptus, in quo ‘ ſciolus aliquis è ſuo capite mutavit quicquid libuit, ‘ & quodam modo novum Plinium nobis dedit. Admonui, nè fideret illi exemplari, ſed auditus non ſum. ‘ Hermolaus non auſus eſt mutare lectionem Plinianam. ‘ Gelenius ſe putavit rem mirificam præſtitiſſe, ego ‘ cenſeo crimen eſſe inexpiabile (6). —— Sigiſmund ‘ Gelenius inſcribed to you his notes upon Pliny, now ‘ a third time corrected by him. But he was ſtrangely impoſed upon by a manuſcript copy, in which ſome ‘ ſmatterer had made what alterations he thought proper, and given us as it were a new Pliny. I adviſed him not to truſt to that copy, but he had no ‘ regard to my advice. Hermolaus would not venture ‘ to alter the text of Pliny. Gelenius thought he had ‘ done a wonderful thing; but I think it an unpardonable crime.’ Here follows Mr Huet's judgment (7): ‘ In iis quoque numeratur Sigiſmundus Gelenius ‘ Bohemus, quo vix quiſquam pluribus hanc artem ‘ monumentis ditavit: diſertus imprimis habitus eſt ‘ & elegans; audax in conſtringendis pluribus in unum ‘ periodis, vel disjungendis, ſenſus ſibi non ſemper intellectos ad libitum recoquit. —— Among theſe likewiſe is reckoned Sigiſmund Gelenius, a Bohemian, ‘ than whom no one has left more monuments of his ‘ skill in this ſcience; he is eſteemed particularly eloquent and beautiful; bold in connecting ſeveral periods ‘ into one, or in diſuniting them, he makes alterations, ‘ where the ſenſe is not clear to him.’

(1) Cælius Secundus Curio, Præfat. in Appianum Alexandrin.

(2) Linguarum quatuor Symphonum Lexicum, Græcis videlicet, Latinis, Germanicis & Dalmaticis vocibus ordine diſpoſitis concinnavit. Id. ibid.

(3) Henricus Valeſius, in Præfat. Amm. Marcellini.

(4) That is, Mariangelus Accurſius, and Sigiſmundus Gelenius.

(5) That is, to Damian de Goes.

(6) Eraſm. Epiſt. lxix. lib xxx, pag. 1957. It is dated the 21ſt of May, 1535.

(7) Huetius, de claris Interpret. pag. m. 225.

ſeldom in a paſſion [C]; and cared neither for honours, nor riches [D]. He preferred, before the employments that were offered him elſewhere, the peaceful place he had at Baſil (a), where he died [E] like a good chriſtian, being fifty ſeven years old. He married in that city, and left behind him two ſons and one daughter (b), of whoſe deſtiny I am ignorant. Some place his death in the year 1554 (c), others in the year 1555 (d). His edition of Arnobius has been much cenſured [F].

(a) See the remark [D].

(b) Taken out of the preface, which Cælius Secundus Curio has put before the tranſlation of Appian.

(c) Thuanus, Bucholcerus.

(d) Pantaleon apud Bucholcer. Ind. Chron.

[C] He was very ſeldom in a paſſion.] Curio expreſſes this in theſe words (8): ‘Erat in eo animi lenitas mira, naturæque bonitas quædam, ut vix iraſci poſſet etiam irritatus . . . . cum nemine unquam ſimultatem geſſit: rerum alienarum minimè curioſus, minime ſuſpicax: ſed antiqua non tamen ſtulta ſimplicitate præditus. ——— He had a wonderful mildneſs of temper, and a certain good-nature, which ſcarce ſuffered him to be angry, even tho' provoked . . . he had no reſentment to any one; was by no means inquiſitive into other mens affairs, nor at all ſuſpicious; but endued with an ancient, but not weak, ſimplicity of manners.’ This is the true character of a good man; which will appear yet more by the following remark.

(8) Curio, ubi ſupra.

[D] He cared neither for honours, nor riches.] I uſe Curio's words (9): ‘Quanta vero continentia atque abſtinentia fuerit, quarum illa in iis quæ abſunt non expetendis, altera in iis quæ adſunt, in noſtraque poteſtate ſunt, abſtinendo, illa declarant, quòd cùm per tot annos tantopere in re literaria elaboravit, ex quo magnorum virorum gratiam eſt conſecutus, nullas tamen divitias congeſſit, nullas reliquit, ſuppellectile domeſtica, victuque contentus. Bonis & doctis, ſi quos egere animadvertebat, largiebatur: felicibus & fortunatis non invidebat: calamitatibus aliorum afficiebatur: neminem contemnebat. Illud verò maximum continentiæ ſignum fuit: quod in Regis Bohemiæ aulam magnis præmiis, & honoribus, quibuſque vel cupidus & ambitioſus aliquis contentus eſſe poteſt, allectus renuit, hanc quietam & moderatam vitam ambitioſis illis & turbulentis dignitatibus anteponens. Omitto provincias bonas & literas & artes profitendi oblatas, quas nunquam ut ſuſciperet adduci potuit, adeò tenax propoſiti, vitæque generis ſemel honeſtè ſuſcepti, ſemper fuit. ——— How great his continence and abſtinence were, the former of which virtues conſiſts in not deſiring what we have not, the latter in abſtaining from what is in our power, appears in this, that, notwithſtanding his many years learned labours, during which he acquired the friendſhip of great men, he heaped up no riches, nor left any behind him, being ſatisfied with his private fortunes. He was bountiful to good and learned men, whom he obſerved to be in want: he envied not the happy and ſucceſsful: he ſympathized with the calamities of others; he deſpiſed no body. But the greateſt inſtance of his continence, was, his refuſing the great rewards and honours, ſuch as were ſufficient to ſatisfy avarice and ambition, by which he was invited to the court of Bohemia, preferring this quiet and humble life to ambitious and turbulent dignities. I omit the profeſſorſhips he refuſed, ſo tenacious was he of his purpoſe, and the kind of life he had once made choice of.’ Though Eraſmus thought Gelenius worthy of a better fortune, yet he durſt not wiſh him riches; being apprehenſive leſt plenty ſhould cool that zeal, with which he ſaw him labour for the good of the commonwealth of learning (10). Gelenius, according to Thuanus, ſtruggled with poverty all his life-time (11).

(9) Id. ibid.

[E] He died at Baſil.] Mr Moreri has here made a notorious tranſpoſition. Sigiſmund de Ghelen, (thus he makes Thuanus ſpeak) a native of Baſil, died in Bohemia. Thuanus had ſaid, that he was born in Bohemia, and died at Baſil (12). Mr Moreri is in the wrong to ſay, that Gelenius has tranſlated ſome homilies of Origen; he ſhould have ſaid, of St Chryſoſtom. Mr Teiſſier is to blame not to mention it: he has been led into an error by thoſe that have abridged Geſner (13). He has alſo corrected ſeveral homilies of St Chryſoſtom: theſe are Mr Teiſſier's words (14), which import as if he had tranſlated none: but if you do but look into father Labbe (15), you will find there ſeveral homilies of St Chryſoſtom turned into Latin by Gelenius.

FAULTS of Mr Moreri.

[F] His edition of Arnobius has been much cenſured.] Here is what Barthius ſays of it (16): ‘Ingenioſiſſimus ſed audaciſſimus, & nil prorſus ſibi negans, Arnobii corrector Sigiſmundus Gelenius in eam editionem quam totam ad ſuum captum reformavit, aut transformavit potius, teſtatus neminem ſibi unquam auctorem tantum negotii exhibuiſſe. ——— A moſt ingenious, but moſt bold, man, and who denied himſelf nothing; I mean Sigiſmund Gelenius, the corrector of Arnobius, in that edition of his, which he entirely reformed, or rather transformed to his own genius, aſſuring us, that no author had given him ſo much trouble.’ Add to this paſſage that of the preface to Arnobius, of the Leyden edition, 1651. ‘Arnobium quidem hunc primus Romæ vulgaverat Franciſcus Priſcianenſis Florentius, ſed una cum veteris manuſcripti, quo uſus fuerat, fœdis admodum erroribus. Sigiſmundus poſtea Gelenius editionem hanc corruptam ſolo ingenio, uti potuit, reſtituit. Sed ingenii ille fiducia malo exemplo uſus, conjecturas ſuas textui inſeruit, antiquas lectiones ſuo imperio ejecit, & Arnobium nobis effinxit, qui Arnobii ſpeciem non referret. Hanc audaciam merito reprehendit Canterus. ——— Franciſcus Priſcianenſis, of Florence, firſt publiſhed Arnobius at Rome, but together with the foul errors of the ancient manuſcript he made uſe of. Afterwards Sigiſmund Gelenius reſtored this faulty edition by his own genius, as well as he could. But, depending too much on his own abilities, he inſerted his conjectures in the text, rejected the old readings by his ſole authority, and dreſſed up for us an Arnobius, but very unlike Arnobius. Canterus juſtly cenſures this raſhneſs.’

(10) Gelenius pro ſua doctrina non vulgari, proque morum ſinceritate dignus eſt lautiore fortunâ, divitias vix auſim illi optare. Quid periculi inquis? Ne ſegnior fiat ad provehendam rem literariam. Multos πενια ad induſtriam ſtimulat. Eraſmus, Epiſt. xxxviii, lib. xxvii, pag. 1555.

(11) Cum egeſtate tota vita conflictatus. Thuan. lib. xiii, pag. 271, ad ann. 1554.

(12) In Boëmia natus Baſiliæ deceſſit. Id. ibid.

(13) Chryſoſtomi homilias aliquot cum manuſcriptis Græcis exemplaribus contulit, emendavit, ſupplevit. Epit. Biblioth. Geſner. pag. 753.

(14) Teiſſier, Elog. Tom. I, pag. 90. Sir Thomas-Pope Blount, Cenſura Autorum, pag. 459, is in the ſame error.

(15) De Script. Eccleſ. Tom. I, pag. 531, & ſeq.

(16) Adverſar. lib. xliv, cap. i, apud Blount, ibid. pag. 460.

GENTILIS DE BECHIS, a native of Urbino, and canon of Florence, was preferred to the biſhopric of Arezzo the twenty firſt of October, 1473. The Florentines were very glad of it, and ſent him often upon embaſſies to the courts of princes; particularly to Charles VIII, king of France, to condole with him upon the death of the king his father, and to congratulate his acceſſion to the crown (a). He got a reputation by his eloquence, which he ſhewed in the Latin orations he pronounced in ſeveral places of Italy. He had a ſhare in the education of Leo X. He applied himſelf alſo to poetry. Some critics ſpeak of his productions with contempt, and cannot forgive him the barbarous Latin words that crept into his works, nor bear, that the beſt of his pieces ſhould contain the phraſe præſtare obedientiam. We ſhall ſee the proof all this in a paſſage of Alcyonius [A]. The ſpeech, in which that

(a) Taken out of Ughelli, Tom. I, of the Italia ſacra, pag. 790.

[A] The proof of all this is in a paſſage of Alcyonius.] I take it out of a dialogue, wherein Julius de Medicis, one of the interlocutors, ſpeaks thus to the legate John de Medicis, who was afterwards Pope Leo X. ‘Memini etiam operam te dare Gentili præſuli Aretino homini, ut ſuis temporibus politioris humanitatis laude florentiſſimo. Sed nihil etiam melior ille fuit quam Politianus, id quod cum ex aliis monimentis ejus perſpici poteſt, tum ex orationibus quas in diverſis Italiæ locis complures habuit. In illis enim multa verba ex trivio arrepta viſuntur, multæ quoque elocutiones barbaræ & agreſtes occurrunt, ſententiæ autem multæ pueriles ac imprudentes ſunt. Nonnulli tamen eam in primis orationem honorifica laude proſequuntur, quam habuit apud Alexandrum VI. Pontif. Max. Legatus populi that phraſe is found, is that, which he made to Pope Alexander VI, upon his embaſſy of obedience. Some pretend, that the great deſire he had to harangue upon that occaſion, was one of the reaſons, which obliged Peter de Medicis to hinder the people of Italy from paying that duty to the new Pope all together, and by a ſingle deputation [B]. Gentilis was ſent to Charles VIII (b), at the time of the expedition of Naples, and ſettled the conditions, which the Florentines were to obſerve in that nice ſituation of the affairs of Italy.

Florentini

(b) Ughelli, ubi ſupra.

‘Florentini paulo poſt quam ille ſacris Chriſtianis publice præfectus eſt. Verum hanc quoque non ſatis dignam video quæ iterum legatur; in ea enim minus eleganter expreſſit id quod homini exprimendum erat elegantiſſime, hoc eſt cauſſam cur Romam veniſſet, quæ erat ut per illum populus Florentinus ſe conferret ad auctoritatem Pontificis Maximi. Ille autem in hoc ſenſu reddendo plebeiam elocutionem uſurpavit, quæ eſt obedientiam præſtare, quam ob rem id genus orationes tempus, ut alias multorum oblivione obruet. Feruntur quoque ejuſdem verſiculi faciliore quidem muſa facti, ſed ſine cultu & Latinæ puritatis nitore (1). —— I remember that you ſtudy Gentilis, a Florentine, and a biſhop, a man of polite learning for his times. But he was nothing better than Politian, as appears both from his other remains, and from the orations, which he pronounced in ſeveral parts of Italy; for we find in them many vulgar words, many barbarous and ruſtic phraſes, and many childiſh and weak ſentiments. Some however particularly extol that, which he ſpoke before Pope Alexander VI, a little after his election. But even that, I think, is hardly worthy a ſecond reading; for in that, he has not elegantly enough expreſſed what ought to have been expreſſed with the greateſt elegance, to wit, the reaſon of his coming to Rome, which was to acknowledge, in the name of the people of Florence, the Pope's authority. In expreſſing this, he made uſe of the vulgar phraſe, obedientiam præſtare, for which reaſon theſe kind of orations, as well as many others, will periſh by time. He was more happy in poetry, but without attaining to the elegance and purity of the Latin tongue.’ Theſe words contain a prediction, which time has verified; for the orations of that Gentilis are no more talked of, than if they had never been extant.

[B] The great deſire he had to harangue, at the time of the embaſſy of obedience to Alexander VI, was one of the reaſons why this duty was not paid .... by a ſingle deputation.] Lewis Sforza had cauſed a reſolution to be taken, that the ſtates of Italy ſhould ſend to the Pope only one embaſſy of obedience, ‘wherein the deputies of each prince and republic ſhould be together, march each in his rank, have but one orator, and ſo well concert meaſures, that, if the new Pope had purpoſed to divide them, he might be diſappointed in his hopes .... (2). But Peter de Medicis, who had not dared to oppoſe that reſolution, becauſe he alone was of a contrary opinion, forgot nothing that he thought proper to hinder the execution of it. He had procured himſelf to be named chief of the deputation of the Florentines; his equipage was almoſt all compleated; and, becauſe none in Italy, except the republic of Venice, had more money than he, of which he was very profuſe upon ſuch pompous occaſions, he was ſure of making a greater figure alone, than all the other embaſſadors and deputies together ..... He conceived, that, if his train marched with that of the other embaſſadors, it would be eclipſed by the great number, and that none but critical eyes would diſtinguiſh it amidſt that confuſion: whereas, if he entered Rome, and went to his audience alone, both the good judges, and ſuch as were but indifferently ſuch, would equally do him juſtice. However it had not been impoſſible to work him out of that prepoſſeſſion, if his friends had undertaken to do it. But one of them, that was moſt intimate with him, confirmed him, by another conceit, in his error, inſtead of curing him of it. This was one Scipio Gentile, a Florentine gentleman (3), and biſhop of Arezzo, who had made himſelf very famous by polite literature, and his agreeable converſation. His birth and great eſtate did not make him proud, or leſs tractable; and his too great paſſion for eloquence was almoſt the only fault he had. He was but a mean orator; and yet he had ſo great a conceit of himſelf in that particular, that he would ſcarce yield to the matchleſs Savanarola. He had obtained, by his intereſt, from the republic of Florence, that he ſhould harangue the Pope for them; and had afterwards compoſed his ſpeech with all the application he was capable of. He had communicated it to John Picus Mirandula, Angelus Politianus, Marcellus Ficinus, and other wits of Italy, who, by their approbation, confirmed him in the opinion that it was a maſter-piece; ſo that nothing could vex him more, than being hindered from pronouncing it; which however muſt of neceſſity happen, if there was but one orator for all Italy, becauſe the king of Naples, as the higheſt in degree of all the princes, would have the right to name him. That prince, who had in his capital city the moſt flouriſhing academy in Europe for the Belles Lettres, and of which the famous Sannazar was director, would not chooſe a perſon, that was not of that body to harangue his holineſs. Whereupon Gentile, animated by his own intereſt, ſtirred up Peter de Medicis to that degree, that he made him ſollicit the king of Naples, for reviving the cuſtom, that each particular prince and ſtate of Italy ſhould pay their duty by themſelves to the Pope (4). This ſucceeded: the ceremony of obedience was performed by each prince and republic of Italy in particular, and the two Florentines found their account in it. The equipage of Peter de Medicis out-did all the reſt in magnificence; and the ſpeech of Scipio Gentile was ſo much eſteemed, that it was prefixed to the collection of ſuch ſort of pieces (5).’

This quotation may ſeem too long to ſome; but I do not doubt that ſeveral others will be glad to find here a full account of ſo curious a thing as this is.

(1) Petrus Alcyonius in Medice Legato Poſteriore, circa fin.

(2) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles VIII, lib. ii, pag. 162. Dutch Edit.

(3) Ughelli does not give him that chriſtian name: he only calls him Gentilis de Bechis; and ſays, he was a native of Urbino, and not a gentleman of Florence.

(4) Varill. ubi ſupra, pag. 163.

(5) Id. ibid. pag. 165, 166.

GENTILIS (JOHN VALENTINUS) (a), a native of Coſenza [A] in the kingdom of Naples, left his country for his religion, towards the middle of the XVIth century, and retired to Geneva, where ſeveral Italian families had already formed a congregation. There happened to be among thoſe refugees of Italy ſome wits, who ſubtilized upon the myſtery of the Trinity, on the words Eſſence, Perſon, Co-eſſential &c. George Blandrata, a Phyſician, and John Paul Alciatus, a Milaneze, were the chief of thoſe innovators, with an advocate called Matthew Gribaud. The thing was treated without noiſe, and by private writings. Gentilis would have a ſhare in thoſe diſputes, and contributed not a little to embolden thoſe new Arians. This gave occaſion to the Articles of Faith, which were drawn up in the

(a) See the remark [D] of the article GENTILIS (SCIPIO) towards the end.

[A] He was a native of Coſenza.] Some (1) have ſaid, that he was not born in that town; others (2) make him a Neapolitan. Nicodemo confutes them invincibly, by the teſtimony of ſeveral grave authors, and by the ſubſcription of Valentinus Gentilis; but he is miſtaken, when he fathers upon Theodore Beza the hiſtory of the puniſhment of that heretic. To be entirely in the right, he ſhould have aſcribed that work to Benedictus Aretius, after having cenſured Quattromani, who aſcribed it to Calvin.

[B] This

(1) Sertorio Quattromani, in Epiſtola ad Celſum Mollum, apud Leonardum Nicodemum, addizioni alla Bibliotheca Napoletana, pag. 243.

(2) Lindanus in Dubitantio, Dial. ii, pag. 149, & ex eo Prateolus in Elench. Hæret. pag. 510, apud Nicodemum, ibid. pag. 244.

the Italian conſiſtory, the eighteenth of May 1558 [B]. They contained the moſt pure orthodoxy concerning that myſtery, and exacted a promiſe in expreſs terms, and upon pain of being accounted guilty of perjury, never to do any thing directly, or indirectly, that ſhould oppoſe it. Gentilis ſubſcribed thoſe articles, and yet continued to ſpread his errors clandeſtinely: Whereupon the magiſtrates took cognizance of the thing, and committed him to priſon. He was convicted of having violated his ſubſcription, which he endeavoured to excuſe from the ſuggeſtions of his conſcience. He preſented ſeveral writings, firſt to endeavour to palliate and maintain his opinions, and then to pacify Calvin, and to acknowledge and abjure his errors: In conſideration of which, the magiſtrates of Geneva ſentenced him only to undergo an Amende honorable, to throw his writings into the fire, and to promiſe not to go out of the city without leave. This ſentence was executed the ſecond of September, 1558. He was ſet at liberty a few days after; and, upon his petition, ſhewing his incapacity to give bail, he was excuſed from it; but they made him ſwear not to go out of Geneva without the conſent of the magiſtrates. Neverthelеſs he ſoon fled away, and retired into the country, to Matthew Gribaud [C], his companion in hereſy. He went afterwards to Lyons, and then wandered from place to place in Dauphiné and Savoy; and being ſafe no where, he returned to the village, whither he retired firſt, in the territory of the canton of Bern. He was ſoon known there, and put in priſon; but he was ſet at liberty not many days after, and publiſhed a confeſſion of Faith, attended with ſome proofs and ſome invectives againſt St Athanaſius. He dedicated it to the bailiff, who had committed him, and made him very uneaſy by ſuch a dedication [D]. About the ſame time, he was impriſoned at Lyons for his doctrine; but, having had the cunning to ſhew, that he only oppoſed Calvin, and not the myſtery of the Trinity, he was ſet at liberty. Blandrata and Alciatus, who left no ſtone unturned, in Poland, to plant their hereſies, invited him to come to them, to be their fellow-labourer. They would have done more miſchief than they did, if they had not differed among themſelves, and if the king of Poland had not publiſhed, in 1566, an edict, by which he baniſhed all ſtrangers, who taught their new tenets [E]. Gentilis retired into Moravia, from whence, being gone to Vienna in Auſtria, he reſolved to return into Savoy, where he hoped to find ſtill his friend Gribaud; not to mention, that death had [B] This gave occaſion to the articles of faith which were drawn up in the Italian conſiſtory, the 18*th of May* 1558.] The author (3) of the book I have quoted, and Calvin againſt Gentilis, ſpeak only of the articles of faith of the Italian conſiſtory, and name only five perſons that ſigned them. They ſay, indeed, that Gentilis and five more, refuſing to ſign at firſt, ſigned afterwards, when they were called in private (4); but they do not ſay, that he was one of the ſeven, who choſe rather to leave Geneva, than to ſet their hands to the articles, 'till the powerful ſollicitations of their countrymen had obliged them to return, and ſubſcribe. It is Mr Leti (5), who, without mentioning the articles drawn up by the Italian conſiſtory, mentions others much longer, which, according to him, were propoſed to be ſubſcribed before the council. Theſe articles were only the confeſſion of faith, which Calvin had lately drawn up, and which had been approved by the miniſters, the ſyndics, the council of XXV, and that of CC, and the general aſſembly of the people. He names ſeveral that ſubſcribed them; and, among the reſt, Galeazzo Caracciolo, Celſo Conte Martinengo, Maſſimiliano ſuo fratello Miniſtro della Chieſa. But as to the firſt, the account of his life informs us, that he was abſent from Geneva, from the ſeventh of March to the fourth of October, 1558, in which interval the articles were ſubſcribed, Gentilis impriſoned, &c. As for the two others, the ſame account informs us, that we muſt reduce them to one, that is to the miniſter. Now this Martinengo was dead before the ſubſcribing of the articles was thought of. See the 262d letter of Calvin. Mr. Leti adds, that ſeven perſons refuſed to ſubſcribe, and went out of the city: Che in fatti ſi ritirarono della citta e tra queſti Andrea Oſſellani, Marco Pizzi, e Valentino Gentile: quali vinti poi in breve dalle perſuaſive de loro compatrioti, ſi riduſſero à ſotto ſcrivere (6). What he ſays might be true: but if it be ſo, are not the authors of other accounts much to blame, for having ſuppreſſed things ſo eſſential to this hiſtory? Dr Spon (7) does but partly agree with them: He ſays, that the council cauſed the ſuſpected Italians to ſubſcribe the general confeſſion of the church: he owns that ſome of them left the city, but not that they returned to ſubſcribe; nor does he put Gentilis among thoſe that went out of Geneva. How comes hiſtory to be ſo full of variations? Is it becauſe people delight to falſify the memoirs they copy? Or is it becauſe they do not take notice of the alterations they make in them?

(3) Benedictus Aretius. See concerning his book, citation (b), in the margin of the text of this article.

(4) See Beza, in the Life of Calvin.

(5) Hiſtor. Genevrina, Tom. III, pag. 104.

(6) Ibid. pag. 117.

(7) Hiſt. de Geneve, ad ann. 1558.

[C] He retired into the country, to Matthew Gribaud.] Aretius ſays, that he retired in Pagum Fargiarum; and that that village is in the country of Gex, in præfectura Gajenſi. Which makes me believe, that there is an error in the paſſage of Lubieniecius (8), where it is ſaid, that Matthæus Gribaldus celeberrimus Juriſconſultus Patavinus was pagi Turgiarum dominus. Inſtead of Turgiarum, I would ſay Fargiarum. The country of Gex was then poſſeſſed by the canton of Bern.

(8) Hiſt. Reformat. Polonicæ, pag. 108.

[D] He dedicated to the bailiff of Gex a Confeſſion of Faith, and made him very uneaſy by ſuch a dedication.] That bailiff of Gex had demanded a Confeſſion of Faith of Gentilis, that he might cauſe it to be examined by ſome miniſters, and ſent to Bern: Whereupon Gentilis got it printed, as if by the bailiff's order, and dedicated it to him (9). The Bibliotheque of the Anti Trinitarians (10) ſays, that that bailiff, who had ſet Gentilis at liberty, at the deſire of John Paul Alciatus, became ſuſpected of hereſy at Bern, becauſe that Confeſſion was dedicated to him; and that therefore he ſecured Gentilis as ſoon as he came within his reach: which he did, to remove thoſe ſuſpicions. Whether that be true or no, yet it is moſt certain, nothing more powerfully influences thoſe, who would preſerve or enlarge their dignities, than the deſire not to be accounted heretics. If one ſhould write the hiſtory of all the unjuſt proceedings, and hypocritical tricks, which ſpring from that ſource, how many ſtrange things would be brought to light? Gentilis's Confeſſion, and the pieces annexed to it, were printed at Lyons, though the title page bore Antwerp; and the bookſeller was made to ſpeak, in the preface, under the name of Theophilus ad filios Eccleſiæ. In Gentilis's indictment, his lies were mentioned before his cheats (11). They found about him ſome other works of his own writing, when he was ſeized; but theſe were not printed. Aretius (12), and the Bibliotheque of the Anti-Trinitarians (13), mention them.

(9) Aretius, pag. 9, & 46.

(10) Pag. 27. Vide etiam Hiſtor. Reform. Polon. pag. 107.

(11) Aretius, pag. 46.

(12) Ibid pag. 11, 12.

(13) Pag. 26, 27.

FAULTS of Moreri.

[E] The king of Poland publiſhed, in 1566, an edict of baniſhment againſt all ſtrangers, who taught new doctrines.] Moreri has committed ſome faults in this place: I. He pretends, that Valentinus Gentilis was driven out of Poland towards the year 1562. II. That the edict, then publiſhed by king Sigiſmund Auguſtus, baniſhed all heretics. All which is falſe. The had delivered him from the moſt dreadful adverſary he had in thoſe parts, I mean Calvin. But he brought himſelf into a ſnare; for the bailiff of the canton of Bern, who before impriſoned him, happened to be ſtill in office, and did not fail to lay hands on him the eleventh of June 1566 [F]. The cauſe was carried before the magiſtrates of Bern, where it was under examination from the fifth of Auguſt to the ninth of September. Gentilis, being duly convicted of having obſtinately, and againſt his own oath, oppugned the myſtery of the Trinity, was ſentenced to loſe his head. He gloried in ſuffering for the honour of GOD the Father [G], and taxed his adverſaries with Sabellianiſm (b). He held a particular opinion; for he believed, that, during the extent of eternity, GOD had created a moſt excellent ſpirit, which was incarnate, when the fulneſs of the times was come (c). I do not think, that this is the opinion of a Tritheiſt (d): But, no doubt, he held different opinions at different times.

(b) This article is extracted out of a Latin book, printed at Geneva by Francis Perrin, in 1567, in 4to. It contains, beſides divers dogmatical treatiſes, the Hiſtory of Gentilis's condemnation, by Benedictus Aretius, a divine of Bern.

(c) See the remark [G], towards the end.

(d) He is ſo called in the Moreri, printed in Holland, in the article of John Paul Alciatus.

The edict was publiſhed in a diet called the fifth of March 1566 (14), and did not concern the Calviniſts. Aretius would not have commended the king of Poland upon it, as he has done, if the reformed had been comprehended in it; and they were ſo far from being ſo, that they are accuſed of having promoted the publiſhing of that edict: 'Inſtigantibus adverſariis Romano '& Lemano ſpiritu ductis rex Auguſtus in Comitio 'Lublinenſi anno 1566. legem horrendi carminis in 'Anabaptiſtas, & Trideitas latam promulgari curavit, 'qua ii intra menſem regni finibus excedere juſſi. —— 'At the inſtigation of their adverſaries, actuated by 'the ſpirit of Rome and Geneva, king Auguſtus, in the 'diet of Lublin, in 1566, publiſhed a ſevere edict againſt 'the Anabaptiſts and Tritheiſts, ordering them to leave 'the kingdom within a month.' Thus ſpeaks Lubieniecius, in the 194th page of his Reformation of Poland. III. There is no exactneſs in ſaying, in general terms, that Gentilis, going through Bern, had his head cut off there, about the year 1565. Father Maimbourg (15) has not entirely avoided an anachroniſm, with reſpect to Gentilis; for he makes him diſpute at the conference of Petricow in 1566; whereas it was held in 1565.

[F] The bailiff, who had formerly impriſoned him, happened to be ſtill in office, and did not fail to lay hands on him, the eleventh of June 1566.] It was at Gex, that Gentilis was arreſted, and not at Bern. He was gone thither (16), to deſire the bailiff to permit a public diſputation, of which the ſcheme and conditions were found among the papers of that fugitive. He propoſed, that the bailiff ſhould give notice to the miniſters and conſiſtories in the neighbourhood, that if any one had a mind to maintain Calvin's doctrine againſt Gentilis, he ſhould come to Gex within eight days, to diſpute with him; on this condition, that he, who ſhould not be able to prove his own opinion by the pure word of GOD, ſhould be put to death, as a notorious impoſtor, and a maintainer of a falſe religion: and that, if no body accepted the challenge, the bailiff and all the town-council ſhould proclaim, that Gentilis's ſentiments, touching the moſt high GOD, and his ſon JESUS CHRIST, were orthodox. The anſwer, that was made to the firſt overture of this diſpute, was the impriſoning of the heretic (17).

[G] He gloried in ſuffering for the honour of GOD the Father.] Aretius does not mention any other remarkable thing he ſaid on his dying-day; but he relates elſewhere (18) the particulars I am going to ſet down: 'Gentilis de ſe ita & ſcripſit & loquutus eſt 'quod eſſet patronus ſummi patris eminentiæ, & aſ'ſertor gloriæ patris. Nec dubitavit etiam dicere, ne'minem adhuc (quod ipſe quidem ſciret) pro gloria '& eminentia patris mortuum eſſe; prophetas, apoſto'los, pioſque martyres pro filii gloria perſecutiones, 'mortem & extrema quæque paſſos eſſe; eminentiam 'autem Dei patris nullos adhuc martyres habere. —— 'Gentilis wrote and ſpoke of himſelf as a patron and 'aſſertor of the ſupremacy and glory of the Father. Nor 'did he ſcruple ſaying, that no one yet (as he knew) 'had died in defence of the glory and ſupremacy of 'the Father; that the prophets, apoſtles, and pious 'martyrs, had ſuffered perſecutions, death, and ex'treameſt tortures for the glory of the Son; but that 'the ſuperiority of GOD the Father had as yet produced 'no martyrs.' Let us mention here the opinion he profeſſed in a ſynod of Poland: 'Sententia ejus quam 'in Polonia in Synodo Pinczoviæ ann. 1562, die 4. 'Novembris celebrata propoſuerat, hæc fuit, Deum 'creaviſſe in latitudine æternitatis Spiritum quemdam 'excellentiſſimum, qui poſtea in plenitudine temporis in'carnatus eſt (19). —— The opinion, which he pro'poſed in Poland, in the Synod of Pinczovia, held 'Novem. 4, 1562, was this; That GOD, in the 'extent of eternity, had created a moſt excellent ſpirit, 'which afterwards, in the fulneſs of time, was incar'nate.'

he should have left out the Prophets who were all persecuted by the Jews a people who neither could nor would comprehend farther [illegible] the law [illegible] not kill the Prophets on account of their Prop[illegible] of the Messiah as for presuming [illegible]

(14) In Comitiis Pinſovienſibus, anno 1566, 5, Martii celebratis. Aretius, pag. 10. The Hiſtory of the Reformation of Poland, pag. 195, ſays, that it was in Comitio Lublinenſi, anno 1566.

(15) Hiſt. de l'Arrianiſme, Tom, III, pag. 356. Dutch Edit.

(16) Aretius, pag. 47, 48.

(17) Ab præfecto Gaienſi petit publicam diſputationem: reſpondit ille, fiat quod juſtum eſt, & ad carceres duci juſſit. Id. pag. 10.

(18) Pag. 27.

(19) Biblioth. Anti-Trinitar. pag. 26. Hiſtor. Ref. Polon. pag. 107.

GENTILIS (ALBERIC), profeſſor of the civil-law at Oxford, was the ſon of Matthew Gentilis, an Italian phyſician [A], deſcended from an ancient and noble family of the march of Ancona. That phyſician, having found ſome abuſes in the church of Rome, and reliſhed the good ſeed of the reformation, left his country, and retired into Carniola, with Alberic his eldeſt ſon, and Scipio the youngeſt but one of his ſeven children. Alberic was ſent into England, where his great capacity procured him a good ſettlement, I mean, the place of profeſſor of the civil-law in the Univerſity of Oxford, in the year 1582. He had taken his degree of doctor at Perugia, being twenty one years old; and, ſoon after, he was made a judge in the town of Aſcoli; which employment he quitted, to follow his father in his voluntary baniſhment, and the dictates of his conſcience. He compoſed ſeveral works [B], which gained him a great reputation. In ſome of his writings he does not entirely embrace the hypotheſes of the [A] He was ſon of Matthew Gentilis, an Italian phyſician.] I have found ſomething concerning him in a work of Scipio Gentilis. 'An vero Dæmones morborum cauſſa 'ſint, hanc quæſtionem cum parens meus Matthæus 'Gentilis optimus & clariſſimus, Matth. Duraſtanti, 'Med. & Philoſ. præſtantiſſimo propoſuiſſet, edito libro 'ei reſpondit (1). —— Whether devils are the cauſe 'of diſeaſes; which queſtion when my father Matthew 'Gentilis, a good and great man, had propoſed to Mat'thew Duraſtantes, phyſician and philoſopher, he anſwer 'him by publiſhing a book on that ſubject.' Note, by the way, that the phyſician, who anſwered that queſtion, was miſnamed Duraſtanes by Mr Konig. He was called Duraſtantes (2).

[B] He compoſed ſeveral works.] He wrote three books de Jure Belli, which have done Grotius no diſſervice. He wrote alſo three others de Legationibus. His diſputes about the abſolute power of kings, the union of the kingdoms of Great-Britain, and the injuſtice inſeparable from reſiſtance to kings, De vi civium in Regem ſemper injuſta, ſhewed yet more clearly, that he was not for republican principles, than the ten diſputes, of which he made a preſent to his ſon, that he might dedicate them, in the year 1607, to the earl of Pembroke, his patron. They are upon the titles of the Code, Si quis Imperatori maledixerit, ad legem Juliam de majeſtate. His books, De Juris interpretibus, & De Advocatione Hiſpanica (3), are not the leaſt

(1) Scipio Gentilis, in Comment. in Apolog. Apuleii, pag. 260.

(2) See Lindenius renovatus, pag. 504.

(3) To apprehend the reaſon of that title, it is to be noted, that Alberic Gentilis was made perpetual advocate of all the cauſes which the ſubjects of Spain ſhould have depending in England. See his epitaph in Konig's Bibliotheca.

the proteſtants [C]; for his diſpute, touching the firſt book of the Maccabees, comes but little ſhort of an indirect apology for thoſe, who hold it for canonical. The ſame judgment may almoſt be made of the treatiſe he compoſed againſt thoſe, who blame the Latin of the vulgar tranſlation of the Bible. See the remark [C]. He died at London, the nineteenth of June, 1608, being fifty eight years old. He loved to that degree to improve in the ſciences, that he did not ſeek leſs to inſtruct himſelf by converſation, than reading; and he has acquainted us in print, that his collections were full of a thouſand things he had heard, as he talked familiarly with perſons, who did not imagine, that what they ſaid would be ſo honoured. The paſſage, wherein he ſpeaks of this, deſerves a place in our remarks [D]. See Mr Konig's Bibliotheque, and the funeral oration of Scipio Gentilis.

leaſt of his works. I paſs over the titles of ſeveral others.

[C] He does not entirely embrace the hypotheſes of the Proteſtants.] Voëtius was very ſenſible of it. He relates, that John Howſon, an Oxford divine, maintained, in a public diſputation, the opinion of the Roman Catholics about the indiſſolubleneſs of marriage; that is, that adultery may indeed be a lawful reaſon to part with one's wife, but not ſuch a reaſon as may juſtify the marrying of another. An Engliſh divine, called Thomas Pye, wrote againſt that tenet of John Howſon, who defended himſelf, and compoſed an apology, printed at Oxford, in 4to, in 1606, with the diſputation, and two letters, one from John Raynolds to Thomas Pye, the other from Alberic Gentilis to John Howſon. Note, that Raynolds cenſured Pye, for having publiſhed certain things, which were not exact; but he perſiſted in the doctrine he had already maintained againſt Bellarmin, in an Engliſh book concerning divorce. Gentilis ſhuffled, and gave to underſtand, he knew not what to think about that queſtion: though in his work, de Nuptiis, he had declared himſelf for the common opinion of the Proteſtants. Voëtius, having related all this, adds to it a reflexion, which highly deſerves to be here inſerted: 'Iſte (Alb. Gentilis) in hâc epiſtolâ haut obſcurè fatetur ſe fluctuare, quamvis antea in libro de Nuptiis affirmantem ſententiam tradidiſſet. Sed neſcio quomodo Albericus Gentilis vaſtæ eruditionis Raynoldianæ, & theologiæ ipſius tanquam nimis puræ & reformatæ in dogmatibus & in practicis, ſi non æmulum (de quo quidem ex ſingularium factorum gnaris, aliquid audiſſe memini) ſe oſtendere, ſaltem ſuſpectum ſe reddidiſſe videatur diatribis ſuis de vulgatâ verſione, de actoribus fabularum, de abuſu mendacii, &c. In quibus tam longè ac diſciplina reformata, à moribus antiquis Academiæ Peruſinæ, ubi antea Jus profeſſus erat, non abibat. Sed hæc in tantâ omnium imperfectione miſeriæ humanæ pars non minima (4). —— In this letter Gentilis plainly confeſſes, that he doubts; though before, in his book concerning marriage, he had laid down an affirmative opinion. But, I know not how, Alberic Gentilis, in his diſſertations concerning the Vulgate, the actors of plays, and the abuſe of lying, if he does not openly rival, at leaſt gives room to ſuſpect that he emulates the extenſive learning of Raynolds, and his divinity, as too pure and reformed both in doctrine and practice; and indeed I remember to have heard ſo from perſons acquainted with the particular facts. But, in thoſe pieces, he did not depart ſo much, as the reformed diſcipline did, from the ancient manners of the univerſity of Altdorf, where he had before profeſſed the civil-law. But this is not the leaſt among ſo many inſtances of human weakneſs.'

[D] The paſſage, wherein he ſpeaks of this, deſerves a place in our remarks.] Here is what we read in one of his books (5): 'Quid de Oxonienſibus meis? vel repertoria mea teſtantur ſatis quantum ego capiam fructus ex eorum virorum & juvenum colloquiis, nam in illis ego deſcripſi non pauca, quæ dum minus id ipſi cogitant, diſco tamen & aſſervo ex ſermonibus familiaribus. —— How much I profited by my acquaintance at Oxford, is plain from my table-books, in which I wrote down many things, which paſſed in converſation unknown to thoſe, with whom I converſed.' He adds, what he had heard from his father, who had ſtudied the civil-law under the profeſſor Argenterius. That profeſſor never ſlighted any thing he heard in converſation, but ſet down all that occurred, even from the meaneſt perſons, in a book for that purpoſe. Tu non audiſti aliquando à Patre de illuſtri præceptore ſuo Argenterio, qui ab unius cujuſque ore ſolebat pendere, ſi forte aliud agendo excidiſſet homini aliud quod ipſe diſceret, nam & dicta homuncionum curabat reponi in ſua quædam volumina, ſi quæ audiſſet non inepta? Laſtly, Gentilis relates, that Alciatus learned, by the action of a peaſant, the ſenſe of a paſſage of Plautus, which he had not underſtood till then. *Refert Alciatus * ex facto ſui cujuſdam villici ſe locum Plauti intellexiſſe quem non potuerat antea.* God preſerve us from ſuch hearers, who would be deteſted by all companies, if they were found out: for there are thoſe, who, freely advancing whatever their memory ſuggeſts, would be very uneaſy, if they knew, that, at parting, ſome of the company would go and write down in their collections all they have heard. A man finds a great miſreckoning, both as to proper names, and circumſtances of times and place, when he compares, with the books in his cloſet, the converſation of perſons that have the largeſt memory, and ſpeak without a premeditated deſign (6). Every one may know this by experience, and therefore ought to wiſh, that what he delivers in familiar diſcourſe may not be writ down. Thoſe, who wiſh the contrary, ought never to ſpeak unprepared.

Thoſe who write what is ſaid in company, are dangerous perſons.

GENTILIS (Scipio), brother to Alberic, and as famous a civilian as he, was born at Caſtello di Sangeneſio, in Italy, in the year 1563. He was yet a child, when his father left his country and his wife to go elſewhere, to make open profeſſion of the proteſtant religion. He did not go out of the houſe with his father; but, ſoon after, means was found to ſteal him from his mother, and under pretence of a walk, to carry him to his father, who had ſtopped to wait for him, as ſoon as he came to a ſafe place. We have already ſaid, that he retired into Carniola, and ſent his eldeſt ſon into England. As for Scipio, whom he loved very tenderly, he ſent him to ſtudy in the univerſity of Tubingen. He had wherewithal to anſwer thoſe expences; for he had in Carniola the title of phyſician of that province, with a ſalary (a). The young man improved very much at Tubingen. He learned the Greek tongue under the famous Martin Cruſius; and his wit was ſo happily turned to poetry, that Meliſſus, who was one of the beſt poets of Germany, acknowledged himſelf his inferior. He went afterwards to ſtudy at Wittemberg, and then to Leyden, that he might be nearer his father, who, having been obliged to leave Carniola for his religion, was retired into England to his eldeſt ſon. Scipio Gentilis improved much at Leyden under Hugo Donellus, and Juſtus Lipſius; after which he went to Baſil, and there took his degree of doctor of the civil-law in the year 1589. He went to Heidelberg ſome time after, where Julius Pacius, an Italian like himſelf, taught the civil-law. There aroſe a kind of

---

(4) Giſbert. Voëtius, Politica Eccleſ. Tom. II, pag. 171.

(5) Dial. iii, de Juris Interpret. fol. 36.

* Lib. i, Pareg. cap. xxi.

(6) The Scaligerana, the Menagiana, &c. not to mention Guy Patin's letters, confirm this truth.

(a) Provinciæ proceres .... conſtituerunt illum Archiatron propoſitis iis conditionibus, & ea erga ipſum munificentia uſi quam ipſe nec aſpernari vellet, nec repudiare ulla ratione poſſet. Orat. funeb. Scip. Gentil. See alſo Alberic Gentilis, lib. iii, de Jure belli, cap. xiii, & lib. iii, de Legatis, cap. xiv.

emulation between them, which made Scipio reſolve to go from thence to Altdorf, where, by the care of Donellus, who was there profeſſor of the civil-law, he became his colleague in the year 1590; and when Peter Wenſenbecius was called into Saxony, our Gentilis filled his place of firſt profeſſor. He was alſo made counſellor of the city of Nuremberg. All which places he diſcharged glorioully 'till his death, which happened in the year 1616. His method of teaching with clearneſs and brevity, and of mixing, with the thorns of the law, the flowers of polite literature; (for he was a great humaniſt) that method, I ſay, having been known, both by his lectures and the books he publiſhed, procured him the invitation of ſeveral famous univerſities [A]. But he preferred the poſt, he had in the univerſity of Altdorf, to all the offers that were made him. He had lived in celibacy 'till the year 1612; but at laſt he underwent the conjugal yoke. The beauty and merit of a gentlewoman, originally come from Lucca, and daughter of Cæſar Calandrini, having captivated his liberty, he demanded her in marriage, obtained her, and had by her a ſon [B] and a daughter (b). I give the titles of his principal writings [C]. He is mentioned in the letters of Bongars [D].

(b) Taken from his funeral oration, pronounced by Michael Piccart, profeſſor of logic and metaphyſics, at Altdorf It is in the collection of Mr Witte.

[A] His method of teaching procured him the invitation of ſeveral famous univerſities.] He was offered a profeſſorſhip in France, at Heidelberg, and at Leyden; and what is more remarkable and extraordinary, Pope Clement VIII, to incline him to accept of a profeſſor's place at Bologna, promiſed him liberty of conſcience (1).

(1) Piccart, in Orat. Funebri Scip. Gentilis.

[B] He had a ſon.] We find in a letter of Voſſius (2) to William Laud archbiſhop of Canterbury, that that boy's mother, not being in a condition to maintain him at the univerſity, becauſe of the loſſes ſhe had ſuſtained in the wars of Germany, endeavoured to get him a place in a college, either at Oxford or Cambridge. His friends were to preſent a petition for that purpoſe, and hoped that the memory of Alberic Gentilis would do his nephew ſome ſervice. Voſſius prepared the way for that petition; but I know not what became of it, or of that only ſon of Scipio Gentilis. I take notice, that it is the hardeſt thing in the world to find a lineal ſucceſſion of moſt of the heroes of the commonwealth of learning. Generally things go well enough for the firſt generation. The ſecond begins to grow obſcure; the curious want ſome time to find it out: but the third or fourth are ſo confounded in the croud, that they are no more diſtinguiſhed. Therefore it could not be ſaid of the poſterity of thoſe great men, what a Roman ſatiriſt has ſaid touching his anceſtors, and which he would have ſeveral noblemen ſay of theirs.

(2) It is the 266th: It was written in 1635.

Reflexion upon the poſterity of learned men.

- - - - Quære ex me quis mihi quartus
Sit pater, haud prompte, dicam tamen: adde etiam unum
Unum etiam, terræ eſt jam filius (3).

(3) Perſ. Sat. VI, ver. 57.

The fourth degree downwards is already in the dark. What ſhall I ſay of ſo many men illuſtrious by their learning, whoſe family is as obſcure in the firſt degree downwards, as in the degree juſt before them? May not we ſay, that they are fires, which we ſee ſhine afar off in the middle of a dark night, without diſcovering any thing near them, by reaſon of the obſcurity round them? See the remark [B] of the article BENSERADE.

[C] I give the titles of his principal writings.] Here they are: De Jure publico populi Romani. De conjurationibus libri duo. De Donationibus inter virum & uxorem libri IV. De Bonis maternis & ſecundis Nuptiis libri duo. In Apulei Apologiam Commentarius. De Juriſdictione libri tres. Commentarius in Pauli Epiſtolam ad Philemonem. De erroribus Teſtamentorum. His funeral oration, with the catalogue of his works, is in the collection of Mr Witte; but it is to be noted, that ſome writings are attributed to him in that catalogue, which belong to his brother; as, the treatiſe De Jure Belli, and that De Legationibus; and that there is no mention made of his book, De antiquis Italiæ Linguis, nor of his notes upon Tacitus, nor of his Quæſtiones ad Africanum Juriſconſultum. Theſe three works are mentioned in his commentary on Apuleius's apology.

[D] He is mentioned in the letters of Bongars.] If I remember well, he is generally denoted there by the terms of Scipio noſter, or the like. The Latin tongue allows and approves of that expreſſion; but the French tranſlator is to blame in rendering it by Monſieur Scipion. This is owing to his ignorance; for, if he had known that the perſon meant was Scipio Gentilis, he had ſaid Monſieur Gentilis, and not Monſieur Scipion (4).

(4) This fault is found in the edition of the Hague, 1695.

Note, that the cuſtom of naming people, in Latin, as well by their chriſtian-name, as by their family-name, occaſions many miſtakes; and I fancy it has led Mr Konig into an error, touching Gentilis the Arian: for he ſpeaks twice of him, without perceiving, that it is ſtill the ſame heretic. He ſpeaks of him under the word Gentilis, and under the word Valentinus. In the firſt place (5), he only gives him the chriſtian-name of Johannes; and ſuppoſes, that Valentinus is his country-firname. In the ſecond place (6), he beſtows upon him Valentinus as his family-name, and Johannes as his chriſtian-name. The firſt occaſion of this miſtake probably proceeded from this, that there are books, wherein Gentilis is ſimply and barely called Valentinus, which was but one half of his chriſtian-name.

(5) Konig. Biblioth. pag. 341.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 825.

GENTILLET (INNOCENT),

a native of Vienne in Dauphiné (a), flouriſhed in the XVIth century. He publiſhed ſome books of controverſy, which made him eſteemed by the Proteſtants [A]; for he exerted his learning, and ſhewed a great zeal againſt Popery. He was a civilian by profeſſion; and ſome ſay, he was advocate in the (a) Allard. Biblioth. de Dauphiné, pag. 114.

[A] He publiſhed ſome books of controverſy, which made him eſteemed by the Proteſtants.] He did for them, what Quadratus, Ariſtides, Juſtin Martyr, Melito, Tertullian, and ſome others, had done for the chriſtians of the primitive ages; I mean he wrote an apology: which he dedicated to the king of Navarre, who was afterwards king of France. The epiſtle dedicatory is dated the fifteenth of February 1578. The edition, which he publiſhed ten years after, was much improved, and well corrected: and it is to be noted, that he publiſhed that work both in Latin and French. This is the Latin title: Apologia pro Chriſtianis Gallis Religionis Evangelicæ ſeu Reformatæ, Qua docetur hujus Religionis fundamenta in ſacra Scriptura jacta eſſe, ipſamque tum ratione, tum antiquis Canonibus, comprobari. The edition, which I make uſe of, is the ſecond, printed at Geneva by James Stoer, 1588, in 8vo. He is there deſcribed thus, Authore INNOCENTIO GENTILLETO Juriſconſulto clariſſimo, & ampliſſimi Senatus Provinciæ Delphinenſis præſide. The work, which he intituled, Le Bureau du Concile de Trente: auquel eſt monſtré qu'en plusieurs poincts iceluy Concile eſt contraire aux anciens Conciles & Canons, & à l'autorité du ROY, was printed in the year 1586, in 8vo. He dedicated it to the ſame king of Navarre, and dated the epiſtle the twelfth of July 1586. He names himſelf barely Innocent Gentillet, a civilian of Dauphiné. He publiſhed the ſame book in Latin, the ſame year, with the title of, Examen Concilii Tridentini: in quo demonſtratur, &c. There have been ſeveral editions of that work: the laſt, if I am not miſtaken, is that of Gorcum in Holland in 1678. Mark theſe the parliament of Toulouſe (b). I have ſeen in the title of one of his books, that he calls himſelf preſident in the parliament of Grenoble (c). He tells us in a preface (d), that he was in exile, by reaſon of the edicts that had been publiſhed in France againſt thoſe of the reformed religion. Some affirm, that he had been Syndic of the republic of Geneva; and that he diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Joachimus Urſinus Anti-Jeſuita [B], in the title of ſeveral books which he publiſhed. I believe Mr Allard is miſtaken, when he affirms (e), that Vincent Gentillet [C], his ſon, Counſellor, and then Preſident in the Chamber of the Edict of Grenoble, wrote the Antimachiavel in 1573, a Remonſtrance to King Henry III, ſeveral Rules about Polity; and that he tranſlated the book of the Republic of Switzerland of Joſias Simlerus. I wonder we have ſo few particulars about the life of a perſon, who diſtinguiſhed himſelf both by his writings and employments; and I cannot ſufficiently admire, how it came to paſs, that thoſe, who these words of the epiſtle dedicatory (1): Seeing therefore, great SIR, that thoſe, who carp at your declaration, ground altogether their opinion upon that council of Trent; I thought my duty for your ſervice, and for my country, did ſufficiently command me to employ the leiſure, which the edict, called of Re-union, makes me enjoy in my exile, in ſhaking that foundation of theirs. The declaration he ſpeaks of, is that, which the king of Navarre had cauſed to be publiſhed every where, that he would ſtand to the deciſion of a free council, about the differences in religion that were in France (2). That declaration was publiſhed in 1585, the ſame year, in which the edict of Re-union was made. From whence we may conclude, that Gentillet did not ſet about that work before that year; and conſequently that Voëtius is miſtaken, when he ſays (3), that that book was publiſhed in Latin in 1556, under the title of, Hiſtorica relatio & nullitas Concilii Tridentini. He adds, that it was publiſhed at Amberg in the year 1615. Note, that, in 1556, the council of Trent was not concluded.

[B] Some affirm, that he had been ſyndic of the rebuplic of Geneva; and that he diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Joachimus Urſinus Anti-Jeſuita.] Pray, conſider theſe words of Mr Placcius (4): ‘Antimachiavelli nomine vulgo inſigniuntur commentariorum de regno .... libri tres ... qui citantur ſub nomine Innocentii Gentileti JCti Delphinatis olim Toloſanæ curiæ Advocati, dein Genevenſis Reip. Syndici. ——— The three books of the commentaries De Regno .... cited under the name of Innocent Gentillet, of Dauphiné, formerly advocate in the parliament of Toulouſe, and afterwards ſyndic of the republic of Geneva, bear the title of Antimachiavel.’ To prove this, he quotes Draudius, pag. 1169, and 1144, of the Bibliotheca Claſſica; Voëtius, pag. 124, 209, 211, 218, of the firſt volume of the Theological Theſes; Pellerus, pag. 505, of the Politicus ſceleratus impugnatus; Conringius, in the preface to his edition of the Prince of Machiavel; and Keckerman, in the firſt chapter to the Conſilium de locis communibus. Of theſe five authors, I have been able to conſult only the three firſt; and I find nothing in them, that ſays, that Gentillet ever pleaded in the parliament of Toulouſe, or had any employment in the republic of Geneva. It is even to be noted, that Pellerus calls him, Juriſconſultus Delphenſis; which may make one believe, that Gentillet was a native of Holland, not of Dauphiné. Mr Baillet obſerves (5), that it is the common opinion, that the author of the Antimachiavel was an Huguenot of Dauphiné, named Innocent Gentillet, who was at firſt a pleading advocate in the parliament of Toulouſe, and afterwards ſyndic of the republic of Geneva (§ α).

[(§ α) At page 43. of the Citadin de Geneve, we find among the famous civilians, who have delivered their oracles in Geneva, Innocent Gentillet; but it is not ſaid, that he had any poſt there. Rem. Crit.]

As for Joachimus Urſinus Anti-Jeſuita, Mr Placcius (6) mentions five books, which have been publiſhed under that falſe name. The firſt is intituled, Concilii Tridentini Hiſtorica Relatio, & nullitas ſolidè & ex fundamento demonſtrata, and was printed at Amberg, in the year 1615, in 8vo. The ſecond is intituled, Apologia pro Chriſtianis Gallis Religionis Reformatæ, at Geneva, 1598, in 8vo. The third, Stupenda Templi Jeſuitici: divided into three parts, and printed at Francfort, and at Amberg, in the year 1610, in 8vo. The title of the fourth is, Floſculi blaſphemiarum Jeſuiticarum, ex tribus Concionibus ſuper beatificatione Ignatii Loyolæ habitis decerpti, unà cum Sorbonnæ Pariſienſis Cenſura. Which was printed in 1612, in 4to. The fifth was printed at Amberg in 1611, in 8vo, and is intituled, Hiſpanicæ Inquiſitionis, & carnificinæ ſecretiora, ubi præter illius originem .... exemplis illuſtrioribus tum Martyrum, tum articulorum, & regularum inquiſitoriarum in fine adjectis per Joachimum Urſinum Anti-Jeſuitam de Jeſuitis qui Inquiſitionem Hiſpanicam in Germaniam & Bohemiam vicinam introducere moliuntur, prefantem. Vincent Mollerus, burgomaſter of Hamburgh, and great-grand-father of Mr Placcius, had marked with his own hand the name of Innocent Gentillet in the firſt of thoſe five books; which, together with ſome other reaſons, inclined Mr Placcius to believe, that it was the true name of the pretended Joachim Urſinus (7). Mr Baillet (8) has followed that opinion, and (9) aſcribes to the ſame Gentillet a work, which was printed at Francfort in 1612, under the title of, Antiſocinus, hoc eſt ſolida confutatio errorum quos olim Arriani, &c. I have not a ſufficient number of books to clear all this.

[C] I believe that Mr Allard is miſtaken, when he affirms, that VINCENT GENTILLET &c.] He remarks (10) in the firſt place, that the examination of the council of Trent is a work of Innocent Gentillet; an author, ſays he, who lived under Henry III; and then he adds, that Vincent Gentillet, his ſon .... wrote the Antimachiavel, in 1573. This claſhes with the cuſtom of chronologers, who, when they mark the ages of illuſtrious men, put ſome diſtance between the fathers and the ſons, the maſters and diſciples; tho' it frequently happens, that the time of the reputation of the one concurs with the flouriſhing ſtate of the other. The writer of the Bibliotheque of Dauphiné has not followed that rule: for he puts the father under Henry III, and places higher, under Charles IX, the writing of the principal book of the ſon. This error is leſs than that I am going to mark. It ſhould have been ſaid, according to the general opinion, that the Antimachiavel was the production of Innocent Gentillet, and not the production of his ſon. I do not find any bibliographer, who has mentioned this Vincent Gentillet, ſon of Innocent; and it is certain, that la Croix du Maine (11) aſcribes to Innocent Gentillet all the works, which Mr Allard ſpecifies as the writings of Vincent. It is true, La Croix du Maine is miſtaken in the chriſtian name; for he has put Francis inſtead of Innocent (12). The office of preſident in the chamber of the edict of Grenoble, which he beſtows upon that writer, confirms me in the belief, that he had in view our Innocent Gentillet, who, as we have already ſeen (13), took the title, at the head of the apology for the reformed, of ampliſſimi Senatus Provinciæ Delphinenſis Præſes. I conjecture, that he was made preſident of the chamber of the edict at Grenoble, when thoſe ſort of courts were granted to the Huguenots, in each parliament in 1576 (14): which intituled him to the quality of preſident in the parliament of his province. We have ſeen (15), that the edict of Re-union occaſioned his exile; and I add here, that Poſſevin (16) has obſerved, that the Calviniſt author, who had writ againſt Machiavel, had taken ſanctuary at Geneva: which is another proof that Mr Allard is miſtaken, in aſcribing, not to the father, but to the ſon, the work againſt Machiavel. The French tranſlator's preface before the book of Joſiah Simler, about the republic of the Swiſſes, ſays nothing that may incline us to conjecture, that he might be our Gentillet: and yet I could eaſily believe him to be the author of that verſion. Some aſcribe

(b) See the remark [B].

(c) See the remark [A].

(d) See the ſame remark.

(e) Allard, ubi ſupra, pag. 115.

(1) Gentillet, epiſtle dedicatory prefixed to the Bureau du Concile de Trente.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Voëtius, Polit Eccleſ. Tom. IV, pag. 271.

(4) Placcius de Anonymis, pag. 60.

(5) Baillet, Tom. II, of the Anti, pag. 131.

(6) Placcius de Pſeudonymis, pag 275.

(7) Id. ibid. pag. 276.

(8) Baillet, Tom. I, of the Anti, pag. 197.

(9) Id. Tom. II, pag. 31.

(10) Allard. Bibl. de Dauph. pag. 114, 115.

(11) In the Biblioth. Franç. pag. 97.

(12) Keckerman, apud Placcium, de Pſeudonymis, pag. 60, has committed the ſame fault.

(13) In the remark [A].

(14) Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. V, pag. 212.

(15) In the remark [A].

(16) Poſſev. Bibl. lib. xvi, cap. v.

who have given us an account of the authors of his province, could not fill up ſix lines concerning him, without committing ſeveral faults.

aſcribed it to him, according to La Croix du Maine. It was printed at Paris, in the year 1578 (17) (§β), for James du Puis, with the king's licence, dated the ſixteenth of Auguſt 1577, and at Antwerp in 1580 in 8vo. Simler had publiſhed that work in Latin in 1576, and died ſome months after.

I will ſpeak elſewhere (18) at large of the Antimachiavel of Gentillet.

[(§β) From an edition in 8vo, of the year 1577, without the name of the place, for Antony Chupin, and Francis le Preux. REM. CRIT.]

(17) See the tranſlator's preface.

(18) In the remark [E] of the article MACHIAVEL.

GERGENTI, a town of Sicily, formerly Agrigentum, or Acragas. I only mention it, in order to correct Mr Moreri's faults [A]. His omiſſions would require a long

[A] I mention it only to correct Mr Moreri's faults.] I. It is not true, that that town took it's name from mount Agragas. Stephanus Byzantinus, who relates three other etymologies, makes no manner of mention of that. Several towns of Sicily were named from their rivers (1); and this was one of them, according to the firſt of the three opinions (2) mentioned by that author. It is certain, that it was built upon the river Acragas (3); but, according to the third opinion (4), both that river and the town were ſo called by reaſon of the goodneſs of the ſoil. I omit the ſecond opinion, according to which the town owed it's name to Acragas, ſon of Jupiter and Aſterope. II. It is not true, that Virgil mentions the mountain Acragas; for the two verſes, quoted by Moreri, ſignify viſibly no more than a town ſeated on a hill.

The verſes are,

Arduus inde Acragas oſtendit maxima longe
Mœnia, magnanimûm quondam generator equorum (5).

High Acragas at diſtance thence appears,
With wide extended walls; famed for the breed
(In ancient annals) of the generous ſteed.

III. It had been neceſſary to have named the author, who has ſaid, that the Ionians, led by Gellus, or Gelo, laid the firſt foundation of Agrigentum; for that author muſt be an apocryphal one, ſince Cluverius was not acquainted with him, or did not think him worthy to be quoted. It had been better to have let alone that Gellus, or Gelo, and have ſaid, with Thucydides, that the inhabitants of Gela ſent a colony to Acragas one hundred and eight years after the foundation of Gela (6). Now, ſince Gela was built, jointly, by Antiphemus the chief of a company of Rhodians, and by Entimus the leader of a company of Cretans; and ſince they ſettled there the laws of the Dorians (7); I had rather take Agrigentum for a Doric colony, than for an Ionian colony. Thucydides, who marks the time and names of the founders, is, in this place, to be a little more credited than Strabo, who contented himſelf to ſay, in a looſe manner, that Agrigentum belonged to the Ionians (8). I do not think he has ſaid it above once, and I am certain he has ſeldom mentioned that town: and therefore I reckon for the fourth fault, theſe words of Moreri; it is for that reaſon that Strabo commonly calls it the Ionian Agrigentum. Before we go further, I take notice, that Polybius mentions Agrigentum as a colony of the Rhodians (9). A groſs fault has crept into Cluverius, which his abridger has not mended. We find in that author (10), that the inhabitants of Gela founded Agrigentum in the XCIXth olympiad. He ſhould have ſaid XLIX, not XCIX. For this is Cluverius's computation: he places the foundation of Syracuſe in the ſecond year of the XIth olympiad. Forty five years after, according to Thucydides (11), Gela was founded by the Rhodians and Cretans; and, according to the ſame author, thoſe of Gela ſent a colony to Agrigentum, one hundred and eight years after their town had been founded; therefore they ſent it in the XLIXth olympiad. V. He ſhould not have quoted Ælian touching the luxury of the Agrigentines in their houſes and meals, without ſaying that he quotes Plato: for a witty ſaying from Plato (12) has, without compariſon, more weight, than from Ælian. VI. It is not true, that Diodorus Siculus informs us, that Alcamon ruled at Agrigentum after Phalaris, and that Alcander, Theron, and Thraſideus, were the ſucceſſors of Alcamon. VII Nothing claſhes more with the rule of an exact narrative, than to join together the time, when the town of Agrigentum was taken by the Carthaginians, and the time, when it became a part of the Roman commonwealth; for the ſtate of the Agrigentines underwent many conſiderable changes after the Carthagnians had plundered them in the fourth year of the XCIIId olympiad, till the Romans got poſſeſſion of that town. They became maſters of it during the ſecond Punic war; but they were not ſo, when they took Syracuſe: for, even after the taking of that city, the Carthaginians, who were maſters of Agrigentum, cut out work enough for them (13). VIII. He ſhould not have applied to the time, when it was ſubdued by the Romans, the magnificent deſcription, which Diodorus Siculus has left us of it: for that deſcription concerns the flouriſhing ſtate of the Agrigentines, when the Carthaginians attacked them in the XCIIId olympiad. The town recovered from the diſmal condition, into which that war had reduced it: nay, we find, that it's forces were formidable at ſeveral times (14), after the ſacking it underwent, when it fell into the hands of the Carthaginians in the year that I have marked before; but it is confounding the times, to ſay with Moreri, that it was one of the moſt flouriſhing cities of the Roman empire, being large, fair, and extreamly populous, when the Romans drove from thence the Carthaginians, and ſettled there themſelves. IX. Empedocles the philoſopher, and Empedocles the poet, are but one and the ſame man; and therefore Moreri ſhould not have made of them two illuſtrious Agrigentines. X. Cicero did not mention the temple and ſtatue of Hercules, that were to be ſeen at Agrigentum, as one of the fineſt works of antiquity. At moſt, he only ſpeaks ſo as to the ſtatue; and as for the temple, he contents himſelf to ſay, that the Agrigentines look upon it as a very holy place. Herculis templum eſt apud Agrigentinos non longè à foro ſane ſanctum apud illos & religioſum (15). As to the ſtatue, he ſays, that it was one of the fineſt he ever ſaw in his life; but he owns he was no good judge, and that, in that matter, he had much more employed his eyes, than his underſtanding (16). If Mr Moreri had had any diſcernment, with reſpect to things that ſtrike a reader moſt, he would have added a very ſingular circumſtance concerning that ſtatue; to wit, that it had been ſo often devoutly kiſſed, that it's lips and chin were ſomewhat worn out by it. Rictus ejus ac mentum paulo ſit attritius, quod in precibus & gratulationibus non ſolum id venerari, verum etiam oſculari ſolent (17). XI. Pliny has not ſaid, touching the ſalt of Agrigentum, what Mr Moreri aſcribes to him; but only, that it bears the fire, and flies out of the water. Mr Moreri has forgot the latter of theſe two properties, and has but ill related the firſt; for he pretends, that Pliny ſays, that that ſalt melted in the fire. If he had a mind to mention that, he ſhould have had other vouchers than Pliny; for the words of that writer (18), Agrigentinus (ſal) ignium patiens (19) ex aqua exilit, ſignify only, that that ſalt crackled in, and flew from the water; but that it bore the fire without crackling in it. If Mr Moreri had quoted either Solinus, or St Auguſtin, he needed not have feared any cenſure. Theſe are Solinus's words: ‘ Salem Agrigentinum ſi igni ‘ junxeris, diſſolvitur uſtione: cui ſi liquor aquæ pro‘ ximaverit, crepitat veluti torreatur (20). — If you ‘ apply Agrigentine ſalt to the fire, it melts by the ‘ heat; if to water, it crackles as if in the fire. St Auguſtin alledges that Phænomenon to the incredulous, who rejected all miracles in religion, as ſoon

(1) Duris apud Steph. Byzantin.

(2) Thucydides, lib. v, and Ariſtarchus, apud Scholiaſten Pindari in Od. ii, Olymp. are of that opinion.

(3) See Polybius, lib. ix, cap. vii; Ælian. Var. Hiſt. lib. ii, cap. xxxiii; The ſcholiaſt upon Pindar ex Ariſtarcho, ubi ſupra; Thucydides. Ibid.

(4) Polybius, apud Stephanum Byzant.

(5) Virg. Æn. lib. iii, ver. 704.

(6) Thucyd. lib. vi, circa init.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Strabo, lib. vi, pag. 187.

(9) Polyb. lib. ix, cap. vii.

(10) Sicil. Antiq. lib. i, cap. xv, pag. m. 108.

(11) Ubi ſupra.

(12) Diogen. Laërtius, lib. viii, in Empedocle, aſcribes to Empedocles what Ælian attributes to Plato.

(13) See Cluverius, ubi ſupra, pag. 112, quoting Livy. lib. xxiv, & xxv.

(14) See Cluverius, ibid. quoting Diodorus Siculus, lib. xvi, & xix.

(15) Cicero, in Verrem, Act. vi, cap. xliii.

(16) Ibi eſt ex ære ſimulacrum ipſius Herculis quo non facile quicquam dixerim me vidiſſe pulcrius: tametſi non tam multum in iſtis rebus intelligo quam multa vidi. Id. ibid.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) Plin. lib. xxxi, cap. vii, pag. m. 807.

(19) Meurſius, in Antigon. pag. 188, conjectures that we muſt read impatiens. Father Hardouin, in hunc locum Plinii, rejects that conjecture.

(20) Solin. cap. v.

a long diſcourſe; for he has forgot the moſt curious things that might have been ſaid of Agrigentum [B].

as divines could not explain them. He alledges to thoſe unbelievers ſeveral natural things, of which the philoſophers could give no reaſon; and he begins with the ſingularities of the ſalt of Agrigentum. ‘ Agrigentinum Siciliæ ſalem perhibent cum fuerit admotus ‘ igni velut in aqua flueſcere; cùm vero aquæ velut ‘ in igne crepitare (21). - - - - It is reported of the ‘ Agrigentine ſalt, that when it is held to fire it ‘ melts as if in water, and, when put in water, crac- ‘ kles as if in fire.’ Note, againſt thoſe that would apologize for Mr Moreri, that there is a great difference between melting in the fire, and bearing the fire, without crackling in it. I ſay nothing of his falſe quotations (22): I ſhall only obſerve, to conclude this remark, that there are a vaſt number of other articles in Moreri's dictionary, which are no leſs faulty than this.

[B] He has forgot the moſt curious things that might have been ſaid of Agrigentum.] I have already reproached him with paſſing over in ſilence, both thoſe devout kiſſes, which had thinned the lips of the brazen Hercules of the Agrigentines, and one of the wonderful properties of the ſalt of Agrigentum. He is no leſs to blame, for ſaying nothing of the properties of the lakes, that were near the town, whoſe water was as ſalt as that of the ſea; but men did not ſink in it, and even thoſe, that could not ſwim, did float upon it like wood. Περὶ Ἀκράγαντα δὲ λίμναι, τὴν μὲν γεῦσιν ἔχουσι θαλάττης, τὴν δὲ φύσιν διάφορον· οὐδὲ γάρ τοῖς ἀκολύμβοις βαπτίζεσθαι συμβαίνει, ξύλων τρόπον ἐπιπολάζουσιν. Apud Agrigentum lacus ſunt guſtu marino, natura planè diverſa: nam & natandi inſcii in iis lignorum in morem ſupernatant (23). How many ſingular things might he not have taken out of the thirteenth book of Diodorus Siculus, concerning the luxury of the Agrigentines, their riches, and the expence one of them was at for the entertainment of ſtrangers? he ſhould not have forgot, that that part of the city, which ſerved for a fortreſs, was built before the taking of Troy: that it was built, I ſay, by Dædalus the moſt able engineer of all antiquity. He fortified the place ſo well, that three or four men were able to defend it: which made king Cocalus reſolve to reſide there, and to lodge there all his treaſures (24). I would not have omitted the violent zeal of the Agrigentines againſt thoſe, whom the prætor Verres had ſent to the temple of Hercules, with orders to carry away the ſtatue. They forced the guards of the temple, and were a whole hour in removing that Hercules by ſtrength of arms and machines. But, notwithſtanding the darkneſs of the night, the Agrigentines had time to arm themſelves, and to drive the ſatellites of Verres out of the temple. As ſoon as the alarm was given, every body got up; and even old men, and infirm people, found ſtrength enough to go to the reſcue of Hercules. ‘ Ex clamore fama tota urbe percrebuit, expugnari deos pa- ‘ trios, non hoſtium adventu, neque repentino prædo- ‘ num impetu: ſed ex domo atque cohorte prætoria ‘ manum fugitivorum inſtructam, armatamque veniſſe. ‘ Nemo Agrigenti neque ætate tam affecta, neque ‘ viribus tam infirmis fuit, qui non illa nocte eo nun- ‘ cio excitatus, ſurrexerit, telumque, quod cuique ‘ ſors offerebat, arripuerit (25). This great zeal did not hinder the inhabitants from turning that adventure into a jeſt: for they ſaid, it ought to be added to the other labours of that God. ‘ Nunquam tan- ‘ tum mali eſt Siculis quin aliquid facete & commo- ‘ de dicant, velut in hac re: aiebant in labores Her- ‘ culis non minus hunc immaniſſimum Verrem, quam ‘ illum aprum Erymanthium inferre oportere (26).

GIFANIUS (Obertus), was a learned humaniſt, and a great civilian. He was a native of Buren in Gelderland. He ſtudied at Louvain and at Paris, and was the firſt that ſettled the German library at Orleans. He took, in that city, his degree of doctor of civil-law, in the year 1567, and went into Italy in the retinue of the ambaſſador of France; after which he removed into Germany, where he taught the civil-law with ſo much capacity, that he gained a great reputation. He taught it firſt at Straſburg, where he was firſt profeſſor of Philoſophy: Afterwards in the univerſity of Altdorf, and at laſt at Ingolſtadt. He renounced the Proteſtant religion to embrace the Romiſh. He was invited to the Imperial court, and honoured with the office of counſellor, and referendary to the emperor Rodolphus. He died at Prague the twenty ſixth of July 1609 [A], being above ſeventy (a) years old (b), if we may believe ſome authors; but ſome others, who are better informed, place his death in the year 1604 (c). He had acquired an eſtate; for he was a good œconomiſt [B]. He is accuſed of a notorious breach of truſt, with reſpect to Fruterius's manuſcripts [C]; and he, placed in the catalogue of plagiary writers

[A] He died at Prague the twenty ſixth (1) of July, 1609.] Swertius (2) and Valerius Andreas (3) ſay ſo; but I know not how to reconcile it with the Scaligerana, where Gifanius's death is mentioned. An Italian Jeſuit was preſent at his death; and, having plundered ſeveral of his papers, is gone to Rome (4). Now how could Scaliger ſay this, when he died the twenty firſt of January, 1609? To remove this difficulty, it may indeed be ſuppoſed, that a falſe report was raiſed of Gifanius's death, upon which Scaliger went; or that the compilers of the Scaligerana have inſerted in it ſeveral things, which they never heard Scaliger ſay; which may be obſerved in other places of that compilation. But the ſureſt way was to ſay that Swertius and Valerius Andreas are miſtaken, having not followed Thuanus, who has placed Gifanius's death in the year 1604.

[B] He was a good œconomiſt.] I have no other proof for it than theſe words of Scaliger (5). ‘ He ‘ was counſellor to the emperor; and, becauſe a mar- ‘ ried man muſt keep houſe, he ſent his wiſe back ‘ to Nuremberg. He was worth 25000 ducats, and yet ‘ lived in a garret. Liberis utebatur ut ſervis.’ This is beyond good husbandry: it is downright ſtingineſs.

[C] He is accuſed of a notorious breach of truſt, with reſpect to Fruterius's manuſcripts.] Fruterius, one of the great wits of his age, was at Paris, in the year 1566, with ſome other Flemings, Janus Douza, Obertus Gifanius, Janus Lernutius, &c. and died there the ſame year, being twenty five years of age (6). He had already collected a good number of critical obſervations, which, at his death, he recommended to Gifanius: who acted fraudulently, and ſuppreſſed them as much as he could; nor did he reſtore part of that truſt till after the complaints of Janus Douza. Read theſe words of Thuanus (7): ‘ Is (Fruterius) in puriore literatura cum excelleret, ‘ & jam multa commentatus eſſet, properata morte ‘ præpeditus omnia ea Gifanii judicio ac fidei com- ‘ miſit, qui pari fide minime uſus creditur, vixque ‘ lite à Jano Duza mota exorari potuit, ut paucula ‘ quæ ex tanta jactura, velut ex magno naufragio ‘ exiguæ tabulæ ſupererant, ſint publicata. Read alſo theſe verſes of Douza:

Adſuit ille quidem, fateor, lectique reſedit
Ante pedes, ſed non ut amici impendere, verum
Vulturis officium valido male poſſet amico:
Ut vel continuo patuit, cum Fruterius jam
Deficiens illi manuum monumenta ſuarum
Subjicienda operis prælorum traderet, atque,
Hæc mea ſint, Fanni, tibi, diceret, ut tua, curæ (8).

Cloſe by the bed, where ſick Fruterius lay,
Sat Fannius, watching, vultur-like, his prey.

---

(21) Auguſt. de Civit. Dei, lib. xxi, cap. v. See alſo cap. vii.

(22) He cites Pliny, lib. xxxi, c. He ſhould have ſaid, cap. vii. He ſhould have cited Thucydides, at lib. vi, and not at lib. v, and Cluverius, in Sicilia Antiqua, and not in Deſcr. Ital.

(23) Strabo, lib. vi, pag. 189.

(24) Diodor. Sicul. lib. iv.

(25) Cicero, in Verrem, Orat. VI, cap. xliii.

(26) Id. ibid.

(a) Seventy five, according to de Witte, in Diar. Biograph.

(b) Taken from Valer. Andreas, Biblioth. Belg. pag. 703.

(c) Thuan. lib. cxxxi, pag. m. 1041.

(1) The twenty fifth according to the Diarium Biographicum of Witte.

(2) Athen. Belg. pag. 587.

(3) Bibl. Belg. pag. 703.

(4) Scaligerana, pag. m. 94.

(5) Ibid.

(6) Thuan. Hiſt. lib. xxxviii, ad ann. 1566.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Douza, Sat. II, pag. 339. Edit. 1609.

writers [D]. His quarrels with Lambinus made a noiſe in the republic of letters

The ſage, as fainting he approach'd his end,
Entruſts his papers with this faithleſs friend:
Preſerve my works, he cried, when I am gone,
And guard theſe labours, Fannius, as your own.

Douza was ſo angry with Gifanius, upon the account of that diſhoneſty, that he forgot nothing to bring him to reaſon; and even implored the aſſiſtance of Giſelinus, to oblige the thief to reſtore the manuſcripts.

Quid tamen hæc, Giſeline, juvant, ſi Fannius hæres
Se premere æterna tot bona nocte cupit?
Ille cupit: ſed tu genio communis amici
Aſſertor venias, injiciaſque manus.
Tunc ego damnatus voti, de more ſacrabo
Prima quidem Nemeſi dona, ſecunda tibi.
Scis etenim quàm me mendaci læſerit ore,
Dum pia pro caris Manibus arma gero (9).

Yet what avails, my Giſelin, our care,
If Fannius, faithleſs Fannius, is his heir?
Who fain would bury in eternal night
Works, worthy of the day, and everlaſting light.
But thou, prevent ſo undeſerv'd an end,
And from oblivion ſnatch our common friend.
My ſolemn vow, perform'd, ſhall ſet me free,
And altars riſe to Nemeſis, and thee.
His ſlanderous tongue no longer ſhall prevail,
Nor, in our friend's defence, our pious warfare fail.

The tamen of the firſt verſe relates to a place, where Douza ſays, that Giſelinus was the firſt that had exclaimed againſt Gifanius's diſhoneſty.

At quota virtutum pars eſt tamen iſta tuarum?
Majus opus Fannî non tacuiſſe dolos,
Verbaque Frutericæ prima injeciſſe favillæ,
Nec dubiam factis exhibuiſſe fidem.
Non mihi Fruterium reddendo plura dediſſes:
Hoc quoque Fruterium reddere pæne fuit (10).

Small credit from ſuch acts to virtue ſprings;
Fannius expos'd more laſting honour brings.
Scarce had you merited a nobler prize,
(Such glory in detecting falſehood lies)
Reſtoring loſt Fruterius to our eyes.

He relates, in his ſecond ſatire, what he had done for the memory of the deceaſed, and againſt Gifanius.

Suſpectum ex illo cœpi obſervare, quid eſſet
Demum acturus, at ille vaſer malè diſſimulare,
Nec de ſe quicquam promittere, donec aperto
Spes mutata metu nos extorquere ſubegit
Editionis opus. mirum, quas perfidus hîc ſe
Verterit in facies, primùm civilia jura
Cauſſari: mox commentaria ſeſquipedali
Cæſaris ingeminare ſono, & cui nomen Agellî
Ipſe adeo primus vult reſtituiſſe videri.
Poſtremò, ipſe meas poſtponere res alienis
Nec volo, nec poſſum, nec debeo, dicere. quid te Longa ambage moror? ceſſi inde, nec ulterius mî
Ceſſandum ratus, Haud falles tamen improbe, dixi.
Nec mora, & archetypum exemplar clam nactus, & apta
Tempora, dum ſeſe miratur Fannius, & ſpe
Creſcentem tumida inflat utrem, præeunte fideli
Verba Syro, à capite ad calcem loca quæque notando
Deſcripſi ſapiens. hinc tempeſtatis origo,
Hinc illæ lachrymæ (11).

Suſpected once, I kept him in my eye;
But he nor promiſe made, nor wou'd deny.
What ſhapes he, Proteus-like, at firſt put on,
The publication of the work to ſhun?
He quoted Codes, the comment and the text,
With lofty tone; th' Imperial Edicts next,
And laſt Agellius; ſo he wou'd reſtore
The name, which Aulus Gellius was before.
Shall I neglect my own affairs, he cry'd?
Then, peremptory, our requeſt deny'd.
What's to be done? Repuls'd, I took my leave,
Reſolv'd he ſhou'd not thus our hopes deceive,
And, whilſt elate with pride he ſwell'd, I brib'd
His ſervant, and the manuſcript tranſcrib'd.

[D] He is placed in the catalogue of plagiary writers.] See the collection of the learned Thomaſius about that ſort of people. You will find in it (12) Gifanius loaded with all the reproaches you have juſt now read, and with ſeveral others. You will ſee there alſo theſe verſes of Douza:

Tu præter omnes alpha legulejorum
Burene quem inter buſtuarios Verres,
Plumis adornatum & colore furtivo,
Autumnitas Pontana nobilem fecit,
Notiſque Tranſrhenana inuſta frons Gallis (13).

You, before all, chief of the gowned tribe,
Burenus, whom amidſt funereal ſwords-men,
Adorn'd with plumes, and colours not your own,
Fruterius' Autumn render'd eminent,
And the French brand on the Tranſrhenane front.

You will ſee them, I ſay, accompanied with this note. ‘Autumnitas Pontana idem eſt quod Fruteriana, ſumebat enim Fruterius nomen Pontani, ut ſe Brugis (Pont, Bruke) natum ſignificaret: vide Reliquias ejus pag. 134. Notæ autem Gallæ ſunt quas Dionyſius Lambinus Gallus Giphanio quamquam ſuam potius quam Fruterii cauſam agens, tum initio coram auditoribus ſuis, tum poſtea in præfat. ad lectorem Lucretii tertium editi inuſſit. ——— The Autumnitas Pontana is the ſame as Fruteriana; for Fruterius took the name of Pontanus, to ſignify, that he was born at Bruges (Pont, Brucke): ſee his Remains, p. 134. As for the Notæ Gallæ, they ſignify the brand, which Dionyſius Lambinus, a Frenchman, fixed on Gifanius, both at firſt before his auditors, and afterwards in his preface to the reader of the third edition of his Lucretius; in which he vindicated himſelf, rather than Fruterius.’ You will find there likewiſe, that Giſelinus repented his having lent his Prudentius to Gifanius; who ſtole from Giſelinus the beſt things he found in it.

Atque utinam tantùm ſcires mea vulnera, nec te Luſiſſet plagiis improbus ille ſuis.
Illa dies nocuit, qua te ſibi credere primùm
Nobile Prudenti nomine ſuaſit opus.
Te quoque tunc animos vafra ſub vulpe latentes
Suſpicor, & Geldram perdidiciſſe fidem (14).

O! that my inj'ries had prevented thine,
And thou eſcap'd the plagiary's mine.
That day, when, unſuſpicious of a ſnare,
You truſted your Prudentius to his care;
That fatal day, his practis'd cunning gave
My friend the ſad experience of a knave.

When Douza writes in proſe, he is more moderate, and even ſpares the name of his adverſary: but however, he ſays, that Gifanius had adorned his Lucretius with the ſpoils of Fruterius: ‘Nec dubium quin de Giphanio intelligendum ſit, quod lego apud Valer. Andræam, pag. 629. Bibl. Belg. notaviſſe Janum Douſam ad Triumviros amoris, quæ in Lucretium adfecta Fruterius habuerit, iis non parùm adjutos fuiſſe, qui poſt Lambinum auctorem illum Collectaneis illuſtrârunt. Utique enim in Lucretium habentur collectanea Giphanii (15). —— Nor do I doubt, that Gifanius is meant in what I read in Valerius Andreas, Bibl. Belg. p. 629. that Janus Douza gave notice to the letters [E]. The occaſion of his falling out with the formidable Scioppius, was a puniſhment,

---

(9) Id. Epiſt. iii, pag. 412.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 411.

(11) Id. Sat. II, pag. 339.

(12) Num. 445, & ſeq.

(13) Douza, Ode in Felles Literarias, pag. 619.

(14) Douza, Epiſt. iii, pag. 412.

(15) Thomaſius de Plagio Literario, pag. 196.

'the triumvirs of love, that they, who, after Lambinus, adorned Lucretius with miſcellaneous notes, were not a little aſſiſted by what Fruterius wrote on that author. For we have the collections of Gifanius on Lucretius (15).'

[E] His quarrels with Lambinus made a noiſe in the Republic of Letters.] Lambinus did not content himſelf with complaining in his public lectures, that Gifanius had robbed him; but ſhewed his reſentment upon it, in his preface to his Lucretius, when he printed it the third time. Here follow the verſes concerning the invectives he made in his reading-deſk.

Nec libet antiquam plagii renovare querelam:
Quod te, felicem quondam, Lambine, cerebri,
Et vidi & pleno memini poſuiſſe theatro
Pariſiis, tunc cùm miſerandus & hoſtibus ipſis
Fannius introrſum detractâ pelle pateret.
Indignum ſcelus, & nullo ſatis igne piandum (16).

No more of that: already Fannius ſtands
Convict, and puniſh'd, Lambin, by thy hands;
When publickly, at Paris, you expos'd
His plagiariſm, and all his frauds diſclos'd.

Read theſe verſes of the ſecond ſatire:

- - - - Non ut ineptus
Fannius hic Fidentini genus, & plagii olim
Convictus, Lambine, tibi, cum fronte retecta
Furtivis riſum movit cornicula plumis (17).

Not like this Fannius, plagiary convict;
When, like the daw, her borrow'd feathers gone,
He ſtood unmask'd, the laughter of the town.

Gifanius, without being named in the preface (18), is treated there like a dog: the moſt abuſive language is there given him. 'Pag. xxvi. ipſi Giphanius eſt quidam omnium mortalium, qui unquam fuerunt, qui ſunt, qui erunt injuſtiſſimus, audaciſſimus, impudentiſſimus. p. xxx. audacem vocat, arrogantem, impudentem, ingratum, petulantem, inſidioſum, fallacem, infidum, nigrum. pag. ſeq. unum ex omnibus mortalibus nulla re magis, quàm feritate, importunitate, contumacia, ſuperbia, audacia, confidentia & impudentia excellentem (19). —— Pag. 26. Gifanius is to him, of all men, that ever were, are, or will be, the moſt unjuſt, moſt daring, and moſt impudent. pag. 30. he calls him impudent, arrogant, ungrateful, ſawcy, treacherous, deceitful, unfaithful, black. page the following, the man of all others excellent in nothing more than in ſavageneſs, importunity, contumacy, pride, confidence, and impudence.' The foundation of this abuſive language, is, that Gifanius had plundered, in the Lucretius of Dionyſius Lambinus, what he thought beſt in it, and had condemned the reſt, without acknowledging from whom he had borrowed what he had. 'Omnia fere, quæ in eo Lucretio recta ſunt, mea ſunt: quæ tamen iſte aut ſilentio prætermittit, aut maligne laudat, aut ſibi impudenter arrogat. Sic unde reprehendendi anſam arripere poteſt, ibi mihi petulantiſſimè inſultat, in eo me improbiſſimè inſectatur (20). —— Almoſt every thing in that Lucretius, that is right, is mine; which yet he either takes no notice of, or praiſes like an enemy, or impudently arrogates to himſelf. Thus, wherever he can have a handle for reproof, there he moſt ſaucily inſults me, and moſt unreaſonably inveighs againſt me.' Nevertheleſs, it is true, he acknowledged in his preface, that Lambinus's commentary had been very uſeful to him: 'Dionyſio autem Lambino & Adriano Turnebo duobus Franciæ ornamentis quantum debeatur præmii, quippe qui de hoc graviſſimo ſcriptore optimè ſint meriti, oratione mea quidem nequeam adſequi. Neque ſanè viri illi præſtantiſſimi à me id ut faciam expectant aut volunt, ſatis inclaruit eorum induſtria & eruditio incredibilis. Hoc tantum vereque teſtatum relinquere poſſum ac debeo, illorum maximè laboribus & ſolertia adjutum eſſe in his cujuſquemodi Emendationibus ac Notis comparandis (21). —— I cannot expreſs how much I am indebted to thoſe two ornaments of France, Dionyſius Lambinus, and Adrianus Turnebus, who have deſerved the beſt of this moſt excellent writer. Nor do thoſe worthy men expect or deſire it of me; their own induſtry and incredible learning are too well known. This alone I can and ought to acknowledge, that I was chiefly aſſiſted by their ſkillful labours in compiling theſe emendations and notes.' Here are a great many commendations; but they came too late, and could not cure the wound made in the preceding page; wherein it was ſaid, that the public was now preſented with a Lucretius much better than that of Lambinus; and that, for all Lambinus's erudition, the public had not yet the true Lucretius. Gild that pill with encomiums as long as you pleaſe, and you will never take away it's bitterneſs. It will ever preſerve it's ill taſte, and ſet choler, and all other bad humours, in motion. Here is the whole paſſage, which, taken altogether, is diſobliging. 'Tandem Dionyſius Lambinus libros manu deſcriptos complures feliciſſimè nactus; adjutus etiam doctiſſ. virorum, in iis præcipuè Adriani Turnebi, & Joh. etiam Aurati opera, ipſe incredibili diligentia & eruditione præditus, à pluribus iiſque turpiſſimis mendis Lucretium liberavit. Sed quia tam fœdè eſſet contaminatus, uti adhuc præſtantiſſimus poeta nomine tantùm fuerit notus; illi recuſantibus medicinam adhibere eruditis viris, ut ſi deſperatus eſſet ac depoſitus: efficere ille quamvis doctus & diligens (quod pace viri doctiſſ. dictum velim) non potuit, ut purum ac merum haberemus Titum. Nos igitur etſi id quoque præſtare non potuimus, ſpero tamen id nos conſecutos, ut multis jam partibus melior & emendatior in hominum manibus eſſe poſſit optimus Romani ſermonis auctor (22). —— At length, Dionyſius Lambinus, having luckily met with ſeveral manuſcripts, and being aſſiſted by ſome learned men, particularly Adrian Turnebus, and John Auratus, being himſelf likewiſe a perſon of incredible diligence and learning, corrected many ſhameful errors in Lucretius. But, as that author was ſo very incorrect, that he was known to be a moſt excellent poet only by name, the learned refuſing to adminiſter phyſic to one given over, as it were, and buried, this critic, with all his learning and diligence, could not give us a true and genuine Lucretius. Therefore, though the ſame was out of my power likewiſe, yet I hope I have given the world a much better and more correct edition of this beſt of Latin poets.' I know not, any more than Thomaſius, whether Gifanius defended himſelf againſt Lambinus (23); I only know that he complained of it to Muret (24), and had recourſe to recrimination. He pretended, that his corrections upon Cicero and Cornelius Nepos had been pirated by Lambinus, whom he alſo accuſed of a ſhameful lie. Lambinus, ſays he, boaſted of the friendſhip of all the Flemings, who ſtudied at Paris, except Gifanius, and named a dozen of them, whoſe very names he had not known, had he not uſed an artifice. Theſe are Gifanius's words: 'De Lambino, φεῦ τῆς ἀναιδείας! in quem ut omnia pulchrè conveniant, accipe & aliud ejus ſtratagema. Cùm Lutetiæ thyrſum, non Lucretianum illum, ſed ſuum in me quatere inſtituiſſet, (ego interim domi virgam tàm pueriliter peccanti minitabar,) primâ concione dixit, cum Belgis omnibus familiaritatem ſibi eſſe, me unum ſibi malè cupere: protulitque duodecim ferè Belgarum nomina, qui tùm ibi agerent ſtudiorum cauſa, (conferenda ſunt cum his, quæ ſcribit Lambin. ad Lect. tertiæ ed. Lucret. p. xxxi, xxxii.) Multi ex his admirari hanc publicam teſtationem & citationem, quod illum ne ſalutaſſent quidem, me autem uterentur familiariſſimè; imo eo ipſo tempore epigrammata in illum partim proſcripſiſſent, ad me accurrerunt, & acumen Lambini, arteſque ejus oratorias mihi expoſuerunt. Mirantibus omnibus, unde eorum nomina collegiſſet, intervenit mox ejus convictor Bruxellenſis, qui ſcrupulum illum nobis exemit: ſe namque rogatum & coactum fuiſſe Lambino petenti domi aliquot Belgarum nomina dictare, cauſæ ignarum. Atque ita res in riſum abiit (25). —— To ſhew you, that Lambinus is conſiſtent with himſelf, here is another of his ſtratagems. Being at Paris, and reſolving to ſhake the Thyrſus, not Lucretius's, but his own, againſt me; (in the mean time I threatened this childiſh offender with the rod, at my own houſe) the firſt harangue he made,

(15) Thomaſius, de Plagio Literario, pag. 196.

(16) Douza, Sat. I, pag. 336.

(17) Id. pag. 338.

(18) Ego autem nunquam abducar ut eum nominatim deſcribam. Lambinus, Præf. tertiæ edit. Lucretii, pag. xxviii, apud Thomaſium, pag. 197.

(19) Thomaſius, ibid.

(20) Lambinus, pag. xxix, apud Thomaſ. ibid. Note, That I have verified the quotations of Lambinus's preface alledged by Thomaſius.

(21) Gifan. Præf. in Lucret. fol. m. * * 2.

(22) Id. ibid. fol. * * verſo.

(23) Quid Douzæ, quid Lambino ipſi ad iſtas accuſationes reſponderit Giphanius, fateor ignorare me Thomaſ. pag. 198.

(24) Thomaſius, pag. 199, 200, ſets down all the paſſages of the letters from Gifanius to Muret, and Muret's anſwers.

(25) Gifanius ad Muretum, Epiſt. lxxviii, lib. i, inter Epiſtolas Mureti apud Thomaſium, pag. 200.

puniſhment, which he deſerved by Lex Talionis [F]. That affair is curious enough. You will find the title of moſt of his works in Moreri's dictionary, where, by a ridiculous miſtake, Hubert Giphani, and Obertus Giphanius, are mentioned as two diſtinct perſons.

‘made, he ſaid, that all the Dutch, except myſelf, wiſhed him well; upon which he produced the names of about twelve Hollanders, who then ſtudied there; many of them were ſurprized at this public appeal, ſince they had not ſo much as ſaluted him, but had been intimately converſant with me; nay, at that very time, they had partly written epigrams againſt him, and had run to me, and ſhewed me the wit and oratory of Lambinus. While they were all wondering, whence he had their names, comes in one, who had boarded with him at Bruſſels, and informed us, that Lambinus had preſſed him, he knew not why, to dictate to him the names of ſome Hollanders, and ſo the whole was turned into laughter.' It is a melancholy conſideration, that polite learning cannot keep thoſe, who profeſs it, from the diſorder of paſſions!

Muret was not the only man, whom Gifanius made the confident of his complaints: for there was lately publiſhed a letter, which Gifanius wrote to Theodore Canterus in the year 1567, wherein we find theſe words (26): ‘Præterea noſti quemadmodum mea compilarit, meque tractarit Lambinus in Æmilium Probum, cujus rei teſtes habeo epiſtolas Mureti, quas & tu jam divulgatas videre potuiſti, & Puteani cujus auctoritate Lambinus abutitur inviti, &c. — You know beſides, how Lambinus, in his comment on Æmilius Probus, plundered me; for the truth of which I appeal to the letters of Muretus, which you may have ſeen in print, and thoſe of Puteanus, whoſe authority Lambinus abuſes, againſt his will.' Gifanius wrote to the ſame Canterus, in the year 1567, what follows (27): ‘Ille qui ea fulmina in me jacit anne ut divinavi eſt Ludovicus Carrion, quem mihi nomen amiciſſimum putavi. Certe eum eſſe indicavit Dn. Bombergus. Sic Lucretiana mea ubique vapulant, ſed tua & tui ſimilium amicitia fretus vana illa fulmina eſſe judico. —— He, who darts this thunder at me, is he not, as I gueſſed, Lewis Carrion, whom I looked upon as my friend. Bombergus has plainly ſhewn, that this is he. Thus my labours on Lucretius ſuffer on all ſides; but relying on the friendſhip of you, and ſuch as yourſelf, I deſpiſe their thunder.'

I ſhall ſay, by the way, that Scaliger is not very proper to make us believe, that Gifanius was not a plagiary. Gifanius, ſays he (28), was learned; his Lucretius is very good: I ſent him ſince ſome good remarks upon Lucretius, which he has kept, and ſays, he has not received them, and deſigns to publiſh them as his own . . . . He had ſtolen from L. Fruterius his Agellius, which was ready for the preſs.

[F] The occaſion of his falling out with the formidable Scioppius, was a puniſhment, which he deſerved by Lex Talionis.] Scioppius, having obtained from Conradus Ritterſhuſius, at whoſe houſe he lodged at Altdorf, a letter of recommendation to Obertus Gifanius, profeſſor at Ingolſtadt, inſinuated himſelf into the favour of that profeſſor; and, having free acceſs to his houſe, he found means, upon a certain day, to viſit the library, during the abſence of it's maſter, and to take out of it a manuſcript of Symmachus. He copied alſo as much as he pleaſed out of a work in manuſcript of Gifanius, and found in it materials to ſet up for a critic; and, when Gifanius loudly complained of it, the plagiary called him a thouſand names. This is what Scaliger's friends relate againſt Scioppius. ‘In ædes primum, mox in animum, poſtea in Bibliothecam abſentis penetravit Giphanii, cui MS. Symmachi codicem ſubduxit: libros vero obſervationum linguæ Latinæ, invito domino percurrit, & ex iis quæ voluit furtim ſublegit. E quibus partim, emendationibus Plautinis, quas è Camerarii membranis deſcriptas in ſuo Ritterſhuſius codice adnotarat, partim etiam reliquiis ſchedarum Modii, quas ab ampliſſimo Velſero, ſummo literarum patrono acceperat; duos illos, quibus primum innotuit, libellos corraſit . . . . Quod quidem plagium cum paſſim voce paſſim literis teſtaretur Giphanius, in præceptorem ſuum & doctiſſimum hominem erupit hæc vipera, & quæcunque undique poterat convitia in eum contorſit (29).' Here is what Scioppius anſwers: I. He quotes two paſſages in his works (30), wherein he acknowledges his obligations to Gifanius, for the communication of Symmachus's manuſcript. II. He confeſſes, that thoſe two paſſages were but a jeſt (31); for, adds he, Gifanius never let me ſee but once that manuſcript; and when I deſired it of him a ſecond time, he anſwered me: Sir, for a man to aſk of me my Symmachus, is the ſame as if he ſhould aſk my leave to lie with my wife: Symmachum à me petere perinde eſt atque uxorem meam utendam poſtulare (32). III. That Gifanius, who had ſtolen that manuſcript at Venice, out of the library of cardinal Beſſarion, would neither publiſh it himſelf, nor ſuffer others to publiſh it. ‘Erat autem liber ille Symmachi ex Beſſarionis Bibliotheca Venetiis furto Gifanii ſublatus (velut Wolfgangus Zundelinus indicium Scioppio fecit) quem ille neque ut ederet, neque ut Ritterſhuſio id petenti edendum daret, ullis precibus aut muneribus induci potuit (33).' IV. That Scioppius, leaſt the public ſhould be ſo long deprived of that treaſure, was extreamly kind to Gifanius, and invited him often to ſupper; but that all this was to no purpoſe, though that profeſſor loved mightily to eat and drink at his friend's houſe. ‘Scioppius ne literarum ſtudioſis liber ejuſmodi diutius deberetur, Giphanium creberrime ad cœnam vocando demulcere (vix enim ullam diem toto anno elabi ſibi Gifanius ſinebat, quin foris cœnaret, ac plerumque Menelai Homerici exemplo invocatus amicis condiceret) & Symmachi copiam ab eo impetrare ſtuduit, ſed fruſtra (34).' V. That, ſeeing this obſtinacy, he aſſociated himſelf with three civilians, to get ſecretly that manuſcript; and that, having made uſe of it, he put it in it's place again the next day. VI. That the ſubtilty, with which he gueſſed where that manuſcript lay hid, ſurpaſſes all the cunning of the critics that have commented upon Symmachus. ‘Unica illa conjectura ſua quo loco Symmachi codex in Gifanii Bibliotheca ſitus foret, omnium Criticorum quotquot ei ſcriptori operam navarunt ingenium & acumen longè ſuperavit (35).' VII. That it is falſe that he ſtole that manuſcript, ſince he kept it but one night, that others might have the benefit of it. ‘Rem quoque malo furto acquiſitam poſſeſſori ſuo nequaquam ſubduxerit (velut tu mentiris) ſed uſum ejus unius noctis lucubratione cum aliis communicavit (36).' VIII. As for the other manuſcript, he owns, he had it in his hands, through the means of Gifanius's Amanuenſis; and that he took the beſt things out of it, tho' not with a deſign to arrogate them to himſelf, ſince he ſuffered ſeveral lovers of fine Latin to write out copies of it (37). IX. He pretends he has publickly acknowledged the benefit he received from that work. ‘De obſervationibus Grammaticis fateri puta Scioppium cum præfatione diſputationis de injuriis ita Giphanium alloquitur, Ego multa ex te quamvis inſcio & invito didici.' I do not wonder Gifanius fell into ſuch a paſſion; for who could bear ſuch tricks? Scioppius owns enough to perſuade his readers, that he was not an honeſt man. The worſt of all for Gifanius was, that people laughed at his anger. Hoc ut reſcivit Giphanius, tantum non in furorem redactus eſt, omnibuſque viris doctis etiam amicis ſuis deridiculo fuit (38).

I have heard the illuſtrious Mr Grævius ſay, that he had ſeen, in the hands of Frederic Gronovius, a letter from Philip Pareus, by which Gronovius was informed, that the manuſcript of Gifanius's obſervations on the Latin tongue had been found again, and that it would thereby be eaſy to diſcover Scioppius's plagiariſms.

GILLES (Peter) miniſter of the reformed church of la Tour in the Vale of Luſerne, compoſed, by order of his ſuperiors, an Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory of the Churches of the Vaudois, and publiſhed it at Geneva, in 1644, in 4to. He was then ſeventy three years old. He had already publiſhed other works [A].

---

(26) See the letters, which Mr Matthæus, profeſſor of civil-law at Leyden, has publiſhed there in 1695, pag. 97.

(27) Ibid.

(28) Scaligerana, pag. 93.

(29) See the ſatire, Hercules tuam fidem, where there is an appendix, intituled, Vita & Parentes Gaſpar. Scioppii, pag. 145, 146.

(30) The preface to his Veriſimilia, and the fifteenth letter of his Suſpectæ Lectiones.

(31) Iſta Scioppium non ſerio ſed joco tantum ſcripſiſſe Oporinus Grubinius Amphot. Sciopp. pag. 130.

(32) Ibid.

(33) Ibid.

(34) Ib. pag. 140.

(35) Ibid.

(36) Ib. pag. 141.

(37) Cum ei Giphanii amanuenſis librum illum obſervationum attuliſſet, cum iiſdem Juriſconſultis, amicis ſuis, operas partitus intra paucos dies quidquid in eo minus pervulgatum eſſe videretur, deſcripſit, & paſſim poſtea aliis linguæ Latinæ ſtudioſis, etiam ſacrilego illi Guldinaſto deſcribendi copiam fecit. Ibid.

(38) Ibid.

[A] He had already publiſhed other works.] I have ſaid elſewhere (1), that the prior Marco Aurelio Rorenco publiſhed, in 1634, an apology for a piece he had written in 1632. Our Peter Gilles refuted this apology by a work, intituled, Conſiderations on the Apologetical Letters of the Sieurs Marco Aurelio Rorenco, prior of Luſerne, and Theodorus Belvederenſis, Prefect of the monks (2). The other replied by a Latin work, intituled, Turris contra Damaſcum, id eſt Tutela Eccleſiæ Romanæ contra Calviniſtarum incurſiones objecta conſiderationibus cujuſdam Miniſtri P. Gillio ſubſcripti ædificata cum propugnaculis à Fr. Theodoro Belvederenſi, &c. This work was printed at Turin, in 1636, and refuted ſoon after by the Sieur Gilles, who replied likewiſe to another book, which the ſame monk had publiſhed in Italian, under the title of Lucerna della Chriſtiana Verita per conoſcer la vera Chieſa e la falſa preteſa Reformata; he replied to it, I ſay, by an Italian work, intituled, Torre Evangelica, divided into forty eight chapters, the contents of which he gives in his Hiſtory of the Vaudois (3). He does the ſame with regard to his anſwer to another Italian book, which Belvederenſis dedicated to Meſſ. de la propaganda, to inform them of the ſtate of the reformed churches of the Vaudois, and of their order, doctrine, and ceremonies, inſinuating obliquely at the end, that they ought to be exterminated (4).

(1) In the article RORENCO.

(2) See his Hiſtory of the Vaudois, pag. 540.

(3) Ibid. pag. 542, & ſeq.

(4) Ibid. pag. 545, & ſeq.

GIOACHINO GRECO, known under the name of the CALABRIAN, played at Cheſs ſo ſkillfully, that it cannot be thought ſtrange, that I conſecrate to him a little article. All thoſe, who excel in their profeſſion, to a certain degree, deſerve that diſtinction. This gameſter did not find his match any where: He went to all the courts of Europe, and ſignalized himſelf there at Cheſs in a moſt ſurprizing manner. He found famous gameſters at the court of France, ſuch as the duke of Nemours, Mr Arnaud, colonel of the Carabineers, Chaumont, and La Salle; but, though they pretended to know more than others, none of them was able to play with him; nor could they cope with him all together. He was at Cheſs a bravo; who ſought in all countries ſome famous knight, with whom he might fight, and break a lance; and he found none whom he did not overcome. A wit made ſome Verſes upon that ſubject (a) [A]. See above, the article BOI.

(a) Taken from a letter, inſerted in the Mercure Galant for the month of Decem. 1693.

[A] A wit made ſome verſes upon that ſubject.] Moſt readers would be angry with me, if I ſhould acquaint them with this, without producing the verſes themſelves. I muſt therefore tranſcribe them.

A peine dans la carriere
Contre moi tu fais un pas
Que par ta demarche fiere
Tous mes projets ſont à bas.
Je vois dès que tu t'avances
Ceder toutes mes defenſes,
Tomber tous mes champions,
Dans ma reſiſtance vaine
Roi, Chevalier, Roc, & Reine
Sont moindres que des Pions (1).

As ſoon as in the field thou mov'ſt a ſtep,
Thy haughty march confounds my whole deſign:
I ſee, at thy approach, my men diſmay'd;
My knights and biſhops make but faint reſiſtance;
My rock, and even the queen, forſake their king.

(1) From the letter inſerted in the Mercure Galant, Dec. 1693.

GIRAC (Paul Thomas Sieur de): See THOMAS.

GLAPHYRA, wife to Archelaus, high-prieſt of Bellona, at Comana in Cappadocia, procured kingdoms for her two ſons by her beauty. She flouriſhed at the ſame time with Marc Antony. There are hiſtorians, who do not expreſsly ſay, that ſhe was diſhoneſt, but content themſelves to give us implicitly to underſtand it [A] by relating what Marc Antony did for her ſake: But Dion, without any ſoftening calls her a leud woman [B]. It is indeed very probable, conſidering the temper of Marc Antony, that he did not give crowns for the bare ſatisfaction of obliging a handſome woman; and that he received from Glaphyra all the acknowledgments, which a voluptuous man is capable to wiſh and exact. The noiſe of this intrigue ſpread as far as Rome; and Fulvia, Marc Antony's wife, would fain have engaged Auguſtus to revenge the infidelity of her huſband. Her deſires in this matter were ſo violent, that ſhe threatened Auguſtus with a declaration of war, if he did not uſe her, as her huſband uſed Glaphyra: But Auguſtus ſlighted that threatening, and choſe rather to expoſe himſelf to an open war, than to be Fulvia's gallant. This is at leaſt what he would have the world think of him: For he compoſed upon it an epigram, which Martial has inſerted in his poems [C]. I know not by what fatality Glaphyra's huſband did not find [A] There are hiſtorians, who do not expreſsly ſay that ſhe was diſhoneſt; but content themſelves to give us implicitly to underſtand it.] Appian is the man I have in view: ſee how he ſpeaks, when he relates what Marc Antony did in Aſia, after the defeat of Brutus and Caſſius: Diſceptationes quoque civitatum ac regum ex arbitrio ſuo compoſuit, Siſinnæ Ariarathiſque in Cappadocia, prælato Siſinna in Glaphyræ matris formoſæ gratiam (1). It was in the 713th year of Rome, that Siſinna was made king of Cappadocia, upon the excluſion of Ariarathes. He did not long enjoy that crown; for we are going to ſee, that, in 718, Ariarathes reigned in Cappadocia.

[B] Dion . . . . . calls her a leud woman.] It is when he ſpeaks of the change of government, which was made by Marc Antony in ſeveral provinces of Aſia, in the year 718. Amyntas, who had been ſecretary to Dejotarus, was put in poſſeſſion of Galatia, and of ſome parts of Lycaonia and Pamphylia. Ariarathes was turned out of Cappadocia, and Archelaus put in his place: Archelaus, I ſay, who was deſcended from the Archelai, who had made war againſt the Romans, and ſon to the courtezan Glaphyra. Ὁ δ᾽ Ἀρχέλαος οὗτος, πρὸς μὲν πατρὸς, ἐκ τῶν Ἀρχελάων ἐκείνων τῶν τοῖς Ῥωμαίοις ἀντιπολεμησάντων ἦν, ἐκ δὲ μητρὸς ἑταίρας Γλαφύρας ἐγεγέννετο. Archelai vero hujus genus paternum deducebatur ab Archelais qui contra Romanos belligeraverant, mater autem ei erat ſcortum Glaphyra (2).

[C] Auguſtus compoſed upon it an epigram, which Martial has inſerted in his poems.] If I inſert it here, it is only after I have taken out of it the moſt ſcandalous words (3).

(1) Appian. lib. v, de Bell. Civil. pag. m. 392.

(2) Dio, lib xlix, pag. 469. D.

(3) Martial. Epig. xxi, lib xi. See the remark [F] of the article LYCORIS.

find in Cæſar the ſame ſupport, which her ſons had in Marc Antony. I have already ſaid, that he was high-prieſt of Bellona, which was a conſiderable dignity. Cæſar beſtowed it upon a great lord, named Lycomedes [D], who founded his pretenſions upon good titles. Where was Glaphyra at that time? If ſhe had pleaded her huſband's cauſe before Cæſar, ſhe had made it appear, that Lycomedes's pretenſions were ill grounded: And the judge, I ſuppoſe, had been too well bred, not to declare himſelf for a prieſt, who had ſo handſome a wife. I ſhould be glad to know, what reaſon a wit had for ſaying (a), that the Glaphyra of Auguſtus's epigram was the player Cytheris. We ſhall ſee, in the following article, that Glaphyra pretended to be deſcended from the kings of Perſia.

Cæſaris Auguſti laſcivos livide verſus
Sex lege, qui triſtis verba Latina legis.

Quod . . . Glaphyram Antonius, hanc mihi pœnam
Fulvia conſtituit, ſe quoque uti . .
Fulviam ego ut . . . quid ſi me Manius oret
Pædicem, faciam? non puto ſi ſapiam.
Aut . . . aut pugnemus ait. Quid quæ mihi vita
Carior eſt ipſa mentula? ſigna canant.

Abſolvis lepidos nimirum Auguſte libellos
Qui ſcis Romana ſimplicitate loqui.

Father Noris imagined that Auguſtus made that epigram againſt Marc Antony, and with an intent to reproach him with that unlawful commerce (4): but the blow is not at all levelled againſt Marc Antony, but againſt his wife Fulvia; and, indeed, it is the crueleſt blow that ſatire can ſtrike againſt a woman. I make the leſs ſcruple of taking the liberty to mark that ſmall miſtake of the learned library-keeper of the Vatican, becauſe he would be glad to ſay, that he has not examined that ſort of verſes, and takes a pride in miſtaking them. His error is infinitely leſs, than that of Farnaby, who has found, in thoſe verſes, a proteſtation of Auguſtus, that he preferred chaſtity before life. We ſhall ſee, in the article LYCORIS, that ſome people pretend, that the courtezan Cytheris is meant in Auguſtus's epigram.

[D] Cæſar conferred her husband's dignity upon a great lord, named Lycomedes.] I have already ſaid, in another place (5), that Hirtius calls him Nicomedes: let us quote his words; 'Id (Bellonæ templum) homini 'nobiliſſimo Nicomedi Bithynio adjudicavit, qui regio 'Cappadocum genere ortus propter adverſam fortunam 'majorum ſuorum mutationemque generis jure minime 'dubio, vetuſtate tamen intermiſſo, Sacerdotium id 'repetebat (6). —— He adjudged the temple of Bellona to Nicomedes, a noble Bithynian, who, being deſcended from the kings of Cappadocia, claimed that prieſthood, by an undoubted right, which, thro' the misfortunes of his anceſtors, had lain long dormant.' Theſe words intimate, that there were ſome diſputes, before Cæſar, touching the poſſeſſion of that benefice. Now ſince Strabo affirms, that Lycomedes enjoyed it after Archelaus, it may ſeem, that the diſpute was between them two. This is the opinion, of Father Noris, who made no difficulty to affirm (7), that Archelaus enjoyed the pontificate of Bellona, till Cæſar took it from him, in the year 707, to beſtow it upon Lycomedes. According to this ſuppoſition, it may be asked, where were, then, Glaphyra's charms, and why did ſhe not make uſe of them againſt Lycomedes's demands? her beauty was undoubtedly more powerful at that time, than in 713; for that is not a fruit, that grows better by coming to maturity. Did her husband hide her, and rather chuſe to loſe his prieſthood, than expoſe his wife to the dangerous courtſhip of Cæſar? it is what I know nothing of.

(a) Nouveaux Dialogues des Morts, Part. II, Dial. iv, pag. m. 28.

(4) Hinc (that is from what has been quoted out of Appian) argumentum obſcœni Epigrammatis Auguſtus poſtea ſumpſit, quod Antonio objicit apud Martialem. Noris, Cenotaph. Piſan. pag. 225.

(5) See the remark [D] of the article ARCHELAUS, king of Cappadocia.

(6) Hirtius de Bello Alexandr.

(7) In Cenotaph. Piſan. pag. 225.

GLAPHYRA, grand-child to the former, was the daughter of Archelaus, king of Cappadocia. Her firſt huſband was Alexander, the ſon of Herod and Mariamne; and being proud and infatuated with her nobility, ſhe no way contributed to maintain an union in the family, into which ſhe was married: A family, whoſe diviſions rendered Herod the moſt unhappy and moſt criminal of all fathers. Glaphyra boaſted at every turn, that her father traced his origin to Temenus (a); that her mother deſcended from Darius, the ſon of Hyſtaſpes; and that therefore her noble birth ſet her above the reſt of the ladies at court. She looked down with contempt upon the ſiſters and wives of Herod; and reproached theſe, that their beauty, not their birth, had raiſed them to the rank they held. Nothing was more apt, than ſuch diſcourſes, to ſet Herod's family in a flame: And it is certain that this pride of Glaphyra was one of the firſt cauſes of her huſband's death. She rendered him odious, and encreaſed the deſire they had to deſtroy him by calumnies and artifices (b). When Herod cauſed Alexander to be tried for his life, Glaphyra was examined as an evidence: Her anſwer deſerves to be related [A]. After Alexander's execution, Herod ſent back Glaphyra to her father Archelaus, and kept with him the two ſons Alexander had by that woman (c). Joſephus pretends, that ſhe was married again to Juba king of Libya; and that, after the death of this ſecond huſband, ſhe returned to her father; but it is eaſy to prove that to be falſe [B], if it be meant of Juba king of Mauritania. It is certain, that Archelaus,

[A] Her anſwer deſerves to be related.] She underwent the interrogatory before her husband, who was faſt bound, like a ſon, who had conſpired againſt his father's life. That ſpectacle grieved her extremely, and made her fetch moſt lamentable groans. Her husband being preſſed to confeſs, whether his wife was an accomplice in the attempt, anſwered, that he was not the man, that would keep any thing ſecret from a wife, by whom he had children, and who was dearer to him than his own life. Thereupon ſhe proteſted her innocence, and declared, ſhe would not ſcruple to tell a lie, if thereby ſhe could contribute to ſave her husband's life though with the loſs of her own; but that otherwiſe ſhe would confeſs all. The husband made then his confeſſion, and ſaid, they had both no other deſign, than to go to Archelaus's court, and from thence to Rome (1).

[B] It is eaſy to prove that to be falſe.] Joſephus mentions that marriage of Glaphyra with Juba king of Libya, as a thing certain (2); adding, that Juba was dead, when Glaphyra was married to Archelaus. Here is a demonſtration, that this cannot be underſtood of the king of Mauritania. Juba, king of Mauritania, was not dead (3), when Strabo compoſed his ſixth book. Now Strabo compoſed it in the reign of Tiberius (4); therefore Juba was not dead, when Archelaus, Herod's ſon, married Glaphyra, ſince he married her during his proſperity, and conſequently before the year of Rome 759, which was that of his diſgrace: for it was then, that Auguſtus confined him to Vienna. Auguſtus lived ſeven or eight years after that. It may be proved, that Strabo wrote his ſixth book about the fifth year of Tiberius? for in the fourth book (5), he takes notice, that Tiberius and Druſus

(a) I ſuppoſe ſhe meant him, who was one of the three chiefs of the Heraclidæ, on their return into Peloponneſus; ſo that ſhe pretended, that her father deſcended from Hercules.

(b) Ex Joſepho de Bello Jud. lib. i, cap. xvii.

(c) Id. ibid. cap. xviii, & Antiq. lib. xvii, cap. i.

(1) Ex Joſepho Antiquit. lib. xvi, cap. xvi.

(2) Antiquit. lib. xvii, cap. xv, de Bell. Jud. lib. ii, cap. xi.

(3) Strabo, lib. vi, pag. 198.

(4) Ibid. pag. 199, quæ eſt ultima lib. vi.

(5) Pag. 142, ſub fin.

laus, the ſon of Herod, fell ſo paſſionately in love with her, that in order to marry her, he put away his own wife (d). It is ſaid, that, Glaphyra lived not long after her return into Judæa, by reaſon of a marriage ſo oppoſite to the Jewiſh laws; and hiſtory mentions a dream, which preſaged her death [C]. The two ſons ſhe had by Alexander, her firſt huſband, renounced betimes the Jewiſh religion (e); becauſe, I ſuppoſe, Archelaus, their grand-father by their mother's ſide, ſent for, and took care of them. One of them was called Alexander, and the other Tigranes: I ſhall ſay ſomething of their adventures in the remarks [D]. If we may truſt the chronology of ſome modern authors [E], we muſt rank the two Glaphyra's amongſt the women, who preſerved their beauty to old age.

Druſus had ſubdued the Norici thirty three years before (6). It would be needleſs to remark after this, that Dion (7) mentions king Juba as a prince, that was alive the ſame year, in which he places Archelaus's baniſhment. It may be gathered from the fourth book of Tacitus's Annals, that Juba died about the tenth year of Tiberius; for that hiſtorian mentions him (8) as a man who was living in the 776th year of Rome; but, in the following year, he ſpeaks of the reign of Ptolemy, ſon of Juba (9). The ſeventeenth book of Strabo was compoſed ſoon after the death of the ſame Juba (10); and therefore it is plain, that Joſephus would be groſsly miſtaken, if by the king of Libya, whom he mentions as ſecond husband of Glaphyra, he had meant the king of Mauritania. Father Noris (11) would clear Joſephus but from part of his miſtake, ſuppoſing he had reaſon to conjecture, that Glaphyra was put away by Juba. What Joſephus declares concerning the death of the ſecond husband, as antecedent to the marriage of Archelaus and Glaphyra, would ſtill be falſe: but after all, this divorce is nothing but a meer ſuppoſition. Noldius (12) ſuppoſes a thing, which is, perhaps, leſs uncertain, to wit, that Joſephus meant, by Juba king of Libya, a king, who had nothing to do with the Romans, and whoſe widow Glaphyra was, when Archelaus fell in love with her. That author maintains (13), that Libya is taken for all Africa in general, or for certain parts of Africa in particular; but that, in this laſt ſignification, it never comprehends Mauritania: from whence he takes occaſion to cenſure (14) Sigiſmundus Gelenius, who has tranſlated Regem Mauritaniæ, the words uſed by Joſephus in ſpeaking of Juba king of Libya, Τῶν Διϐύων. He cenſures yet more ſtrongly father Salian, who thought that Juba was killed in the fight, mentioned by Dion (15) in his fifty fifth book. It is the battle, in which the Getuli, who had revolted, and refuſed obedience to Juba, gained the victory. That Jeſuit obſerves, in order to ſupport his opinion, that Juba was then dead; that his widow was returned to her father's houſe, and that ſhe had married a third husband, viz. Archelaus, ethnarch of Judæa. He quotes Joſephus, but he ſhould have remembred, that the ſame year, wherein the Getuli gained the victory, mentioned by Dion, Archelaus was baniſhed by Auguſtus. It is therefore true, that Juba was ſtill alive, the year, wherein Archelaus was baniſhed beyond the Alps; and conſequently it is falſe, that his widow was Archelaus's wife: for it would be abſurd to ſuppoſe, that he married her but a few days before his diſgrace, which happened in the ninth or tenth year of his ethnarchy: So that the very paſſage, which father Salian has quoted out of Dion, ſuffices to convince him of a blunder.

[C] Mention is made of a dream which preſaged her death.] I mention it with the moral reflexions, which the hiſtorian has added to it (16). 'As ſhe was with her laſt husband Archelaus, ſhe dreamed, that Alexander came to her, and that ſhe embraced him for joy. But Alexander reproached her, ſaying; Glaphyra, thou haſt made good the common proverb, that women are not to be truſted. I married thee a virgin; I have made thee a mother to our common children: and now, having quite forgot our love, thou haſt been taken with the deſire to marry a ſecond husband. Nor haſt thou been contented with putting ſuch an affront upon me, but haſt dared to lie with a third husband, creeping baſely and imprudently into my family: and can'ſt thou now bear my brother Archelaus to be thy husband? As for me, I ſhall never forget thy former love; and I ſhall free thee from ſuch a reproach, by making thee mine, as thou waſt before. Having declared this dream to ſome women her familiar acquaintance, ſhe died ſoon after. I thought this ſtory deſerved to be recited, and that it was not impertinent in this place, wherein I ſpeak of thoſe kings: and, beſides, this example is particularly remarkable, ſince it contains a moſt certain proof of the immortality of the ſoul, and of divine providence. If theſe things ſeem incredible to any man, let him enjoy his own opinion: but at the ſame time, let him not endeavour to make thoſe diſbelieve it, who, by ſuch examples, are incited to the ſtudy and practice of virtue.'

[D] I ſhall ſay ſomething of the adventures of her two ſons in the remarks.] Tigranes was king of Armenia, and died without iſſue (17). Joſephus ſays only, that the Romans accuſed him: he ſhould have added, that Tiberius cauſed him to be put to death (18). Alexander, Tigranes's brother, had a ſon called Tigranes, on whom Tiberius beſtowed the kingdom of Armenia. This Tigranes had a ſon, named Alexander, who married Jotapa, daughter of Antiochus, king of Comagene, and who obtained from Veſpaſian a kingdom in Cilicia. Let us add, to this narrative of Joſephus, the ſupplement which Tacitus furniſhes us with. "Advenit Tigranes à Nerone ad capeſſendum imperium delectus, Cappadocum ex nobilitate, regis Archelai nepos, ſed quod diu obſes apud urbem fuerat uſque ad ſervilem patientiam demiſſus (19). - - - - Tigranes arrived, being pitched upon by Nero to aſſume the crown: he was of the Cappadocian nobility, grandſon of king Archelaus, but, through his long continuance at Rome as an hoſtage, ſunk to the patience of a ſlave.' There is reaſon to believe, that the Romans did not ſupport Tigranes againſt the Parthians, who demanded Armenia for Tiridates. Tacitus does not mark preciſely the degree of conſanguinity of that Tigranes, with reſpect to Archelaus, king of Cappadocia (20). This Archelaus was not his grand-father, but his great grand-father, ſince that Tigranes was ſon to one Alexander, whoſe father was another Alexander, and his mother Glaphyra daughter of Archelaus.

[E] If we may truſt the chronology of ſome modern authors.] Noldius proves againſt Tacitus, that Archelaus was not the grand-father, but the great grand-father of that Tigranes on whom Nero beſtowed Armenia: He proves it (21), I ſay, firſt, by the teſtimony of Joſephus; and ſecondly, by the decrepit age, wherein that Tigranes muſt have been, if he had been Archelaus's ſon; for, in ſuch a caſe, he he had been ſon of Alexander. Now Herod put to death his ſon Alexander ſoon after the battle of Actium, and conſequently Tigranes muſt have been born towards the 724th year of Rome, and muſt have been near ninety years old, when he was ſent into Armenia. This is the conſequence Noldius ought to have drawn from his hypotheſis, which however he has not done, chooſing rather to reaſon thus: ſince Tigranes's father was put to death ſoon after the battle of Actium, Tigranes muſt have been born towards the middle of the age of Auguſtus, and ſo he could not have been fit for buſineſs in the reign of Nero. The firſt conſequence is not according to the rules of exact chronology. Auguſtus died in the 766th year of Rome, being ſeventy ſix years old; the middle of his age was, therefore, the year 728. Now can an exact chronologer ſay, that a man, born about the year 728, is the ſon of a father, that was put to death ſoon after the battle of Actium? The other conſequence is much better: Armenia was given to Tigranes by Nero, in the year 813. Therefore, if Tigranes was born in the year 728, he muſt have been eighty five years old when he went to Armenia. But let us ſhew Noldius, that he has built upon a falſe ſuppoſition. The death of Alexander, ſon of Herod, could not happen ſoon after the battle of Actium; for that unfortunate prince left two ſons. It may therefore be ſuppoſed, that his wife was twenty years old, when he died: ſhe muſt then have been born about the 704th year of Rome, and Archelaus her father's birth muſt fall towards the year

(d) Id. Antiq. lib. xvii, cap xv, & de Bell. Jud. lib. ii, cap xi.

(e) Id. Antiq. lib. xvii, cap. vii.

(6) Calviſius places that expedition in the 738th year of Rome; and Auguſtus's death in the year 766.

(7) Dio, lib. lv, ad ann. 759.

(8) Tacit. Ann. lib. iv, cap. v.

(9) Ibid. cap. xxiii.

(10) See Strabo, lib. xvii, pag. 570.

(11) Cenotaph. Piſan. pag. 238.

(12) Noldius de vita & geſtis Herodum, pag. 190.

(13) Pag. 185, & ſeq.

(14) Pag. 185.

(15) Ad ann. 759.

(16) Joſeph. Antiq. lib xvii, cap. ult. See alſo de Bello Jud. lib. ii, cap. xi.

(17) Joſeph. Antiq. lib. xviii, cap. vii.

(18) Ne Tigranes quidem Armeniæ quondam potitus, ac tunc reus nomine regio ſupplicia civium effugit. Tacit. Annal. lib. vi, cap. xl, ad ann. 788.

(19) Id. ibid. lib. xiv, cap. xxvi.

(20) See the remark [E].

(21) Eum pronepotem fuiſſe præter Joſephum. Ant. xix, cap. vii, ipſa rerum ſeries oſtendit. Quo pacto enim Tigranes, nepos circa tempus medium Auguſti natus (pater non multo poſt victoriam ad Actium ab Herode interfectus) ſub Nerone agere aut pati potuit? quo profecto tempore natura eum aut morte aut ſenio ita multaverat, ut rebus gerendis aptus tum haud eſſe potuerit, nedum ita arduis & perturbatis. Noldius, ubi ſupra, pag. 367.

year 684; and ſo he would have been eighty five years old when he died. Now this is not at all likely, becauſe the hiſtorians, that have mentioned his death, have deſigned, thereby, to caſt an odium upon Tiberius; and yet they have not mentioned the circumſtance of Archelaus's old age, which circumſtance was very proper to render the emperor's cruelty yet more horrid. Add, that, if Archelaus was born in the year 684, his mother muſt have been near fifty years old, when ſhe raiſed ſuch a violent paſſion in Marc Antony. The proof of this is eaſy: Archelaus was not her eldeſt ſon, and therefore we may reaſonably ſuppoſe, that ſhe was about twenty years old, when he was born. Now it was in the year 713, that Marc Antony gave the kingdom of Cappadocia to Siſinna ſon of Glaphyra. It would have been an uncommon ſight indeed to ſee a grand-mother, whoſe grand-daughter was already nine or ten years old, hold in her chains, by the charms of her beauty, the ſovereign diſpoſer of crowns and ſceptres (22). Auguſtus would have had here a fair occaſion to write ſatirical epigrams upon Marc Antony, and to turn him into ridicule. On the other hand, ſince Glaphyra, Archelaus's daughter, was not married to Archelaus, Herod's ſon, till after Herod was dead, ſhe might have been able to kindle a violent love, when ſhe was fifty years old. Let us therefore rectify Noldius's chronology, by ſaying, with father Noris (23), that Alexander, husband to the laſt Glaphyra, was not put to death till after the 742d year of Rome.

(23) Cenotaph. Piſan. pag. 153, & ſeq.

(22) The reader will find, in this Dictionary, remark [G] of the article ARAGON (JOAN of); and remark [F] of the article CYRUS, ſome inſtances of women, whoſe beauty has laſted long: but nevertheleſs he muſt not draw from thence conſequences to maintain chronological hypotheſes, which are otherwiſe uncertain.

GLEICHEN. A very ſingular adventure is related concerning a German count of this name. He was taken in a fight againſt the Turks, and carried into Turkey, where he ſuffered a hard and long captivity, being put upon ploughing the ground, &c. But thus happened his deliverance: Upon a certain day, the daughter of the king (a) his maſter came up to him, and aſked him ſeveral queſtions, whilſt ſhe was a walking. His good mien and dexterity ſo pleaſed that princeſs, that ſhe promiſed to ſet him free, and to follow him, provided he would marry her. He anſwered, I have a Wife and Children. That is no Argument, replied ſhe, the Cuſtom of the Turks allow one Man ſeveral Wives. The count was not ſtubborn, but acquieſced to theſe reaſons, and gave his word. The princeſs employed herſelf ſo induſtriouſly to get him out of bondage, that they were ſoon in a readineſs to go on board a veſſel. They arrived happily at Venice. The count found there one of his men, who travelled every where to hear of him. He told him, that his wife and children were in good health: Whereupon he preſently went to Rome; and, after he had ingenuouſly related what he had done, the Pope granted him a ſolemn diſpenſation to keep his two wives (b). If the court of Rome ſhewed itſelf ſo eaſy on this occaſion, the count's wife was not leſs ſo; for ſhe received very kindly the Turkiſh lady, by whoſe means ſhe recovered her dear huſband, and had for this concubine a particular kindneſs (c). The Turkiſh princeſs anſwered very handſomely thoſe civilities; and though ſhe proved barren, yet ſhe loved tenderly the children, which the other wife bore in abundance. There is ſtill at Erford a monument of this ſtory to be ſeen (d) [A]. A very worthy gentleman (e), who told me this ſtory in the year 1697, ſeemed very much ſurprized, that the Proteſtant writers, when they are obliged to anſwer the reproaches touching the permiſſion the reformers gave to a Landgrave of Heſſe, do not inſtance in the diſpenſation granted by the Pope to count de Gleichen, and deſired to know my thoughts thereupon [B]. He told me, That du Val has mentioned this adventure in his deſcription of Germany (f). In the year 1227, ſays du Val, a count of Gleichen obtained leave from the Pope to have two wives at once. If this ſtory be true, we have in it a great inſtance of the triumph and power of love [C]. An abbot, who kept a correſpondence by letters with count Buſſy,

(a) Filia Regis ſub quo ſerviebat Comes. Hondorf. ubi infra.

(b) Re ordine narrata literas à Pontifice impetrat, quibus ei concederetur utramque fovere conjugem. Id. ibid.

(c) Summo amore pellicem, cujus opera cariſſimum maritum recepiſſet, proſequitur. Id. ibid.

(d) Taken from the Theatrum Hiſtoricum of Andrew Hondorf, pag. 535, of the fifth Edition, printed at Francfort, 1633, in 8vo.

(e) Mr Pallary, a French miniſter at Delft.

(f) Pag. 205, Paris Edit 1668. The author of the Polygamia Triumphatrix, pag. 556, ſays, that this count Gleichen was of the cruſade of Frederic II, in 1217. But this expedition was in 1228.

[A] There is ſtill at Erford a monument of this ſtory to be ſeen.] Theſe are Hondorf's words: ' Hujus rei monimentum Erphordiæ etiamnum exſtat: ' in quo ex utroque latere Comiti uxores adſtant. Regina marmoreâ coronâ ornata: Comitiſſa ſculpta eſt ' nuda & infantes ad ejus pedes reptantes (1). - - - ' There is ſtill at Erford a monument of this ſtory; ' in which the count is placed between two wives. ' The queen is adorned with a marble crown: the ' counteſs is engraved naked, with children at her ' feet.'

[B] And deſired to know my thoughts thereupon.] If my memory fails me not, my anſwer amounted to this: firſt, that this paſſage was ſomewhat obſcure, and uncertain; and ſecondly, that it would ſignify nothing to alledge it, unleſs either the Pope's brief, or the teſtimony of ſome cotemporary author, or the conſent of the Romiſh writers, could be produced. Hondorf is almoſt the only author that vouches for this ſtory (2): now he quoting no body, and being but a compiler, whom the learned never much eſteemed, and alſo a Proteſtant, the Roman Catholics would not fail to reject his teſtimony. They would aſk, out of what records or annals he has taken that paſſage? and ſince he quotes nothing, they would pretend, that he has no other ground for it but an hearſay, or uncertain and even fabulous traditions; ſuch as many illuſtrious families induſtriouſly propagate, concerning the manner how their anceſtors were freed from bondage in the times of the cruſades. In ſhort if they denied the fact, what could one anſwer to them? the monument at Erford can prove nothing: for after all, does the figure of a man between two figures of women clearly ſignify polygamy? May it not as well ſignify, among other things, two ſucceſſive marriages, or two marriages contracted betwen a huſband and two living wives, but the latter of which marriages was declared void? are there not abundance of ridiculous ſtories, which people endeavour to prove by monuments of ſtone? thus ſome pretend to prove, that a certain counteſs of Holland was delivered of 365 children at once: a thing, which all good hiſtorians make a jeſt of, and evince to be a falſity.

[C] We have here a great inſtance of the triumph and power of love.] That is, the daughter of a king, ready not only to renounce the ſublime advantages of her condition, to follow a ſlave to the world's end, but actually a fugitive, after having overlooked dangers, to which her deſign expoſed both her own life, and that of the priſoner, with whom ſhe was in love. She did not engage her ſelf by degrees in a flight ſo ſurrounded with dangers, ſo diſadvantageous, ſo ſcandalous; no, ſhe fully reſolves upon it the very firſt time ſhe ſees the ſlave. Ut vidi ut perii, ut me malus abſtulit error (3), might ſhe have ſaid, like many others. How true is what is ſaid in an opera;

Bacchus revient vainqueur des climats de l'Aurore,
Il traine apres ſont char mille peuples vaincus;
Il mepriſoit l'amour, mais l'amour eſt encore
Un vainqueur mille fois plus puiſſant que Bacchus.

Bacchus returns victorious from the Eaſt.
A thouſand conquer'd nations grace his triumphs;

(1) Hondorf. Theat. Exempl. pag. 535. Edit. 1633.

(2) Simon Goulart, who has inſerted this ſtory in his tranſlation of Camerarius's Hiſtorical Meditations, Tom. II, lib. ii, cap. xiv, pag. m. 152, quotes only Hondorf's Theatrum. The author of the Polygamia Triumphatrix, pag. 556, hath quoted Dreſſer. Millen. 6. Zeiler. Contin. Itineris Germ. Peccenſteinius in Theatr. Saxon. But theſe three authors, or a thouſand more of that ſtamp, can give no weight to this ſtory.

(3) Virgil. Eclog. viii, ver. 41.

Buſſy, had heard ſomething of this ſtory, but was ignorant of the true ſtate of the caſe [D]. For the reſt, the author of the fifteen comforts of matrimony ſeems to ſuppoſe, that it happens pretty often, that a woman marries again, upon the falſe ſuppoſition of her huſband's death [E]. The Journal of Hamburgh will furniſh me with a good ſupplement to this article [F].

Which makes him ſlight the power of Cupid's darts:
But ſoon he feels the greater force of love.

I know not whether the lady de Ville-Dieu has romanized the ſtory of our count de Gleichen. This had been a fine ſubject for her pen; and as dry as Hondorf's narrative may ſeem to be, ſhe would have made ſomething very pretty of it. Note, that the triumph of love, in this particular, regards only the fair ſex; for certainly the count did not marry another wife upon the ſcore of love, but becauſe, being a gentleman, he was weary of being a ſlave, and of tilling the ground. But let us obſerve alſo, that the action of that Ottoman princeſs is not by much ſo black as that of Niſus's daughter, or that of the daughter of Pterelaus (4). Nay, perhaps, it is ſomewhat more excuſable, than that of Minos's daughter. And indeed it was much more proſperous than the treaſon of theſe three princeſſes, and of ſeveral other like victims of love, ornaments of Venus's triumphant chariot. Neverthelefs, do not allow the advantage to the male ſex; for certainly there are a great many more men, that marry their maids, than women that marry their footmen.

[D] An abbot had heard ſomething of this ſtory, but was ignorant of the true ſtate of the caſe]. This is what he wrote to the count de Buſſy Rabutin, the twelfth of June, 1674 (5). ‘I was the other day with Madam de ——, and as they talked of Mr de —— who preſented a petition to the Pope, praying he might be allowed to marry another wife; they ſaid that the holy ſee had once done that favour to a German count, who, not having enough of one wife, was permitted, for the ſalvation of his ſoul, to marry a ſecond. Madam de —, who was before nodding and falling aſleep, awaked at the hearing of this, and ſaid, ſighing, that there were no ſuch husbands now-a-days.’ It manifeſtly appears that he confounds things, and that of two adventures he makes but one: he blends together what concerns the count of Gleichen, and what regards a landgrave of Heſſe, and knows not the circumſtances of either. The permiſſion, which he pretends was granted by the holy ſee to a German count, was not grounded on the inſufficiency of the wife; nor was that, granted to a landgrave of Heſſe, founded on the ſame reaſon (6), tho' Thuanus ſays ſo. I would not warrant that the abbot has better obſerved the rules of hiſtory, as to the jeſt and ſighing of Madam de ——, than the reſt. He invented, perhaps, that reflexion himſelf, and wrote it nevertheleſs as an hiſtorical paſſage to count Rabutin, to end his letter with a diverting ſtroke. However it be, I happened the other day to be in company with a gentleman, who has been married theſe five or ſix years, and I took notice, that, after he had been told that part of the abbot's letter, he ſaid, almoſt ſighing, that if there were no ſuch husbands now-a-days, there were yet fewer wives like that of the count. I wiſh he had made another reflexion, viz. that that lady ſuppoſed without reaſon, that our age falls ſhort of the former times: which is falſe. Husbands of that ſtamp were always very ſcarce, and as ſcarce in preceding ages as in the preſent.

[E] The author of the fifteen comforts of matrimony ſeems to ſuppoſe, that it happens pretty often, that a woman marries again on the falſe ſuppoſition of the death of her husband.] For this is the thirteenth comfort of matrimony. ‘A gentleman, ſays he (7), who has lived with his wiſe in great delight and ſports five, or ſix, or eight years, more or leſs, has now a mind to acquire honour, by feats of arms . . . . it happens that he goes beyond ſea to follow chivalry . . . . having firſt, with deep regret, taken leave of his wife, who expreſſes all the ſorrow imaginable; but he is a man that loves honour, and ſo nothing can detain him . . . . Away he goes, and recomends his wife and children, (whom, next to honour, he loves beyond any thing in the world) to his intimate friends. Now it happens, that, as he croſſes the ſea, he is taken by the enemy, where, by ill fortune, or otherwiſe, he continues three or four years, or more, ſo that he cannot return home. His lady, all the while, is in great affliction; and now ſhe happens to hear, that he is dead, whereupon ſhe is wondrous ſorrowful: but ſhe cannot always weep; and, by God's bleſſing, her grief is ſo allayed, that ſhe marries again to another, with whom ſhe takes her delight, and has ſoon forgot her husband, whom ſhe loved ſo well, and her dear children. The dalliances, kiſſes, and embraces, ſhe had with her husband, are paſſed and forgotten; and who ſhould ſee her ſport with this laſt husband, would ſay, that ſhe loves him more than ſhe ever did the other, who is a priſoner, or in ſome other ſtreight, for his proweſs. Her children, which the good man loved, are diſcarded, and their eſtate ſpoiled and waſted; and ſo they dally and ſport together. But fortune ſo orders it, that the good gentleman her husband returns, being grown old and decayed; for he was not at eaſe, for two, or three, or four years, that he was a priſoner; and, when he comes near his country, he enquires after his wife and children: for he is greatly afraid leſt they be dead, or in any other great ſtreight. And you may well imagine how many times the good man has thought of them amidſt the anguiſh of his confinement; and has often been uneaſy about them, whilſt his wife made herſelf merry: and perhaps, at that very time that the good man was thinking of her, and praying God to preſerve her, he, whom ſhe had lately married, held her in his arms, out of harm's reach. Now he is told that ſhe is married, and ſo you may imagine how concerned he is at ſuch a piece of news. . . . . And, being come into his own country, and finding the thing to be true, if he be a man of honour, he will never take his wife again; and the other, who had married her, and has ſported with her, will leave her. And ſo ſhe has loſt her honour, and perchance will loſe her ſenſes to boot. The good man ſhall ever live in ſorrow; his children ſhall in ſome meaſure be diſgraced for the fault of their mother: It ſhall not be lawful for either of them to marry again, as long as the other is alive.

[F] The journal of Hamburgh will furniſh me with a good ſupplement to this article.] Mr Dartis, ſpeaking (8) of a novel of Mr le Noble, intituled, Zulima, or, Pure Love, obſerves, that the firſt notion of this romance ‘was taken from a memoir among the archives of the houſe of Gleichen, which deſcends from a prince of Weſtphalia, the chief hero of this hiſtorical novel. He was called Eberard, and, having been taken in the battel of Joppa, which the Sultan Noradin gained over the Chriſtians of the cruſade, he was ſo happy as to inſpire with love the daughter of that Sultan. She helped him to break the chains of his ſlavery, went with him into Europe, and was his ſecond wife after the death of her, whom he had married ſome time before the cruſade. Mr le Noble cites, as an indiſputable witneſs of the truth of this ſtory, the tomb, where lie the aſhes of this prince, and his two wives. It is ſtill to be ſeen, ſays he, at Herford in Weſtphalia, where he reſided. On this foundation it is that he has built a pious love-intrigue, which aimed firſt at the converſion of a Sultaneſs, and afterwards ended in her marriage with the Weſtphalian prince.’ He ſays in another place (9), that the writers of romances are obliged to follow hiſtory, when they tell in a preface the foundation of their fictions. Yet this, adds he, is what Mr le Noble has not done, in the advertiſement, which he has prefixed to his Zulima, as will appear by the extract of a letter, which I have received from a good hand on this ſubject. It is this. ‘It appears evidently from what you have ſaid of Mr le Noble's little book, that he has confounded all. Eberard, duke of Weſtphalia, is a perſonage abſolutely unknown to hiſtory; and, if he lived in the time of Noradin, a Saracen prince of the XIIth century, how could he be author of the counts of Gleichen, who pretend to have received their earldom from Charlemagne, and who at

(4) See the article AMPHITRYON, in the text, between citations (c) and (d).

(5) Lettres du Comte de Buſſi Rabutin, Tom. I, pag. 114, 115, Dutch Edit.

(6) See the remark [Q] of the article LUTHER.

(7) Les quinze Joyes du Mariage, pag. 154, & ſeq. Roan Edit. 1596. The title ſays, that this book was extracted from an old manuſcript copy written four hundred years before.

(8) Journal de Hamburgh, Aug. 26, 1695, pag. 142.

(9) Journ. de Hamburgh, Sept. 30, 1695, pag. 219, 220, 221.

‘ leaſt are older than the wars beyond ſea ? The family of the counts of Gleichen is extinct, and I believe, what they pretend to fetch from their archives ‘ is as fabulous as the reſt of the little romance. It is ‘ true, however, there is a tradition, confirmed by ſome ‘ modern chronicles, which imports, that a count of ‘ Gleichen, bringing with him from beyond ſea the ‘ lady that freed him, and meeting again his firſt wife, ‘ found the means of keeping them both in good underſtanding with each other, and with the conſent ‘ (they ſay) of the church ; which is not very probable. We may hold it for certain, that there is no ‘ monument of a duke Eberhard of Weſtphalia, neither at Erford, nor at Hervorde. The counts of ‘ Gleichen were neighbours of Erford in Thuringia, ‘ and had nothing common with Hervorde in Weſtphalia.’

GOLDAST (a) (MELCHIOR HAIMINSFELD), a native of Biſchoff-zell (b) in Switzerland, and a Proteſtant according to the confeſſion of faith of Geneva, was a very learned man in the XVIIth century. His family was not rich [A], and he never raiſed himſelf; ſo that he made himſelf more known by the great number of books he either compoſed, or of which he was the editor, than by his public employments. A collection of letters, printed in the year 1688 [B], ſhews that, in the year 1598, he lived at Biſchoff-zell. That, the following year, he lodged at St Gall, in an honeſt man's houſe, named Schobingerus, who declared himſelf his patron. That the ſame year he went to Geneva, and lodged in Lectius's houſe [C], with the ſons of Vaſſan, whoſe preceptor he was. That he was ſtill at Geneva in the year 1602, where he complained of his miſerable condition. That the ſame year he went to Lauſanne, becauſe he could live cheaper there than at Geneva. That he returned ſoon after to Geneva. That, upon Lectius's recommendation, he was preferred to be ſecretary to the duke of Bouillon. That he was not long in that place; for he was at Franckfort in February 1603. That he was tutor in a private family, at Forſteg, in the year 1604; That, in the year 1605, he lived at Biſchoff-zell; where he complained he was not ſafe [D] by reaſon of his religion, which rendered him very odious, even to his relations. That he was at Franckfort in the year 1606. That (a) By the Latin letters, that were written to him, it appears, that he was indifferently called Goldaſtus, or Goldinaſtus, or Guldinaſtus. His fore names were latinized, Melchior, or Mel or Heiminſfeldius, or Haiminſfeldius, or Hamenveltus, or Hamenvelto, or Hamenevelto.

(b) In Latin, Epiſcopo-Cella. Moreri is much miſtaken, in making him a native of Heminsfeldt.

[A] His family was not rich.] This appears by ſome letters of Conradus Ritterſhuſius, at whoſe houſe Goldaſt had boarded. Goldaſt was gone from thence without paying his landlord; and, after his return into his own country, a long time paſſed before he diſcharged that debt. Ritterſhuſius complained of it (1), and repreſented, that the butchers, bakers, and brewers, had preſſed him ſo hard, that he had been forced to take up money at intereſt, to be rid of their perſecutions. He added, he hoped that Goldaſt would remit to him both the principal and intereſt; and that Taurellus, and ſome others, did the ſame by ſuch of their boarders as went upon truſt. His letter is dated the twenty fourth of Auguſt, 1598. The following year, Stuckius (2) wrote to Goldaſt, that Ritterſhuſius complained that he had not received the fifty two florins of gold, which were due to him; wherefore he exhorted the debtor to diſcharge that debt ſpeedily; which if he failed to do, his mother ſhould be acquainted with it. A letter of Ritterſhuſius (3), dated the eighth of September, 1599, informs us, that he was paid, and did forgive the intereſt; but that Goldaſt having left ſeveral debts unpaid at Altdorf, ſeveral ſcandalous ſtories were handed about concerning him. However, this is not an argument that Goldaſt was not nobly born; which, as Scaliger tells us, he pretended to be (4): for a man may be a gentleman, and yet not have wherewithal to pay for his board. Scioppius obſerves, that Goldaſt put before his name a particle, which was peculiar to the nobility: ‘ Fratribus ‘ quidem certe hoc uno nomine nobilior, quod illi ſe ‘ tantum Heiminsfeld, hic autem Heros noſter pro ‘ conſuetudine pleræque nobilitatis ab Heiminſfeld cognominat (5) —— In this alone more noble than his ‘ brothers, that, whereas they called themſelves barely ‘ Heiminsfeld, this our hero, after the manner of the ‘ nobility, aſſumes the ſtile of ab Heiminsfeld.’ But here is a pregnant proof of Goldaſt's poverty. When he printed any books, he ſent copies of them to the magiſtrates of cities, and to the conſiſtories, who commonly ſent him a preſent ſomewhat above the value of the book; and his friends thought they did him no ſmall ſervice, when they procured him ſuch ſorry rewards: however, that mean commerce helped him to ſubſiſt. A miniſter, called David Lange, wrote to him from Memmingen, that the magiſtrates of the place ſent him, in the encloſed, unum nummum aureum, and the conſiſtory another, for his book (6).

[B] A collection of letters.] Here is the title of them: Virorum clariſſimorum & doctorum ad Melchiorem Goldaſtum epiſtolæ, ex Bibliotheca Henrici Guntheri Thulemarii J. C. editæ. Francofurti & Spiræ 1688. in 4to.

[C] He lodged in Lectius's houſe at Geneva.] He was one of the profeſſors of the academy. The collection of letters, I have mentioned, contains one (7) very ſharp againſt him. Lectius complained, that when Goldaſt and his pupils left his houſe, they had not made him a handſome preſent: but Goldaſt complained on the other hand, that they had been obliged to pay for a hundred things without any manner of juſtice; ſuch as ſtoves, benches, locks, keys, &c. It muſt be owned, that thoſe, who keep boarders in univerſities, are too often guilty of ſordid avarice. When they are not profeſſors, there is no great harm; but what a diſgrace to learning, what a ſhame for the character of profeſſors, when they are ſo fond of filthy lucre!

[D] In 1605, he reſided at Biſchoff-zell, where he complained (8) he was not ſafe.] Scioppius ſays, that Jodocus Mezlerus, vicar to the abbot of St Gall, had told him, that Goldaſt was committed to priſon at St Gall, upon account of theft. He added, that Goldaſt had asked leave to buy a ſmall eſtate near St Gall, where the Lutheran gentlewoman he deſigned to marry might have liberty of conſcience; and that, as for himſelf, he would not ſtick to be a Roman Catholic. ‘ Commodum eas literas legeram cum officii cauſa viſum ad me venit D. Jodocus Mezlerus illuſtriſſimi ‘ Principis & Abbatis S. Galli vicarius, iſtumque Melchiorem adhuc vivum probeque ſibi notum eſſe affirmavit. Idque ut credibilius faceret præter alia hoc ‘ quoque de eodem narravit, expoſuiſſe eum ſibi in ſermone, in quanto apud Sangallenſes periculo ſemel ‘ verſatus fuerit cum illi furti nomine in carcerem ſe ‘ compegiſſent: petiiſſe etiam ut prædioli cujuſdam in ‘ Sangallenſi territorio emendi ab Abbate poteſtas ſibi ‘ fieret, ita tamen ut uxori, quam ducere in animo haberet, Lutheranæ religionis libertas ſalva eſſet: nam ‘ ſeipſum quidem Catholicum facilè futurum. His ego ‘ auditis cæpi de ipſo non deſperare futurum ut fato ‘ aliquando fratris utatur, & ſublime potius quàm humi ‘ putiſcat, cum preſertim nemo, qui faciem ejus viderit, non confeſtim patibulo dignum judicet. Interim nos velut Ciceronem Vatinii morte nunciata, cujus parum certus dicebatur auctor, reſpondiſſe legimus, uſura fruemur (9). —— I had juſt read thoſe ‘ letters, when Jodocus Mezlerus, vicar of the moſt illuſtrious prince and abbot of St Gall, came to pay me ‘ a viſit, and affirmed, that that Melchior was ſtill ‘ alive, and well known to him. And to convince me ‘ farther of it, he gave me this account of him, that ‘ he had heard him ſay in converſation, in what great ‘ danger he once was at St Gall, being impriſoned there ‘ for theft; that he had petitioned the abbot for leave ‘ to purchaſe a ſmall ſeat in the territory of St Gall, ‘ yet ſo as that the wife, he intended to marry, might ‘ have

(1) His letter is the third, in the collection printed in 1688.

(2) His letter is the ninth of the ſame collection.

(3) It is the eleventh of the ſame collection.

(4) Goldaſtus pretends to be nobly born, and names his houſe near St Gall. Scaligerana, pag. m. 95.

(5) Oporini Grubinii, Amphot. Scioppian. pag. 111.

(6) See the 131ſt letter of the collection.

(7) It is the 56th.

(8) See the 10th letter of the collection.

(9) Scioppius in Oporini Grubini Amphot. Sciopp. pag. 108.

That he married, and ſtaid there till the year 1610, in miſerable circumſtances [E], being diſappointed in the hopes his friends gave him of a good ſettlement [F]. The collection, I ſpeak of, ends there. Goldaſt had already publiſhed many books, which he continued to do till his death [G], which happened on the eleventh of Auguſt, 1635 (c). Sciοppius had ordered, that they ſhould publiſh, in his Scaliger Hypobolimæus, that Goldaſt had been broke upon the wheel; but, finding that to be falſe, he cauſed it to be left out. We ſhall ſee, in the remarks, how he gets off [H], though not 'have liberty to profeſs Lutheraniſm, but that himſelf 'ſhould make no difficulty of being a Catholic. When I 'heard this, I began not to be out of hopes, that he 'might, one time or other, meet with his brother's fate, 'and rot on high rather than on the ground; eſpecially 'ſince every one that ſees him muſt preſently judge him 'worthy of a gibbet. In the mean time, let us, as Ci'cero is ſaid to have replied, upon the uncertain news 'of the death of Vatinius, enjoy the uſury.' Scioppius is exceptionable in this particular; both becauſe he was a very ſlanderous, abuſive, man, and becauſe he looked upon Goldaſt as one, who had furniſhed Scaliger with materials to write the ſatire, intituled, Munſterus Hypobolimæus (10). Apply this to the remark [H].

[E] He continued till 1610, at Francfort, in miſerable circumſtances.] This appears by a letter (11), which was written by Quirinus Reuterus, director of the college of Wiſdom at Heidelberg; wherein he exhorts him to come and board in that college.

[F] . . . . . diſappointed in the hopes his friends gave hime of ſome good ſettlement.] They negotiated at the court of the elector Palatine, to procure him the office of counſellor to his electoral highneſs in the year 1608. The 191ſt letter mentions this as concluded, but, in the 194th letter, Lingelſheim ſays, that that buſineſs went backwards; and, in the 209th, he informs us, that it had abſolutely miſcarried. The elector of Mentz offered, then, an employment to our Goldaſt. The latter asked Lingelſheim's advice (12), who, knowing him to be in great neceſſity, and having nothing to offer to him, did not abſolutely diſſuade him from accepting thoſe offers; but only repreſented to him in what ſlavery he would infallibly be, in a place, where the jeſuits were maſters.

[G] He continued to publiſh books 'till his death.] Let us give here a catalogue of his principal works. Alamannicarum Rerum Scriptores vetuſti, three volumes in folio. Monarchia Imperii Romani, ſeu de Juriſdictione & Poteſtate Imperatoris & Papæ per varios Autores, three volumes in folio. Conſtitutionum Imperialium tomi quatuor, in folio. Suevicarum Rerum Scriptores veteres, at Francfort 1605 in 4to. De Juribus ac Privilegiis Regni Bohemiæ, & hæreditaria Regiæ familiæ ſucceſſione, libri 6. cum appendice, in folio. Conſultatio de officio & jure Electoris Bohemiæ in conventibus Electorum Romani Imperii. Rationale Conſtitutionum Imperialium. Statuta & Reſcripta Imperialia. Politica Imperialia. Catholicon rei monetariæ ſeu Leges monarchicæ generales de rebus nummariis & pecuniariis. Digeſta regia ſeu Conſtitutiones Imperiales de SS. Euchariſtia. Apologiæ Principum Germaniæ pro Henrico IV Imperatore contra criminationes Gregorii VII. Replicatio pro Cæſarea & Regia Francorum Majeſtate & Ordinibus Imperii contra Gretſerum (13). Imperialia Decreta de cultu Imaginum. Paradoxon de honore Medicorum, & obiter de honore Theologorum, & Jureconſultorum. Sibylla Francica, ſeu de admirabili Puella Joanna Lotharinga exercitus Francorum ductrice ſub Carolo VII. Dialogi duo de querelis Franciæ & Angliæ, & de jure ſucceſſionis utrorumque Regum in regno Franciæ. Centuria Epiſtolarum Philologicarum diverſorum hominum, at Francfort 1610 in 8vo. Emendationes in Petronium. Notæ ad parænetices Scriptores veteres.

This laſt work was not much eſteemed by Scaliger. He quotes old authors in his Perenetics, ſays he, ſpeaking of Goldaſt (14). He has trifled too long with theſe old words. There is nothing that is good for any thing in theſe Parenætici Melchioris. It were well, indeed, if he had publiſhed thoſe old records; for thereby one might learn ſomething relating to gentlemens houſes. Melchior has ſome manuſcripts, ſed infimi ævi. I did proſtitute my ſelf by writing to Melchior, ſince he is ſuch a man (15). It is not neceſſary to advertiſe the reader, that moſt of the works, which Goldaſt publiſhed, are productions, of which he was not the author; for the titles of them ſufficiently ſhew, that he did but reduce them into one body, or took them from the libraries, where they were only in manuſcript: wherein he ſhewed himſelf the moſt indefatigable man in the world. Conringius gives him great commendations. 'Vir, ſays he (16), editis antiquis Germaniæ monumentis tam bene de patria 'meritus, ut abſque dubio Athenienſes illum in Prytanæo aluiſſent, ſi quidem illud in ævum incidiſſet. Cum (17) primis in Germania certius meliuſque 'hoc ſtudiorum genus (de jure publico Imp. Germ. agit) incenſum fuit initio hujus ſæculi auctore 'MELCHIORE GOLDASTO, cui nemo Germaniæ rebus illuſtrandis par fuit, nec forte erit quiſpiam, '& vero illius ductu paulatim cœpit apud nos ſolito 'exquiſitior Reip. cognitio. - - - - A man, who deſerved ſo well of his country by publiſhing the antiquities of Germany, that the Athenians would certainly have maintained him at the public expence, if he had lived at that time. This kind of ſtudy '(viz. of the public law of Germany) was chiefly 'encouraged in the beginning of this century, from 'the example of MELCHIOR GOLDAST, 'who exceeded every body in illuſtrating the affairs 'of Germany, and who taught us a more accurate 'knowledge of the conſtitution.' However, he charges him with unfair dealing, in certain reſpects (18): 'Sunt hæc omnia (examinat nonnulla ex libro III. 'Conſtitutionum Imperialium) illaudabili facinore perquam tamen GOLDASTO familiari effic̄ta, quo nomine 'eum ex merito acerrime increpavit Wendelinus, c. 2. 'de l. Salica. - - - All theſe (ſome things in the third 'book of the Imperial Conſtitutions) are counterfeited, by an uncommendable fraud, but very much practiſed 'by Goldaſt; for which Wendelinus, in his ſecond 'chapter of the Salic law, cenſures him as he deſerves. He is not the only man, that complains of Goldaſt on that account. 'Qui noverit quam multas ſuſpectæ 'fidei merces pro veris erudito orbi obtruſerit GOLDASTUS, cui cæteroquin diligentiæ laudem non negamus, in re cui aliunde fides fieri non poteſt, vix 'ejus ſolius auctoritate ſibi aliquid plane perſuaderi 'patietur (19). - - - - Whoever is acquainted with the 'many pieces, of doubtful credit, which GOLDAST 'has impoſed upon the learned world (a man, who 'otherwiſe deſerves the praiſe of diligence), will 'ſcarce depend upon his ſingle authority in a matter 'which is capable of no other confirmation.

[H] We ſhall ſee . . . . how Scioppius gets off.] Two gentlemen of Franconia, who had boarded with him at Altorf, at Conradus Ritterſhuſius's houſe, payed him a viſit during their ſtay at Rome. He enquired after their common friends, and, among the reſt, after Goldaſt, one of their fellow-boarders at Altorf: whereupon they told him, that that wretch had been broke upon the wheel, and afterwards burned, for having committed a horrid murder. 'Eum 'videlicet ſuperiori anno cum Bullionio Duce, cui 'interpretis operam dederit, Geneva in Germaniam 'profectum, cum Argentinæ in familiaritatem Centurionis cujuſdam perveniſſet, qui in contuburnio ſuo 'puellam nobilem, domo paterna abductam pro ſecutuleia muliere & concubina circumducebat, audito 'eum jam ſatietate illius captum mille aureos ei, 'qui ab illa ſe liberaret, polliceri, avidè conditionem 'quod pretio inhiaret, arripuiſſe, & ita digreſſo Centurione non procul ab urbe in ipſa via regia . . . . 'miſellam obtruncaſſe (20).' He had contracted a friendſhip, ſaid they, with a certain captain, who began to be weary of a gentlewoman he had carried away from her relations, and who promiſed a thouſand crowns to any one that ſhould rid him of her. Goldaſt accepted the offer; and, ſoon after, he murdered that woman in the middle of the high-way near Straſburg, and, having ſtripped her, returned into the city. He was ſeized in the inn where he lodged, as he was unripping the cloaths of that woman, and clapped in Goal; and, within ſeven days, he was ſentenced to be broke alive upon the wheel, and burnt.

(c) Witte, in Diario Biographico.

(10) Hem qui tibi omnium illorum, quæ de Scioppii natalibus, vita, ſtudiis ac fortuna in Satyram & confutationem tuam conjeciſti, auctor fuit. Id. Ibid. pag. 111. See alſo pag. 332.

(11) It is the 278th of the collection.

(12) See the 214th and 217th letter of the collection.

(13) A German Jeſuit, who wrote ſeveral books againſt Goldaſt.

(14) Scaligerana, pag. 95.

(15) Ibid. pag. 154, at the word Melchior.

(16) In Præfat. ad Tacitum de moribus Germanorum, apud Magirum Eponymolog. pag. 393.

(17) Id. in Dedicat. Exercitationibus de Rep. Imp. Germ. præmiſſ. apud eundem Magirum, Ibid.

(18) Idem, cap. vii, de O. J. G. apud eundem, Ibid. pag. 394.

(19) Maurit. de Matricula Imperii, n. 2. apud eumdem Magirum, Ibid.

(20) Oporinus Grubinius in Amphotidibus Scioppian. pag. 104.

not without ſpeaking very ill of Goldaſt. The conduct of the latter, with reſpect to Juſtus Lipſius, cannot be approved [I]; for he publiſhed under his name an oration, of burnt. ‘Septimo tandem poſt die capitis condemnatum & ſummo ſupplicio, tanquam parricidam affectum, hoc eſt membratim pæne rota contuſum & comminutum, & inde lignis infelicibus uſtulatum conflagraſſe (21).’ Scioppius immediately wrote down this ſtory, that it might be inſerted in the work, which he was then printing in Germany againſt Scaliger; and he thought he wanted no other apology of revenge againſt Goldaſt (22), with reſpect to the ill office he thought he had received from him: for he pretended, that Goldaſt had publiſhed, under the name of Scioppius, a commentary upon the Priapeia, of which he, Scioppius, was not the author. The letter he wrote, touching that pretended tragical end of Goldaſt, was followed by another five months after (23), wherein he acquainted his friend, that the ſtory, which the two german gentlemen had told him, concerned a brother of Melchior Goldaſt. The Sieur Charles Fugger, preſident of the imperial chamber at Spire, had ſent to Scioppius an account of the barbarous action and puniſhment of that brother of Goldaſt. This is what he wrote to him: ‘Sebaſtianus Heiminsfeld, dictus Guldenaſt, natus Cellæ Epiſcopi in Turgovia die ſexta Junii anno 1603, propterea in carcerem conjectus fuit, quod pridie ſeminam quandam, Dorotheam de Gries, Bambergæ aut Herbipoli, quemadmodum ipſe retulit, natam, quam diebus aliquot hac illac circumduxerat, bene mane non longe ab hac civitate priuſquam patefacta eſſent portæ, Satanæ inſtinctu cultro immaniter obtruncaſſet, & omni veſtitu uſque ad lineam interulam ſpoliaſſet, ac poſtquam aliquantum de via regia eam provolverat, in civitatem portis commodum apertis ingreſſus in hoſpitium publicum divertiſſet, ubi & captus mox, factumque quæſtioni ſubjectus, & ſponte etiam ſua confeſſus die 10. ejuſdem menſis Rotæ ſupplicio affectus fuit (24). ——— Sebaſtian Heiminsfeld, called Guldenaſt, born at Biſchoffzel in Turgow the ſixth day of June in the year 1603, was impriſoned for the murther of one Dorothea de Gries, born, as he himſelf ſaid, at Baimberg or Wurtzburg, whom he had carried up and down with him for ſome days; whoſe throat he cut, early in the morning, not far from the city before the gates were opened, and ſtripping her to her ſhift, and throwing her a little out of the road, returned into the city, and went to an inn, where he was taken, and, having confeſſed the fact, was broke on the wheel, the tenth day of the ſame month.’ Scioppius learned, not long after, from Jodocus Mezler, vicar to the abbot of St Gall (25), that Melchior Goldaſt was alive; whereupon he wrote to his friend, that he muſt not print what he had ſent him, concerning the puniſhment of that man: ‘Hoc à te pro amicitia noſtra peto, ut ſi adhuc eſt integrum illa ſupplicii de monſtro iſto ſumpti mentio ex Scaligero meo Hypobolymæo circumſcribatur. Sin autem, quod vereor, hac ipſa mea epiſtola ad calcem libri illius adjuncta totius geſtæ rei ordinem palam omnibus declarari cupio (26). ——— I beg of you, by our friendſhip, if the mention of the puniſhment of that monſter be not yet put to the preſs, that you would ſtrike it out of my Scaliger Hypobolymæus: but if it be, as I fear it is, I deſire that this letter of mine, added at the end of the book, may clear up the whole matter to every body.’ This ſecond letter is dated the third of March, 1607, and thereby we may convict the two gentlemen of having miſtaken the time: for in the beginning of November 1606 (27), Scioppius wrote to his friend that they had told him, that Goldaſt had been executed the year before, ſuperiori anno. Now Goldaſt's brother was broke upon the wheel the tenth of June 1603 (28). They reported alſo, that, when Goldaſt murdered the gentlewoman near Strasburg, he travelled through Germany with the duke of Bouillon, whoſe ſecretary he was. This does not agree with a letter, which Goldaſt wrote to Mr Schobinger, his patron, in February 1603 (29). He was no longer with the duke of Bouillon; and yet the murderer of the gentlewoman, being interrogated by his judges in the month of June, 1603, ſaid that Melchior Goldaſt, his brother, was in the duke of Bouillon's ſervice (30).

[I] Goldaſt's conduct, with reſpect to Juſtus Lipſius, cannot be approved.] Scioppius, who was a great amplifier, was not aſhamed to ſay, at the time he thought that Goldaſt had been broke upon the wheel, that the principal crime, which had brought that horrid puniſhment upon him, was his having ſathered upon Juſtus Lipſius a ſpeech, of which he was not the author. ‘Hujus ego non minus facti, quam ſupplicii atrocitatem cum animo meo recogitans, nullius magis ſceleris, quam quod orationem illam, de qua Lipſius Cent IV. Epiſt. LXVIII. ad conſules ac ſenatum Imperialis oppidi Francofurtenſis ſcribit, ejuſdem Lipſii nomine præſcriptam minime Helvetica ſimplicitate, ſed actu pluſquam Punico & vere Genevenſi malitia Tiguri edendam curaſſet, pœnas ab eo expeditas & ſumptas eſſe judicavi (31).’ That ſpeech was intituled, De duplici concordia Literarum & Religionis, and was publiſhed in 1600. It was pretended, that Juſtus Lipſius had pronounced it at Iena, the thirty firſt of July, 1574. It was not printed at Leyden, as the title has it, but at Zurich, by John James Friſius (32). A hundred printed copies of it, being ſent to the ſair of Francfort, were all bought up by Plantin, who denied that piece to be of Lipſius, and threatned, that both the printer and the true author ſhould repent it (33). The bookſeller of Zurich ſent an account of theſe things to Goldaſt, and deſired him to prove, that the ſpeech was made by him, whoſe name it bore. A profeſſor of Zurich gave Goldaſt notice of Juſtus Lipſius's threats, and told him, that the contexture and thread of the ſpeech ſhewed Lipſius to be the author of it: Nos quidem ex filo orationis conjicimus omnino ejus eſſe (34). This was the judgment of the learned of Zurich: the taſte of thoſe of Paris was quite different; for they did not find in it Lipſius's ſtyle. Lipſii oratio nova nobis viſa fuit, nec in ea Lipſii ſtylum ſine monitione tua unquam agnoviſſemus (35). Juſtus Lipſius's threats were not vain; for he applied himſelf to the magiſtrates of Francfort, who ordered that ſpeech to be ſtruck out of the catalogue of their Fair (36). He thanked them for it, and ſhewed them, by many reaſons, the impoſture of thoſe who had fathered it upon him. He maintained, among other things, that he was not at Iena the thirty firſt of July, 1574, and that he was gone from thence the firſt of March (37). Goldaſt was covered with ſhame; for there were few equitable men, who were not perſuaded of Lipſius's innocence in that reſpect. ‘Inſulſam illam, & vix latialem orationem de duplici concordia literarum & religionis Jenæ, ut volunt, habitam, jam olim falſimoniam eſſe meram, edita epiſtola ipſe oſtendit, & nuper ſuppoſititii iſtius ſœtus parens Melchior Haiminsfeldus Goldaſtus ſe prodidit (38). In a late letter, he plainly ſhewed, that the inſipid, and ſcarce Latin, oration on the double agreement of learning and religion, ſaid to be delivered at Iena, was a mere cheat; and not long ago Melchior Haiminsfeld Goldaſt diſcovered himſelf to be the true father of the foundling.’ But there are men ſo obſtinate, that they will never own themſelves to be in an error, and are proof againſt the moſt pregnant reaſons. Some men of that temper did obſtinately maintain, that Lipſius had pronounced the oration, which Goldaſt aſcribed to him. Read what follows: ‘Juſti Lipſii nomine (39), de duplici concordia literarum & religionis, editas Orationes (40), non eſſe ipſius, ſed Melchioris Goldaſti, Miræus in vita Lipſii pag. m. 67. refert. Carolus etiam Scribanius Jeſuita, cap. ult. defenſionis poſthumæ, Lipſii operibus in folio præfixæ, aliquot jam ante menſibus, quam Orationes iſtæ habitæ perhibentur, Lipſium Jena diſceſſiſſe, audacter ſcribit: ſed vide refutationem hujuſce mendacii factam à Sagittario in Lipſio Proteo, Francofurti 1614. edito. ——— Miræus, in the life of Lipſius, page 67, relates, that the orations on the double agreement of learning and religion publiſhed under the name of Juſtus Lipſius, were not his, but written by Melchior Goldaſt. Alſo Carolus Scribanius, the Jeſuit, in the laſt chapter of his Poſthumous defence, prefixed to the works of Lipſius in folio, confidently writes, that Lipſius had left Iena, ſome months before thoſe orations were ſaid to be delivered: but ſee a confutation of this falſehood by Sagittarius, of which he himſelf was the author. It appears, that people complained of his capricious humour [K], and of his diſhoneſty (d).

---

(21) Id. ibid.

(22) Ibid. pag. 106.

(23) Ibid.

(24) Ibid. pag. 109, 110.

(25) See the remark [D].

(26) Opor. Grubin. pag. 109.

(27) The ſecond letter of Scioppius was written five months after the firſt, Ibid. pag. 106.

(28) Sebaſtianus Melchioris frater germanus is fuerit qui Argentinæ anno 1603 a. d. 10 Junii ob crudeliſſimum homicidium & latrocinium affectus, nunc quoque ſuperbus & cæſus in rota, velut in radiato diſco, quotidiano prandio aſſo, inquam, bene ad ſolem toſto corvos accipiat. Ibid. pag. 107. See, above, citation (24).

(29) See the collection of letters written to Goldaſt, printed in Germany in the year 1688.

(30) Amphotides Scioppian. pag. 110.

(31) Ibid. pag. 105.

(32) See Stuckius's letter to Goldaſt, in the collection before mentioned, citation (29): It is the 18th. See alſo Lipſius, Epiſt. lxviii. Centur. ad Germ. & Gallos.

(33) John James Friſius gave Goldaſt notice of all this. His letter is in the collection.

(34) Waſerus, Epiſt. ad Goldaſtum. It is the 38th of the collection.

(35) Vaſſan, in the thirty firſt letter of the collection, written from Paris to Goldaſt, the 23d of Septemb. 1600.

(36) See the 68th letter of Lipſius, Centur. ad Germanos & Gallos, pag. m. 700.

(37) Ibid. pag. 702.

(38) Miræus, in vita Lipſii, circa finem, pag. m. 35.

(39) Placcius de Pſeudonymis, pag. 219.

(40) The plural number ſhould not be uſed; for there was but one oration.

(d) See the remark [G], citations (9) and (10).

‘ in his Lipſius Proteus, Francfort, 1614.’ I do not pretend to deny Juſtus Lipſius's inconſtancy in point of religion.

[K] Complaint was made of his capricious humour.] When his patron Schobinger adviſes him to go to Lauſanne, if he could live cheaper there than at Geneva, he adds this reſtriction: ‘ Modo à crebris migrationibus in poſterum abſtineas, quæ neque è re, neque pro exiſtimatione tua moroſitatis neſcio cujus ſuſpectum te apud nonnullos fecere, qui id mihi Tiguri nuper objecerunt (41). —— So that for the future you abſtain from frequent change of place, which, to the prejudice of your character, hath rendered you ſuſpected of a kind of churliſhneſs in the opinion of ſome, who have made this objection to me at Zurich.

(41) See the 58th letter of the collection printed in 1688. It is dated from St Gall, Feb. 16[illegible].

GOLIUS (JAMES), Mathematic and Arabic profeſſor in the univerſity of Leyden, was born at the Hague in the year 1596, of an ancient and conſiderable family [A]. He had a ſtrong inclination for learning, and a vaſt genius; for he not only ſtudied the languages, philoſophy, the Greek and Roman antiquities, divinity and phyſic, but he alſo ſtudied the mathematics with great application. When he was twenty years of age, he left the univerſity of Leyden, where he had made a great proficiency, and retired to a country-houſe (a), being reſolved to ſpend two years there, without minding any thing but his ſtudies; but, following them too hard, he ſoon fell ſick, and was obliged to deſiſt. He was ſo taken with the works and lectures of the learned Erpenius (b), that he followed him entirely. He took a journey into France with the ducheſs de la Trimouille, which occaſioned his being called to Rochelle to teach Greek. He did not long enjoy (c) that employment; for the civil-wars, which ended in the taking of that town, made Golius deſirous to return to Holland. Not long after (d) he followed the embaſſador, whom the States ſent to the king of Morocco; and made a good uſe of the advice given him by Erpenius [B], to get an entire knowledge of the Arabic tongue. He ſeemed ſo curious and well-informed of the ſciences and cuſtoms of the Arabians, that he rendered himſelf very acceptable to the learned and courtiers. He alſo received ſeveral marks of favour from Muley Zidas, king of Morocco [C]. He furniſhed himſelf with ſeveral books unknown to the Europeans; and, amongſt others, with the annals of the kingdom of Fez and Morocco, which he reſolved to tranſlate. He alſo made a great many collections concerning the hiſtory of the Serifs. By theſe means he brought to Erpenius a thouſand valuable things, which had been of great uſe to that learned profeſſor, had not a contagious diſeaſe ſwept him away a ſhort time after. Golius, not conſidering the danger to which he expoſed himſelf, did his dear maſter all the good offices imaginable during his ſickneſs, and attended him till he expired. He was choſen his ſucceſſor in the profeſſorſhip of the Arabic (e), according to the advice, which the deceaſed had given ſome time before his death; and he ſo learnedly diſcharged his employment, that the incomparable Erpenius was not miſſed (f). But, whilſt he ſo well ſatisfied others, he was not ſatisfied with himſelf; for he thought many things were wanting in him, which he could never acquire but in viſiting ſuch places as were near the fountain-head. He therefore asked his ſuperiours leave

(a) Situate near Naaldwijk. It belonged to his father.

(b) He was Arabic profeſſor at Leyden.

(c) One year only.

(d) In the year 1622.

(e) In the year 1624.

(f) Hac in Sparta ornanda jam ſatisfaciebat omnibus, haudquaquam ſibi: nemo non renatum in Golio Erpenium, & corpus tantum hominis, non virtutem Profeſſoris mutatam credere: ipſe non credulus illis omnia in ſeſe requirere, & licet haudquaquam arrogaret ſibi magiſtri ſummam, tamen ne hac quidem contentus eſſe. Joh. Fridericus Gronovius in Orat. Funebri Jac. Golii, pag. 15.

[A] He was of an ancient and conſiderable family.] It came originally from Leyden, where FRANCIS GOLIUS, great-great-grandfather of him we now ſpeak of, was an alderman, about the year 1458. CORNELIUS and GILBERT GOLIUS, his grandſons, were ſenators of the ſame city. They were ſons of THEODORIC GOLIUS, who, having married two or three wives, procured to his deſcendants ſeveral degrees of relation with a great many good families. Another THEODORIC GOLIUS, ſon to the former, was father of our James. He enjoyed a conſiderable employment (1), and was one of the burghers of Leyden, who contributed moſt to preſerve the city, during the ſiege ſo famous in hiſtory. His wife, the mother of our profeſſor, was called Anne Hemelar (2), and had a brother, for whom I deſign an article (3), wherein I ſhall ſpeak of PETER GOLIUS, brother of James.

[B] He made good uſe of the advice given him by Erpenius.] He charged him, amongſt other things, to enquire into the origin of certain proverbs, and upon what cuſtom, or inclination of the people, were grounded ſeveral Arabic words or expreſſions, which he underſtood only by conjecture; and which he thought he might have got well explained, if he had been in the country, where that language is ſpoken. But let us make uſe of the deſcription, which we find of all this, in the book I quote: ‘ Intellexerat (Erpenius) unum ſibi deeſſe quod terras, in quibus viget atque in uſu habetur Arabiſmus, non incoluiſſet, non acceſſiſſet. Quum enim multa in promptu haberet verba, proverbia, vocabula, quæ quid ſignificarent, divinabat magis & ſuſpicabatur quam noverat, quod de rerum formis, hominum actionibus, locorum habitu, unde & ubi illa nata eſſent nunquam oculis judicaſſet, hoc præcepit, inculcavit, infixit noſtro, ut quicquid ejuſmodi ſive natura illic, ſive ars, ſive conſuetudo nobis ignarum peperiſſet, aut introduxiſſet, diligentiſſime obſervaret, accurate deſcriberet, annotaretque una cum ſignato cujuſque nomine, & ſi noſcerentur, cauſis nominum (4).’

[C] He received ſeveral marks of favour from Muley Zidan, king of Morocco.] He had brought to him a letter from Erpenius, very well written, and had very luckily recommended himſelf by his agreeable carriage. Nec privata tantum humanitate, ſed & Imperatoris ipſius Mulei Zidani, (quam & literis Erpenii puriſſimo ſermone ſcriptis, & ſuo lepore atque honeſtate promeruerat) clementia, cumulatiſſime præſtitit (5). This is all we find thereupon in his funeral oration. We may add to it a very curious ſupplement, taken out of a relation in manuſcript, which Colomiés had peruſed, and of which he has publiſhed ſomething that concerns Golius. I tranſcribe the whole paſſage, tho' thereby I fall into the troubleſome neceſſity of repeating ſomething of what is to be ſeen in Moreri's dictionary. ‘ Mr Golius, whom I ſaw at Leyden, where he was an Arabic profeſſor in the room of Mr Erpenius, was very learned in the languages, and in the mathematics; but his wit was ſuperiour to his learning. He got great credit by the voyage he made into the Levant in the year 1622, and particularly to Morocco, with an ambaſſador from the States, and a gentleman of the horſe belonging to the prince of Orange. Being come to that city, they went to pay their reſpects to the king, who was called Mouly Zidam, and who received them, with their preſents, very graciouſly.

---

(1) Feudorum Hollandiæ actuarius. Gronovius in Orat. Funebri Jacobi Golii, pag. 6.

(2) Ex oratione funebri Golii habita à Gronovio.

(3) Look for HEMELAR (JOHN).

(4) Gronovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 13, 14.

(5) Ibid. pag. 14.

leave to make a voyage into the Levant (g). He ſtayed a year and a half at Aleppo; after which he travelled into Arabia and Meſopotamia, and came by land to Conſtantinople. His learning and prudence procured him, every where, both friends, and what was neceſſary to make his travels amongſt thoſe barbarous nations turn to account. He met with Turks, who gave him leave to ſearch into fine libraries [D]. In a word, he left ſo good a name behind him, that it was very uſeful to his brother (h), who ſome time after undertook the ſame voyage. Our Golius returned four years after to Leyden, with a fine collection of manuſcripts, and the remembrance of many curious things (i). Having re-aſſumed the thread of his former lectures, he ſoon ſaw himſelf called to make ſome of another nature [E]; for he was made profeſſor of the mathematics, in the room of Willibrord Snellius. He very worthily filled theſe two employments during forty years. And, although they might take up the whole time of a laborious man, yet he found leiſure to compoſe ſome valuable works, which have been publiſhed [F]; and to undertake others, which would not have come ſhort of 'graciouſly. He ſhewed himſelf particularly well pleaſed with the preſent, which Mr Erpenius had ſent him, and which was a great Atlas, and a New Teſtament in Arabic, in which he read often afterwards. The ambaſſador of the States happening to be uneaſy, becauſe he was not diſpatched, was adviſed to preſent a petition to the king, which Mr Golius drew up in the Arabic character and language, but in the ſtyle of the Chriſtians; a thing extraordinary in that country. The king was much ſurprized at the beauty of that petition, both as to the character, the language, and the ſtyle; and having ſent for the Taliphs or writers, he ſhewed them that petition, which they admired. He called immediately for the ambaſſador, whom he asked who had drawn up that petition. The ambaſſador having told him, that it was Mr Golius, diſciple and envoy of Mr Erpenius, he had a deſire to ſee him, and ſpoke to him in Arabic. Mr Golius anſwered him in Spaniſh, that he undeſtood very well what he ſaid to him, but that he could not anſwer him in Arabic, becauſe he could not pronounce the gutturals. The king, who underſtood Spaniſh, received his excuſe, and having granted the ambaſſador's petition, cauſed him to be ſpeedily diſpatched. I owe all theſe particulars to the Relation of the late Mr le Gendre, a merchant of Roan, who happened to be then at Morocco. Mr Briot keeps a copy of it, which he did me the favour to communicate to me at Paris. Let us add one word more concerning Mr Golius. He was brother to Peter Golius, who was alſo very learned in the oriental languages; who tranſlated from Latin into Arabic the treatiſe of The Imitation of JESUS CHRIST of Thomas à Kempis; and who, being turned friar of the order of the bare footed Carmelites, took the name of father Celeſtine of St Lidwine. Theſe two worthy brothers were nephews to a canon of Antwerp, named Hemelar, who has publiſhed a fine book of medals, which is very ſcarce (6).' I wiſh the Mêlanges Hiſtoriques of Colomiés were a volume in Folio.

[D] He met with Turks, who gave him leave to ſearch into fine libraries.] The Turks are not ſo deſtitute of books as people imagine. See what Dr Spon has related (7), and add to it this paſſage of Gronovius: 'Simul cum Legato (8) in Aſiam tranſiit (Golius) Præfecto oræ propontidos amæniſſimos hortos cum ampliſſima Bibliotheca eis cedente: in quo ſeceſſu in Hiſtoricorum & Geographorum Arabum ſcripta aut ignorata adhuc, aut inevoluta ſe ingurgitavit. Ut rediit, & memoriam lectorum per occaſiones in ſermonibus apud Megiſtanas oſtendit, ita obſtupefecit audientes, ut purpuratorum principi dignatione proximus cum eo egerit, Imperatoris diplomate ornatus ac tutus omne Imperium obiret, ac ſitus locorum rectius quam vulgo fit in tabulis depingeret: ille gratiam fecit prætexto Sacramento quod Ordinibus dixiſſet, ſed & periculi magnitudinem cogitans (9). —— He paſſed over with the embaſſador into Aſia, the governour of the Propontic coaſt giving them the liberty of very fine gardens, and a well-furniſhed library: in which retirement he buried himſelf in the ſtudy of the Arabian geographers and hiſtorians, hitherto unheard of, or never peruſed. Upon his return, recollecting what he had read, occaſionally in converſation with the great men, he ſo aſtoniſhed his hearers, that he was offered the emperor's commiſſion and ſafe-guard to travel over the whole empire, and take a more exact, geographical, ſurvey of it than had hitherto been done. He declined the offer on the pretence of the oath he had taken to the States, but, in reality, in conſideration of the dangers he muſt have run.' This paſſage deſerves to be quoted, ſince it may acquaint my readers with the particular eſteem the Turks had for Golius at Conſtantinople, and the offers they made him of an authentic commiſſion, whereby he ſhould have been created geographer to the Grand Seignior. The skill Golius had in phyſic, and the remedies he gave, without taking any money for them, procured him many preſents and friends. They offered him great advantages, to engage him to ſettle in the Levant. 'Philarchi & reguli Arabum admiſerunt eum familiariter, & ob Medicinæ experimenta ſuſpexerunt, quodque mercedes recuſaret donis plurimis & pretioſis affecerunt; majoribus, ut ſecum maneret, ſollicitatum (10) —— The princes and governours of the Arabians converſed freely with him, and greatly reſpected him for his skill in phyſic; and, as he refuſed all rewards, they loaded him with many valuable preſents, and tempted him with greater to ſtay among them'. Theſe are very glorious things for a Chriſtian.

[E] He ſoon ſaw himſelf called to make ſome lectures of another nature.] I have purpoſely followed Gronovius's narrative, to convince my readers by an inſtance how nicely a man ought to examine things, if he would be throughly acquainted with what is neceſſary to clear a fact. This is related in ſuch a manner in the funeral oration, that there is no body but will conclude, that Snellius died after Golius's return; and that Golius was not made profeſſor of mathematics, till after he had diſcharged for ſome time the functions of his other employment after his return to Leyden. But whoever believes that, will be in an error. Snellius died in the year 1626, and Golius returned from the Levant in the year 1629, and during his voyage was choſen to ſucceed Snellius; of which he received the news at Conſtantinople.

[F] He compoſed ſome valuable works, which have been publiſhed.] He publiſhed the Hiſtory of the Saracens, written by Elmacinus: a work which is partly owing to Erpenius, who had begun the tranſlation of that hiſtory. Golius compleated what was wanting. He publiſhed the life of Tamerlane, compoſed in Arabic by a famous author; as alſo the Aſtronomical Elements of Alſerganus, to which he added a new verſion, and learned commentaries. His Lexicon Arabicum is a moſt exact work (11). He illuſtrated with notes and additions the Arabic grammar of Erpenius, and added to it ſeveral pieces of poetry, taken out of Arabic poets, and chiefly out of Tograi and Ababolla. Tho' he was 54 years old when he began to ſtudy the Perſian language in good earneſt, yet he got ſuch a maſtery of it, that he compoſed a very ample dictionary of it, which was printed at London (12). He could have compoſed another of the Turkiſh language. He had ſuch a genius for languages, that, having begun late to learn that of the Chineſe, he made ſuch a progreſs in it, as to be able to read and underſtand their books. It is no ſmall matter even to know the figures they make uſe of in writing; for they have near eight thouſand of them (13). The Chineſe Atlas, to which he made ſome additions, ſhews the progreſs he had made in that language.

[G] . . . . and

(g) The letters patents, which Frederic Henry prince of Orange granted him, are dated the 30th of Nov. 1625.

(h) He was a monk. See the article HEMELAR.

(i) Quadriennio circumacto cum inæſtimabili quo bibliotheca publica ſuperbit, rariſſimorum librorum theſauro quem mente ac pectore condiderat, huc regreſſus intermiſſa docendi munia repetiit. Gronovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 19. The catalogue of the manuſcripts he brought, has been printed more than once.

(6) Colomiés, Mêlanges Hiſt. printed at Orange, 1675, pag. 75, &c.

(7) In the firſt Tome of his Voyage, pag. 193, Dutch Edit. See alſo Sir George Wheeler's Voyage, pag. 362.

(8) He means Cornelius Haga, embaſſador from Holland to Conſtantinople.

(9) Gronovius, in orat. funebri, pag. 18.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 17.

(11) Non parvæ molis, ſed immenſæ atque infinitæ curæ & induſtriæ. Id. ibid. pag. 20.

(12) It is inſerted in the Lexicon Heptaglotton of Caſtellus.

(13) Quod rariſſimum, annis jam vergentibus Sinenſi etiam linguæ difficillimæ, & niſi quis inter ipſos ætatem exigat, ingenio humano inexſuperabili attenderat, & ad octo millibus ſignorum quibus pro vocibus utuntur ſatis aſſuerat, ut libros illorum non ægre legere atque intelligere poſſet. Gronovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 20.

of thoſe, if he had lived to put the laſt hand to them [G]. What is moſt commendable in his works, is the zeal, with which he applied himſelf to make his knowledge of the tongues ſubſervient to the propagation of the faith among the infidels [H], and to the comfort of the Chriſtians, who groan under the tyranny of the Mahometans. He had an intercourſe of letters with the moſt learned men of Europe (k); and was very much eſteemed by his ſovereigns (l). His conſtitution was ſo very ſtrong [I], that he always enjoyed a perfect health. He died the twenty eighth of September 1667, after having gone through all the degrees of the univerſity, and being as much eſteemed for his virtue and piety, as for his learning. He made a right judgment of things; for he deplored the method, with which diſputes about religion are commonly managed [K]. He left two ſons, of whom I ſhall ſay ſomething in the remarks [L].

[G] .... and undertook others, which would not have come ſhort of the former if he had put the laſt hand to them.] He deſigned to have publiſhed a ſecond edition of the life of Tamerlane, the text of which would have been printed with the vowels; and he would have added to it a tranſlation, and a commentary, full of illuſtrations on ſeveral intricate paſſages of the oriental hiſtory. This work wanted but little of being delivered to the printer. He had begun a geographical and hiſtorical dictionary, relating to the countries in the Levant, in quo omnia locorum & hominum per Orientem nomina explicarentur. He had promiſed a long time a new edition of the Alcoran, with a tranſlation, and a confutation of it. He deſigned to give a catalogue of all the Perſian books, that are in Europe, and a treatiſe of the dialects of the Perſian language. He would chiefly have examined the dialect, which is accounted the beſt, and which has obtained that title by the moſt authentic ſentence that can be required in that kind of privileges. See the margin (14), where you will find a remarkable paſſage. Never did the Greeks or Romans, or any of the nations, that have moſt cultivated learning and eloquence, do ſo much for their languages, as the kings of Perſia: neither the academy della Cruſca, and ſuch like it, nor that, of which cardinal Richelieu was the founder, come near that aſſembly of ſages, whom the kings of Perſia called together, for the admiſſion or excluſion of words.

[H] He applied himſelf to make his knowledge of the tongues ſubſervient to the propagation of the faith among the infidels.] We may reckon, for a proof of his zeal, the particular care he took to cauſe the New Teſtament to be printed both in literal and and vulgar Greek. The States were pleaſed to be at that expence in favour of the Grecians. Nemo tanto ſtudio, labore, gratia ob conſulatus & præturas & imperia contendit omnemque lapidem movit, quam ille ut Novi Fœderis ſacratiſſimæ tabulæ, ſimul uti ſcriptæ ſunt, ſimul ut in ῥωμαικὸν (ut appellant) ſeu Græcam linguam vulgarem traductæ, formis vulgarentur: atque id magnificum atque divinum munus Potentiſſimorum Liberi Belgii Ordinum beneficio, gemens ſub barbariæ intolerabili jugo gens libertatis & elegantiæ inventrix acciperet (15). He took care to diſperſe, among the Chriſtians of the Levant, an Arabic tranſlation of the confeſſion of faith of the reformed, and of their Catechiſm and Liturgy; for there are Chriſtians in thoſe countries, who make uſe of the Arabic tongue in divine ſervice. He employed in this tranſlation an Armenian, who underſtood vulgar Arabic, and ſuch phraſes as are conſecrated to religion, and who knew how to adapt Golius's ſtyle to the capacity of every body: for if Golius alone had made that tranſlation, his expreſſions might have been too ſublime and learned. He entertained that Armenian at his houſe two years and a half, and promiſed him the ſame penſion, which the States had granted to the Archimandrite, who turned the New Teſtament into vulgar Greek. However he did not know whether the States would be at that expence, neither did he propoſe the thing to them till the work was compleated: and then they not only made good his promiſe, but likewiſe made him a fine preſent (16). I ſhall not defer mentioning what I have to ſay concerning another preſent. He was their interpreter in ordinary for the Arabic, Turkiſh, Perſian, &c. tongues; which was worth an annual penſion to him. I ſuppoſe the functions of that employment gave no great interruption to his other labours; but, as often as they had occaſion for him in that capacity, they treated him with great civility, and upon a time preſented him with a gold chain, and a very fine medal (17).

[I] His conſtituion was very ſtrong.] He had preſerved himſelf ſound by a conſtant temperance, and forbearance of voluptuouſneſs (18). At the age of ſeventy years, he walked on foot all the ſpace of ground, which is between the Maeſe and the Wahal, at a place, where he was forced to march fourteen hours (19).

[K] He deplored the method, with which diſputes about religion are commonly managed.] Theſe are the expreſſions of the author of his funeral oration: 'Religionem, perinde ut rempublicam, factionibus 'geri dolebat. Speciem quandam externam ſibi circumdediſſe multis ſufficere, quam vita & actiones 'confutarent. Inter diſſentientes, de mediis quoque 'rebus atque indifferentibus, nullam turpem rationem 'vincendi: calumnias, artes malas, pias fraudes vigere. 'Nuſquam moderata conſilia, zelum, qui furor ſit, 'vocari. Partim Scripturam S. tractare potius ut 'ingenium inde quam ſalutis curam nutriant. Theologicen præferre, ut nomen ſcientiæ atque auctoritatis. Ergo miſſa in diſcrimen veritate, quamvis ſatis '& excellenter doctos eſſe conſtet, tam ſecure de illa 'tranſigere. Hos in Theologia philoſophari, ad diſputandum modo, atque ut magni & conſpecti ſint, 'Theologos (20) —— He was grieved, that religion, 'no leſs than the ſtate, was carried on by factions, that 'many were ſatisfied with an outward ſhew, which 'their lives and actions confuted; that, among diſputants, even about indifferent matters, no way of obtaining the victory was thought ſcandalous; that 'calumny, baſe arts, and pious frauds flouriſhed; that 'moderate counſels were no where to be found, and that 'what is rage was called zeal; that the ſcripture 'was handled more to exerciſe the wit, than to provide for ſalvation; that divinity was profeſſed only 'as carrying the name of ſcience and authority; that 'truth was in danger whilſt it's advocates, however 'learned, were careleſs of it's intereſts; and that they 'philoſophized in religion chiefly for the ſake of diſputation, and acquiring the reputation of eminent divines.' This is one of the five or ſix reflexions, that Gronovius has ſelected, among many others, which Golius was heard to make during his laſt ſickneſs (21). All men of ſenſe will agree, that his choice is judicious; for, of all things in the world, the abuſes here in queſtion deſerve moſt to be deplored: yet, nevertheleſs, people are ſo hardened, and ſo ſo little affected with that diſorder, that we ought to conclude, that none but perſons of an exquiſite judgment can think, in that matter, as our profeſſor did. The church is divided into factions and cabals, juſt like commonwealths: into factions, I ſay, which either triumph, or are oppreſſed, juſt as in commonwealths: not in proportion to the goodneſs or badneſs of the cauſe, but in proportion to the great or little uſe people can make of all manner of devices (22). Such a church is certainly an object of compaſſion, and a matter of affliction. Another thing, which Gronovius has collected, is, in my opinion, very judicious. Golius, who had lived ſo long, ſeen ſo much, travelled ſo far, had found nothing more ſcarce than a Chriſtian worthy of that name. He had ſeen mankind every where plunged in vice, every where in diſguiſe, (23). Travellers obſerve an infinite variety amongſt men: in a day they are tranſported into another country, where they find another language, other habits, other cuſtoms; but notwithſtanding thoſe infinite variations, all nations are alike, and agree in this, that there are but few honeſt men every where, and that forbidden pleaſures are commonly practiſed.

[L] He left two ſons, of whom I ſhall ſay ſomething in the remarks.] They both ſtudied the civil-law, and were admitted advocates. The elder was called Theodore, (k) Gronovius names ſeveral, and, among the reſt, Carteſius. See in the life of that philoſopher by Mr Baillet, Golius's friendſhip for him.

(l) Taken from his funeral oration, pronounced by J. Frid. Gronovius. The dates were wanting in it every where; I have been obliged to ſupply them in the margin.

(14) Et libellus de variis linguæ Perſicæ dialectis, præſertim de omnium puriſſima, quam juſſu magnorum regum omnibus ex partibus regni concilio coacto ſapientes moroſo verborum delectu probarunt, & aula recepit. Ibid. pag. 21.

(15) Ibid.

(16) Gronovius, ibid. pag. 22, 23.

(17) Id. ibid.

(18) Idem. pag. 28.

(19) Septuaginta natus annos continenti quatuordecim horarum Vahalim inter & Moſam ambulatione iter pedes confecit. Ibid.

(20) Ib. pag. 30.

(21) Ib. pag. 28.

(22) Nullam turpem rationem vincendi; calumnias, artes malas, pias fraudes vigere. Ibid. pag. 30.

(23) Vana eſſe omnia, & fucata, totumque orbem inundatum & immerſum vitiis. Ibid. pag. 29.

dore, and was admitted into the council of Leyden in the year 1669. He was choſen burgomaſter of the ſame city three times, and exerciſed there once the office of great bailiff, which is the firſt in the cities of Holland. He was alſo deputed to the college of the admiralty at Amſterdam. He died in the year 1679, being then burgomaſter. His brother MATTHEW GOLIUS, a very honeſt and moſt learned gentleman, dean of the court of Holland, died at the Hague in Sept. 1702. Their mother was of a very good family (24). She lived twenty four years very lovingly with her husband (25).

(24) Gronovius, ubi ſupra, pag. 24, & ſeq.

(25) Idem. pag. 29.

GOLIUS (THEOPHILUS) profeſſor of Ethics at Straſburg, where he was born in the year 1528 (a), and died in the year 1600 (b). He compoſed in Latin an Abridgment of Ethics, taken from the ten books of Ariſtotle ad Nichomachum, and an Abridgment of Politics, taken from the ſame Ariſtotle. He dedicated the firſt of theſe two works to Baron de Tanberg, the firſt of September 1592. My edition of them both is of Straſburg, typis Joſiæ Ribelii hæredum 1621 in 8°. I have not ſeen his Greek Grammar. Mr Konig mentions it (c).

(a) Konig. Bibl. pag. 352.

(b) Id. ibid.

(c) Id. ibid.

GOMARUS (FRANCIS), profeſſor of divinity, was born at Bruges the thirtieth of January, 1563. His father and mother, who had embraced the Proteſtant religion, retired into the Palatinate, in the year 1578, in order to profeſs it quietly, and cauſed him to ſtudy at Straſburg under the famous John Sturmius. He was under the diſcipline of that good old man about three years; after which, he went to purſue his ſtudies at Newſtad, whither the profeſſors of Heidelberg were retired (a). He took a journey into England towards the end of the year 1582, and heard, at Oxford, the lectures in divinity of John Raynolds, and, at Cambridge, thoſe of William Whitaker. He took his bachelor's degree in the month of June 1584. He ſpent the two following years at Heidelberg (b), where the univerſity had been reſtored. The Dutch congregation at Francfort called him to be their paſtor in the year 1587, and enjoyed his miniſtry from that time till 1593, when they were entirely diſperſed by perſecution. He was called to Leyden, to be profeſſor of divinity, in the year 1594. He accepted that offer; but before he went to take poſſeſſion of his place, he went to Heidelberg, to take his doctor's degree. He exerciſed quietly that profeſſorſhip, till he had for his colleague James Arminius, in the year 1603, a man, who ſoon broached his Pelagian tenets [A], and made himſelf the head of a party in the univerſity. Gomarus ſtood up againſt him with great zeal, not only in the ſchools of Leyden, but alſo in the preſence of the ſtates of the province. They two diſputed twice in the aſſembly of the ſtates of Holland, in the year 1608, which was continued by five againſt five the following year. The ſucceſs of theſe diſputes was not ſuch as the churches wiſhed (c); but nevertheleſs it ſerved for ſomething, to wit, to diſcover Arminius's Pelagianiſm. That profeſſor, who was ſick, made uſe of that excuſe to break off the conferences, and died ſome time after. His adverſaries employed all their induſtry to hinder Vorſtius from ſucceeding him; but not being able to effect it, it happened that Gomarus, to avoid having ſuch a colleague, reſigned his poſt, and retired to Middleburg, in the year 1611. He was miniſter there, and made public lectures, till the year 1614, when he was called by the academy of Saumur to be profeſſor of divinity. He exerciſed that employment four years; after which he retired to Groningen, to be, there, firſt divinity and Hebrew profeſſor. Here he found a fixed ſtation, to which he firmly ſtuck till his death, that is, till the eleventh of January 1641. If he abſented himſelf twice, it was not to allow himſelf any relaxation, but to be one of the judges of Arminius's cauſe in the ſynod of Dort (d), and to reviſe the tranſlation of the Old Teſtament (e). He married three wives, and had children only by the ſecond [B]. He was a very learned man, particularly in the oriental languages. His works were printed at Amſterdam, in folio, in the year 1645 (f) [C]. If it be true, that he anſwered Barnevelt,

(a) The elector Palatine had driven them away, becauſe they were not Lutherans.

(b) The elector Lewis, perſecutor of the Reformed, being dead, in 1583, prince Caſimir his brother had the adminiſtration of the electorate, and reſtored the Reformed.

(c) See the remark [A], citation (1).

(d) In the year 1618.

(e) At Leyden, in 1633.

(f) Taken from his life in the collection of thoſe of the profeſſors of Groningen.

[A] It was not long before Arminius ſpread his Pelagian tenets.] I advance this, as a tranſlator of him, who compoſed Gomarus's life (1); though, for the reſt, I do not pretend to warrant he is in the right: for I know, that Arminius did not own his opinions to be like thoſe of Pelagius, nor even like thoſe of the Semi-Pelagians. See Grotius's treatiſe, intituled, Diſquiſitio an Pelagiana ſint ea dogmata quæ nunc ſub eo nomine traducuntur? It is in the third volume of his theological works. See alſo one of his letters (2). When therefore you read, in Gomarus's life, that this advantage, at leaſt, reſulted from the conferences held with the Arminians, that they were manifeſtly convicted of teaching Pelagius's tenets (3), do not preſently believe, that they were forced to own that, and that the judges of the conference pronounced, that they had been ſufficiently convicted of it. The terms of that author ought to ſignify no more, than that Gomarus pretended he had produced good proofs for his charge againſt Arminius.

[B] He had children only by his ſecond wife.] She was called Mary Leremite, and was a gentlewoman both by her father's and mother's ſide. He married her at Francfort (4), and had by her one ſon, and two daughters. The ſon died before his father, and left children behind him. The younger daughter was married to David de la Haie, miniſter of a Walloon church. This remark, and ſeveral others of this nature, which will be found in this dictionary, are made in favour of many good ſouls, which are known to be very inquiſitive about the relations of paſtors and learned men. If there be readers, that care little for theſe things, as undoubtedly there are but too many, they are deſired to remember, that an author is not obliged to ſay nothing but what they like; for, in a work like this, a man is obliged to pleaſe, ſometimes one ſort of people, ſometimes another. Let this be ſaid once for all.

[C] His works were printed at Amſterdam, in folio, in the year 1645.] That is, ſeveral treatiſes, which had been publiſhed at divers times, were collected into one volume. His Anti-Coſterus was printed in the year 1599, and in 1600. His Lyra Davidis was publiſhed a long while before his death. Lewis Capel wrote againſt that work. 'Non ita pridem vir Cl. & 'Doctiſſ. thus Rivet ſpeaks (5), Franciſcus Gomarus 'edidit

(1) Dogmata Pelagiana clam, palam, voce, ſcripto ſpargere cœpit, ac familiam in Academia ducere. Vita Gomari inter Profeſſ. Groningenſ. Vitas, pag. 76.

(2) The 10th of the ſecond part.

(3) Succeſſu quidem non eo quem eccleſiæ optabant, ut profligatis erroribus ac ſchiſmate orthodoxa veritas & concordia in arce collocaretur: non tamen nullo, cum detracta larva Adverſarii Pelagianiſmus palam evictus fuerit. Vita Gomari, pag. 77.

(4) He had alſo married his firſt wife in the ſame city. He married the third at Middleburg; wherefore it ſhould not have been ſaid, in the firſt Tome of the Anti, pag. 128, that he married at Leyden, before he went to Middleburg.

(5) Prolegom. in Pſalmos.

velt, as Grotius relates, one cannot excuſe his great prepoſſeſſion [D]: of which thoſe who know how to judge of things, may be eaſily convinced. Meurſius has led Moreri into ſome miſtakes [E]; but the faults, which Moreri has committed of himſelf, are ſhameful

'edidit Lyram Davidis, in qua putavit ſe ad metra Horatiana & ſimilia Davidis Pſalmorum verſus ita exegiſſe, ut veram poëſeos Hebraicæ rationem invenerit. 'Sed Ludovicus Capellus animadverſionum libello totum illud D. Gomari opus obelo transfigere conatus 'eſt, ut inde lector diſcat vix inter doctos de eo poſſe 'convenire, neque labore parum utili ſe ultra fatiget. '—— Not long ago, Francis Gomarus publiſhed his 'Lyra Davidis, in which he had ſo reduced the verſes 'of David's Pſalms to the metres of Horace and others, 'that he thought he had found out the true meaſure of 'the Hebrew poetry. But Lewis Capel, in a book of 'remarks, endeavoured to overthrow that whole work of 'Gomarus; whence the reader may ſee, that even 'learned men cannot agree among themſelves in that 'point, and may learn not to tire himſelf with a fruitleſs labour.'

[D] If it be true that he anſwered Barnevelt, as Grotius relates, one cannot excuſe his great prepoſſeſſion.] Barnevelt made a ſhort ſpeech to thoſe two antagoniſts before the ſtates of Holland, wherein he declared, he thanked GOD, that thoſe controverſies did not concern the fundamental articles of the Chriſtian religion. Whereupon Gomarus, having obtained leave to ſpeak, proteſted, that he would not appear before the throne of GOD with Arminius's errors. We find this particular in Grotius's letters (6). It is alſo to be found in the preface, that was printed before the acts of the ſynod of Dort. I queſtion whether there be, now-a-days, any ſticklers for Gomarus, ſo paſſionate, as to maintain, that he had reaſon to anſwer Barnevelt as he did. The heat of diſpute, and the untoward influence of profeſſorial emulation, made him ſtrain things too high, and confounded his judgment. For now-a-days the moſt rigid Calviniſts do not ſcruple to own, that the five articles of the Remonſtrants are no fundamental hereſies; and they give ſufficiently to underſtand, that the ſchiſm might ſoon be made up, if the ſect of Arminius was not fallen into new errors, a thouſand times more pernicious than thoſe, which ſet Gomarus and Arminius againſt one another. Therefore thoſe, whoſe heads have not been heated by the perſonal quarrels, which exaſperated Gomarus, do not believe, like him, that a man ſhall eternally be damned for believing the five articles of the Arminians. It is therefore to a perſonal animoſity that we muſt impute the untoward opinion of that adverſary of Arminius.

That no body may contradict what I advance, I am going to produce a proof, which, though founded only upon a ſingle witneſs, has yet all the force of a good demonſtration; ſince that witneſs is no other than Mr Jurieu, the moſt intractable man in the world, with reſpect to the Arminians. Mr Arnauld thought he had wrote an unanſwerable book againſt the Proteſtant miniſters, when he publiſhed his Renverſement de la Morale. He grounded all his proofs on the tenets of the ſynod of Dort, and ſuppoſed, that ſo great an aſſembly would not have enforced the profeſſion of thoſe tenets upon pain of excommunication, if they had not looked upon them as fundamental. Mr Jurieu anſwered him a hundred good things, and confounded him, by maintaining to him, that that ſynod had never looked upon, as articles neceſſary to ſalvation, the tenets in queſtion in the diſputes of the Remonſtrants (7). He ſaid, in particular, touching that of Inamiſſible Grace, one of the chief points of the diſpute, that, ſince the deciſion of the ſynod, the Lutherans, or any other communion, are free, either to defend, or not to admit that tenet. I ſay, they are free to do it: not but that men always ſin, when they reject a truth ſo ſacred, important, and clearly eſtabliſhed by ſcripture, as that is. But we do not hold it to be ſuch a ſin, as excludes from grace, and deſtroys faith (8). Nay, he ſays, that thoſe, who live in the communion of the Anti-Remonſtrants, are at liberty not to ſubmit themſelves to the deciſion of the ſynod of Dort in that reſpect, and to have particular ſentiments about that, provided they do not take upon them to dogmatize and make diſciples: and that, though ſuch miniſters, as go about to deny the perſeverance of true ſaints, are not ſuffered to aſcend the pulpit, and are even driven from among the Calviniſts, yet the latter do not therefore pretend to baniſh them from the body of JESUS CHRIST (9).

For the reſt, if we may credit the Engliſh author of ſome letters publiſhed by the Arminians, Gomarus was a very paſſionate man. See the letters of thoſe gentlemen, in the pages 548, 565, &c. This emboldens me the more to reject the temerity and malicious conjecture of thoſe, who would pretend, that he did not believe, that Arminius's tenets did lead to hell; tho' he affirmed it, to juſtify the oppoſition he made againſt thoſe tenets: for he had reaſon to fear, that the ſtates of Holland would tell him, that it was not worth the while to make ſuch a noiſe, if Arminius's opinions did not hinder people from being ſaved. The beſt anſwer, that could be made to that objection, was, to ſay, that one could not ſtir too much, nor implore with too much ardour the authority of the magiſtrates, againſt thoſe doctrines, ſince they were ſufficient to caſt into hell all ſuch, as ſhould ſuffer themſelves to be infected with them. Grotius obſerves, that Gomarus, in a converſation they had together about the Arminian controverſies, called Arminius's opinions profane and impious, and inveighed againſt him, but without ſaying any thing about predeſtination. 'Cum multa acriter in Arminium diceret, impiaſque & profanas vocaret ipſius opiniones, tamen de prædeſtinatione vix 'quicquam locutus eſt. Sed primum in illam maxime 'ſententiam invectus eſt, quæ juſtificationis objectum 'aut materiam ſtatuit fidem, juſtitiam autem Chriſti 'cauſam meritoriam juſtificationis ejus quæ eſt ex fide '(10).' He principally inſiſted on the matter of juſtification; though moſt members of the ſtates of Holland had determined, that, as to that point, the diſpute of Gomarus and Arminius was almoſt nothing but a diſpute of words (11). If there was artifice in not inſiſting much upon predeſtination, it was alſo an artifice to inſiſt upon it; which ſecond artifice was that of Arminius. He took notice, that the tenet of abſolute reprobation might eaſily bear an odious conſtruction; and that his doctrine, as to that point, was more plauſible and popular; wherefore he ſhewed himſelf on that fair ſide (12). It is the general cuſtom of pleaders; they always ſhow the fair ſide of the cauſe. Mark well what Grotius relates, at the end of that letter. Uyttenbogard had foreſeen, even from the year 1608, the ſucceſs of thoſe diſputes, (viz.) that Calvin's doctrine ſhould triumph in Holland, as it triumphed at Geneva in the time of Caſtalio, a man, who was ſo ſeverely perſecuted, and reduced to ſuch ſtreights, as to be obliged to turn wood-cleaver to get a livelihood. 'Cum tantis præjudiciis res agatur, & 'ſingulares Doctorum opiniones, in mentes diſcipulorum ſenſim irrepentes, atque auctu temporis, & altius inquirendi negligentia ac ſpecie, tacito Eccleſiarum conſenſu receptæ, liberam magnorum ingeniorum ſedulitatem autoritate ſua jugulent, neque minus 'in Eccleſiis, quam in aliis conſeſſibus vincat major 'pars meliorem, non alium ſe eventum rerum Arminii 'ſperare, quam Caſtellionis fuerit, qui preſſus impotentia adverſariorum eo redactus ſit, ut vir non indoctus & perpetuæ famæ lignando ſibi victum quæreret (13). —— When parties run ſo high, and the 'particular opinions of doctors, inſenſibly creeping into 'the minds of the ſcholars, and, through length of 'time, and a neglect of inquiring further, being received with a tacit conſent of the church, baffle, by 'their authority, the free enquiries of learned men; and 'when, no leſs in the church, than in other aſſemblies, 'the greater part conquers the better, the Arminians 'can expect no other event of things, than was Caſtellio's, who, through the perſecution of his adverſaries, was reduced, though a learned man, and 'of perpetual fame, to get his living by cleaving wood.'

[E] Meurſius has led Moreri into ſome miſtakes.] He has placed (14) Gomarus's birth in the year 1562 (15), and ſaid, he went into England before he went into Germany. Theſe two faults are eaſily perceived, if one reads the narrative I have given, which is, without compariſon, better than that, which Mr Moreri has followed; ſince it is taken out of a book, written at Groningen, where Gomarus was a profeſſor twenty two years: out of a book, I ſay, compoſed after Gomarus's death, and with the help of more copious memoirs, than thoſe, which John Meurſius made uſe of.

[F] The

---

(6) Cum D. Oldenbarneveldius, brevi, quam ad profeſſores habebat, oratione inter alia gratias ſe habere Deo diceret, quod de Chriſtianæ religionis capitibus nulla eſſet diſputatio; reſpondit Gomarus, poſtulata dicendi venia, ejuſmodi eſſe collegæ ſui opiniones in articulis inter ipſos controverſis, ut ipſe, ita ſentiens, nolit coram Deo Judice conſiſtere. Grotius, Epiſt. xi, Part. I, pag. 3.

(7) I have alledged the reaſons, which made the ſynod of Dort inſert this in their deciſions. It is . . . in the third place, to pacify differences by terminating a controverſy, about which people were divided. But I deny once more, that the ſynod ever intended to make that new deciſion a fundamental article of our faith. Jurieu, Juſtification de la Morale des Reformez, Part. II, lib. vi, cap. iii, pag. 216.

(8) Id. ibid. cap ii, pag. 207.

(9) Id. ibid.

(10) Grotius, Epiſt. xi, Part. I, pag. 3.

(11) Plerique ex Senatu judicaverant hoc non multo plus eſſe quam λογομαχίαν (verborum pugnam) . . . . ille contra rem magnam agi putabat. Grotius, ibid.

(12) At Arminius dicebat, non ita graves eſſe controverſias, ſed maxime circa prædeſtinationem ambigi, quod ideo in conventu dixiſſe videbatur aut credebatur, quia in iſto argumento, popularis ac plauſibilis eſt novitas. Id. ibid.

(13) Ibid. pag. 4.

(14) Athen. Batav. pag. 176.

(15) Mr Baillet, Tome I, of the Anti, pag. 127, having followed Meurſius in this, ought to have ſaid, by a neceſſary conſequence, that Gomarus died ſeventy nine years old, ſince he died in the year 1641. The truth is, he wanted a few days of ſeventy eight years, the day of his death.

ſhameful [F]. They have moſt of them been marked in the edition of Holland. I forgot to ſay, that Scaliger had no great eſteem for our Gomarus [G].

[F] The faults Moreri has committed of himſelf are ſhameful.] He ſays, that Gomarus's father carried him into England. Meurſius ſays no ſuch thing; and the author of the lives of the profeſſors of Groningen ſays expreſsly the contrary: to wit, that Gomarus's father retired into the Palatinate, and ſent his ſon to Straſburg. Moreri pretends, that Arminius taught a particular doctrine at Leyden, when Gomarus was called thither; which is a great anachroniſm: for Gomarus had been ten years a profeſſor at Leyden, when Arminius began to teach there. But the moſt ſtrange miſtake of our author, and the moſt inexcuſable in a French prieſt, who ought to think himſelf called to the converſion of the Huguenots, is, the having believed, that the tenet of Irreſiſtible and Inamiſſible Grace, was an error, into which Gomarus fell, by being carried ſomewhat too far by his paſſion. What a profound ignorance is this! Is it not a doctrine, which has ever obtained in the communion of Geneva, from Calvin to this preſent time? If Gomarus differed from the reſt, it was in his explaining himſelf harſhly, according to the hypotheſis of the Supralapſarians. See the advice that Voſſius gave him (16).

(16) Voſſius, Epiſt. cccxcvi, pag. 362. Edit. Londinenſis, 1693.

[G] Scaliger had no great eſteem for our Gomarus.] Read this paſſage of the Scaligerana. ‘ If any body ‘ ſhould aſk Gomarus and Snellius, whether this age ‘ will produce greater men than the preceding, they ‘ will undoubtedly anſwer, yes; becauſe they think ‘ themſelves to be the moſt learned. Gomarus is of ‘ Bruges: that is the reaſon he is learned. He has a ‘ fine library, and a great many Ramiſts: for he is a ‘ great analytic, which is the mark of a Ramiſt. He ‘ thinks himſelf the moſt learned divine. He has no ‘ more skill in chronology, than I in coining falſe ‘ money (17).’

(17) Pag. m. 95.

GOMBAULD (JOHN OGIER DE), one of the beſt French Poets of the XVIIth century, was born in Xaintonge, at St Juſt de Luſſac, near Broüage (a). One may ſee in Moreri's Dictionary, that he not only was admitted into the French academy, from the beginning of the inſtitution of that ſociety, but likewiſe that he was one of the little aſſembly of wits, which preceded that inſtitution, and occaſioned the foundation of that illuſtrious academy. One may ſee, in the ſame dictionary, ſome other curious things concerning Mr Gombauld, which I ſhall not repeat, contenting myſelf to mention ſuch paſſages as are not to be found there. Therefore I ſhall ſay, that he was a Proteſtant [A], a gentleman, and a younger ſon by a fourth marriage, as he uſed to ſay in jeſt, to excuſe himſelf for not being rich. That he was tall, well ſhaped, and looked like a man of quality. That his piety was ſincere, his probity above ſlander, and his life unblameable. That he had a noble and upright ſoul, a lofty mind, leſs fruitful than judicious; a quick, fiery, and paſſionate temper, tho' he ſeemed to be grave and compoſed. That, after he had ſtudied moſt ſciences at Bourdeaux, under the beſt maſters, he came to Paris, about the latter end of the reign of Henry the great, where he was ſoon known and eſteemed (b). He was none of the laſt, nor the meaneſt of thoſe, who made verſes on the death of that great monarch (c). He was very much eſteemed by Mary de Medicis, and no man of his condition had a freer acceſs to, or was more kindly received by her. She allowed him a penſion of twelve hundred Crowns. ‘ And, being as great an enemy to needleſs expences, as ‘ he loved to live handſomely, and to ſpend what was neceſſary, he raiſed a pretty ‘ conſiderable ſtock out of what he ſaved, whilſt he was in plenty; which proved very ‘ beneficial to him, when the civil and foreign wars leſſened, and at laſt dried up, the ‘ ſprings,

(a) Peliſſon. Hiſt. de l'Acad. Françoiſe, pag. m. 339.

(b) Preface to the treatiſes and letters of Mr Gombaud, concerning religion. Mr Colomiés, in his Bibliotheque Choiſie, pag. 155, of the ſecond edition, obſerves, that Mr Conrart is the author of this preface.

(c) Ibid.

[A] He was a Proteſtant.] This is what the continuators of Moreri have not mentioned: perhaps they were ignorant of it: but perhaps alſo they would not have mentioned it, though they had known it. However it be, ſuch an omiſſion is a fault; for, unleſs we ſee in an hiſtorical dictionary, printed in France, and compoſed by Roman Catholics, that an author did not profeſs the eſtabliſhed religion, we are apt to ſuppoſe, that he did profeſs it, eſpecially if we find (1), that he was in honourable poſts, ſuch as to be a member of an academy of wits, founded by a cardinal, who was firſt miniſter of ſtate: that he was appointed to examine and ſettle the ſtatutes of that new ſociety; and that he furniſhed memoirs concerning them. Therefore, to prevent the reader's imagining, that Gombauld was a Roman Catholic, it ſhould have been expreſsly ſaid, that he was not ſo, but a Huguenot; though, if they pleaſed, they might have added their reflexions as to his misfortune in that reſpect. The books, that author publiſhed, were little proper to let the world know, that he was a good Proteſtant; but this has ſufficiently appeared by ſome poſthumous treatiſes, printed in Holland, in the year 1678. They are, Diſcourſes about religion; and theſe Gombauld eſteemed more than any of his other works. He had compoſed them out of a meer motive of charity, with a deſign to make the truth known to thoſe, that were in an error, and to confirm, in the ſound belief, thoſe that were born in it, or had embraced it. He commonly complained of two things: firſt, that the generality of thoſe, that wrote about theſe matters, made too voluminous books, wherein they heaped proofs upon proofs, and authorities upon authorities, without much minding either order or clearneſs. And ſecondly, that they perſuaded themſelves, that learning and elegance were incompatible. To ſhew, that they were miſtaken in that, he compoſed his conſiderations on the Chriſtian religion, when he was yet in the vigour of his age; and ſhewed indeed, that a man may be at once nervous and clear, conciſe and full, ſolid and elegant: Having communicated that piece to ſeveral of his friends, and even to ſome of the Romiſh communion, it was approved and valued by all, which encouraged him to write afterwards the treatiſe of the Euchariſt; and another, which he addreſſes to one of his friends, under the name of Ariſtander. As for the letters, he wrote them when he was more advanced in years, except that to a ſtudent of divinity, which bears almoſt the ſame date with the conſiderations on the Chriſtian religion . . . His greateſt paſſion was to publiſh theſe writings, becauſe he was perſuaded, that they would be uſeful; and perhaps few lay-men expreſſed ſo much zeal for the glory of GOD, and ſo much love for their neighbours, as he did. The fervency of his zeal appears by his books; but, if it be conſidered that he had ſcarce any thing to live upon but what he received from the court, it will be no wonder, if he did not publiſh them in his life-time. In order to prevent the loſs of them after his death, if they ſhould fall into the hands of perſons of a different religion from his, he put them, in his latter years, into the hands of one of his old friends, whoſe faithfulneſs and affection were well known to him, and made him promiſe not to part with them, and to get them printed as ſoon as he ſhould find an occaſion for it (2). One may eaſily perceive, by the reading of thoſe books, that Gombauld was as averſe to the Roman communion, as a miniſter; but he may be compared to thoſe men, who do no good to their heirs but after their death. Not that they want affection, and would be unwilling to ſhew their liberality while alive, if they could do it without any inconveniency; but they think they have not too much for themſelves. Perhaps, if any one ſhould blame this conduct of Gombauld, he would be thought overzealous.

(1) This is found in Moreri.

(2) Preface to Gombauld's treatiſes and letters.

‘ ſprings, which afforded him a plentiful maintenance. At firſt, his penſion was brought ‘ down from twelve hundred crowns to eight hundred, and from eight hundred to four ‘ hundred, where it reſted till his death; nor was he paid, ever ſince the war of Paris,
‘ but by the good offices of ſome potent and generous perſons [B], to whom he had ‘ the honour to be known, and by whom he was protected, among whom the duke and ‘ ducheſs of Montauſier ought to be firſt named. He was alſo for ſome years gratified
‘ with a penſion by Mr Seguier, chancellor of France. He always enjoyed a good ‘ health, to which his frugality and oeconomy did very much contribute. But, one day,
‘ as he was walking in his chamber, which he uſed to do, he fell, and got ſuch a hurt
‘ in his hip, that, ever after this accident, he was forced to keep his bed the greateſt ‘ part of the time, till he died, being almoſt an hundred years old, if a date, written ‘ with his own hand in one of the books of his cloſet, was the true time of his birth; as ‘ he told one, who never ſaid any thing of it till after his death, becauſe Gombauld had ‘ imparted his age to him as a ſecret [C].’ None had more conſtantly attended the drawing-room zealous. Gombauld had nothing to maintain himſelf, but the penſion he received from the court of France; nor could he be paid, but by uſing the intereſt of a great man to overcome a thouſand difficulties. That great man's credit would have been ineffectual, if Gombauld had publiſhed books of controverſy; and conſequently the publiſhing of them would have reduced the author to great ſtraits. Were it not therefore too rigid a thing, to condemn his cautious prudence, and to think it ſtrange, that he ſhould put off the impreſſion of thoſe books till after after his death? How many people would have laughed at him, if he had loſt his penſion for having publiſhed his controverſial treatiſes? They would have ſaid, that he ſtrained charity; and that, ſince he wanted his penſion more than his brethren wanted his books, he ſhould have moderated his zeal, and contented himſelf with being a poſthumous author. This ingenuous epigram of the poet Gomes is very judicious.

Plaiſe au Roi me donner cent Livres,
Pour acheter Livres & vivres:
De Livres je m'en paſſerois,
Mais de vivres je ne ſçaurois (3).

Give me, great monarch, pounds five ſcore,
For meat and books . . . . I ask no more.
Or . . . . keep the books, and give me meat . . .
For ſome folks read, but all folks eat.

[B] His penſion was brought down . . . . . to eight hundred crowns, and then to four hundred . . . nor was he paid . . . but by the good offices of ſome generous perſons.] There were two inconveniencies in it; for ſuch a ſucceſſive decreaſe of a penſion muſt needs very much diſtreſs and vex a wit: beſides, Gombauld was obliged to make many viſits, and to be troubleſome to others, and fatigue himſelf to get that ſmall part he was reduced to. How often was he obliged to have recourſe to the interceſſion of the Muſes, and to extort ſome verſes from them, in order to ſoften the intendants of the Finances, or to beg recommendations, or to thank thoſe, who had been moved at laſt with the pathetical deſcription of his neceſſity? If you read the beſt poets, you will find in them many ſuch verſes. But, though Gombauld was in very ſad circumſtances, his condition was ſtill leſs deplorable than that of many other wits, who were always ſent away with empty hands. No man was ever more liberal to them, than cardinal Richelieu; his miniſtry was a golden age for the French Muſes: but his death was like a dreadful ſtorm of hail, that falls upon a plentiful crop; which is rather to be aſcribed to the confuſions, in which the kingdom happened to be involved, than to the different genius and inclinations of thoſe, who ſucceeded him. The penſions were ſuppreſſed, leſſened, or ill paid; which made many people murmur and ſigh. I ſhall only mention Scudery's complaints, which are to be found in the verſes he compoſed upon Scarron's Virgil Traveſty.

Quand tu ſouffres qu'on te voye,
Tu reſſuſcites ma joye;
Tu rétablis ma raiſon:
De l'humeur qui m'aſſaſſine,
Ton livre eſt la medecine,
Et le ſeul contre-poiſon.
Je te jure par Hercule,
(Serment de l'antiquité)
Que ton Heros ridicule
M'a preſque reſſuſcité.
Auſſi pour ſes aſſiſtances,
J'appends comme des potences,
Et mes chagrins, & mes ſoins:
Et tout ce qu'un miſerable
De l'Eſpargne inexorable,
Endure & ſouffre le moins.
J'appends (dis-je) dans le Temple
De VIRGILE TRAVESTY,
Mille chagrins ſans exemple,
Dont je me trouve inveſty:
Oüy, par ce croteſque Ænée,
J'incague la Deſtinée
Qui me met à l'abandon:
Et j'offre mon Ordonnance,
Et mes Brevets ſans finance
A la burleſque Didon (4).

When you appear, again I live,
Reaſon returns, my joys revive:
Thy book's my humour's ſole relief,
The counter poiſon of my grief.
By Hercules, renown'd in war,
(Oath of antiquity) I ſwear,
Thy hero traveſty'd has ſtole
The ſecret anguiſh of my ſoul.
For this I'll hang up all my cares,
My diſappointed hopes, and fears,
All that I feel of grief and mis'ry
From an inexorable treas'ry.
I' th' temple I will hang 'em high,
Off'rings to VIRGIL TRAVESTY,
Be but groteſque Æneas by,
My deſtiny I dare defy.
My unpaid penſion freely I do
Here dedicate to burleſque Dido.

We may therefore conclude, that Gombauld was none of thoſe, who were in the worſt circumſtances: he only loſt two thirds of his penſion, and he received the third part for a great many years, by taking care to implore the aſſiſtance of his patrons. He died a Jubilate penſioner, and more than a Jubilate one (5); for the yearly gratifications he received laſted about fifty years. A very remarkable circumſtance: for if the court of France does readily grant penſions, and pays them punctually during the firſt years; it is as ready to take them off, and to convert the funds, upon which they are aſſigned, into more preſſing uſes. New-comers croud in daily, and the court is willing to ſatisfy them without new expences; that is, by applying to them what has already ſerved for others, who are ſuppoſed to have enjoyed it long enough. The old penſioners are the moſt odious; they are obliged to ask with the greateſt and moſt ſubmiſſive patience, and are denied with the leaſt ſcruple.

[C] He died, being almoſt an hundred years old . . . he had imparted his age to a friend as a ſecret.] What an odd thing is this! A man of good morals, and

(3) See Gueret, pag. m. 171, of La Guerre des Auteurs.

(4) Scudery, in his ode to Scarron, prefixed to the Virgil Traveſty.

(5) See the article BENSERADE, remark [O].

drawing-room of Mary de Medicis, and Anne of Auſtria, during the regency of thoſe two princeſſes. But he was ſtill more careful to go to Rambouillet-houſe (d) [D], and he did it with more pleaſure. He died in the year 1666. I ſhall put in one ſingle remark what I have to ſay concerning his writings, and what the beſt judges have thought of them [E].

zealous for his religion, makes a myſtery of the year of his birth: he reveals, with much ado, this great ſecret to a friend; but, at the ſame time, he ſo earneſtly intreats him to ſay nothing of it, that his friend thinks himſelf obliged to be ſilent about it, till after the death of his confident. One could ſcarce bear this in a maid or a widow, though no body takes it ill, that they ſhould be deſirous to conceal their age (6). But this, and a thouſand other inſtances ſhew, that what ſeems to be a meer oddneſs, an extravagant weakneſs, and an old woman's childiſhneſs, is nevertheleſs grounded upon a reaſon, that is ſpecious, and has a kind of ſolidity. Gombauld was not a ſorry rhimer, or a meer verſifier: he was an excellent poet, and had been very much eſteemed by perſons of the greateſt quality (7). He had conſtantly attended the aſſemblies of the ladies, and conſequently he had got the habit of gallant converſation. When he happened to be among women, he ſtill remembered the ſtile he uſed in his youth; he praiſed them, he flattered them. He could ſtill act the part of a wit, and of a galant; but, to perform that part with a greater decorum, it was neceſſary, that they ſhould know nothing of his great age. He printed a large collection of epigrams in 1657; and therefore he might have feared, that, if people ſhould come to know that he was ninety years old, they would think it ſtrange, that he ſhould deſire a licence for ſuch a book, and preſent his friends with it. He might have feared, that Mr Daillé, and the other miniſters of Paris, would cenſure him for minding ſtill ſuch trifling things at an age ſo far advanced. However, he is not the only man, who has been guilty of ſuch a weakneſs: we ſhall ſee hereafter (8) another inſtance of it in a grammarian, ſtuffed with Greek, who ſhould have been more free from it than a court-poet.

[D] He went carefully to Rambouillet-houſe.] The author of the preface calls it, The charming place, whither all the perſons of quality and merit of that time uſed to reſort (9). It was, ſays he, a kind of a contracted and choice court, leſs numerous, but, if I dare ſay ſo, more exquiſite than that of the Louvre; becauſe none was allowed to come near that temple of honour, where virtue was reverenced under the name of the incomparable Artenice, but ſuch as deſerved her approbation and eſteem.

[E] I ſhall put in one remark what I have to ſay concerning his writings, and what the beſt judges have thought of them.] The hiſtory of the French Academy (10) informs us, that, in 1652, Gombauld had not yet publiſhed the tragedy, intituled, The Danaides, nor the tragi-comedy, intituled, Cydippe, nor three books of epigrams, nor many other poems, and letters and diſcourſes in proſe; but that his Endymion, and his Amarante a paſtoral, and a volume of poems, and a volume of letters, were printed. The abbot de Marolles obſerves, in a book he publiſhed in the year 1657, that Mr Gombauld had lately put out an excellent collection of epigrams (11); and (12) that his Aconce (13), and his immortal Danaides, wherein there are ſuch fine verſes, were not as yet printed. We find, in the preface to the poſthumous treatiſes, that the tragedy of the Danaides has been printed, and that the author left not only a tragi-comedy of Cydippe, but alſo wherewithal to make a new collection of verſes, eſpecially of ſonnets and epigrams, which have not yet ſeen the light, becauſe they are in the hands of ſome perſons, who have little knowledge of theſe ſorts of things. Note, that the Endymion is written in proſe: It was printed in 1624, and reprinted in 1626. It is a kind of a romance.

The critics are divided in their opinions about his poetry. Some pretend, that he excelled in the making of ſonnets; and that it was his lot and the ſhare of Parnaſſus which fell to him. Let us mind ſuch things as we have a natural genius for (they are Gueret's words (14); let us keep to that kind of work, for which we have a talent: we muſt not envy the glory of thoſe, whom we cannot imitate. Let Deſportes write elegies, Theophile ſtanzas, Gombauld ſonnets, and Maynard epigrams: others extend Gombauld's dominion farther: they will have it, not only that he reigned over the ſonnets, but alſo that he conquered the empire of the epigrams over Maynard. ‘ Gombauld, ‘ the great Caſuiſt, and law-giver of the country, cauſ‘ed very pretty ſonnets to come from the iſland of ‘ the ſame name. He drew alſo from the Epigram‘matic Mountains three troops of light-horſe of a ‘ ſmall ſize; but which fought with a wonderful quick‘neſs, and had very dangerous darts, which they ‘ ſhot with an admirable dexterity. He had made uſe ‘ of them to diſmember the principality, which pre‘ſident Menard had uſurped before (15).’ The abbot de Marolles is contented to place Menard, Bautru, and Gombauld, among the French poets, with whom our Neighbours cannot diſpute the pre-eminence, as to epigrams, and who are little inferior to the ancients (16). Mr Boileau does not at all value the ſonnets of our poet.

Un Sonnet ſans defauts vaut ſeul un long Poëme.
Mais en vain mille Auteurs y penſent arriver,
Et cet heureux Phenix eſt encore à trouver.
A peine dans Gombaut, Maynard, & Malleville
En peut-on admirer deux ou trois entre mille.
Le reſte auſſi peu lû que ceux de Pelletier,
N'a fait de chez Sercy qu'un ſaut chez l'Epicier (17).

A faultleſs ſonnet is a perfect piece.
In vain a thouſand authors hunt this ground;
The happy Phenix yet is to be found.
In Gombaut, Maynard, Malleville, ... who you pleaſe . . . .
Scarce two or three, amidſt a thouſand, pleaſe:
The reſt as little read as Pelletier,
From Serty make one leap to the Grocer.

Here follows the judgment of another critic, which I ſhall ſet down in M. Baillet's own words (18). ‘ M. Roſteau ſays *, that few poets have, in their ‘ latter days, applied themſelves to epigrams, which ‘ are commonly made up of ſuch turns and flaſhes of ‘ wit, as become rather a young man than a poet worn ‘ out, and far advanced in years. But he adds, that ‘ Mr Gombauld may be excuſed for having done it ‘ in the latter part of his life, becauſe moſt of his e‘pigrams are rather a cenſure upon the lives and cor‘rupt manners of his time, than gallant verſes made ‘ for the ladies.’ Mr Roſteau ſuppoſes what is very uncertain, that Gombauld's epigrams were the laſt work that he applied himſelf to. It is a very doubtful thing, to ſay no worſe; for, though they are the laſt book of poetry publiſhed by Gombauld (19), he might have compoſed them in his youth (20).

(d) Taken from the above-quoted preface.

(6) See the new letters againſt Maimbourg, pag. 762, 763, where the author quotes a very pretty paſſage out of the letters of the Chevalier d'Her * *.

(7) See citation (17), and Mr Menage's obſervations upon Malherbe's poems, wherein Gombauld is praiſed, and quoted in ſeveral places.

(8) See the article GUYET, remark [B].

(9) Preface to Gombauld's treatiſes and letters.

(10) Pag. 339, of the Paris Edit 1672, in 12mo.

(11) Marolles, Suite des Memoires, pag. 246.

(12) Id. ibid. pag. 242.

(13) It is the ſame piece, which Mr Pelliſſon calls Cydippe.

(14) Gueret, ubi ſupra, pag. 138, 139.

(15) Furetiere, Nouvelle Allegorique, pag. 56, 57. Paris, 1658, in 8vo.

(16) The abbot de Marolles, ubi ſupra, pag. 246.

(17) Boileau, Art. Poëtique, Canto ii, ver. 94.

(18) Baillet, Jugem. ſur les Poët. Tom. V, pag. 25, 26.

* Roſteau, Sentim. ſur quelques livres qu'il a lûs, pag. 74.

(19) This I ſay, not knowing exactly in what year the Danaides were publiſhed.

(20) I mean, that he began early to make ſome, to which he added others every year, as occaſion offered.

GONET (John Baptist), a Dominican frier, born at Beziers, was a doctor of the univerſity of Bourdeaux, where he taught divinity. He cauſed the famous Provincial Letters of Montalte (a) to be approved there, whereby he incurred the indignation and hatred of the Jeſuits. He publiſhed ſeveral works [A], wherein he ſhews, that [A] He publiſhed ſeveral works.] His theology, intituled, Clypeus Doctrinæ Thomiſticæ, was firſt printed at Bourdeaux, in ſixteen volumes in 12mo, in the year 1666, and then at Paris, in five volumes, in folio, in the year 1669. This laſt edition was enlarged with ſeveral prefaces and diſſertations, and is much more correct than the firſt. The Spaniards ſay it is too ſhort, and call it a very pretty Compendium of Divi- that he excelled in School-Divinity, and that he was but indifferently verſed in what we call Poſitive Theology. He retired to Beziers about the latter end of his life, and died there the twenty fourth of January, 1681 (b). Mr de Rocolles, who had praiſed him in one of his books (c), prefixed to a new edition a letter of thanks, which he had received from that frier, who aſſured him that he would return the compliment upon the firſt occaſion.

(a) That is Mr Paſcal.

nity. He publiſhed, at Bourdeaux, in 1664, a little book, intitled, Diſſertatio Theologica de probabilitate (1). His Manuale Thomiſtarum, printed at Beziers, in 1680, in ſix volumes, in 12mo, is his laſt work. He left a courſe of philoſophy to be printed; but it is thought to be too prolix, and not ſuited to the genius of our age (2).

GONTAUT (ARMAND DE) baron de Biron (§ a), was made a marſhal of France in the year 1577. He had been great maſter of the ordonance from the fifth of November 1569; and, before that, he had gone through all the military offices (a). Of all the noble actions, that made him ſo illuſtrious, there is none, for which he deſerves ſo many praiſes, as his conſtant fidelity to king Henry III, who did not love him [A], and to Henry IV, who had openly ſeparated from the Romiſh communion. After the death of Henry III, none did ſo much contribute to ſecure the crown for Henry IV [B], and therefore he was very much lamented by that prince, when he was killed at the ſiege of a town in Champagne (b), before the League had been ſubdued. He diſſuaded the king

[(§ a) Mr Bayle might have added, that Biron, the father, followed the duke of Anjou into the Low-Countries; that he was at Antwerp, when that prince endeavoured to take the town, and that he was preſently ſuſpected to be one of the chief authors of the deſign; but that afterwards, after the retreat of the duke of Anjou, a letter from Biron to the duke, in which he diſſuaded and even deteſted the enterprize, being found in the cloaths of that duke, brought the citizens of Antwerp, from hating Biron, to eſteem and love him. This is what Busbequius tells us, in the nineteenth letter of his French Embaſſy. REM. CRIT.]

[A] Henry III, who did not love him.] He incurred his indignation (1) becauſe he oppoſed the peace that was made before Rochelle in the year 1573. Henry III, who was then but duke of Anjou, had beſieged that place ſeveral months, and found no better expedient to retire with honour, than to make a a treaty of peace; for the continuation of the ſiege was dangerous, and contrary both to the queen-mother's deſire to ſee again the duke of Anjou, and to the deſign he himſelf had to go and take poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Poland: and therefore his mother, and he, were very willing, that the beſieged ſhould be brought to an accommodation. ‘Biron did whatever he could to diſſuade the king and queen from hearkening to any compoſition, and engaged upon his life to take the town within a month, or five weeks at fartheſt, without loſing or venturing any thing but making a good blockade: but his advices and letters proved ineffectual at that time. . . . . When Biron ſaw, that he could not prevail with the king and queen, and the king of Poland, he took another courſe: He wrote to the cardinal of Lorrain, and to ſome of the chief members of the council, and deſired them to prevent the raiſing of the ſiege, and the making of a peace; aſſuring them that, if they would but let him act, the city of Rochelle would be more ſubject to the king in ſix weeks time, than ever it had been. The cardinal, who was a ſhuffling man, began to carry on ſecret practices, and to tamper with the council, in order to diſſuade the king and queen from ſuch a capitulation and peace. They importuned their majeſties, and particularly the queen, to ſuch a degree, that ſhe found no other way to put an end to their ſollicitations but to write to the king of Poland by the abbot de Gadagne, whom ſhe truſted entirely, and to inform him of the ſecret practices of Biron, adviſing him to talk big to him. The king of Poland, being informed of this, wrote ſome haughty and threatning letters to the cardinal, and other members of the council, who adviſed ſuch a thing. Thoſe letters, written with his own hand, were ſo ſevere, that they were all amazed at it, and proceeded no farther. As for Biron, one morning, as he attended the king in his wardrobe, where the council met that day, the king of Poland took him to taſk, and ſaid him as ſoon as he ſaw him, come hither, ſpark, I am informed of your doings: you take upon you to carry on ſecret practices againſt me, and to write to the court: I have almoſt a mind to run you through the body, and to kill you upon the ſpot; or rather to appoint ſome commiſſioners to enquire into your life, and examine what you have done againſt me, the king, and his dominions, in order to have your head cut off. How dare you oppoſe my will? I know who you are. Were it not for the king, and for me, you would be a very inconſiderable man. How come you to forget your ſelf? you ſet up for a pretending man. You will take Rochelle, ſay you, within a month or ſix weeks, and are reſolved to have the glory of it, to my prejudice. You have already too much expoſed my honour . . . . You made me ſtay five months here; and now that I may retire with honour, you oppoſe me; and you are for ſtaying longer, to triumph over me. I will teach you to ſet up for a great captain at my coſt (2).’ Biron excuſed himſelf in a ſubmiſſive manner (3), and ‘ever after the king of Poland carried himſelf very coldly towards him, even at his return from Poland (4).’ But ‘he gave him a kind reception (5)’ when Biron waited upon him in Auguſt, 1575, being ſent for by the queen-mother, at the requeſt of the duke of Guiſe, ‘who would have no other captain with him but Biron, and Strozza, to maul Thore (6), and all his reiſters.’ Biron behaved himſelf very well in that war; and though it has been ſaid, that he would have ſided with the league, if the thirty thouſand crowns that ‘were offered to him,’ had been put into his hands, it is more probable, that he rejected all thoſe propoſals (7). ‘However it be the king had no better and more faithful ſervant than he, during that war. . . . The duke of Guiſe being dead, he waited upon the king very ſeaſonably, who was very glad to ſee him. He aſſiſted his maſter in a very critical time; for the greateſt part of the kingdom was bent againſt him, by reaſon of the duke of Guiſe's murder (8).’

[B] None did ſo much contribute to ſecure the crown for Henry IV.] Let us hear Brantome again (9). ‘After the king's death, having had a long time a great intereſt with the ſoldiers, both French and foreigners, who all loved and reſpected him, he drew them over in ſuch a manner, that the king of Navarre ſucceeded the late king with an unanimous conſent, which was the nobleſt exploit that ever he did. . . . . So that every body believes, that the marſhal made him king, as he told him once in a reproachful manner: for the Catholics would have forſaken him, becauſe he was a Huguenot, and the Huguenots were not ſtrong enough to ſet him on the throne. But by the induſtry of the ſaid marſhal, they were brought to obey the new king, though a Huguenot, if not out of a good will, at leaſt to revenge the death of the late king, who had been unjuſtly murthered. But this was not all; for there was a neceſſity to maintain him, and to conquer the towns, wherein he was but

---

(b) Taken from a memoir, ſent from Paris.

(c) I think it was his Introduction to Hiſtory.

(1) The Journal des Sçavans of March 30, 1665, contains a very good extract of it.

(2) Taken from a memoir ſent from Paris.

(a) See the particulars of it in Brantome's Memoirs, Tom. III, pag. 326, & ſeq. Father Anſelme, whom Moreri tranſcribes, has only abridged Brantome.

(b) At Epernai, the 26th of July, 1592.

(1) Note, That Brantome had already ſaid, that this prince fell into a violent paſſion againſt Biron, and threatened him with his dagger, during the third civil-war, and before the battle of Moncontour. See, below, the remark [D].

(2) Brantome, Elog de Mareſchal de Biron, in the third Tom of his Memoirs, pag. 340.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 344.

(4) Ib. pag 345.

(5) Ib. pag. 346.

(6) The ſon of the conſtable of Montmorency.

(7) Others, who are the wiſeſt, ſay, that he was at that entertainment, and heard their diſcourſes and deſigns, which he diſapproved. They grounded their deſigns upon religion, and were for extirpating hereſy; but he laughed at it. Brantome, ibid. pag. 353, 354.

(8) Ib. pag. 354.

(9) Ibid.

king from following the opinion of thoſe, who adviſed him to retire to a ſafe place by ſea [C]; and had he done nothing elſe, he would deſerve very great praiſes. He was a man of little religion; but he was rather a Proteſtant than a Catholic [D]. He was ſo much ſuſpected by the inquiſitors, that he was put in the liſt of thoſe that were to be maſſacred on St Bartholomew's day [E]; but as he lodged in the Baſtile, being great

' but half a king; which the marſhal did ſo effectually, that he helped him to recover ſome good and ſtrong towns, to win the battle of Yvry, and to get out of Arques and Dieppe, as I ſhall ſhew in the king's life. Afterwards, as he was taking a view of the town of Eſpernay, his head was ſhot off by a cannon-ball.' There was a blot in his fidelity to Henry IV; but it was of no long continuance. He looked upon himſelf as the moſt neceſſary man, and was really ſo after the death of Henry III, and ' thinking, that, in ſuch a confuſion, the kingdom would be torn to pieces, he came to fancy, that he might get one of them; and, entring into the cabinet, and hearing ſeveral people murmur, he took Sancy aſide, and told him, that he deſired to be made ſovereign of the county of Perigord, as a reward for his ſervices. Sancy, being unwilling to diſcourage him, went immediately to the king, and acquainted him with it. The king charged him to give Biron all the encouragement imaginable; and Sancy managed him with ſo much addreſs and dexterity, that, working upon his generoſity, he obliged him not only to deſiſt from his pretenſion, but alſo to proteſt never to ſuffer, that any part of the kingdom ſhould be diſmembered for any body whatſoever (10).'

[C] He diſſuaded the king from following the advice of thoſe who perſuaded him to retire to a ſafe place by ſea.] The duke of Mayenne, having obliged that prince to raiſe the ſiege of Rouen, and to retire towards Dieppe, endeavoured to follow him ſo cloſe, that he might have no way to eſcape but by ſea. The king's captains, ' and even the Proteſtants (11), ... knew not well how to get out of the danger they were in, and were very much concerned for the king's ſafety, on which the welfare of the kingdom depended: ſo that in a council held the fifth of September (12), moſt of them were of opinion, that he ſhould leave his troops intrenched in good poſts, ... and take ſhipping immediately, in order to retire into England, or to Rochelle, leſt he ſhould be inveſted both by ſea and land. . . . . Their opinion was ſupported by ſo many ſtrong reaſons, that the king himſelf began to waver, when marſhal de Biron, who had heard this diſcourſe with contempt, being ſorry that it made a greater impreſſion, than it ſhould have done, ſpoke with an angry tone, and told the king, &c.' I do not ſet down his ſpeech, which may be found in Mezerai: It is ſo well turned, and ſo full of ſtrong arguments, that it is no wonder it had the deſired effect. Henry IV, having heard it, reſolved to hold out in his poſt. He was attacked in it, and the enemies were gloriouſly repulſed. Biron was in the right to ſay, ' that as things ſtood then, to go out of France, only for twenty four hours, was to leave it for ever.' A prince muſt not expect to ſucceed in ſuch a concurrence, if he tells his generals, ' take care of my crown, and I will take care of my ſelf.'

[D] He was rather a Proteſtant than a Catholic.] His being ſuſpected of being a Proteſtant was the reaſon why he was not made a knight of the order, in the beginning of the civil-wars. ' It is to be obſerved, ſays Brantome (13), that the chief reaſon why that honour was not conferred upon him, and why they made no great account of him, was, that he was looked upon as a great Huguenot: nay, it was ſaid at court, that he had got two of his children baptized by Proteſtant miniſters, which was then abhorred by the great captains, ſuch as the king of Navarre, meſſieurs de Guiſe, the conſtable, and the marſhal de Saint Andre, and by every body. For this reaſon Biron was looked upon with an evil eye; ſo that he reſolved to quit the court, and to retire to his houſe.' He would have done it, had not du Perron, afterwards marſhal de Rets, ſpoke for him to the queen. They made him ſtay and he went to the army without any employment; but, they having quickly diſcovered his merit, he was made an aſſiſtant to the great marſhals de camp. ' The duke of Guiſe began to like him, though he dropt now and then ſome words that ſavoured of a Huguenot. He had much ado to forbear it; but he took care not to diſcover openly his affection to that party. He acquired at laſt ſo great a capacity in his poſt, that there was a neceſſity to make uſe of him (14).' He was twice unfortunate in the third civil-war, and very much blamed by the king's brother, who was the general; ' and it was ſaid in the army, (they are Brantome's words) (15), that he had threatened to run him through with his dagger. Biron was obliged to excuſe himſelf as modeſtly as he could; for if he had raiſed his voice never ſo little, the king's brother would have run him through, ſo great was his paſſion againſt him. He reproached him with being a Huguenot, and a favourer of that party; and told him, that he had been wanting to his duty, on purpoſe to bring a diſreputation upon him, and to have him and his whole army deſtroyed. Tavannes, who was a very haughty man, ſpoke alſo to him, and told him, that he was a pretending man, who would meddle with every thing, and a Huguenot; and that he ſeldom went to maſs and when he did, it was only for a ſhew. Biron was upbraided with all theſe things in council, and obliged to buckle to, and hold his tongue.' After the Paris maſſacre, the king ſent him into Xaintonge (16), to bring Rochelle to his obediece either willingly or by force. The town was beſieged. Biron was (17) ' unfortunate in that ſiege; for, though he performed the duty of a great captain, and of an excellent maſter of the artillery, and received a muſket ſhot, yet the greateſt part of the beſiegers were of opinion, that he kept correſpondence with the beſieged, and that he, and his creatures, acquainted them with every thing that paſſed out of the town. This is a great miſtake; for, if he had taken that town, he would have been made governor of it, and put in poſſeſſion of the moſt important place of France. He was an ambitious man; and therefore I leave you to judge whether he would have miſſed the opportunity of taking ſuch a town. Beſides, it is certain, that, if his advice and that of Strozza, had been followed, that town would have been taken gradually, as we have done at laſt (18).' He was, doubtleſs, ſuſpected of keeping intelligence with the Rochellers, becauſe they looked upon him as a Huguenot; and therefore I have added this paſſage of Brantome to thoſe, which you have ſeen before. I ſhall confirm all thoſe paſſages by theſe words of Mezerai taken from the elogy of our Biron (19). ' As for his religion, he was a little inclined to the new reformation. A tutor, whom he had in his younger years, imbued him with thoſe principles; and his wife, who made an open profeſſion of the Proteſtant religion, kept him up in thoſe opinions (20): ſo that he favoured the Proteſtants underhand, except when the king's ſervice required the contrary; and, his heart ſpeaking through his mouth, he often dropt ſome ſatirical jeſts againſt the ceremonies of the church of Rome: which made ſeveral people ſuſpect, that he kept off the king's converſion; for the king, by reaſon of the great ſervices he had done him, after the death of Henry III, relied entirely on him, and was wholly directed by his counſels, though ſometimes he was offended at his haughtineſs.'

[E] He was put in the liſt of thoſe, that were to be maſſacred on St Bartholomew's day.] Biron had been made uſe of, to bring the queen of Navarre to the court of France, with the prince her ſon, who was to be married to Charles the ninth's ſiſter. Biron brought that prince, ' attended with the flower of the Huguenots, who, thinking to domineer and govern the world, met there with a tragical end. Thoſe, who eſcaped, blamed Biron, and laid the whole fault on him, ſaying, that he had wheedled and amuſed them, to bring them to the ſlaughter . . . But, notwithſtanding all thoſe ſuſpicions and calumnies, it is certain, that he was in great trouble, during that maſſacre; and it was well for him, that he had

---

(10) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom III, pag. 829.

(11) Mezerai, ibid. pag. 842.

(12) 1589.

(13) Brantome, ubi ſupra, pag. 328.

(14) Ib. pag. 330.

(15) Ibid. pag. 332.

(16) Biron was governor of it, and of the country of Aunix.

(17) Brant ubi ſupra, pag. 328.

(18) Add to the misfortunes, to be had in that ſiege, the ſevere reprimand, which he received from the king of Poland, above, in remark [A], citat. (2).

(19) Mezerai, Hiſtoire de France, Tom. III, pag. 1026.

(20) I wonder he ſaid nothing of his mother, who, according to Thuanus ſheltered the Reformed. Denique in Aginnenſi agro apud Annam Bonvalliam, Armani Bironi famoſi illius ducis matrem, toto eo tempore tutus receptus fuit. Thuan. lib. xxxiii, pag. 671, ad ann. 1562.

great maſter of the ordonance, he knew how to defeat the ill deſigns of the murderers. The reaſon, why he was ſuſpected to favour the Huguenots, is very glorious to him [F]. There never was a man of his quality, who had a more univerſal knowledge [G]. He was well qualified, not only for all ſorts of military offices, but alſo for negotiation. He loved books, and the converſation of learned men; and uſed to write down in his table-book whatever he thought worthy the taking notice of. He was too paſſionate, and too much given to drinking [H]. He had another fault greater than thoſe two, and which often proves very prejudicial to princes; for he neglected the opportunities to give the enemy a deciſive blow [I]. He was afraid, that the war would be too ſoon ended, and that the court would ſend him home without any employment. It is ſaid, that, after he had laughed at the predictions of thoſe who calculate nativities, a thing, with which the court of France was then infatuated, he became ſo credulous, as to believe, what thoſe men told him, concerning the kind of death had a great deal of courage and bravery; for he immediately retired into his arſenal, and planted ſeveral guns at the gate and other avenues, and was ready to make a brave defence: ſo that, ſome troops of Pariſians, who never had any thing to do with ſuch a warlike man, coming near the gate, he ſpoke to them boldly, and threatened to fire at them, if they did not retire. They immediately went away, and durſt no more come near him, nor do any thing againſt him. He was certainly put in the black liſt, as well as the reſt; and he told me ſo himſelf, at his return from Brouage; for he was my friend, and related to me, and we had a long talk about the maſſacre. It was ſaid, that Tavannes, and the count de Rets, who did not love him, had him put in the liſt of thoſe, that were to be maſſacred (21).' Mezerai informs us, that Biron ſheltered ſome of his friends in the Baſtile. Theſe are his words (22): 'The Montmorency's, Coſſé, and Biron, had been put in the liſt; but the abſence of the marſhal de Montmorency, who was at Chantilly, ſaved the life of his three brothers. The intreaties of the fair Chateau-neuf, miſtreſs to the king's brother, ſaved Coſſé, who was her relation; and Biron, great maſter of the artillery, having planted ſome culverins over the gate of the arſenal, ſtopt the fury of the murderers, and ſheltered ſome of his friends; amongſt others James, ſecond ſon of the lord de la Force, who being then but 10 or 12 years of age, had cunningly hid himſelf betwixt the bodies of his father and his eldeſt brother, who had been killed in bed, where they three lay.'

[F] The reaſon, why he was ſuſpected to favour the Huguenots, is very glorious to him.] I ſhall uſe the words of one of our beſt hiſtorians (23). 'Biron ſeemed to have been inclined to the new opinions, ever ſince he had been in eſteem with the late king of Navarre. Nevertheleſs he ſhewed himſelf a good Catholic all the reſt of his life; and whenever the war broke out againſt the Huguenots, he behaved himſelf with as much courage and fidelity as any body elſe. But the reaſon why they thought he did not hate the Huguenots, was becauſe he could not approve, that they ſhould break the faith that was given them; and becauſe, when the laſt Edict of Pacification was patched up, he gave the queen to underſtand at ſeveral times, that it had been more becoming the king's majeſty to carry things to the laſt extremity (24), than to make a treaty, which he knew was not to be obſerved. For this reaſon, and becauſe he was a man of a ſincere probity, the queen-mother, and the Guiſes, put him in the black liſt: at leaſt he believed it, and always kept a lively remembrance of it.'

[G] There never was a man of his quality who had a more univerſal knowledge.] 'He had an univerſal knowledge of the art of war, and of ſtate-affairs: he underſtood and managed them as well as any lord in France; and therefore the queen-mother, upon any important occaſion, never failed to ſend for him, whether he was at home, or elſewhere, and intirely depended upon him. He himſelf uſed to ſay, in a drolling way, that he was a clever fellow, conſulted upon all occaſions. He ſaid nothing but what was true; and the queen and he agreed very well in all things relating to war or peace. He had been a great lover of books, and continued to love them ever ſince his younger years. He was very curious and inquiſitive, and had always a table-book about him, in which he writ down whatever he ſaw, or heard, that deſerved to be taken notice of: which occaſioned a kind of a proverb at court; for when any body ſaid any thing, he was told, you ha e found that in Biron's table-book. Nay, king Henry's jeſter would ſometimes ſwear by the divine table-book of Biron . . . . . And I have ſeen ſeveral people wonder, that, tho' he had never been employed in great affairs with any foreign ſtate, or ſent upon an embaſſy, as Lanſac, Rambouillet, the marſhal de Rets, and others, had been; yet he knew more than they, and might have taught them many things relating both to foreign and domeſtic affairs (25).' Let us add to this paſſage ſome lines out of the encomium, which Mezerai beſtows upon him. 'He had a quick and penetrating wit, a ready Elocution, a perſuaſive diſcourſe, and a noble and warlike ſoul. He was quick, laborious, and bold, deſirous to learn, very exact, and no leſs ſkilled in the intrigues of the court and among the ladies, than brave and valiant in war . . . . . He gloried in having an univerſal knowledge, and to underſtand negotiations as well as the art of war. He meddled with every thing, and kept himſelf buſy, when they gave him nothing to do. He pretended to be a perfect maſter of geography and hiſtory, and delineated plans and maps with his own hand; ſaying, that it was one of the things that belong to a great captain, to ſhew upon paper what he can do in the field (26).

[H] He was too much given to drinking.] Mezerai ſays only (27), 'that he loved jeſting and good chear; that he ſlept but little; and ſate a long time at table, drinking till he was merry.' But there is a repartee, aſcribed to Henry IV, which carries the thing further. 'One day the duke of Savoy was praiſing the noble actions and great ſervices, which the two Birons, father and ſon, had done him. The king anſwered, that, indeed, they had ſerved him well; but that he had much ado to moderate the drunkenneſs of the father, and to reſtrain the mad fits of the ſon (28)'

[I] He neglected . . . . to give the enemy a deciſive blow] Brantome relates (29), that it was ſaid, that, if Biron 'had been willing to puſh on,' he would have done more miſchief to the king of Navarre. This belongs to the time, when Biron commanded in Guienne under Henry III. Upon another occaſion, that is, when the duke of Parma was at Caudebec, Biron reproved his ſon for repreſenting to the king, that, if his majeſty would give him four thouſand arquebuſiers, and two thouſand horſe, he would hinder the enemy from paſſing 'Hereupon (they are Brantome's words) the marſhal gave a ſevere reprimand to his ſon in the king's preſence, and told him, that he was a fine ſpark to do ſuch a thing, and found ſo many difficulties in it, that the deſign was broke off. Afterwards he told his ſon in the evening, that he knew very well he would have ſucceeded, or have been killed in it; but that ſuch an enemy of the French nation muſt not be routed all at once. For, ſaid he, when they are overcome and undone, kings make no account of their captains and military men; and therefore the war ought to be kept up, and cultivated like a piece of ground; otherwiſe thoſe who have ploughed it will ſtarve, if they let it lie waſte (30).' Mezerai expreſſes this in a ſtile more nervous and polite. 'Marſhal Biron was looked upon as a man, who raiſed factions, to ſhew his ability,

(21) Brantome, ubi ſupra, pag. 335.

(22) Mezerai, Abreg. Chronol. Tom. V, pag. 157, 158.

(23) Id. Hiſt. de France, Tom. II, pag. 267, ad ann. 1572.

(24) Some wonder, that none of the miniſters of ſtate of Lewis XIV durſt tell him the ſame thing, when he went about to publiſh ſo many arrêts againſt the Proteſtants. They were obliged at laſt to come to open force. To what purpoſe then ſo many lawchicanes. See the Nouvelles de la Rep. des Lettres, Novemb. 1685, pag. 1263, about the method of perſecuting, which Mary queen of England made uſe of.

(25) Brantome, ubi ſupra, pag. 356.

(26) Mezerai, Hiſt. de France, Tom. III, pag. 1026.

(27) Id. ibid.

(28) Perefixe, Hiſt. de Henri le Grand, ad ann. 160[illegible], pag. m. 320.

(29) Ubi ſupra, pag. 3[illegible]0.

(30) Ibid. pag. 368.

death with which they threatened him [K]. Notwithſtanding his fatigues, his wounds, and his great age, he was ſtill a very vigorous man; and we are told a remarkable thing of the ſtrength of his ſtomach [L]. He left many children; the eldeſt of which ſhall be the ſubject of the following article.

‘to keep up his intereſt, and to prolong the war; not out of a deſire of plunder, but to have the whole diſpoſal and managment of affairs (31).’ A like ambition does ſometimes prevail among divines. See (32) how theſe maxims of marſhal de Biron have been applied to a certain divine.

[K] He became ſo credulous as to believe the kind of death, which the Calculators of Nativities threatened him with.] The following paſſage is to be found in the large hiſtory of Mezerai. ‘A certain perſon, who was very well acquainted with Biron, told me a remarkable thing of him. That marſhal had all along laughed at the predictions of the aſtrologers, whom the great curioſity of queen Catherine de Medicis had brought in great requeſt at court; but, ſome time before he died, ſome of thoſe predictions having had their accompliſhment, he gave as much credit to them, and became as ſuperſtitious in that reſpect, as he had been incredulous before, ſo far as conſult the fortune-tellers. One of thoſe men having foretold him, half a year before that ſiege, that he ſhould be killed by a cannon-ball, it made ſuch an impreſſion upon him, that he confeſſed to his friends, whenever he heard a gun go off, he could not forbear trembling for fear, and bending his head. At that time (33), hearing a bullet whiſtle, he ſtept aſide to avoid it; but it fell out unluckily that he went to meet it, and ſo he fulfilled a prediction, which perhaps had not come to paſs, if he had laughed at it (34).’ This hiſtorian is more exact, than I thought, in relating ſuch things.

[L] They tell a remarkable thing of the ſtrength of his ſtomach.] ‘Let us hear Mezerai once more (35). ‘He had been in many ſieges and bloody actions, and commanded as general in ſeven battles, wherein he received as many wounds: and though he was broken with fatigue and wounds, and above ſixty eight years old (36), yet he enjoyed ſuch a vigorous health, that the chirurgeons, who opened his body, to embalm it, found no meat in his ſtomach, though he had been killed but an hour after ſupper; which ſhews, that he had a great deal of natural heat, ſince the digeſtion was ſo quickly made (37).

GONTAUT (CHARLES DE) duke of Biron, the ſon of the foregoing, was one of the greateſt captains of his time; but he had the fault to ſpeak of his own exploits with an intolerable pride. He learned the art of war early, under marſhal de Biron his father, who omitted nothing to raiſe him, or make him appear worthy of preferment [A]. He was made admiral of France in the year 1592, and, having reſigned that office in 1594, he was made marſhal of France, and governor of Burgundy. The king erected the barony of Biron into a duchy and peerdom in the year 1598, and immediately ſent the new duke to Bruſſels upon a magnificent embaſſy, to make the archduke ſwear to the peace of Vervins. He was ſent into Swiſſerland in January 1602 [B], to renew the alliance with the cantons. He had been in England the year before, to compliment queen Elizabeth in the king's name; and he received extraordinary honours from that great queen. What ſhe did upon this occaſion has not been faithfully related [C]. Every body knows the tragical end of the marſhal and duke of Biron. He

[A] His father omitted nothing to raiſe him, or to make him appear worthy of preferment.] In 1580 (1), he broke his thigh in two places by a fall from his horſe, whereby he was lame; ſo that he was obliged to leave the conduct of his army to others: and, to prevent jealouſy, he deſired thoſe, who had a right to command, to chooſe their leader. They choſe his ſon, who was but fifteen years of age (2). Other hiſtorians (3) affirm, that this ſon of his ‘was colonel of the Swiſs in Flanders at 14 years of age, and ſoon after marſhal de camp, and then marſhal-general.’ But this cannot be reconciled with what is ſaid by others, that his father, after the death of his eldeſt ſon, ‘had him called baron de Biron, and brought him to court, where he quickly had a quarrel with Carency, eldeſt ſon of the count de la Vauguyon, which ended in a combat of three againſt three, in the year 1585. Biron, Loignac, and Janiſſac, on the one ſide, killed Carency, d'Eſtiſſac, and la Baſtie ..... The duke of Eſpernon obtained his pardon (4). He carried him to Pau, when he went to the king of Navarre (5). Afterwards, the father of young Biron was lieutenant-general in the army of Poictou, at the ſiege of Marans, and gave him the command of his houſehold, and of his company of Gens d'Armes; and from that time he became extreamly imperious and free in his words (6).’ Note, that, according to Victor Cayet, he was ſixteen years of age, when marſhal de Biron, his father, took him from his tutor (7). Note alſo, that this marſhal loſt a ſon in the year 1583, at the Antwerp maſſacre. It was, without doubt, his eldeſt ſon, ſince he had already ſome children (8); and the duke of Biron was not yet forty years old (9) when he was beheaded in 1602. Tis very likely, that Dupleix and Peter Matthieu aſcribe to Charles de Gontaut what belongs to his brother.

What follows will afford me a better proof. Mareſchal de Biron, finding himſelf inveſted with great authority, after the death of Henry III, ‘made it his chief buſineſs to raiſe his ſon, who was a young man without experience: in order to it, he picked a quarrel with Dampierre, mareſchal de camp, made him quit his poſt, and procured it for his ſon, who enjoyed it in the quality of mareſchal de camp general: and, becauſe the young man knew not how to diſcharge the duties of that poſt, his father laboured for him day and night, and gave him all the glory of it; which brought the ſaid baron into ſuch a credit and reputation in the army, that the mareſchal his father having been killed with a cannon-ball at the ſiege of Epernai, the king made him admiral. When Mr de Villars came into the king's ſervice, he reſigned his place of admiral, and was made mareſchal of France (10).’ I ſhall conclude this remark with a paſſage of Mezerai (11). ‘The Catholics were not ſo ſorry for the death of mareſchal de Biron, as the king was, who expreſſed more grief for it, than for any other loſs, that he had ſuſtained; and his grief would have laſted longer, had he not believed, that the baron his ſon, being bred up by him, would be able to do him as great ſervices; ſo much the more, becauſe he had all the experience of his father; but he had not yet his cunning and his ill maxims.’

[B] He was ſent into Swiſſerland ..... in 1602.] De Vic and Silleri had much ado to renew the alliance; and, when they thought they had overcome all obſtacles, they perceived, that all was ſpoiled by the emiſſaries of Spain and Savoy: but mareſchal de Biron, who arrived at Soleurre, ‘with a great retinue and a magnificent equipage, brought the treaty to a happy concluſion. His ſumptuoſity, his martial diſcourſe, and the glory of his noble exploits, which the Swiſs had been often witneſſes of, made no ſmall impreſſion upon ſuch a warlike people; and the great ſums that came after him made an end of the work ..... That ſolemnity was concluded with a noble entertainment, wherein he preached up the king's grandeur, and the power of France. This was not the leaſt of his ſervices (12).’

[C] What queen Elizabeth did upon this occaſion has not been faithfully related.] A great many hiſtorians ſay, that queen Elizabeth affected to ſhew him the head

---

(31) Mezerai, ubi ſupra. See alſo Davila, lib. xiii, pag. m. 806.

(32) In the Entretiens ſur la Cabale chimerique, pag 191.

(33) That is, when he was killed by a cannon ball at the ſiege of Epernai.

(34) Mezerai, Tom. III, pag. 1024.

(35) Ibid.

(36) Davila, ubi ſupra, ſays, that he was juſt entering upon his ſixty fifth year. D'Aubigné, Tom. III, pag. 358, makes him ſixty five years old.

(37) Dupleix, Hiſt. de Henry IV, pag. 93, ſays, that it was an hour after he had got a good dinner, and that he was fifty eight years of age.

(1) He was leading his army towards L'Iſle en Jourdain, four leagues from Toulouſe. Dupleix, Hiſt. de Hen. III, pag. 82.

(2) Id. ibid.

(3) Pierre Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, livr. v, pag. 218.

(4) Cayet, Chronol. Septenaire, fol. 319, verſo.

(5) Ibid. fol. 320, verſo.

(6) Ibid.

(7) Ib. fol. 319.

(8) Father Anſelme, pag. 197.

(9) Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, lib. v, pag. m. 218.

(10) Diſcours Hiſtorique de la Fortune & Diſgrace des Favoris, depuis François I, juſques à Louis XIII, inſerted in Le Laboureur's Additions to Caſtelnau's Memoirs, Tom. II. pag. 134. It has been ſince reprinted by itſelf with this title, Memoires de Mr de Beauvais Nangis.

(11) Hiſt. de France, Tom. III, pag. 1026.

(12) Mezerai, Abiégé, Chronolog. Tom. VI, pag. 257, ad ann. 1602.

He was beheaded the thirty firſt of July, 1602, for joining with the duke of Savoy in a horrid conſpiracy againſt the ſtate [D]. He behaved like a madman upon the ſcaffold [E]. He was not yet forty years of age (a). He was a man of a boundleſs ambition; and, tho' he had no religion [F], he appeared ſuperſtitious, in order to revive

head of the earl of Eſſex, to have an opportunity to tell him by what motive ſhe had been induced to puniſh ſo ſeverely the rebellion of that ungrateful man. They add, that ſhe told him, the king of France would do well to puniſh traitors in the ſame manner (13). Some ſay, that ſhe ſhewed him the earl's head from the windows of her palace; others will have it, that ſhe did it, going over London-bridge. But this cannot be true, ſince the queen was at a country-houſe all the time mareſchal de Biron was in England. Dupleix (14) made uſe of this obſervation to confute what has been ſaid by ſo many other hiſtorians; and Leti has done it likewiſe (15): but he is miſtaken, when he ſays, that Henry IV did not ſend Biron to London, till after his return to Paris (16); for he ſent him thither from Calais.

I do not pretend to deny, that the queen diſcourſed in ſuch a manner about the earl of Eſſex; but, inſtead of ſaying that ſhe did it, ſhewing the earl's head to the duke of Biron, thoſe hiſtorians ſhould have ſaid, as le Grain does (17), that ſhe ſpoke thoſe words in her cloſet, ſhewing him the picture of that lord. It is a ſhameful thing, that the French relations, and even thoſe that were written by the beſt hiſtorians of thoſe times, ſhould be ſtuffed with ſo many fables. Camden has all the reaſon in the world to laugh at them for ſaying, that the queen ſhewed the head of the earl of Eſſex to the mareſchal de Biron; for it was buried with the body. Quod quidam Gallici ſcriptores prodiderunt eam cranium Eſſexii inter plura damnatorum, in intimo Larario, vel (ut alii ſcribunt) palo affixum, Bironio & Gallis oſtentaſſe, ridicule vanum eſt. Illud enim una cum corpore conſepultum (18). He ſays the queen was then at a country-houſe, which he calls Baſingum. Baſſompierre (19), who accompanied mareſchal de Biron, calls it Baſing; correct therefore Dupleix, who calls it Vignes. He has committed many other faults, for which Baſſompierre takes him up. Here is one of them. The queen gave the French a royal entertainment, played upon the ſpinnet in their preſence, and ſung along with it. Baſſompierre refutes this in theſe words (20): ‘She gave no royal entertainment to the French; only ſhe defrayed the expences of mareſchal de Biron and his company, all the time he was at Laning (21); and one day, mareſchal de Biron being at Baſing, my lord Corbain brought him, with four or five of us, into her chamber through a back-door, to ſurpriſe her when ſhe was ſinging.’

[D] He was beheaded for joining with the duke of Savoy in a horrid conſpiracy againſt the ſtate.] This was none of thoſe petty conſpiracies deſigned only to keep a king buſy, that he may not diſturb his neighbours. It is affirmed, that the duke of Savoy and Biron had agreed ‘to diſmember the kingdom, to erect as many ſovereignties in it, as there were provinces, and to put all thoſe petty princes under the protection of Spain. The duke of Savoy was to have for his ſhare the Lyonnois, Dauphiné, and Provence, and Biron the duchy of Burgundy, to which the Spaniards were to add Franche Comtê, as a portion for a daughter of their king, or for a daughter of the duke of Savoy, whom they promiſed to marry to him (22).’ I ſhall take occaſion from hence to obſerve a great difference between the paſſions of ſovereign princes and thoſe of private men. Any gentleman would certainly take it as a great affront, if one of his neighbours ſhould offer to corrupt his ſervants, and engage them to betray their maſter. He would quickly ſend him a challenge, or at leaſt ſeek an opportunity to end the difference ſword in hand. But princes are contented to puniſh the traitors, and continue to keep correſpondence with the ſeducer. Henry IV bore very patiently this hoſtility of the duke of Savoy; no rupture enſued upon it, and they remained, in all outward appearance, as good friends as they were before. See hereafter (23) a paſſage of Brantôme concerning the quarrels of great men (24).

[E] He behaved like a madman upon the ſcaffold.] All the hiſtorians of that time tell us at large what he did and what he ſaid, during his trial, till he was executed. I ſhall only ſet down what I find in a letter of Mr Gillot to Scaliger (25). ‘You have heard of the mareſchal's death, who has been executed in the court of the Baſtille, by the king's favour, and not in the Greve. He has all along refuſed to diſcover his accomplices, and has ſaid nothing but what is in his proceſs. He is dead, very ill affected to the king and his country; which he ſhewed, by praying to GOD, that he would have mercy upon his ſoul, and the king's: and then he ſaid, quick, quick, make haſte, and would not ſuffer himſelf to be bound, ſwearing, that he would ſtrangle the executioner with his teeth. The executioner did not come near him: he himſelf tied his handkerchief about his head, and then untied it, ſwearing moſt horribly, that they ſhould take care not to put him into a fury, and that he would ſpoil one half of thoſe that were there; and deſiring the muſqueteers, that were in the court, to ſhoot him. Is there no honeſt fellow among you, ſaid he, that will ſhoot mareſchal de Biron, that he may not die by the hands of theſe raſcals? He complained to the chancellor himſelf of the ſeverity of that ſentence. You may well believe, that his death was neceſſary to France. I can aſſure you, that he is dead, like the man ſpoken of by an Italian poet:

Biaſtemando ſe ne fuge l'alma con grand cordoglio,
Come nel mondo viſſe pieno d'ira & d'orgoglio.

The ſoul, where rage and madneſs wont to dwell,
Furious, breaks looſe, and ſeeks the ſhades of hell.

Theſe two verſes are very like thoſe, that are to be found at the end of Orlando furioſo:

Beſtemmiando fuggi l'alma ſdegnoſa,
Che fu ſi altera al mondo, e ſi orgoglioſa (26).

See the proud ſoul, which boil'd with vengeful ire,
Indignant quit the limbs, and to the ſhades retire.

When he was told, that he could expect no pardon, he did ſo furiouſly inveigh againſt the king, that the hiſtorians durſt not mention the words that he made uſe of. ‘The duke of Biron . . . . . having given up himſelf to grief and fury, ſpoke firſt, and ſaid whatever a man, overcome with grief, can utter, telling the chancellor in a reproachful manner, that he had been all along more inclined to condemn him, than to ſave him: and, upon this occaſion, he added ſome words, the memory whereof is forbidden, and which cannot be mentioned with impunity. But princes are little concerned for the ſatirical ſtrokes of their ſubjects, who ſeldom fail to ſuffer for it (27).’

[F] Though he had no religion.] I will quote hereupon this paſſage of Victor Cayet (28). ‘He often laughed at all religion. One day, the baron de Lux, his truſty friend, told him, that a capuchin, attending his uncle, archbiſhop of Paris, when he was dying, had made uſe of theſe words: When GOD ſees, that a ſinner will not repent, and rejects his grace, he brings him into proſperity; every thing falls out according to his wiſhes; he fills him with the joys of this world. To which the mareſchal anſwered, I ſhould be glad to be thus forſaken. There are a great many ſuch ſayings related of him, which ſhews that he had little religion; but I omit them, not to caſt a blot upon his memory.’ This hiſtorian had ſaid a thing in the foregoing page, which deſerves ſo much the more to be mentioned in this place, becauſe we learn from it, that Biron was brought up in the reformed religion. The paſſage runs thus: ‘He often laughed at the maſs, and at thoſe of the pretended reformed religion, with whom he had been bred up from his younger years. For when he was eight years of age, Madam de Briſambourg (29), his aunt by the father's ſide, who was of the pretended reformed religion, conceived ſuch an affection for him, by reaſon of his briſkneſs and pleaſant humour, that ſhe begged him of his mother, who granted her requeſt, for they were both of the ſaid

---

(a) Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, lib. iv, pag. 218.

(13) Peter Matthieu, Gayet, &c. Mezerai, Abrégé Chronolog. Tom. VI, pag. 240, ſays, that ſhe ſhewed him deſignedly the head of the earl of Eſſex. Thuanus, lib. cxxvi, pag. 943, ſays, that ſhe ſpoke thoſe words, as they were looking upon the heads, ſet upon the Tower of London.

(14) Hiſt. de Henry IV, pag. 300.

(15) Hiſtoire d'Elizabeth, Tom. II, pag. 495.

(16) Ibid. pag. 485.

(17) Le Grain, Decade de Henri le Grand, pag. m. 782.

(18) Camb. Hiſt. Eliz. Part. IV, pag. m. 820, ad ann. 1601.

(19) Baſſompierre, Obſervat. ſur Dupleix, pag. 82.

(20) Id. ibid. pag. 83.

(21) A houſe near Baſing.

(22) Mezerai, ubi ſupra, pag. 237.

(23) In the remark [I] of the article POITIERS.

(24) It is to be found in the 329th page of the ſecond Tome of his Dames Galantes.

(25) Epitres Françoiſes à Scaliger, pag. 248.

(26) Compare with this the words of Virgil: Illi ſolvuntur frigore membra, Vitaque cum gemitu fugit indignata ſub umbras. The hero with a groan expir'd, His ſoul, indignant, to the ſhades retir'd. Æneid. lib. ult. ver. 951.

(27) Matthieu, ibid. lib. v, pag. 340.

(28) Chronologie Septenaire, fol. 319.

(29) Briſambourg is near St John d'Angely.

vive the league [G]. He did not forget what his father told him, that a general ought to keep up the war as long as he can, becauſe in time of peace he is no neceſſary man, and muſt live in his country-houſe (b). This was the reaſon why he did not give the neceſſary orders, during the ſiege of Amiens, to hinder the arch-duke from throwing ſuccours into that place. He would not have been ſorry it had been relieved, becauſe it would have retarded the peace. He could hardly bear, that Henry IV ſhould have a ſhare in the glory of good ſucceſs; and he threatened the hiſtorians who did not indulge his vanity [H]. I can ſcarce believe what is ſaid of his learning [I]. What is reported of ‘ religion. His mother gave him willingly to his ‘ aunt, to have him brought up in that religion, ‘ which was done accordingly: and from that time his ‘ aunt Briſambourg made him her only heir. She ‘ had a vaſt eſtate; for ſhe had been married thrice, ‘ and had no children by any of her husbands; and ‘ they left her great jointures and legacies, which ‘ were all adjuged to her, ſo far as to diſpoſe of ‘ them as ſhe ſhould think fit.’ Camden ſays, that mareſchal de Biron laughed at the earl of Eſſex for ſuffering death with a Chriſtian diſpoſition: as if ſuch a reſignation became only a parſon, and not a ſoldier (30).

[G] He appeared ſuperſtitious (§ α), in order to revive the league.] Mezerai obſerves (31), ‘ that, ‘ after the loſs of Dourlens and Cambray, the nobility ‘ and the army looked upon him as the only deliverer ‘ of the ſtate. At his return from the ſiege of Amiens, he grew fond of the love of the inhabitants of ‘ Paris; and, when he went into Flanders, to make ‘ the arch-duke ſwear to the peace, the Spaniards, ‘ knowing his vanity and ill diſpoſition, beſtowed ſuch ‘ great encomiums upon him, that they filled his head ‘ with wind, and his mind with ill deſigns. From ‘ that time, and even before, he endeavoured to ingratiate himſelf with the people, and affected to appear zealous for the Catholic religion, ſo far as to ‘ uſe beads, and to be admitted into fraternities, as if ‘ he had deſigned to revive the league, which he had ‘ deſtroyed with the ſword.’ He had not forgot how far the city of Paris had ſupported the duke of Guiſe in his ambition; and he was not ignorant, that the chief reaſon of their great fondneſs for that duke, was, becauſe he made it his buſineſs to extirpate the Proteſtants. He thought therefore, that there was a neceſſity for him to make a ſhew of bigotry, in order to ſtrengthen the impreſſions his valour had made upon the inhabitants of that populous city. It was with this proſpect that he affected to hate the Huguenots. Here is the ſequel of the paſſage which I have quoted out of Mr Gillot's letter (32). ‘ I muſt tell you, that ‘ his whole conduct ſavoured of the ſpirit of the ‘ league. He had promiſed and ſworn not to ſpeak ‘ with any Huguenot, and to ſhun their converſation; ‘ and that he might keep his oath, he would not ſee his ‘ mother, when he went into his province; and he ‘ turned out his old ſervants, and thoſe of his father, ‘ Sacramento illo obligatus, (to keep his oath), to the ‘ count de Fuentes.’

[(§ α) The facetious narrative concerning Monſieur Saint Biron. B. ii. ch. 8. of the Confeſſion of Sancy, might have been brought in here. Rem. Crit.]

[H] He could ſcarce ſuffer that Henry IV ſhould have a ſhare in the glory of good ſucceſs, and he threatened the hiſtorians who did not flatter his vanity.] The king and the mareſchal were jealous of one another. The king was not always willing to acknowledge, that the mareſchal deſerved the glory, which he aſcribed to himſelf, and ſpoke freely about it to the duke of Savoy (33), who, through a very malicious craft, put him upon that ſubject, to report ſome things to the mareſchal that might exaſperate him (34). When the mareſchal was told of them, he uttered the moſt abuſive words, that his reſentment would afford him, againſt the reſpect he owed to the king . . . . He made very blunt and inconſiderate repartees; for he could not bear the leaſt reflexion upon his valour, which he valued above all things. And, when he happened to give an account of his life, he mixed with it malicious ſtories of every body, without ſo much as ſparing the king (35). He told him ſometimes (36), that he would not have any French hiſtorian to ſay, that any body had done ſuch or ſuch a thing but he (37). Having ſeen a diſcourſe of Peter Matthieu, about the cauſes and conſequences of the long wars between the houſe of France and the houſe of Auſtria; and, fancying that the author did not ſpeak of him ſo often, nor ſo glorioufly, as he wiſhed, he complained of it to chancellor de Bellievre; and diſcovered his reſentment more openly to de Vic, embaſſador in Swiſſerland, with hard words and great threatenings againſt the author (38).

Note, that he had a kind of ambition like that of Achilles. This hero would not ſuffer, that any other Greek ſhould kill Hector; he would have all the glory of it.

Λαοῖσιν δ' ἀνένευε καρήατι δῖος Ἀχιλλεὺς,
Οὐδ' εἴα ἔμεναι ἐπὶ Ἕκτορι πικρὰ βέλεμνα,
Μήτις κῦδος ἄροιτο βαλὼν, ὁ δὲ δεύτερος ἔλθοι.

Populis autem innuebat capite nobilis Achilles,
Neque ſinebat mittere in Hectorem acerba tela,
Ne quis gloriam auſerret jaculatus, ipſe vero poſterior veniret (39).

Notwithſtanding the great authority of Homer, the ancients did not approve this character of Achilles. This we learn from Plutarch (40): ‘ Achilles himſelf ‘ is blamed with great reaſon, as not behaving himſelf ‘ like a wiſe man, but like a hardy young fool, tranſported with an eager deſire of glory; for in the ‘ heat of the battle he made ſigns to the Greeks not ‘ to meddle with Hector, as Homer ſays:

Leſt that their darts his glory ſhould abate,
And, when the blow was given, himſelf ſhould come too late.

[I] I can ſcarce believe what is ſaid of his learning.] Balzac tells us a very curious thing (41). ‘ Beſides the two Frenchmen, ſays he, whom I have ‘ alledged (42), I muſt mention a third, whom I had ‘ forgot, and you will never think of; I mean the late ‘ mareſchal de Biron, a man, who breathed nothing ‘ but fire and ſlaughter, and of whom Torquato Taſſo ‘ ſaid, in the perſon of Argante,

Impatiente, ineſſorabil, fiero,
Ne l'arme inſaticabile & invitto, &c,

Impatient, fierce, inexorable,
Untired in arms, unconquerable.

‘ One of our friends, who knew him, gives us the ‘ following account of him. The king ſent mareſchal ‘ de Biron to queen Elizabeth, calling him in his ‘ credential letters, The moſt cutting inſtrument of his ‘ victories. The mareſchal acquitted himſelf worthily of that employment; for his parts anſwered his ‘ great courage. It has been ſaid elſewhere, that he ‘ had a mind to be accounted a brutiſh man, ‘ in order to comply with the fooliſhneſs of the age: ‘ but it is certain, that, beſides his natural endowments, he had a great deal of knowledge. He gave an ‘ inſtance of it at Freſne; where the king walking ‘ in a gallery, and asking of ſome maſters of the requeſts the meaning of a Greek verſe engraved upon ‘ a piece of marble, he explained it immediately, ‘ and then went away, being aſhamed to be a more ‘ knowing man than the maſters of the requeſts of ‘ that time.’ I am apt to believe, that this paſſage does not belong to the ſon, but to the father; for the father loved learning, and learned converſations, and uſed to write down in his table-book whatever he heard that deſerved to be taken notice of; and therefore it is likely, that he found the explication of that Greek verſe in his pocket-book. However, I will not be poſitive: You will ſee, in the following remark, a paſſage, which is the cauſe of my uncertainty. Mr de Pereſixe (43) ſays, that Biron, the ſon, was very ignorant, and extreamly fond of the predictions of

(b) See a diſcourſe concerning favourites, in Le Laboureur's Additions to Caſtelnau's Memoirs, Tom. II, pag. 135.

(30) Licet hanc pietatem ut miniſtello quam viro bellicoſo digniorem Bironus & alii prophani ſubſannarent. Camdenus in Annal. Part. IV, pag. 805.

(31) Abrégé Chronolog. Tom. VI, pag. 209, ad ann. 1599.

(32) Epitres Françoiſes à Scaliger, pag. 249.

(33) Whilſt that duke was at the court of France in the year 1600.

(34) Peter Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, livr. iii, pag. m. 449.

(35) Ibid.

(36) Theſe words were ſpoken and heard at the ſiege of Amiens. Id. ibid. pag. 452.

(37) Ibid.

(38) Idem. lib. iv, pag. 388.

(39) Homer, Iliad. lib xxii, ver. 205.

(40) Plut. in Pompeio, pag. 634.

(41) Balzac, Entretien IV, towards the end, pag. m. 72, 73.

(42) He had been ſpeaking, pag. 71, of Mr de Givry and Mr d'Urfé, who were two eloquent and learned men, and knew how to write in proſe and verſe.

(43) Hiſtoire de Henry le Grand, pag. m. 374.

of his reminiſcence deſerves to be mentioned [K]. He was at firſt brought up in the Proteſtant religion (c). He was a great gameſter (d); but little given to women, and other bodily pleaſures (e). Henry IV had a mind to make him his ſon-in-law [L]; and it is ſaid, he boaſted, that he had ſaved his life [M]. I ſhall only take notice of two faults of Moreri [N].

of aſtrologers, diviners, geomancers, and ſuch like cheats. For the reſt Balzac's dealing upon this occaſion is ſomewhat unfair: he uſes one of the tricks of proud writers: he dares not name his author, hoping that the readers will think he has found this paſſage in a book unknown to every body elſe; and yet it is to be found in a common book, viz. in d'Aubigné's hiſtory (44). I have made, elſewhere (45), the like remark.

[K] What is reported of his reminiſcence deſerves to be mentioned.] I have already ſaid, that he was brought up by his aunt, the lady Briſambourg: to which I add here, ‘ that he had no inclination for learning, but only for war: wherefore mareſchal de Biron, his father, who was a Catholic and a very warlike man, took him from his aunt, carried him for ſome time along with him into the provinces of Xaintonge, Aunis, and Angoumois, and had him inſtructed in the Catholic religion . . . thus Charles de Biron, being unqualified for learning till he was ſixteen years of age, got ſuch a skill in the art of war, that he found nothing impoſſible. His father was well pleaſed with it. What I am going to mention is very wonderful. Whilſt he was at Briſambourg, he was taught hiſtory by one Manduca, a learned man of Malta; and though he made no progreſs in it, yet he has ſince alledged many hiſtorical facts admirably well, though naturally he was no great talker (46).

[L] Henry IV had a mind to make him his ſon-in-law.] This I have read in the additions to Caſtelnau's memoirs; and I think the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find, here, the following paſſage, which is full of curious things (47). ‘ If the duke of Biron did not conſpire againſt his perſon (48), it cannot be denied, that he conſpired againſt his ſtate, and deſigned to divide it into ſeveral parts, and to deliver it up to the king of Spain, and the duke of Savoy, his pretended father-in-law. The king was the more exaſperated at him, becauſe he loved him ſo well, that he intended to make him his ſon-in-law, by marrying him to Catherine Henrietta his daughter, who was afterwards ducheſs of Elbœuf; the better to ſecure the crown to the duke of Vendoſme, whom he deſigned to legitimate by his marriage with the ducheſs of Beaufort. A few days after the death of that lady, his miſtreſs, he diſcovered this deſign of his at Fontainbleau to the Sieur du Vair, counſellor of ſtate, in a private conference; and having imparted his grief to him, he deſired to know what he thought of it. S I R, ſaid du Vair, if your majeſty was duke of Tuſcany, of Mantua, or of Urbino, (Italy affords many inſtances of cruelty, eſpecially in the eſtabliſhment of ſovereignties, which generally have been tyrannical in the beginning) I ſhould think, that, by deſtroying all your relations, and their friends, you might ſet illegitimate children upon the throne; but being a gracious king of France, and careful to tread in the ſteps of your predeceſſors, your majeſty would have run the hazard of loſing your kingdom, and even your life. You are miſtaken, replied the king; The French nation uſe themſelves to every thing. The king, having loſt the opportunity of placing the duke of Vendoſme upon the throne, had a mind to make him the greateſt man in the kingdom; and was ſtill reſolved to marry this duke's ſiſter to the duke of Biron. But the latter, either becauſe he did not think the match good enough for him, or becauſe he was unwilling to be engaged by authority in a marriage which could not ſatisfy his ambition as before, ſuffered himſelf to be fooliſhly flattered with the hopes of marrying the daughter of the duke of Savoy, who was deſcended by her father and mother from Francis I, and the emperor Charles V. . . . The ſame Mr du Vair, in his return from the court to Provence, by the way of Dijon, had a long conference with the duke of Biron's ſecretary; and having intimated to him, that he was a little ſurprized, that a lord of his age, who was ſo great a man, and had ſo great an intereſt, did not marry, the ſecretary gave him a hint of his deſign by this anſwer: theſe great men ſuffer themſelves to be brought into ſuch high enterprizes, that they hardly know themſelves. Indeed, this duke of Biron, who was a proud and haughty man, and of a very untractable temper, was only pleaſed with difficult and almoſt impoſſible things. He envied the grandeur of other men; and his jealouſy of the duke of Montmorency, by reaſon of his office of conſtable, reached Louiſe de Budos, his wife. Thinking to ſucceed the conſtable, he propoſed to marry his wife (49), and the thing was agreed upon between that lady and him, if their fate had permitted it; but they died both of them in the flower of their age, and the conſtable ſurvived them.’

[M] . . . . and boaſted that he had ſaved his life.] I have read this in a hiſtory of Henry IV, written by G. Soſſi. That author (50) brings in this prince, ſaying; though I am a king, I have ſaved the life of one of my ſoldiers: had it not been for me, he had been killed before my eyes: I have ſeen that great warriour turning his back to the enemy. What the king ſaid was true enough. As Biron was purſuing Farneſe in the frontiers, there happened an accidental fight on horſeback, in which the enemy, having recovered their ſtrength, attacked Biron, and run his horſe thro' with a lance. At Fontaine Françoiſe, he received ſeveral wounds in a rencounter, and his eyes were almoſt blinded with the blood that iſſued from a wound in his head. The king brought him off from thoſe two dangers. Peter Matthieu gives us a clearer account of that matter. He has ſerved me well, ſaid the king; but he cannot deny that I have ſaved his life three times. I brought him off from the enemy at Fontaine Françoiſe, ſo wounded, and ſo ſtunned with his wounds, that, as I had acted the part of a ſoldier to ſave his life, I acted that of a mareſchal, in order to make a retreat; for he told me he was not in a condition to think of it, and to ſerve me (51). The following words are to be found in the margin of that hiſtorian. ‘ At the fight of Fontaine-Françoiſe, the king reſcued mareſchal de Biron from the middle. One of his majeſty's ſervants told him, that he expoſed himſelf too much by running thus among the enemies. It is true, anſwered the king; but if I do not do it, marſhal Biron will take advantage of it as long as he lives.’

[N] I ſhall only take notice of two faults of Moreri.] He ſays, that the barony of Biron was erected into a dutchy and peerdom, after the mareſchal's return from his embaſſy in England, which is falſe (52); for the erection was made three years before that embaſſy. He adds, that Biron, having loſt his office of admiral, and having ſome ſmall reaſons to be diſcontented, plotted againſt the ſtate. This is likewiſe falſe; for he voluntarily laid down the poſt of admiral in 1549, and was amply rewarded for it.

GONZAGA, (Cecilia de) was one of the moſt virtuous and learned women that lived in the XVth century. She was inſtructed in polite learning by Victorinus of Feltri, and made a wonderful progreſs; for, if I am not miſtaken, what we read in a book of Ambroſius Camaldulenſis ought to be underſtood of her [A]. Her mother, [A] What we read in . . . Ambroſius Camaldulenſis ought to be underſtood of her.] If you read his Hodœporicon, you will find (1), that Victorinus Feltrius taught polite learning at Mantua, with great reputation, and inſtructed the children of the lord of that place: This was John-Francis Gonzaga. He had a daughter about eight years old, who underſtood the declenſions and conjugations of the Greek tongue,

---

(c) See the remark [F].

(d) He loſt above five hundred thouſand crowns in one year. Mezerai, Abrégé Chronol. Tom. VI, pag. 270, ad ann. 1602.

(e) Cayet, Chronolog. Septenaire, fol. 317.

(44) In the third volume, book v, chap. xii, pag. 668, 669.

(45) In the remark [C] of the article CAVALCANTE, at the end.

(46) Cayet, ubi ſupra, fol. 319.

(47) Le Laboureur's Additions to Caſtelnau's Memoirs, Tom. II, pag. 132.

(48) That is, againſt the perſon of Henry IV.

(49) The author of the Diſcours Hiſt. de la Fortune & Diſgrace des Favoris, inſerted in the Additions to Caſtelnau's Memoirs, has theſe words: The king, to reward the ſaid marêchal for his ſervices, made him a duke and peer, gave him great penſions, and waited only for the conſtable's death, who was very old, to give him his place.

(50) Book iv, pag. m. 462.

(51) Matthieu, Hiſt. de la Paix, lib. iv, pag. m. 286.

(52) This fault is in Father Anſelme, Hiſt. des Grands Officiers, pag. 211.

(1) Pag. 34.

mother, Paula Malateſta, a lady moſt eminent for her virtue, learning, and beauty, inſpired her with a contempt of the world [B], and made her deſire to be a nun. This deſire was too ſtrong to yield to any oppoſitions. Cecilia harangued her father, who was againſt her renouncing matrimony, and with ſubſtantial reaſons demonſtrated to him the juſtice of her deſign (a). I have ſaid elſewhere (b) what books ſhe was adviſed to read, when ſhe was engaged in a religious life. Mr Joly has been guilty of ſome miſtakes [C].

tongue, whereof ſhe gave a proof before the moſt learned Ambroſius, general of the Camaldoli, when he paſſed by the city of Mantua in the year 1432. Principis filiam octo ferme annorum ita imbuerat (Victorinus Feltrius) ut legeret jam & ſcriberet, Græcaque & nomina & verba inoffenſe declinaret non ſine admiratione noſtrâ. Theſe are Ambroſe's words in the account of his travels, that is, of the viſits he made to many houſes of the order, of which he was general. What follows, muſt, I think, relate to a later journey. I take it from Mr Joly (2) : What is ſaid of another girl, in the life of Ambroſius * general of the order of the Camaldoli, is much more remarkable : Ambroſe, being ſent by Pope Eugenius IV to the council of Baſil, came to a caſtle called Gorda, in the territory of Mantua, where he found two children, one a boy of fourteen years of age, who repeated before him two hundred verſes he had compoſed, with ſuch a grace †, that he did not believe Virgil pronounced the ſixth book of his Æneid before Auguſtus with a better : It is not ſaid who this youth was : but as to the girl, we have the following account of her ‡. He ſaw alſo the prince's daughter, (that is the duke (3) of Mantua's) about ten years of age, who wrote Greek ſo elegantly, that Ambroſe would have deſired no more in any learned man.

I believe the ſame young lady is meant in both theſe journies, and that it is ſhe, who is the ſubject of this article.

Note, that Victorinus Feltrius was a very famous man. This is what Leander Albertus ſays of him in his deſcription of Italy (4) : ‘ Illuſtrarunt Feltriam ingenia quædam nobilia, nominatim Victorinus memoria noſtrorum avorum linguæ Latinæ, quæ tam diu perierat, reductor ac inſtaurator. —— Feltria was famous for ſome great wits, particularly Victorinus, in the memory of our grand-fathers, the reſtorer of the Latin tongue, ſo long loſt.’

[B] Paula Malateſta . . . eminent for her virtue . . . inſpired her with a contempt of the world.] Leander Albertus praiſes her very much, and declares, ſhe was celebrated by all the authors of the time. ‘ Paula, Franciſci primi Gonzagæ Mantuani Marchionis conjux, non ſolum excellenti formæ pulchritudine (venuſtiſſima quippe totius Italiæ habebatur) ſed etiam multis virtutibus, literis, prudentia, ſanctitateque decorata (5). —— Paula, wife of the firſt Francis Gonzaga, marquis of Mantua, a lady not only of an excellent beauty (for ſhe was eſteemed the handſomeſt woman in Italy) but of many virtues, learning, prudence, and ſanctity.’ Speaking elſewhere of the ſame Francis Gonzaga, promoted to the marquiſate of Mantua by the emperor Sigiſmund, the twenty ſecond of September, 1433, he ſays, ‘ Uxorem habuit lectiſſimam fœminam, religione, ſapientia, pudicitia, literiſque decoratam Paulam Malateſtam, ab omnibus illorum temporum ſcriptoribus ob ſingulares virtutes mirificè laudatam (6). - - - - - His wife was a moſt extraordinary lady, for religion, wiſdom, chaſtity, and learning : her name was Paula Malateſta, praiſed for her ſingular virtues by all the writers of that time.’ Who could chuſe but praiſe ſo incomparable a woman ? She paſſed for the handſomeſt in all Italy, and yet ſhe deſpiſed all the ornaments of the body, and omitting expences upon jewls and finery, ſhe laid out a great deal upon building and repairing of churches, feeding the poor, and marrying young women, &c. She inſpired our Cecilia with the ſame ſpirit, as Matthew Boſſus informs us (7). ‘ Habuit Mantua Paulam Gonzagam illuſtrem fœminam univerſa Italia celeberrimam ; quam ſi dixero, corporis cultum contempſiſſe, omnem ſuam rem in ædificandis inſtaurandiſque delubris, in pauperum Chriſti neceſſitatibus, in locandis nuptuique tradendis virginibus, quæ quidem maxima ſunt, erogaſſe, ſi nihil unquam illam omiſiſſe, quod ad veram humilitatem culmenque virtutis conducat, ſi omnis denique ingenioli mei vires in ejus laudibus expendam, parum dixiſſe me profecto ſemper agnoſcam. Primam Paulam, cujus modo mentionem fecimus (8), imitata Cæciliam virginem ſuam filiam literarum peritiſſimam ſuo educatu, ſuaque imitatione ad tantam ſæcularium ornamentorum, ut ita dixerim, nauſeam perduxit, & ad religionem inflammavit, ut apud patrem primum Mantuæ Marchionem vincere ejus propoſitum cupientem, cauſam conſtantiſſimè agere non ſit verita. —— Mantua had Paula Gonzaga, an illuſtrious lady, famed over all Italy ; of whom if I ſhall relate, that ſhe deſpiſed dreſs ; that ſhe ſpent her eſtate in building and repairing churches, in ſupplying the neceſſities of Chriſt's poor, in placing out and marrying virgins ; that ſhe omitted nothing, which can conduce to true humility and conſummate virtue ; if, laſtly, I ſhould exert the whole force of my little abilities in her praiſes, I ſhall always acknowledge that I fall ſhort of her deſert. In imitation of the firſt Paula, whom I have juſt mentioned, ſhe inſpired her virgin daughter Cecilia, a very learned maid, by the force of education and example, with ſuch a diſreliſh of worldly ornaments, and ſuch a religious zeal, that ſhe was not afraid to plead her cauſe ſtrenuouſly to her father, the firſt marquis of Mantua.’ Theſe words are taken from a diſcourſe, that Matthew Boſſus (9) inſcribed to cardinal Beſſarion, exhorting him not to ſuffer the women of Bologna to re-aſſume their ornaments.

[C] Mr Joly has been guilty of ſome miſtakes.] I will not abridge his diſcourſe, becauſe many will be glad to learn what I ſhould leave out. Upon a due conſideration of thoſe times, ſays he (10), we way ſay, they were more fruitful in learned women, than others, though ignorance was then very great among the men. For in the end of the XVth century, we hear of a Paula Gonzaga, daughter of the marquis of Mantua, a nun ; of a Baptiſta, widow of the lord of Arimini ; of the daughters of John Feruſſini, a Milaneze civilian, whom Margaret their mother took as much care to have inſtructed in the Greek and Latin tongue, as ſince Sir Thomas More has done with his ; of Iſota Nogarola of Verona, whither cardinal Beſſarion going on purpoſe to viſit her, ſaid, She was a virgin more divine than human * ; of Violanta, widow to the prince of Ceſena, and afterwards a nun of the order of St Francis, all mentioned by Matthew Boſſus ⸸ alſo a Veroneſe, and regular canon of St Auſtin. This is committing more than one fault, to ſay, that the learned woman, named Paula, mentioned by Matthew Boſſus, lived at the end of the XVth century, and that ſhe was the daughter of the marquis of Mantua, and a nun. She was of the houſe of Malateſta ; and ſince her husband was the firſt marquis of Mantua (11), ſhe cannot be placed at the end of the XVth century ; for this marquis died in the year 1444 (12), having had many children by her. If it were true, that he married her in the year 1410, as Mr de Marolles (13) affirms, Mr Joly's error would be more manifeſt. Add to this, that Matthew Boſſus obſerves, that ſhe diſpoſed her daughter Cecilia to a religious life : he does not ſay, that ſhe entered upon it, finding herſelf a widow. I have not this author's letters, and ſo I cannot ſay, whether the learned Baptiſta be there found to have been married to the lord of Arimini. I only know, that he does not ſay it in the other work, cited by Mr Joly. I know moreover, that ſhe was of the family of Malateſta, which governed at Arimini (14). However, I am very certain, that this lady had a great credit throughout the whole city ; for her example, her exhortations, and her orders, obliged the women of Arimini to modeſty of dreſs, and to leave off their long trains. Such a reformation is not the work of a lady of an indifferent authority and merit. It is one of the moſt difficult enterpriſes that can be undertaken. However, let us ſee at large the noble elogy, that Matthew Boſſus has given this Chriſtian heroine. ‘ Baptiſtam inſignem Ariminenſe ſolum habuit ſingulari humilitate, pariter & literarum ſtudiis præditam, quæ adeo animi ornamenta corporalibus prætulit, ut

---

(a) See the remark [B], citation (7).

(b) In the article CONRARUS.

(2) Joly, Avis Chrétiens & Moraux pour l'Inſtitution des Enfans, pag. 347, 348.

* Lib. iii, Hiſtoriar. Camaldulenſ. cap xxiv, Autore Auguſtino Florentino Monacho Camaldulenſi, Edit. Florentiæ, 1575, in 4to.

† The author of that hiſtory ſays, that Ambroſe had mentioned this in the thirty fifth of his epiſtles.

‡ Adfuit puella quoque Principis filia, decennis fermè, Græcè adeò ſcribens eleganter, ut tantundem in quolibet à ſe erudito homine Ambroſius deſideraverit.

(3) The lords of Mantua were not yet dukes: they had not had that title till the year 1530.

(4) Pag. m. 749.

(5) Leand. Albert. Deſcript. Italiæ, pag. 456.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 608.

(7) Matthæus Boſſus de immoderato mulierum cultu, pag. m. 327.

(8) A little before he had mentioned Paula, the mother of Bleſilla and Euſtochium, ſo famous in the writings of St Jerome.

(9) He was of Verona, and a regular canon. I have given his article.

(10) Joly, Voiage de Hollande, pag. 163, 164.

* See Dames Illuſtres de la Coſte, pag. 721.

⸸ In Recuperationib. Fœſulanis, ad Beſſarion. Card. de honeſto Cultu Fœminarum. It. Ep. iii, & cii.

(11) Boſſus affirms it in the words before quoted, citation ( ).

(12) Volater. lib. iv, pag. 113. Leand. Albertus, ubi ſupra, pag. 608. The latter is miſtaken in his calculation : He mentions an Inſcription, which ſhews, that this marquis was above twelve years of age in March 1407. (Volaterranus, ubi ſupra, ſays he was 14.) and then places his death on the twenty third of October, 1444, and ſays, he lived fifty four years. The abbot de Marolles, Memoirs, Tom. I, pag. 427, agrees with him in theſe two numbers.

(13) Marolles, ibid. Tom. I, pag. 427.

(14) Fuit & Baptiſta ſingularis formæ, ſapientiæ, honeſtatis ac eruditionis mulier. Leand. Albert. ubi ſupra, pag. 456.

‘ nihil unquam prætermiſiſſe viſa ſit, quod ad principis aut præſentis, aut futuræ decus & ornamentum ullo pacto potuerit attinere. At cæteris ſuis rebus geſtis omiſſis, invenio illam etiam vivente viro nedum humili habitu inceſſiſſe, verùm cæteras concives & populares hortatu ſuo imperioque temperatiſſimis ornamentis, breviſſimiſque veſtium caudis uſas fuiſſe (15). —— Arimini produced the famous Baptiſta, a lady of ſingular humility as well as learning; who ſo far preferred the ornaments of the mind to thoſe of the body, that ſhe ſeemed never to have omitted any thing, which might in the leaſt contribute to the honour and credit of a preſent or future princeſs. But, omitting her other actions, I find, that, even during the life of her husband, though ſhe herſelf appeared in no mean garb, yet the reſt of her fellow-citizens and country-women, by her advice and authority, wore the moſt moderate ornaments, and the ſhorteſt tails to their gowns.’ Volaterranus (16) has mentioned the learning of this lady, and obſerved, that Leonard Aretin, and many other authors, dedicated ſome books to her. Let it be obſerved, that I do not deny, that there was a nun named Paula Gonzaga; I only ſay, that it is not ſhe that Matthew Boſſus has ſpoken of: he was dead, before ſhe took the habit of a nun. She lived but in the XVIth century, and I do not find, that any author praiſes her, but on the account of her being a moſt devout nun. See Hilarion de Coſte, at the 707th page of the firſt tome of the Elogies of illuſtrious ladies, where he ſays, there was a deſign to canonize her.

(15) Matth. Boſſus, de immoder. Cultu Fœmin. pag. 327.

(16) Volater. Commentar. Urban. lib vi, pag. 203.

GONZAGA (ELEONORA), daughter of Francis II, marquis of Mantua, and wife to Francis Maria de la Rovere, duke of Urbino [A], in the XVIth century, made herſelf famous by her excellent qualities. She diſcovered a great conſtancy in her ill fortune, and a great moderation in her proſperity. She always loved her huſband, and was his faithful companion in his diſgraces [B]. But, above all virtues ſhe cheriſhed chaſtity, which ſhe made very apparent by her ſeverity againſt women of a bad life [C]. She had five children, two ſons and three daughters. Guido Ubaldo de la Rovere, her eldeſt ſon, was duke of Urbino; the younger was duke of Sora, and cardinal. Hippolyta, the eldeſt of the daughters, was married to Antony of Arragon, duke of Montalto. Julia, the ſecond, married Alfonſo d'Eſt, marquis of Montecchio. Iſabella, the youngeſt, was married to Alberic Cibo, prince of Maleſpina, and marquis of Maſſa (a).

(a) Taken from Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. I, pag. 544, & ſeq.

[A] She was wife to Francis Maria de la Rovere, duke of Urbino.] He was nephew to Julius II, and ſon to that John de la Rovere, to whom Sixtus IV gave the principality of Sora and Senegaglia, and who married Joan de Montefeltro, daughter of Frederic de Montefeltro, duke of Urbino. Our Francis Maria, the iſſue of this marriage, became duke of Urbino after the death of Guidobaldo de Montefeltro, his uncle by the mother's ſide, who left no iſſue (1).

[B] . . . . . and was his faithful companion in his diſgraces.] Leo X, having made Laurence de Medicis his nephew, duke of Urbino, diveſted Francis Maria de la Rovere of this duchy. This was the misfortune, in which Eleonora ſhewed a great conſtancy in adverſity, under the injurious blows of fortune, which her husband received, whilſt for ſome time he was deprived of dominions; which never made her abate of her uſual generoſity, or entire fidelity to her husband, keeping him company, and comforting him in his misfortune, in which, as a woman of honour, ſhe would always bear a ſhare (2). They were reſtored to their duchy after the death of Laurence de Medicis (3). The husband died in the year 1538 (4). Paul Jovius greatly praiſes him (5).

[C] She ſhewed her love for chaſtity by her ſeverity againſt women of a bad life.] ‘ For ſhe would neither ſee at her houſe, nor have any ſamiliarity with women of quality, who were the leaſt ſuſpected or reported to have defiled the honour of their ſex by the diſorder of their conduct; and ſhe was a mortal enemy to all thoſe, who gave themſelves up to the infamous pleaſures of debauchery, baniſhing many from her dominions, and ſeverely puniſhing thoſe wretched old women, who, after having loſt, in their youth, ſhame and honour, conſcience and reputation, think of nothing continually, at the end of their days, but how to ruin and deſtroy young, ſilly, and unadviſed maids. And therefore ſhe is worthy of an eternal remembrance, for never being ſparing of her money in reſcuing all the innocent abuſed doves out of the talons of the hawks, and conſecrating them to the altars, where afterwards they have done wonders in point of virtue (6).’ This was filling up all the duties of a virtuous princeſs, which ſhe could not be ſaid to have done, had ſhe contented herſelf with an exact obſervation of her conjugal loyalty. This may ſuffice for the generality of women, but not for thoſe women, who are of the firſt rank. They are indiſpenſably obliged to ſtamp a mark of infamy on intriguing women, by manifeſt teſtimonies of their indignation. This ſtain is a more effectual leſſon, than the moſt eloquent ſermons of a pious preacher; and it is certain, that the corruption of a court, that proceeds from womens galantry, is a blot upon the life of a ſovereign princeſs, though ſhe be never ſo chaſte and virtuous; for if ſhe excluded from her familiarity women of ill fame, if ſhe denied them admittance to her palace, if at leaſt ſhe mortified them by marks of coldneſs and cenſures, whilſt ſhe expreſſes her eſteem and affection for chaſte women, ſhe would infallibly produce a reformation of manners. Whence we may conclude, that, if galantry walks barefaced, it is a ſign, that the chief lady makes but little outward diſtinction betwixt thoſe that give occaſion to ſcandal, and others of an unblameable conduct. See what has been ſaid in another place (7). If it be ſaid, that this connivance is not to be attributed to want of zeal for the propagation of chaſtity, but to a certain good nature, that will not ſuffer the torrent to be oppoſed with the neceſſary vigour; I will ſtill maintain, that this ſoftneſs of temper, or good nature, is a great fault on the like occaſions.

(1) See Leander Albertus, Deſcript. Ital. pag. m. 445.

(2) Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. I, pag. 545.

(3) Leand. Albert. ubi ſupra.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Paulus Jovius, Elog. Bellica Virt. Illuſtr. lib. vi, pag. m. 497.

(6) Hilarion de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 546, 547.

(7) In the remark [M] of the article LOUIS XIII.

GONZAGA (ISABELLA DE), the wife of Guido Ubaldo de Montefeltro (a), duke of Urbino, deſerves to be reckoned amongſt the moſt illuſtrious ladies. One of her panegyriſts calls her a woman, for her goodneſs, integrity, courage, and nobleneſs, more divine than humane (b). She had ſuch a chaſtity, as deſerves to be admired: but ſome circumſtances are told of it, that appear fabulous; for it is ſaid, that, after ſhe had lain two years with her huſband, though he had done nothing of what they call conjugal duty, ſhe remained fully perſuaded that nothing was wanting to her marriage [A], and that

(a) And not de la Rovere, as Hilarion de Coſte ſays, pag. 697, of the firſt Tome of his Eloges des Dames Illuſtres.

(b) Joſeph Betuſſi, delle Donne illuſtre, apud Hilarion de Coſte, ubi ſupra. See alſo Chriſtofano Bronzini della dignita, è nobilta delle Donne, Giornata quinta, pag. 116.

[A] After having lain two years with her husband, though he had never performed the conjugal duty, ſhe was fully perſuaded, that nothing was wanting to her marriage.] I will uſe the words of Hilarion de Coſte the Minime: ‘ She was one of thoſe, the apoſtle ſpeaks of, who are married, as if they were not; for either by reaſon of her tender age, or the ſimplicity of her temper, ſhe lived for two years together in ſo profound an ignorance of the ſacrament ſhe was engaged in, as to think other married womens caſe was like her's: in this reſembling the wiſe of the antient Hiero, who complained not of her husband's ſtinking breath, thinking that the breath of all other men was as ſtrong. But age, by a ſecret and not inſenſible that all other huſbands were like her's. At laſt ſhe was undeceived, and her huſband himſelf confeſſed his infirmity to her, when he perceived ſhe underſtood the nature of it [B]; but ſhe nevertheleſs continued her tender affection to him; ſhe comforted him, and never complained, nor revealed the ſtate of her marriage to any body. Nevertheleſs, this ſecret came to be publickly known [C], and then ſhe was ſtrongly ſollicited to think of another match: it was made appear to her, that ſhe might very eaſily get her marriage declared null; and they repreſented many other forcible conſiderations to her: but nothing moved her [D]. She was troubled, that her huſband's impotency was known, and nothing but the death of the duke could part them. His death caſt her almoſt ble leſſon, having taught her what neither the moſt barbarous nations nor the moſt ſtupid women are ignorant of, our corrupt nature being but too much inclined to ſenſual pleaſures, or whether the free company ſhe kept, as a married woman, with women in the ſame ſtate, taught her things ſhe did not know, her ignorance went off (1).' It is not probable, ſhe had been ſo long ignorant in ſuch an affair as this. Moſt of this monk's readers have doubtleſs ſaid, that a maid of ſo great innocence, as to the theory, muſt be taken for one that is but five or ſix years old. Indeed there reigns a very bad cuſtom in families, whether it cannot be prevented, or whether it is hoped it will be of ſome uſe, or whether a ſecret providence ſuffers it for the temporal good of the univerſe. When children come to a certain age, they are told of nothing but miſtreſſes and ſparks. Little girls, are told, that, if they do not mend their faults, they ſhall never have a huſband. They are promiſed the conqueſt of a galant, provided they do ſuch or ſuch a thing (2). An hundred promiſes and threats of this kind are continually offered them. The houſe-maids, landreſſes, ſeamſtreſſes, and chamber-maids, &c. go much farther: they whiſper to them the meaning of all this. A thouſand occaſions naturally offer themſelves. Marriages are made from time to time amongſt their neighbours and relations. There is a curioſity to go to church to hear the ceremony of the nuptial benediction, which frequently happens: and this affords an ample ſubject of converſation, both aloud, and with a low voice, for the myſterious inſtruction of the little female novices. This inſtruction is eſpecially given in the interval of the preliminaries to the wedding, or rather between the contract and the wedding-day. By this means the theory of matrimony comes to be well known before a woman be marriageable. But put the caſe, that a maid could be ſecured from ſecret converſations, in which the ſervants and other women love to ſatisfy, or even prevent the curioſity of nature: put the caſe, I ſay, that a maid ſhould be delivered to an huſband, as ignorant in the theory, as in the practice, could ſhe long remain ſo? Is there not another univerſally prevailing cuſtom? Are not the new brides asked a thouſand queſtions the next day? If their mothers, out of decency, forbear to queſtion them, do they not employ other women? Can the aunts, couſins, friends, &c. forbear to be inquiſitive? It cannot therefore be imagined, that our ducheſs of Urbino ſhould have been two years after her marriage in the ignorance, that this Minime imputes to her.

[B] Her huſband himſelf confeſſed his infirmity to her when he perceived that ſhe knew the nature of it.] We will go on in the words of the ſame Minime (3): ‘The duke her huſband, perceiving, that the ducheſs Iſabella had diſcovered his infirmity, was forced to declare to her his impotency in very modeſt terms, teſtifying by his diſcourſe the great affliction it was to him to ſee himſelf incapacitated to leave heirs to his dominions; and that, if this came to the knowledge of his ſubjects, he ſhould be leſs beloved. Upon this melancholy diſcourſe, the prudent and virtuous Iſabella, with a joyful and ſerene countenance, began to comfort him, exhorting him to bear this diſgrace with a perfect reſignation to the will of GOD: that many kings and great princes had been, and were at preſent, under that affliction; and that it is commonly better to have no children, than to have wicked and vicious ones; the old proverb being generally true, Filii Heroum noxæ, that is, Heroes beget nothing but monſters, ungrateful and unnatural children, fatal incendiaries, and the ruin of their families, eſtates, commonwealths, and fathers that begot them: that, for her part, ſhe would not be concerned for it, and that it would not in the leaſt abate her love and affection: that ſhe would preſerve her virginity to the grave, that, whilſt a defect of nature hindered him from enjoying what was deſigned him, no body elſe ſhould ever poſſeſs it, and that no body ſhould ever know any thing of the matter.’

[C] Nevertheleſs this ſecret came to be publickly known.] Hilarion de Coſte (4) having made an exclamation againſt thoſe, who ſay, that women cannot keep a ſecret, adds, ‘that the ducheſs of Urbino more faithfully kept her ſecret and promiſe to her huſband than he did, having lived fourteen years with him without ever diſcovering the defect of her marriage by any complaint: for the firſt years, ſhe concealed it through youth and ignorance, and afterwards out of honour and virtue, and the obligation of ſecrecy. Not only the people of the duchy of Urbino, and the inhabitants of the fine city of Peſaro, but even the moſt intimate and familiar domeſtics, and the principal lords of their court, were ignorant, that this defect and barrenneſs proceeded from the duke; on the contrary, they rather attributed it to the ducheſs. Nor had it ever been known, if the duke himſelf had not told it, when, being driven out of his dominions by Cæſar Borgia, duke of Valentinois, he came to wait on our king Lewis XII, who was then in his duchy of the Milaneze, and city of Milan, to whom he had recourſe to be reſtored to his dominions; but not obtaining his deſires, becauſe the king was in league with Pope Alexander VI, father of the duke of Valentinois, and feared the hatred of the houſe of Borgia againſt him and his family, he gave them hopes of parting with his wife, and becoming an eccleſiaſtic; affirming he had never conſummated the marriage, by reaſon of his impotency; and, being asked by the king, he certified the truth of it. Thus this ſecret, being revealed by the huſband, was divulged through all the territories of Urbino and Italy, where the meaneſt people knew, that Ubaldo de la Rovere (5), duke of Urbino, was only a man in face, or that if he was a man, he could not be ranked among huſbands; and all the world admired the conſtancy and modeſty of his prudent and chaſte princeſs Iſabella Gonzaga: her conſtancy, becauſe, tho' ſhe might have had her marriage declared null, yet ſhe would not, chuſing rather to be ſilent, than to pollute her lips: her modeſty, by that heroical act of it, having lived above twenty years, without being aſhamed of having ſuch a huſband.’

[D] She was ſtrongly ſollicited to think of another match. But nothing moved her.] Here the monk ſtrains his throat, and lifts up his voice like a trumpet (6). ‘What a wonderful chaſtity of a woman! what an incredible conſtancy! what a perfect and unparallelled virtue! thus to live twenty years with an huſband in the ſame houſe in the ſame palace! here is a true pattern of chaſtity, and a demonſtrative proof, that the ſpirit and virtue have more power than the fleſh and ſenſuality; and that conjugal faith and affection prevail over the inferior luſt, and the brutiſh part. How few others would have thus concealed the ſecret, I do not ſay for fourteen years, but for fourteen months, which ſhe kept, not twenty months, but twenty years, and even to the death of her huſband, without voiding the marriage; when, being intreated, importuned, and almoſt forced by all ſorts of powerful perſons, that were her relations, to ſeparate from her huſband, for a thouſand urgent conſiderations they laid before her, ſhe would never hearken to them; but, on the contrary, conſtantly maintained, that the fault lay not in him, taking it ill to have it ſaid otherwiſe; and ſhe was much concerned when the truth of the ſtory came to light. O moſt faithful and chaſte princeſs! let thy example dazzle the eyes of thoſe women, who, led by almoſt into deſpair, and her affliction had like to have proved truly mortal [E]. Note, that ſhe was married twenty years (c). The exclamations of a Minime, who has praiſed her, are pardonable conſidering the rarity of the thing; but he might have been a little more moderate without tranſgreſſing the rules of a good Rhetorician. Our Iſabella ſpent the reſt of her days in a glorious widowhood. She was aunt to Eleonora Gonzaga, whom ſhe married to a nephew of Julius II, that is, to Francis Maria de la Rovere, who ſucceeded her huſband in the duchy of Urbino. By that you will ſee at what time ſhe lived; and, if you read Il Cortegiano of Balthaſar Caſtiglione, you will ſee her very much praiſed; and you will ſee, that the court of Urbino was then very polite. I will mention what Peter Bembus ſaid of this ducheſs [F].

---

(1) Hilarion de Coſte, Elog. des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. I, pag. 697, 698.

(2) See the New Letters againſt Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm, pag. 663, 664.

(3) Id. ibid. pag. 698.

(4) Id. ibid. pag. 699.

(5) He was not of the houſe de la Rovere, but of that of Feltri, or Montefeltro.

(6) Id. ibid. pag. 700.

‘ by the ſpirit of ſenſuality, without grounds, or with ‘ the leaſt pretence and frivolous reaſon, break a marriage concerted by the conſent of relations, and celebrated in the face of the church, procuring I know ‘ not what diſpenſations under pretence of miſunderſtandings, which will only ſerve as a chain to drag ‘ them to damnation; whilſt you, a young, beautiful, ‘ and noble lady, who might have lawfully procured ‘ a divorce, have ſhewn your marriage to be rather ‘ a match of the mind than of the body.’ After this he obſerves four great ſubjects of admiration in her victory over herſelf (7). 1. Through abundance of courage and virtue, ſhe never ſeparated from her huſband, tho' ſhe might lawfully do it. 2. The affection ſhe had for her husband made her renounce the common and reaſonable deſire of all married people of leaving children behind them . . . . which ought to be the more admired in this great princeſs, becauſe ſhe ſaw the direct line of a ſovereign houſe end in her huſband. 3. She had the prudence to accompany him every where, that ſhe might not manifeſt this prince's imperfection. The fourth wonder is, that, conſidering the liberty of a perſon of quality, and the numbers of men ſhe converſed with, ſhe preſerved her virginity entire. The circumſtances of the fourth point are confirmed by Balthaſar Caſtiglione, who ſays, that the court of Urbino was full of gentlemen accompliſhed in body and mind, who ſpent all the day in exerciſes ſuitable to their condition, and, after ſupper, met at the ducheſs's chamber, whilſt the duke, who went early to his repoſe, by reaſon of his diſtempers, was in bed. Erano adunque tutte l'hore del giorno diviſe honorevoli & piacevoli eſſercitii, coſi del corpo, come dell' animo: ma perche il S. Duca continuamente per la infirmità, dopo cena aſſai per tempo ſe n' andava a dormire, ogn'uno per ordinario dove era la S. Ducheſſa Eliſabetta Gonzaga, a quell'hora ſi riduceva (8). I will relate what he obſerves of the duke's infirmity, which gives reaſon to believe, that Hilarion de Coſte has followed ſome writers who have too much exaggerated things. Obſerve well what I am going to ſay. The duke was very well made, vigorous, and nimble (9); but, at twenty years of age (10), he grew ſo prodigious gouty, that he could not move himſelf. He married, doubtleſs, before he was reduced to that condition; which makes it highly probable that he conſummated the marriage. Tis true, the ſame author informs us, that the ducheſs was ſollicited to ſeparate from her husband, ſince her marriage was a ſtate of widowhood; which is a ſign ſhe was taken for a maid; for an impotency, ſucceeding the accompliſhment of marriage, is no juſt cauſe of divorce. ‘ Non ‘ poſſo piu tacere una parola della Signora Ducheſſa ‘ noſtra, la quale eſſendo vivuta xv. anni in compagnia del marito, comme vedoa, non ſolamente è ‘ ſtata conſtante di non paleſar mai queſto a perſona ‘ del mondo, ma eſſendo da ſuoi proprii ſtimulata da ‘ uſcir di queſta viduità, eleſſie piu preſto patir eſſilio, ‘ poverta, & ogni altra ſorte d'infelicità, che accettar ‘ quello, che a tutti gli altri parea gran gratia, & ‘ proſperità di fortuna: & ſequitando pur Meſſer ‘ Ceſare circa queſto, diſſe la Signora Ducheſſa, Parlate d'altro, & non intrate piu in tal propoſito, che ‘ aſſai d'altre coſe havete che dire (11.) —— I cannot omit ‘ a ſaying of our ducheſs, who, having lived fifteen ‘ years in the company of her husband, as a widow, ‘ not only perſiſted in not declaring this to any perſon in the world, but, being ſollicited by her relations ‘ to take advantage of this widowhood, choſe rather ‘ to ſuffer exile, poverty, and every other misfortune, ‘ than to embrace this, which to every one elſe appeared great good luck: and, being ſollicited upon this ‘ head by Mr Ceſar, ſhe bid him ſay no more of it, ‘ but talk of ſomething elſe.’ You ſee in theſe words an admirable inſtance of that lady's modeſty; ſhe would not be praiſed; ſhe turned off the converſation, whenever any body went about to ſhew the merit of her continence.

Note, that Chriſtoforo Bronzini, who made this lady's encomium, ſays the ſame things, and with the ſame exclamations as this Minime. See the Giornata quinta of his dialogues della dignita e nobilta delle Donne (12).

[E] Her affliction had like to have proved truly mortal.] Father Hilarion de Coſte finds himſelf at a loſs how to give proofs of the love and prudence ſhe expreſſed in mourning for her husband; for . . . . . as long as he was alive ſhe never gave way to her tears . . . leaſt her affliction expreſſed by them ſhould cauſe another in him; but, as ſoon as ever he was dead, ſhe indulged her grief, which made her fall upon him, crying out, O my dear husband, why will you leave me thus, and whither do you go? Having ſpoken thoſe words, ſhe fainted away, and loſt her ſpeech, and remained as it were half dead: ſome believed her truly dead, having much ado to recover her ſpirits; ſo that they lamented at once the death of both. But GOD was pleaſed, that ſhe ſhould come to herſelf again, by degrees, opening her eyes and lifting them up towards heaven: afterwards ſhe caſt them upon thoſe about her, and by way of complaint and reproach told them; how troubleſome you are to me? why do you uſe me ſo cruelly, as to hinder me from following my moſt honoured lord and husband? why will you not ſuffer me to be his companion in death; with whom I have ſpent the beſt of my life? what a wretched creature am I; he muſt go, and I muſt ſtay behind! No, no, I can never be perſuaded to it, I muſt follow him. As ſoon as ſhe had uttered theſe complaints, her eyes, like two fountains, guſhed out with tears, and no other anſwer could be got from her for two days together, refuſing to ſleep or eat, but that ſhe could not ſurvive her husband (13).

[F] I will mention what Peter Bembus ſaid of this ducheſs.] The author of the tract, entituled, De Matrimonio Literati, an cœlibem eſſe an verò nubere conveniat (14), alledges the great merit of ſome women, and does not forget this. ‘ Quid de Elizabetha ‘ Gonzaga? ſays he, quam Bembus ita laudat ut lapideum eum eſſe dicat qui non unam ejus ſeſſiunculam omnibus Philoſophorum ambulationibus & ‘ diſputationibus anteponat. —— What ſhall we ſay of ‘ Elizabetha Gonzaga? whom Bembus ſo far commends ‘ as to ſay, he muſt be as ſtupid as a ſtone, who does ‘ not prefer one ſitting of her to all the walkings and ‘ diſputations of the philoſophers.

(c) Taken from Hilarion de Coſte, Eloges des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. I, pag. 697, & ſeq.

(7) Eloges des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. I, pag. 701.

(8) The count Balthaſar Caſtiglione, in his Cortegiano, B. i, pag. m. 10.

(9) Non eſſendo ancora il Duca Guido giunto alli xx anni, s'infermo di podagre, lequali con atrociſſimi dolori procedendo, in poco ſpatio di tempo talmente tutti i membri gli impedirono che ne ſtare in piedi ne mover ſi potea: & coſi reſtò un de i piu belli, & diſpoſti corpi del mondo deformato & guaſto nella ſua verde età. Balt. Caſtiglione, il Cortegiano, B. i, pag. 8.

(10) Odaxius, in this prince's Funeral Oration, ſays, that it was at twenty one years of age.

(11) Id. Balth. Caſtig. Ib. lib. iii, pag. 46

(12) That book was printed at Florence in 1625, in 4to.

(13) Hilarion de Coſte, ubi ſupra, pag. 703, 704.

(14) It has been printed ſeveral times: It is in a collection of ſuch like pieces, printed at Urſellis in the year 1606. It is alſo to be found in the book, intituled, Baudii Amores.

GONZAGA (Julia), ducheſs of Traietta, and counteſs of Fondi, was the wife of Veſpaſian Colonna. After the death of her huſband, ſhe took for her device, ‘ an ‘ amaranth, which the Botaniſts call Love-flower, with this motto, non moritura, deſigning to expreſs, that her firſt love ſhould be immortal. The wonder is, that her ‘ huſband was old; that ſhe was in the flower of her age, and in ſo great a reputation ‘ for her beauty, that Soliman, emperor of the Turks, had a deſire to ſee her. To this ‘ end, he ſent Barbaroſſa, king of Algiers (a), and his lieutenant-general, with a powerful army, to Fondi, where ſhe made her uſual reſidence: but he ſucceeded not in his deſign;

(a) This excuſes me from ſaying, that ſhe lived in the XVIth century.

‘ deſign ; for, tho’ this general arrived by night, and took the town by ſtorm, the fair ‘ and chaſte Julia fell not into the hands of the Barbarian. Whether ſhe had notice ‘ given her of the danger that threatened her, or whether ſhe was divinely inſpired, ſhe ‘ fled barefooted upon the firſt noiſe ſhe heard ; and, to ſave her honour, expoſed her ‘ life to a thouſand dangers (b).’ This lady was ſuſpected of Lutheraniſm (c). Thuanus, Francis Billon, and other authors, praiſe her for her learning, which made her eſteemed by the moſt learned men in Italy (d). The reaſon why ſhe did not marry again is conſiderable [A]. One may very well queſtion, whether ſhe acted the part of a ſtep-mother without retaining ſome faults of it [B]. We ſhall ſee how Brantome has related Barbaroſſa’s adventure [C].

(b) Taken from the Entretiens d’Ariſte & d’Eugene, pag. m. 458, 459. See alſo Hilarion de Coſte, Tom. II, of his Dames Illuſtres, pag. 96, 97.

(c) Convictuſque quod cum ſectariis in Germania, & in Italia cum Victoria Columna Marchionis Piſcarii vidua, & Julia Gonzaga, lectiſſimis alioqui feminis, de pravitate ſectaria ſuſpectis, amicitiam coluiſſet. Thuanus, lib. xxxix, circa init.

(d) Hilarion de Coſte, Vies des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. II, pag. 97.

[A] The reaſon why ſhe did not marry again is conſiderable.] ‘ After her huſband’s death, ſhe was ‘ courted by the greateſt lords of Italy, who could ‘ not induce her to a ſecond marriage ; becauſe ſhe ‘ ſaid, that, if her ſecond huſband ſhould prove good, ‘ ſhe ſhould be in perpetual fear of loſing him ; and ‘ if he ſhould prove bad, it would be a grievous ‘ thing to bear ; and that, having had a good one, ‘ ſhe would never remove from her heart the af‘ fection ſhe bore him (1).’ She was very fortunate in not having her eyes tempted by a charming object ; for in that caſe her dilemma would have been quickly deſtroyed. In vain did Dido ſay :

(1) Hilarion de Coſte, Vies des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. II, pag. 97.

Sed mihi vel tellus optem priùs ima dehiſcat,
Vel pater omnipotens adigat me fulmine ad umbras,
Pallentes umbras Erebi, noctemque profundam ;
Ante, pudor, quàm te violo, aut tua jura reſolvo.
Ille meos, primus qui me ſibi junxit, amores
Abſtulit ; ille habeat ſecum, ſervetque ſepulchro (2).

Let earth, diſparting, ſnatch me from the light,
Or thunder drive me to the ſhades of night ;
Immediate death be wretched Dido’s fate,
E’re, modeſty, thy laws I violate.
My love, which one dear object only knew,
Is ſtill to my Sichæus’ memory true.

(2) Virgil. Æn. lib. iv, ver. 24.

The noble carriage (3) and the merit of Æneas had already made an impreſſion and renewed the traces (4). She could not withſtand a ſecond match, and forgot her fine reſolutions. Generally ſpeaking, Julia Gonzaga’s dilemma may be turned another way ; for it may be ſaid, if my ſecond huſband be an ill one, I ſhall not be afraid of loſing him ; if he be good, he will make me very happy ; beſides, they, who have loſt a good huſband, may alledge this argument ; I have ſped ſo well in marriage, that I am willing to re-enter into the ſtate I have ſo much reaſon to commend. They, who have loſt a bad huſband, may ſay ; there is reaſon I ſhould try whether I ſhall be more happy in a ſecond choice than in the firſt : I ought not to die without endeavouring to mend my ſelf.

(3) Quam ſeſe ore ferens ! quam forti pectore & armis !
What dignity of ſoul his aſpect bears !
How all the hero in his mien appears !
Ibid. ver. 11.

(4) Agnoſco veteris veſtigia flammæ.
’Tis love ; the tyrant paſſion ſtands confeſs’d,
It’s well-known fires rekindling in my breaſt.
Ibid. ver. 23.

[B] There is room to doubt, whether ſhe acted the part of a ſtep-mother, without retaining ſome of the faults of it.] It is a very difficult part ; the wiſeſt heads find it a hard taſk to come off well ; there is a certain fate, that poſſeſſes mothers-in-law with a great deal of ill humour. Be that how it will, the monk I have cited informs us (5), that Veſpaſian Colonna had by his firſt wife (6) a daughter named Iſabella, whom our Julia, her mother-in-law, deſigning to marry to Lewis Gonzaga her brother, oppoſed Pope Clement VII (who had a mind to marry her to Dom. Hippolito his nephew, who was afterwards cardinal) and the emperor Charles V, who had ſeized on her, to marry her to Dom-Ferdinand Gonzaga ; and by her courage and induſtry, ſhe accompliſhed her deſign. × But did ſhe conſult the inclinations of the young lady ? that is the queſtion. Perhaps Iſabella Colonna would have rather choſen the match propoſed by Clement VII, or by the emperor, than her ſtep-mother’s. Is not this to act like a ſtep-mother, to force the inclination in ſuch a point as this ?

× this may be answer’d as well in ye affirmative as not [illegible] but it do not resolve.

(5) Hilarion de Coſte, ibid. pag. 96.

(6) Beatrix, daughter of the lord of Piombino. Sanſovino, delle Caſe d’Italia, fol. 93.

[C] We ſhall ſee how Brantome has related Barbaroſſa’s adventure.] ‘ There is ſuch another ſtory, ‘ which was told me in the town of Fondi, near ‘ Naples, and which is in every body’s mouth in ‘ that country, about Signora Livia (7) Gonzaga who ‘ had married Aſcanio (8) Colonna : ſhe was reckoned ‘ the fineſt woman in Italy of her time, and was in ‘ ſuch repute, that the fame of her beauty reached ‘ the Levant, (I have often ſeen her picture as a ‘ widow, which confirms it), and Conſtantinople ; for ‘ which reaſon Ariadan Barbaroſſa, who was gene‘ ral of the Grand Signor’s ſea-forces, having firſt, ‘ with a very ſolemn pomp, (as it is written) paſſed ‘ the ſtreights of Meſſina, and coaſted along Calabria, ‘ committed great ravages there, and about Naples, ‘ and made an attempt upon the town of Fondi, ‘ and came there by night ſo opportunely and unex‘ pectedly, that, landing two thouſand Turks, they ‘ ſcaled the walls, and took the town, and ſeized ‘ upon the caſtle, where the lady Livia Gonzaga ‘ was aſleep in bed ; who, hearing the alarm, was ‘ ſo ſurprized, as to ſtart up in the fright, and had ‘ only time to leap out of the window in her ſhift ; ‘ which ſhe did ſo ſeaſonably, eſcaping through the ‘ mountains, that the Turks entered her chamber juſt ‘ as ſhe was eſcaped out of it. They ſay, that Bar‘ baroſſa deſigned her for a preſent to the Grand ‘ Signor, and that the enterprize was made on that ‘ account ; and that, when he found he had miſſed ‘ of her, he was like to run mad : but the lady’s ‘ ill fortune would have it, that, ſhunning Scylla, ſhe ‘ fell into Charybdis, falling in her flight amongſt the ‘ banditti of the kingdom ; and ſhe was known by ‘ ſome and not by others. I therefore leave you ‘ to judge, whether ſuch a dainty bit, when in the ‘ power of thoſe famiſhed wretches, was not actually ‘ taſted by them : ſome believe it, and ſome not. ‘ But whatever oaths ſhe made, ſhe could not be be‘ lieved, ſince ſo noble a morſel could never eſcape ‘ ſuch people without being polluted. The moſt clear‘ ſighted, and who underſtand theſe matters, and have ‘ had a taſte of them, can but too well ſpeak of ‘ them : thus you ſee how eaſily men and women ‘ damn themſelves by their oaths ; for even the fineſt ‘ queens and princeſſes, if they ſhould fall into ſuch ‘ hazards, would be no more ſpared than others, ſince ‘ a great beauty carries no paſſport along with it, and ‘ love in that caſe uſes it’s authority without reſpect ‘ of perſons ; and yet they will proteſt and ſwear, ‘ that their greatneſs daſhed the inſolence of thoſe ‘ who would attempt them, and GOD knows (9).’

(7) It ſhould be Julia.

(8) I call him Veſpaſian in the text of this article : it was his true name.

Varillas (10) has taken from this book of Brantome all that he has ſaid of the adventures of Julia Gonzaga.

He is miſtaken as to the time : he places this in the year 1537, whereas he ſhould have followed Paulus Jovius (11) who ſpeaks of it under the year 1534.

(9) Brantome, Vies des Dames Illuſtres, pag. 282.

(10) Varill. Hiſt. de François I, lib. viii, pag. m. 347, ad ann. 1537.

(11) Paul. Jovius, Hiſt. lib. xxxiii, fol. m. 255.

GONZAGA (LUCRETIA) is one of the moſt illuſtrious women of the XVIth century. She heightened the nobility of her extraction by the brightneſs of her parts, and by her learning [A] and the delicacy of her pen. The wits of that time failed not to

[A] She heightened the nobility of her birth by her learning.] There is no learning in her letters ; but yet we may perceive by them that ſhe was a learned woman : for, writing to Robertel, ſhe declared that his commentary had made her underſtand many obſcure paſſages of Ariſtotle, and the poet Æſchylus. Egli è gran tempo, che vi ſono affettionata per i beneficii che mi ſento haver ricevuto dai voſtri divini componimenti, i quali m’hanno illuminato l’intelletto in molti oſcuri luoghi, & di Ariſtotile, & di Eſchilo dove il voſtro nobil ingegno s’è molto affaticato (1). She laughed at doctor Lewis Picco, her couſin, becauſe to praiſe her [B]. She wrote ſuch fine letters, that they were eagerly collected for the preſs. I have ſeen the collection of them, which was publiſhed at Venice in 1552. They inform us, that her marriage with John Paul Manfrone was very unfortunate. He was a man who did not deſerve her by his wealth; ſhe married him againſt her will, being but fourteen years of age (a). She eaſily comforted herſelf for not living with him in all the figure her quality required. We cannot ſee a finer piece of morality, than what is to be found in a letter ſhe writ to a monk (b), who lamented her being married to ſuch a mean country 'ſquire [C]; but ſhe was very much concerned and diſconſolate cauſe he taught his daughter aſtrology; but underſtanding the great ſervice, that Sulpitius Gallus had done to the Romans, and Pericles to the Greeks, by their skill in aſtrology, ſhe had a mind to learn it, and intreated Lewis Picco to inſtruct her in that ſcience (2). One of the things ſhe ſtudied moſt was rhetoric (3). It appears alſo, that ſhe learned a great deal of logic from Bandel her maſter (4), and that he read Euripides to her (5).

(1) Lettere della Signora Lucretia Gonzaga da Gazuolo pag. 78.

[B] The wits of that time failed not to praiſe her.] Hortenſio Lando was her moſt zealous and beſt panegyriſt. He made a very fine encomium on this lady. See the letter (6), in which ſhe modeſtly thanked him and repreſented to him (7), that it had been better for him to keep his ingenious thoughts, and his fine expreſſions, for a panegyric upon the Signora Marcheſana (8). I ſay this to make known the name of another very famous lady of that age. The ſame author dedicated to our Lucretia his dialogue, Del temperar gli affetti d'ell' animo (9). There was a great correſpondence by way of letters betwixt her and him: ſhe wrote to him above thirty that have been printed. To ſay ſomething of that in the 215th page, we find there Hortenſio Lando a little cenſured for his violent diſcontent at his poverty. She blames him for being afflicted at a thing, the advantages whereof ſhe reckons up to him. 'Eſſendo voi perſona 'dotta; & tanto bene eſperta nei mondani caſi; 'mi maraviglio che di ſi ſtrana maniera vi attriſtiate 'per la poverta; quaſi non ſappiate la vita dei po'veri eſſer ſimile ad una navigatione preſſo il lito: & 'quella de ricchi, non eſſer differente da coloro che 'ſi ritrovano in alto mare: à gli uni è facile gittar 'la fune in terra, & condur la nave à ſicuro luogo; & 'à gli altri è ſommamente difficile, &c (10). —— When 'I conſider your learning, and experience in worldly af'fairs, I am ſurprized to ſee you ſo dejected with 'poverty, as tho' you knew not, that the life of the 'poor was like ſailing near the ſhore, and that of 'the rich like tempting the deep: the one eaſily gets 'ſafe to land, the other with great difficulty &c.' Jerome Ruſcelli was one of this lady's panegyriſts. This appears by a letter ſhe wrote to him, which begins thus: 'Inſieme col panegirico fatto da non ſo 'cui; in mia commendatione, hò ancho letto la bella '& proliſſa lettera che per voi vi ſi è aggiunta; 'nella quale, m'havete ritratta col penello della voſtra 'facondia, tale, quale io doveri eſſere per haver quel'la perfettione che non hò (11). —— Together with 'a panegyric by an unknown hand: I have this day 'read the fine, long, letter you have added to it, in 'my praiſe; in which your eloquent pen has drawn 'me ſuch, as I ought to be, to be miſtreſs of this 'perfection, which I have not.' Read alſo the other letter ſhe wrote to him (12). A memoir which I have from good hands, informs me, 'that Bandel de'dicated to her one of his novels, viz. the twenty 'firſt of the ſecond part. He tells her towards the 'end; Spero ben toſto darvi del mio il libro de le 'mie Stanze tutto compoſto in voſtra lode, ove ve'derete come io mi sforzo à farvi immortale; —— 'I hope very ſoon to preſent you with my book of 'ſtanzas, wholly compoſed entirely to your praiſe, 'in which you will ſee the pains I take to render 'you immortal. And it is upon thoſe ſtanzas that 'Julius Cæſar Scaliger, a great friend to Bandel, made 'a ſorry epigram, intituled, de Bandelli amoribus Thuſ'ca lingua decantatis (31).' Perhaps the reader will not be diſpleaſed to find it here.

Maxime Phœbigenum, cui Thuſco æqualis Homero
  Lydia Mæonio nectare vena fluit:
Unde tibi ætherios immenſi numinis hauſtus
  Largus opum pleno pectore ſpirat amor?
Tantus eras vates, tanta eſt Lucretia. An ipſum
  Hoc illi dederas: an dedit illa tibi?
Dum cœlo imponis, tranſcendes ſidera. Sic te
  Dat Dea, tam rari carminis eſſe Deum (14).

Greateſt of Phæbus's ſons, whoſe numbers flow
With Nectar, ſuch as Homer's only know,
Say, how is thy exalted fancy fir'd,
By love's ſoft influence alone inſpir'd?
So bright a nymph we in thy numbers ſee,
Mad'ſt thou her fair, or ſhe a poet thee?
Thy verſe, that bids to heav'n thy miſtreſs riſe,
Lifts thy own fame above the ſtarry skies;
And fair Lucretia, deiſy'd by thee,
Repays her poet with divinity.

See, in the nymphs of the ſame author, the piece intituled, Pro Diva Lucretia Gonzaga Pyrrhi filia canit Talariſca (15), and, in the Heroids the epigram intituled, Lucretia Pyrrhi Gonzagæ F (16). But eſpecialſee the Rime di diverſi autori in lode di donna Lucretia Gonzaga, printed at Bologna in the year 1565, in 4to. Here is another paſſage of Matthew Bandel (17), from which we may learn the name of Lucretia's mother, and ſome other particulars. Thus he ſpeaks: 'A la molto illuſt. e vertuoſa Heroina la S. Iſabella 'Gonzaga di Poccino, dedicating to her the 57th novel 'of the firſt part. Eſſendo troppo al mondo mani'feſto il debito e obligo che io ho a la felice e ho'norata memoria del valoroſo S. Pirro Gonzaga, e 'de la gentiliſſima S. Camilla Bentivoglia, voſtri ho'noratiſſimi padre e madre che tanto m'amavano, e 'tutto il di con nuovi beneficii m'obligavano, e men'tre viſſero, furono da me (ſecondo le deboliſſime for'ze mie) ſempre tenuti in quella riverenza che io 'ſeppi la maggiore, come ne le Stanze mie ſi vederà 'che io in lode ho compoſte de la voſtra nobiliſſima 'Sorella dal mondo riverita e da me ſantiſſimamente 'amata, la Signora Lucretia, le quali in breve ſaranno 'publicate, ove ancora vederete il nome voſtro eſſere 'celebrato. —— To the illuſtrious and virtuous he'roine, Iſabella Gonzaga di Poccizno .... It 'being too manifeſt to the world how much I am 'indebted to the happy and honourable memory of the 'brave Peter Gonzaga, and the moſt noble lady Camilla 'Bentivoglia, your very honoured father and mother, 'who ſhewed me ſuch repeated marks of their favour, 'and whom I ſhall always hold in the utmoſt reve'verence, as my ſtanzas teſtify, which I compoſed in 'honour of the moſt noble Lucretia, your ſiſter revered 'by the world, and whom I moſt affectionately loved; 'which ſtanzas I will ſoon publiſh, once more to cele'brate your name.'

[C] A monk .... who lamented her being married to ſuch a mean country 'ſquire.] Thus I think I may tranſlate theſe Italian words: 'Ho inteſo che la rive'renza voſtra molto ſi è maravigliata che i miei mag'giori mi maritaſſero mai in huomo di ſi poche fa'cultà, il quale m'haveſſe à condurre in una poco 'amena villuccia, & farmi habitare in una torre poco 'degna degli Avoli onde ne ſono ſecondo la carne 'diſceſa; & per quanto appare dalle voſtre ſcritte à 'mia ſorella, aſſai ve ne doleſte (18). —— I am in'formed that your reverence is ſurprized at my mar'riage with a man ſo much beneath me, who may 'conduct me to a place unworthy my birth and ance'ſtors; and by what appears in your letter to my ſiſter 'you cannot ſufficiently lament it.' But, leſt the reader ſhould have wrong notions of John Paul Manfrone, I muſt obſerve, that he was a much more conſiderable man than this monk thought. A letter of his wife's informs us, that he had had good poſts in the Venetian army, and that he had built magnificent palaces. The following paſſage contains ſome other circumſtances of his life. 'Ve ne ſupplica tutto il 'territorio Vicentino, donde egli ne trahe l'origine: 've ne priega la Città di Padoua, dove egli fanci'ullo

---

(a) See her letters, pag. 151, 214.

(b) It written to Father Bandel; and it is to be found in the 61ſt page.

(2) The letter ſhe writ to him is in the 50th page.

(3) Ibid. pag. 53.

(4) Ibid. pag. 52.

(5) Ibid. pag. 61.

(6) It is in the 30th page. See alſo page 161.

(7) Molto meglio havreſte voi fatto trapportando nel Panegirico della Sig. Marcheſana tutti i bei concetti, & tutte le ſcelte parole che deſtinaſte al Panegirico compoſto per illuſtrare il mio nome oſcuro. Ibid. pag. 30.

(8) It was the marchioneſs de Padula, of the houſe of Cardonna. Ib. pag. 31.

(9) Ib. pag. 140.

(10) Ibid. pag. 215.

(11) Ib. pag. 76.

(12) Ibid. pag. 131.

(13) A memoir imparted to me by Mr de la Monnoie.

(14) Jul. Cæſar. Scaliger in Farragine, pag 174, primæ partis Poëmatum, Edit. 1591.

(15) It is in the 278th page of the firſt part.

(16) It is in the 377th page of the ſame part.

(17) It was imparted to me by Mr de la Monnoie.

(18) Letters of Lucretia Gonzaga, pag. 61.

conſolate for the conduct of her huſband. He was very brave and haughty (c), and did ſome actions that went not unpuniſhed. The duke of Ferrara had him carried away, and detained him many years in a ſevere priſon (d). By the proceſs he formed againſt him, he found him worthy of a capital puniſhment; but he was merciful, and would not put him to death (e). Our Lucretia laboured as much as poſſible to procure his liberty. She endeavoured to ſoften the duke of Ferrara by a very moving letter (f). She implored the interceſſion of Paul III (g), of Julius III (h), of the ſacred college, of the emperor, of the king of France, and of all the other potentates of Chriſtendom. She had recourſe to the aſſiſtance of the court of heaven by her prayers, and thoſe ſhe cauſed to be put up in all the convents and churches; and, when ſhe ſaw that nothing would do, ſhe formed a reſolution of addreſſing the great Turk (i), and writ to him a flattering and reſpectful letter (k), beſeeching him to ſeize the fortreſs, in which her huſband was confined, and to do no other prejudice to the Chriſtian ſtates. She moſt humbly thanked the duke of Ferrara (l) for ſparing the life of a priſoner whom the judges found worthy of death [D]. But ſhe was deſirous to have his clemency carried farther. Her huſband was not ſet at liberty; nor was ſhe permitted to viſit him: they could only write to one another (m); which did not ſatisfy her: and therefore ſhe uſed her utmoſt endeavours to obtain his enlargement; but all her pains proved ineffectual. He died in priſon (n), having expreſſed in his diſgrace ſo great an impatience, that people thought he was beſide himſelf (o). The anſwer his widow made to thoſe, who propoſed another match to her, deſerves our admiration [E]. Of four children ſhe had (p), there remained only two daughters (q), whom ſhe put into convents (r). All the productions

‘ ullo eſſendo diligentemente ſtudiò: ve ne priega il Poleſino, dove molti anni pratticò, & palazzi, & giardini con grande arte edificò: ve ne priega tutto il diſtretto Mantouano, dove ſpoſandomi ben fanciulla, ſi imparentò: ve ne priega finalmente tutto il Senato Vinitiano, il qual hà ſin dalle faſcie per condottiere & fedelmente, & honoratamente ſempre ſervito (19). —— The whole territory of Vicenza, whence he drew his birth, petitions your holineſs in his behalf; as does the city of Padua, in which, when a youth, he diligently ſtudied: the Poleſin, in which he practiſed many years, and built palaces and gardens with great art, joins in the the petition; ſo does the diſtrich of Mantua, in which being very young, I was contracted in marriage to him: laſtly, the whole ſenate of Venice, in whoſe armies he ſerved faithfully and honourably, becomes a petitioner to your holineſs in his favour.’ Theſe are the reaſons his wife made uſe of to engage Paul III to intercede for him.

[D] She thanked the duke of Ferrara for ſparing the life of a priſoner, whom the judges had found worthy of death.] To underſtand perfectly the circumſtances of this trial, we muſt ſee the hiſtory that Antony Braſavolus (20) has publiſhed of it. We find, in the epitome of Geſner's Bibliotheque, that the three firſt books of a volume of phyſic, written by Braſavolus, contained ‘ Hiſtoriam capti & ſupplicio afficiendi Pauli Manfroni propter inſidias adverſus ducem & quomodo dux ei vitam donaverit, ſed in carcere retinuerit (21). —— The hiſtory of Paul Manfrone, taken, and to be puniſhed, for plotting againſt the duke, and how the duke gave him his life, but kept him in priſon.’

[E] The anſwer of his widow to thoſe, who propoſed another match to her, deſerves our admiration.] I confeſs they did not obſerve decorum; they made too much haſte; for they propoſed the thing within leſs than a month after the burial of her huſband. Widows, never ſo wanton and fond of marriage, would expreſs ſome reſentment againſt thoſe, who ſhould talk to them ſo ſuddenly of a ſecond huſband. Decency, cuſtom, the formulary of the ſtyle of converſations, require an appearance of affliction for ſome time, and a ſeeming averſeneſs to a ſecond marriage; and, as thoſe, who ſhould think to ingratiate themſelves by two early advices of matrimony, would have but an ill opinion of a widow's continence, it is requiſite, that they ſhould be anſwered with airs of indignation. I confeſs therefore, that thoſe, who ſo haſtily adviſed our Lucretia Gonzaga to a ſecond huſband, did not well obſerve the ceremonial. But I find, in her anſwer, I know not what that does her a great honour, and which does not reſemble the artificial language of la Fontaine's young widow (22). ‘ Appena hò raſciutto le lagrime che giorno è notte mi ſono con larghiſſima vena piovute da gli occhi: à fatica hò poſto termine ai ſinghiozzi & ai ſoſpiri: ne anche è compiuto il meſe che l'infelice mio conſorte è ſtato ſepolto, & voi già mi parlate di rimaritare? non ſapete voi caſta non eſſer mai ſtata iſtimata, chi due fiate ſi è maritata? Didone anchora preſſo di Virgilio, chiama ſotte nome di colpa le ſeconde nozze, & voi con tanta inſtanza mi ci invitate? nò nò, io non voglio piu ſentire de ſi fatti cordagli; ne altro marito intendo piu di volere che Giesu Christo (23). —— Scarce have I dried up the tears, which have, day and night, trickled plentifully from my eyes; with difficulty have I put an end to my ſighs and groans; nor is it yet a full month, ſince my unhappy huſband was buried; and do you already talk to me of marrying again? Know you not, that ſecond marriages are deemed unchaſte? Dido, in Virgil, calls ſuch matches by the name of A Crime; and do you ſo earneſtly invite me to it? No, no, I will think no more of ſuch troubleſome matters, nor will I have any other huſband than JESUS CHRIST.’ The remaining part of the letter turns upon the deſign of devoting herſelf for the future only to Jesus Christ as her huſband. Our Lucretia goes too far in affirming, that a womam was never reckoned chaſte that married again: but it is certain, that thoſe, who would never marry again, and who lived in an unblameable widowhood, have always been more admired. We have ſeen our widow's anſwer to Orſola Pellegrini, who adviſed her to think of a ſecond match, and that within the firſt month of her mourning. Let us ſee now how ſhe anſwered Andriana Trivulcio, who did much better obſerve decorum; for he gave her not his advice till towards the end of the firſt year of her widowhood. Lucretia declared to him, that ſhe wondered, when ſhe had been ſo unhappy with her huſband, that any one ſhould propoſe to her to come again under the conjugal yoke, from which God had delivered her. Know, ſaid ſhe, that I would not do it, though I could meet with a huſband wiſer than Lælius, handſomer than Nireus, and as rich as Craſſus. It is better to hear her in her own language (24). ‘ Non mi poſſo veramente penſare che fantaſia vi ſia venuta in capo, di procacciarmi marito, non eſſendo anchora conſunto il cadavero di chi già prima à ſe di legittimo nodo mi legò, ilquale, mi hà fatto ſentire tanti affanni, che ſe divina forza non mi haveſſe aiutata, non haurei potuto mai reſiſtere à tanti guai. Iddio finalmente mi hà reſtituito quella libertà, che m'era ſtata occupata dalla fraterna voluntà, dandomi marito contra mia voglia: & voi, non ſo da qual ſpirito guidata, cercate di condurmi un'altra fiata ſotto'l marital giogo: ponete pur il voſtro core in pace, & penſate ad altro: che non ritoglierei marito s'egli fuſſe piu ſavio di quel Lelio, che hebbe el titolo del ſavio, s'egli fuſſe piu bello di Nireo, & s'egli poſſedeſſe le facultà di Craſſo. —— I cannot imagine how it came into your head to propoſe another huſband to me, before the dead body of him, to whom I was firſt lawfully joined, be conſumed; in whoſe lifetime, I underwent ſo much anxiety, that had I not been ſupported by heaven, I could never have born up againſt ſo great misfortunes: GOD, at laſt, has re-

‘ ſtored

(c) Ibid. pag. 57, 105.

(d) See the 59th page.

(e) Ib pag. 158.

(f) It is in the 16th page.

(g) Pag. 99.

(h) Pag. 101.

(i) See her letters, page 104.

(k) It is in the 257th page.

(l) Ibid. pag. 158, 159.

(m) Ib. pag. 156.

(n) Ibid. pag. 221, & ſeq.

(o) Ib. pag. 208.

(p) Ibid. pag. 100, & 151.

(q) Ib. pag. 151.

(r) Ib pag. 141.

(19) Ibid. pag. 100, 101.

(20) An eminent phyſician of Ferrara.

(21) Epitome Bibl. Geſneri, pag. 65.

(22) It is the title, which Mr de la Fontaine gave to the 21ſt fable of the ſixth book, pag. 227, of the ſecond Tome. Edit. of Paris, 1678.

(23) Lucretia Gonzaga, ubi ſupra, pag. 213.

(24) Ibid. pag. 214.

productions of her pen were ſo much eſteemed, that the very notes ſhe writ to her domeſtics ‘ ſtored me to liberty; yet you, guided by I know not ‘ what ſpirit, would once more put me under the marriage yoke: ſet your heart at reſt, and think of ſomething elſe; for I will never take another husband, be ‘ be wiſer than Lelius, who was ſirnamed the wiſe, be ‘ be handſomer than Nireus, or richer than Craſſus.’ Thus you ſee a widow very different from that of la Fontaine. She talks at the end of the year as if it were the firſt day; and therefore theſe four verſes cannot be applied to her:

Entre la veuve d'une année
Et la veuve d'une journée
La difference eſt grande. On ne croiroit jamais Que ce fuſt la même perſonne (25).

The difference is full great, I ween,
Betwixt a widow of a day,
And her, whoſe widow-hood has ſeen
Twelve moons of mourning waſte away.

Collections relating to ſecond marriages.

I think myſelf obliged a little to ſoften the criticiſm I have made on this lady's thoughts, when I have ſaid that there was an exceſs in her expreſſions. This exceſs may be excuſed by ſuppoſing, that our Lucretia had a little too reſpectfully eſpouſed the maxims of St Jerome. The wiſeſt critics obſerve, that this great ſaint has carried this matter too far. Here is a paſſage of Mr Daillé (26). I omit what at every turn he ſpeaks reproachfully, both againſt marriage in general, and againſt ſecond marriages in particular, uſing ſometimes ſuch harſh expreſſions, that, though he uſed all the cautions to explain them, that are to be found in his epiſtle to Pammachius upon this ſubject, yet it ſeems impoſſible to free them from the ſenſe of Tertullian, condemned by the church as contrary to the honour of marriage, and the authority of ſcripture. For example, how is it poſſible to mollify what he writ to a lady named Furia *, That ſhe will not be ſo commendable for remaining a widow, as ſhe will be execrable by marrying again, not obſerving, though a Chriſtian, what many women of her family had obſerved, being heathens: a thing which he repeats in the following epiſtle, exhorting Ageruchia to the ſame deſign †; and he brings ſome ſcandalous compariſons, applying to thoſe, that marry again, the proverb St Peter uſes to another purpoſe, a dog returning to his vomit, and a ſwine to her wallowing in the mire. Is not this clearly to reckon ſecond marriages amongſt filthy and polluted things? If you deſire to know farther what relates to the modeſty, which St Jerome aſcribes to the female anceſtors of Furia, read the article CAMILLA (27). I add, that the virtuous Lucretia Gonzaga was dazzled with the glory that ſurrounded, even among the heathens, the women that did not marry again. And ſo ſhe concluded, that thoſe women were not reputed chaſte, that took a ſecond husband. She had, doubtleſs, read the words I ſhall preſently quote out of a heathen writer; from which we learn, that a crown of chaſtity was decreed to the women, who had been married but once, and that repeated marriages were looked upon as a ſort of corruption. ‘ Quæ uno contentæ matrimonio fuerant, coronâ pudicitiæ honorabantur. Exiſtimabant enim eum præcipuè matronæ ſincera fide incorruptum eſſe animum, qui poſt depoſitæ virginitatis cubile in publicum egredi neſciret: multorum matrimoniorum experientiam, quaſi illegitimæ (28) cujuſdam intemperantiæ ſignum eſſe credentes (29). I believe alſo ſhe had read, in Tertullian, what privileges the heathens granted to women who had married but once. ‘ Monogamia apud Ethnicos in ſummo honore eſt: ut & virginibus nubentibus univira pronuba adhibeatur, & ſic auſpicii initium eſt. Item in quibuſdam ſollemnibus & auſpiciis, ut prior ſit univiræ locus. Certe Flaminia non niſi univira eſt. —— ‘ Monogamy is in high eſteem among the antients; inſomuch, that, when a virgin is married, they aſſign her a woman, that has been but once married, to perform the ceremony of bringing her home to the bridegroom's houſe. Likewiſe, on ſome ſolemn occaſions, the precedency is given to the once-married woman. Flaminia is certainly of that number.’ Lipſius alledges this paſſage of Tertullian in commenting on the place, where Tacitus obſerves, that Pollio's daughter was preferred to the daughter of Fonteius Agrippa, for this reaſon alone, that her mother had never any more than one husband. The queſtion was about the election of a veſtal. Prælata eſt Pollionis filia non ob aliud quam quod mater ejus in eodem conjugio manebat. Nam Agrippa diſcidio domum imminuerat (30). Lipſius does not mention all the privileges ſpoken of by Tertullian: he does not ſay, that no women, but thoſe who had obſerved monogamy (31), were permitted to put a crown on the head of Fortuna Muliebris (32). I ſay nothing of the epitaphs, whereon the epithet Univira was carefully remembered, in honour of the women, that did not marry twice; which ſhews, that this conduct was looked upon as a thing deſerving immortality. Libanius's exclamation informs us, that this conduct was admired, amongſt other reaſons, becauſe few inſtances of it were to be ſeen. This ſophiſt, hearing, that St Chryſoſtome's mother was forty years old, and had been a widow twenty, cried out, Good GOD! what women are there among chriſtians (33)!

The author of the news from the Republic of letters, ſays ſomewhere, that a certain encomium, which had been lately beſtowed upon marriage, was built upon reaſons that prove too much; ‘ and which deſtroy a notion that has been very common even amongſt thoſe, who, for political reaſons, caſt a kind of blot upon celibacy. This notion is, that a widow, who marries not again, is more eſteemed, all other things being equal, than one that does. If we had not a vaſt number of authorities for this, the bare words of Virgil, which he makes Dido ſpeak, would teach us what was the judgment of the ancients: (Æneid. IV. 28.)

Ille meos primus qui me ſibi junxit, amores
Abſtulit. Ille habeat ſecum ſervetque ſepulchro.

My love, which one dear object only knew,
Is ſtill to my Sichæus' mem'ry true.

‘ It muſt be granted, that the ideas of virtue are more favourable to the men, who marry a ſecond time; yet it is certain, that ſuch marriages have been ſubject formerly, and are ſtill, to canonical penalties; and if we believe the learned civilian, who has written the Rights of the queen, the devolution, which takes place in ſome countries, was eſtabliſhed only to bridle the incontinence of widowers, and to hinder them from marrying again, to the great prejudice of their children by the firſt wife (34).’ What he ſays of Dido was not unknown to the illuſtrious lady, who makes the ſubject of this article. I do not know whether ſhe ever read the paſſage of Pauſanias, which I have cited in the article GORGOPHONE, or the reaſons alledged by Plutarch, why the nuptials of virgins at Rome were never celebrated on feſtival-days, nor thoſe of widows on work-days. According to Varro, the reaſon of this cuſtom was, becauſe nothing was to be done unwillingly on feſtival-days. Ἑορτῇ μηθὲν λυπουμένους ποιεῖν μηδὲ πρὸς ἀνάγκην. Feſto die nihil cum moleſtia & coactione agendum (35). Now, added he, a widow marries again with pleaſure, but a maid with reluctancy. Λυπούμεναι μὲν αἱ παρθένοι γαμοῦνται, χαίρουσαι δὲ αἱ γυναῖκες. Virgines nubere triſtes, mulieres autem cum lætitia (36). This thought would be unworthy of this learned man, if we took it literally; we muſt ſay therefore, that he ſpoke only of appearances. His meaning, no doubt, is, that feſtival-days, being deſigned for public rejoicings, mirth ought to appear in every face during thoſe ſolemnities. Since then the laws of decorum oblige maids to appear ſerious and penſive on their wedding-day (37), and widows are diſpenſed with that affected grimace, maids are not married on feſtival-days, &c. Let us mention another reaſon alledged by Plutarch. He ſays, that marriage being honourable to maids, and ſcandalous to widows, the marriage of the former ought to be celebrated in the preſence of many people; but, on the contrary, widows ought to deſire to be married in the preſence of few people; and for that reaſon they chuſe a day, when the people mind other ſhews. Ἢ μᾶλλον ὅτι ταῖς μὲν παρθένοις, καλὸν μὴ ὀλίγων, meſtics were collected [F]: you will find many of them in the edition of her letters; and you will find likewiſe many marks of her virtue and piety. Her reprimands to ſome leud, covetous, or proud women, are very fine [G], and deſerve to be read, as well

---

(25) La Fontaine, ubi ſupra.

(26) Daillé, de l'emploi des Peres, livr. ii, cap. iv, pag. m. 381.

* Id. Epiſt. x, ad Furiam, Tom. I, pag. 89. D. & 101. C. Ut non tam laudanda ſis, ſi vidua perſeveres, quàm execranda ſi id Chriſtiana non ſerves, quod per tanta ſæcula Gentiles fœminæ cuſtodierunt. mox, pag. 90. C. Canis revertens ad vomitum & ſus lota ad volutabrum luti.

† Id. Epiſt. xi, ad Ageruch. Tom. I, pag. 101, C. tot. Hæc brevi ſermone perſtrinxi, ut oſtendam adoleſcentulam meam non præſtare monogamiam generi ſuo, ſed reddere, nec tam laudandam eſſe ſi tribuat, quam omnibus execrandam ſi negare tentaverit.

(27) Remark [E].

(28) It is legitimæ in the beſt manuſcripts.

(29) Valerius Maximus, lib. ii, cap. i, n. 3.

(30) Tacit. Ann. lib. ii, cap. lxxxvi.

(31) That is, who had had but one husband.

(32) Fortunæ muliebri coronam non imponebat niſi univira. Tertull.

(33) Βαβαὶ, ἔφη, οἷαι παρὰ Χριστιανοῖς γυναῖκες εἰσι. Chryſoſt. Orat. I, ad viduam juniorem.

(34) Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres, Sept. 1685, Art. III, pag. 968, 969.

(35) Plut. in Quæſt. Roman. pag. 289, A.

(36) Id. ibid.

(37) It was without doubt the cuſtom of Rome; and the ſame thing is ſtill practiſed in ſeveral countries.

γων, ταῖς δὲ χήραις αἰσχρὸν πολλῶν ὄντων γαμεῖσθαι; ζηλωτὸς γὰρ ὁ πρῶτος γάμος, ὁ δὲ δεύτερος ἀπευκταῖος· αἰσχύνονται γὰρ ἂν ζώντων τῶν προτέρων ἑτέρους λαμβάνωσιν, ὀδύρονται δὲ ἂν ἀποθανόντων· ὅθεν ἡσυχίᾳ χαίρουσι μᾶλλον ἢ θορύβοις καὶ προπομπαῖς· αἱ δὲ ἑορταὶ περισπῶσι τοὺς πολλούς, ὥστε τοῖς τοιούτοις μὴ σχολάζειν. Aut quia decori eſt virginibus nuptias earum multis præſentibus peragi, idemque viduis dedecori? primæ enim nuptiæ optandæ ſunt & in precio: ſecundæ votis recuſandæ, quòd vel cum turpitudine nubunt vivente priore marito, vel cum luctu, ſi is ſit mortuus. Itaque viduæ ad ſuas nuptias quiete magis gaudent quàm frequentia hominum & tumultu: feſtivitates porrò multitudinem ad ſe trahunt, neque nuptiis vacare patiuntur (38). —— Or is it becauſe it is an honour to virgins to be married in the preſence of many, but to widows a diſgrace? For the firſt kind of marriages are deſireable and eſteemed: the ſecond to be ſhunned, becauſe, if the firſt husband be alive, they marry with diſgrace; if dead, with grief. For this reaſon, widows, when they marry, chuſe privacy rather than a concourſe of ſpectators: now feſtival-ſhows draw the multitude to them, and ſuffer them not to attend on weddings. I thought it requiſite to cite the whole paſſage of Plutarch, becauſe, in the ſubſtance which I have given of it, I have not repreſented the whole force of the expreſſions and circumſtances, whereby he ſhews how little thoſe women were eſteemed, who married a ſecond time. If you add to this the anſwers that were made by ſome illuſtrious ladies, when they were told of marrying again (39), you will excuſe the ſtrained expreſſions of our Lucretia.

Call to mind the anſwer of another lady of the houſe of Gonzaga (40).

[F] The very notes ſhe wrote to her domeſtics were collected.] They have even inſerted what ſhe wrote to her footman, to chide him for not readily obeying dame Lucia, who was her houſe-keeper (41); and what ſhe wrote to this Lucia, forbidding her to be ſo parſimonious, and commanding her to laſh a diſobedient ſervant-maid till the blood came. Se Livia non vi è obediente alzatele in capo i drappi & datelene tante che le carni ſi facciano livide & il ſangue le ſcorra fino alle calcagna (42). I do not know whether Mr Montreuil followed this example, when he inſerted in the collection of his letters, what he wrote to his butcher (43); but I think this kind of notes might have been omitted without any prejudice to our Lucretia. I am of another opinion as to thoſe, which acquaint us how carefully ſhe applied herſelf to marry her ſervants. This is very glorious to her memory. It is one of the good qualities a great lady ought to be miſtreſs of, and at the ſame time it is a virtue ſeldom practiſed among great people: for if a lady is ill ſerved, ſhe turns away her maids and waiting women, &c. without rewarding them; and if ſhe is well ſerved, ſhe keeps them as long as ſhe can, without procuring them a marriage, that might deprive her of the good ſervices they do her. None are more inexcuſable in this reſpect, than the ladies of great retinue and equipage; for they may eaſily know, by the familiarity between their domeſtics of different ſexes, that to marry them would be to do them a great pleaſure. The greateſt watchfulneſs of miſtreſſes, their ſeverity, exhortations, cenſures, cannot prevent the familiarity and private correſpondence of ſervants, and other ſtronger engagements, the ſcandalous conſequences whereof do but too often appear. This moſt evidently ſhews what ought to be done to recompence the ſervice they have received. We may therefore juſtly blame the ladies, who do not imitate our Lucretia, and praiſe her for her affection and generoſity to thoſe of her ſex, who ſerved her. She was ſo kind as to write to Cornelia Giannotti, that ſhe had found her a young, rich, prudent and handſome husband. She exactly deſcribed to her his perfections; that he had a great deal of wit, was modeſt in his diſcourſe (44), polite in his carriage, induſtrious, grave, civil, &c. Thus much for the ſoul. She forgot not what concerned the body: ſhe is very particular in her deſcription of it. 'Vengo hora alle qualità corporali, ſays ſhe, lequai ſonomi parute degne di contemplatione, percioche egli 'è piu toſto robuſto, che delicato, non molto grande 'ma thoroſo, d'occhio vivaciſſimo; di largo petto; 'di fianco rotundo; di gamba ſuelta, di fronte ampia; 'di capo tondo, & ricciuto, ne aggiugne al venteſimo 'anno (per quanto ſi dice) (45). —— I come now to 'his bodily perfections, which ſeem to me worthy of 'conſideration, becauſe he is rather robuſt, than delicate, not very large but brawny, of moſt lively eyes, 'of a wide cheſt, round hips, a fine leg, a broad forehead, with a curled head of hair, and, they ſay, ſcarce 'twenty years old.' This ſhews that ſhe made a choice like a good miſtreſs, and a good friend. At another time, having found an advantageous match for one of her women, ſhe immediately wrote to her the happy news; and adviſed her in the firſt place to give thanks to God, and in the next place to keep herſelf neat, that, when the galant came to viſit her, he might not take her for the kitchen-maid. 'Rallegrati Giulia, & alza le mani al cielo, poi che mentre ſon ſtata alla fera di Rovigo, ti hò trovato un 'marito di tal qualita che ogn'uno che lo conoſce 'lo giudica laborioſo . . . . ponti adunque in ordine, 'percioche io penſo ch'egli ſe ne verra con noi alla 'Fratta; fa che non ti ritrovi con i capegli ſcarmigliati, col viſo tinto, ò con le mani impaſtricciate 'come ſe tu fuſſi la cuoca (46). - - - - Rejoice, Julia, and return thanks to heaven: I have found 'you ſuch a husband, that whoever ſees him will 'judge him to be a pains-taking man. . . . . Put 'your ſelf therefore in order againſt he viſits you, 'and take care he does not find you with your hair 'about your ears, and your face and hands greaſy, 'like any cook-wench.' She did ſuch another piece of ſervice to one of her ſiſter's women (47).

[G] Her reprimands to ſome leud, covetous, or proud women are very fine.] Read what ſhe wrote to a woman, who, to excuſe her wanton life, urged, that her reſiſtance was to no purpoſe (48). Amongſt other counſels, ſhe adviſed her to eat and ſleep but little, to avoid idleneſs and laſcivious diſcourſes, to abſtain from lawful pleaſures, to ſtudy the holy ſcriptures, and to apply herſelf to prayer. I do not wonder, ſays ſhe, that you have not the power to reſiſt ſenſual pleaſures, ſince I do not perceive that you are ſufficiently cautious of avoiding thoſe things, that prompt you to luxury. The temptations of the fleſh are like the Sirens. We muſt keep at a diſtance from them, if we would not be caught by them (49): Non ti vego porre alcuna diligenza per ſchivar quelle coſe che alla libidine incitar ti poſſono, & è ben ragione che CHI AMA IL PERICOLO PERISCA NEL PERICOLO. Sono le tentatione carnali ſimili alle Sirene, dalle quali pochi ne ſcampano ſe non ſi allontanano (50). This, by the bye, is a very common illuſion. People complain, that they cannot withſtand ſome temptations, though they oppoſe them with all their ſtrength, as they ſay. But can they be ſaid to oppoſe them, who feed upon the fineſt diſhes, who make all ſorts of viſits, who ſeek for the moſt agreeable converſations, &c? It is ſo eaſy a tranſition from lawful to unlawful pleaſures, that he cannot be thought to deſign a good life in earneſt, who does not renounce many innocent conveniencies. Raffrenati etiandio dai leciti piaceri (51). - - - Refrain even from lawful pleaſures, is what ſhould be ſaid to the voluptuous, as our Lucretia ſaid to the leud woman here mentioned. This leud woman had a ſiſter, who led the ſame life: Lucretia wrote to her a long letter (52), full of reaſons moſt likely to convert this creature. She expreſſes herſelf with admirable life and eloquence againſt the brutiſhneſs of this vice. Nor is ſhe leſs eloquent in cenſuring an old ſinner, whom ſhe turns into ridicule: 'Oh bella coſa, che 'per tutta la città voſtra ſi dica, che non vi poſſiate 'per vecchiezza che vi habbia ſouragiunto diſtogliere 'dalle libidinoſe ſchifezze . . . . Fra tutti i moſtri, 'niuna coſa è piu moſtruoſa di un vecchio libidinoſo. Contemplate almeno allo ſpecchio i canuti capegli, la canuta barba, la fronte rugoſa, & la faccia 'ſimigliante ad un cadavero (53). —— What a fine 'thing it is, for the whole town to cry out, that 'old age itſelf cannot cure you of luſt . . . . Of all 'monſters a libidinous old man is the greateſt. Do 'but look in the glaſs, and contemplate thoſe grey 'hairs, well as thoſe, which ſhe wrote to a prieſt who addicted himſelf to venereal pleaſures [H]. It is likewiſe edifying to read what ſhe wrote to a mother, who wanted to be comforted for not having been able to perſuade her daughter to chooſe a cloyſter rather than marriage (s). She, in a few words, diſplays the moſt excellent common places the Proteſtants make uſe of to exalt the dignity and ſanctity of marriage. Let us not forget, that ſhe was daughter of Pyrrhus Gonzaga, and that ſhe had brothers and ſiſters (t).

---

(38) Idem. Plut. ibid.

(39) See the remark [F], of the article PORCIA.

(40) See GONZAGA (JULIA), citat. (1).

(41) That letter is at page 226. See alſo what ſhe writ to her butler, page 222.

(42) Ibid. pag. 227.

(43) See the article PAYS, remark [B].

(44) Dalla ſua bocca non uſci mai parola (non dico vergognoſa) ma ne pur leggiera ò licentioſa. — He never uttered (I do not ſay an impudent) but even a light or wanton expreſſion. Letter, &c. pag. 221.

(45) Ibid.

(46) Ibid. pag. 143.

(47) Ibid.

(48) Ibid. pag. 292, 293.

(49) See what is ſaid in the article FONTEVRAUD, remarks [M] and [N].

(50) Ibid. pag. 293.

(51) Ibid.

(52) Ibid. pag. 294, & ſeq. See alſo what ſhe writ to ſome other leud women, pag. 128, 166.

(53) Ibid pag. 298.

(s) Ibid. pag. 34, 35.

(t) Ibid. pag. 87.

'hairs, white beard, wrinkled forehead, and complexion 'of a dead man.' What ſhe writ to a man, who, far from finding the cure of his diſorders by marriage, grew more laſcivious by it, is no leſs forcible. 'Io 'mi credevo, che voi vi foſte maritato, perche il 'matrimonio vi haveſſe ad eſſere il rifuggio della voſtra incontinenza: ma per quanto s'intende, gli vi 'è piu toſto ſtato un ſprone, & uno incitamento alla 'luſſuria (54). —— 'I thought you had married 'to avoid incontinence; but I find marriage has proved 'to you rather a ſpur and incitement to wantonneſs.' If ſhe would have cenſured all thoſe, whom neither old age nor marriage cure of that vice, ſhe muſt have written more letters than would have made two volumes in folio. As to covetous or proud perſons, whom ſhe endeavours to reclaim, ſee the pages which I quote (55).

(54) Ibid. pag. 299.

(55) Ibid. pag. 29, 129, 174, 232, 104.

[H]. . . . Nor do thoſe leſs deſerve reading, which ſhe wrote to a prieſt, who addicted himſelf to venereal pleaſures.] See in what manner ſhe talks to him (56): 'Egli è pur forza che poſpoſto ogni riſpetto, io vi 'ſcriva, io vi ammoniſca, & vi faccia rauvedere dei 'voſtri ſporchi falli, voi ſacerdote d'Iddio, tutto con'ſacrato alle coſe divine, non vi vergognerete toccare 'la putrida carne di una meretrice, con quella bocca, 'con laquale, ricevete il corpo del noſtro Signore; '& non vi vergognerete trattare ſi odioſe brutture 'con quelle iſteſſe mani, con lequali celebrate quello 'ineffabile miſterio miniſtrandovi gli agnoli? Oh come 'non ſi patono inſieme, farſi quel medeſimo corpo, '& ſpirito con Iddio, & un medeſimo corpo con la 'malvagia femina. — I cannot forbear writing to you, 'and admoniſhing you, concerning your leud behaviour: 'you, who art one of GOD's prieſts, wholly dedi'cated to divine things; are you not aſhamed to touch 'the rotten fleſh of an harlot, with that mouth, with 'which you receive the body of our Lord; and are you 'not aſhamed to handle ſuch odious filth with thoſe 'very hands, with which you celebrate the ineffable 'myſtery, in adminiſtring to your flock? Oh! how 'can the ſame body and ſpirit ſerve GOD and an 'harlot?'

(56) Ibid. pag. 297.

GORGOPHONE, daughter of Perſeus and Andromeda, was the wife of Perieres, ſon of Æolus, and king of the Meſſenians in Peloponneſus. Out-living her huſband, ſhe married Oebalus, and was the firſt woman that took a ſecond huſband; for, before her, her ſex religiouſly abſtained from ſecond marriages (a). This innovation cannot be ſo great a blot on her memory, as that of Lamech was, who married two wives at the ſame time. Yet it is a blot, whenever hiſtory obſerves, that a perſon was the firſt, who introduced a relaxation in the practice of rigid morality. The relaxation of Gorgophone's children was much more to be condemned; for they fell into inceſt. She had two ſons by her firſt marriage, viz. Aphareus and Leucippus. By the ſecond venter, ſhe had a daughter called Arena, who was Aphareus's wife. This Aphareus permitted his ſon to reign with him jointly at Meſſena; but he reſerved the chief authority to himſelf. He built a city, which he called Arena, from his wife (b). Gorgophone was buried at Argos, her native country (c). She had by her ſecond marriage a ſon called Tyndarus, the father of Helena (d). I believe Plautus took her for the grand-mother, and not the aunt, of Amphitryon [A].

(a) Πρότερον δὲ καθεστήκει ταῖς γυναιξὶν ἐπὶ ἀνδρὶ ἀποθανόντι χηρεύειν. Cum ante ſanctum & ſolemne fœminis fuiſſet, priore viro mortuo, ſecundis nuptiis abſtinere. Pauſanias, ex verſione Romuli Amaſæi, lib. ii, pag. 64.

(b) Id. lib. iv, pag. 112.

(c) Id. lib. ii, pag. 64.

(d) Id. ibid. pag. 81.

[A] Plautus took her for the grand-mother . . . of Amphitryon.] His words are theſe (1). Ego idem ille ſum Amphitruo, Gorgophones nepos, imperator Thebanorum. Madam Dacier makes this note upon it. 'I have never obſerved, that the word nepos, a'mong the ancients, ſignifies nephew, but always 'grand-ſon: yet I believe, that Ovid uſed it in the 'ſame ſenſe as Plautus does here; for Gorgophone 'was the daughter of Perſeus, and ſiſter of Alcæus, 'and conſequently Amphitryon's aunt.' For my part, I cannot be perſuaded, that Plautus uſed the word nepos in any other ſenſe than that of grand-ſon. We do not certainly find, that this word had any other ſignification before the decline of the Latin tongue; and therefore all the ſpectators and readers of the Amphitryon directly underſtood a grand-ſon by the word nepos. What probability is there, that the poet would thus impoſe upon them, in making him Gorgophone's grand-ſon, who was only her nephew? I know indeed, that, according to Apollodorus's genealogy (2), Amphitryon is but the nephew of Gorgophone; but I know likewiſe, that all the genealogies of the fabulous ages have been differently related: and it is very likely, that Plautus had read ſome authors, who made Amphitryon Gorgophone's grand-ſon. Let us remember, that ſhe had two huſbands, and children by each: perhaps it has been ſaid, that ſhe had a daughter, who was Alcæus's wife, and Amphitryon's mother; which would not be more ſtrange, than what we read in Apollodorus (3), viz. that Electryon married Anaxo his niece, daughter of Alcæus. If Electryon married his brother Alcæus's daughter, Alcæus might have married the daughter of his ſiſter Gorgophone. Add to this, that the authors, that remain, are not agreed about Alcæus's wife, who was Amphitryon's mother. Some (4) will have her to be Menœceus's daughter, and that her name was Hipponome. Others (5) ſay, that ſhe was called Lyſidice, and that ſhe was Pelops's daughter. Others (6), laſtly, make her the daughter of Guneus, who was of Pheneum in Arcadia, and call her Laonome. What hinders but other writers, who were not loſt in Plautus's time, might ſay ſhe was Gorgophone's daughter (7)? To conclude, we need not wonder, that Amphitryon gloried on the ſtage in this genealogy; for the bare name of Gorgophone raiſed the idea of Perſeus, the conqueror of the Gorgones from which action his daughter took her name (8).

(1) Amphitr. Act. IV, Scen. IV, ver. 49.

(2) Apollodorus, lib. ii, p. m. 97.

(3) Id. ibid.

(4) Id. ibid.

(5) Pauſan. lib. viii, pag 248.

(6) Id. ibid.

(7) Confer quæ infra, in the remark [F] of the article TELEBOES.

(8) Pauſan. lib. ii, pag. 64.

GORLÆUS, (Abraham) born at Antwerp in the year 1549, became famous by his curioſity in collecting medals, and other like monuments. He was particularly fond of the rings and ſeals of the ancients. He collected a prodigious quantity of them, as appears by the book he publiſhed in 1601 [A]. Seven years after, he

[A] The work he publiſhed in 1601.] The title of it is: Dactyliotheca, ſeu Annulorum ſigillarium quorum apud priſcos tam Græcos quam Romanos uſus ex ferro, ære, argento & auro Promptuarium. This was the firſt part of the work: the ſecond was intituled, Variarum Gemmarum quibus Antiquitas in ſignando uti ſolita Sculpturæ. What makes me ſay, that this work was printed in the year 1601, though I know that he publiſhed a collection of ſeveral medals. He pitched upon the town of Delft for the place of his reſidence, and he died there the fifteenth of April 1609. It is not true that he had a place in the mint [B]. Some ſay, that he never ſtudied the Latin tongue; and that the learned preface, prefixed to his Dactyliotheca, was written by another man [D]. His executors ſold his cabinet to the prince of Wales (a). It is not always ſafe to depend on his medals, if we may believe the Scaligerana [E].

Swertius

(a) See Swertius, Athen. Belg. pag. 87.

Swertius (1) and Valerius Andreas (2) ſay it was printed at Nuremberg in the year 1600, is the date of the epiſtle dedicatory. The author dedicated his book to the elector of Cologne, the firſt of October 1601. Beſides, the print of the author, prefixed to the book, is of the ſame year (3). Laſtly, Mr Gronovius, who has publiſhed a new edition of it (4), obſerves (5), that it was printed the firſt year of this century. The edition of this book in Thuanus's library is of Leyden 1605. In that of Mr le Tellier, archbiſhop of Rheims, it is of Antwerp, 1609. Father Labbé (6) mentions the edition of Leyden 1650: perhaps his printers have made 1650 of 1605, by tranſpoſing figures: however, the Leyden edition exceeds all the reſt, as containing not only a greater number of figures, but alſo a ſhort and very learned explication, which Mr Gronovius has added to it.

[B] It is not true, that he had a place in the mint at Delft.] Valerius Andreas has here made a very notable blunder. Abrahamus Gorlæus, ſays he (7), Antverpiæ natus, celebri emporio, Delphis Batavorum vixit in Collegio III. virorum monetalium. He affirms two things: one is, that there is at Delft a body compoſed of three directors of the mint: the other is, that Gorlæus was one of thoſe three men: neither of which is true. This error was occaſioned by theſe words of Gorlæus (8). ‘Neſcio quo fato in antiquorum numiſmatum θεωρίαν delapſus, reique dulcedine allectus totum me trado huic contemplationi; & tanquam in Collegium III. virorum Monetalium cooptatus, nihil præter nummos veteres ſomnio —— Falling, I know not how, into the ſtudy of ancient coins, and being pleaſed with the thing, I give my ſelf wholly up to that contemplation; and, as if I were one of the three mint-maſters, I dream of nothing but ancient coins.’ Swertius (9) underſtood very well the meaning of theſe words, and has quoted them in the author's ſenſe; but Valerius Andreas has perverted them: he does not ſay, that Gorlæus applied himſelf to the ſearch of ancient coins, like a man who had been one of the Triumviri of the mint; but he repreſents him as being actually poſſeſſed of that employment. Mr Gronovius enquired into the reaſons that induced this antiquarian to leave his own country, and to retire into Holland for the reſt of his days, and what employ the magiſtrates of Delft gave him, but could find out nothing about it. ‘Ipſum Gorlæum cognoſcere familiarius cupivi, & quæ cauſa illum induxiſſet patriam Batavia mutare, præſertim quum diſſona de eo memorarentur, ſic ut ibi quoque mori & ſepeliri novem annis poſt voluerit. Ipſe in præfatione poſtrema videtur ſe deſcribere eum qui publicis quotidie diſtringeretur muneribus, & qualia iſta fuerint reſciſcere non magis potui, quam id ipſum quod modo dixi (10). —— I deſire to be better acquainted with Gorlæus, and to know what induced him to leave his native land for Holland, eſpecially ſince there are ſuch different reports concerning him, inſomuch that, nine years after, he deſired to die and be buried there. In his laſt preface, he ſeems to deſcribe himſelf as one, who was daily embarraſſed with public affairs; but of what kind they were, I could never learn.’ What is certain, is, that Gorlæus deſcribes himſelf as a man whom public employments hindered from ſtudying as much as he deſired. ‘Cæterum ſays he (11), cum illud præſtare quod à nobis ipſi exigimus, ejus ſit verius qui in umbratica rerum contemplatione & deſidie literarum torpeſcit, quam qui publicis quotidie diſtringitur muneribus, aliis relinquemus quod optari poſſit, nobis quod ad nominis noſtri exiſtimationem publicamque utilitatem ſufficiet reſervabimus. —— But ſince the performance of what I require of my ſelf demands leiſure and literary indolence, but is inconſiſtent with the daily avocations of public buſineſs, I leave that to others, and reſerve my ſelf for the care of my own reputation and the public good.

[C] Some ſay that never ſtudied the latin tongue.] Peireskius ſaid this, ſpeaking of the converſation he had with Gorlæus at Delft. The words of his hiſtorian deſerve to be ſet down. ‘Quo loco narrare ſolebat rem memoratu non indignam, nempe Gorlæum, cùm aliàs Latinæ linguæ non ſtuduiſſet, intellexiſſe tamen libros omnes circa rem nummariam Latinè conſcriptos; eodem modo, quo Forcatulus omnes circa rem Mathematicam: tantum valet improbus labor ex deſiderio quidpiam noſcendi vehementiſſimo profectus (12). —— Upon which occaſion, he uſed to relate a memorable thing, to wit, that Gorlæus, tho' he had never ſtudied the Latin tongue, yet underſtood all the books of coins written in that language; in the ſame manner as Forcatulus underſtood all books of Mathematics: ſuch is the force of induſtry, ariſing from an eager deſire of knowledge.’ This would be a thing ſomewhat ſingular, and perhaps it would be more to Gorlæus's glory, than his want of ſcholarſhip would be ſhameful to him. Is it not a ſign of a great genius, to be able to underſtand a latin book, meerly by being skilled in the ſubjects it treats of? Plutarch ſays ſomewhere, that, having ſtudied the Roman hiſtory in Greek books, he thereby underſtood the language of the Latin hiſtorians. Gorlæus might have ſaid, that the knowledge of medals, which he had acquired, let him into the notions of the Latin authors, who had written upon that ſcience. But this ſtory of Peireskius cannot be reconciled with what Swertius ſays, who was intimately acquainted with Gorlæus (13). A ſchool-fellow of Andrew Schottus went, no doubt, to the college. Mr Gronovius (14) urges this argument againſt what Gaſſendus ſays.

[D] The learned preface at the head of his Dactyliotheca was written by another.] Cunæus ſays, that Ælius Everhard Vorſtius was the author of it: this he ſays in Vorſtius's funeral oration. A learned German (15), who has written concerning rings, affirms the ſame thing.

[E] It is not always ſafe to depend on his medals, if we believe the Scaligerana.] There we find theſe words (16): Gorlæus caſts medals: he has ſometimes ſhewn me ſome of them; but I diſcovered, that they were not ancient; ever ſince he has ſhewed me none but what were true: he is a good man. This, and the reſt of the paſſage, ſhews, that Scaliger reckoned Gorlæus among the forgers of falſe medals.

(1) Swertius, Athen. Belgic. pag. 87.

(2) Val. Andr. Biblioth. Belg. pag. 1.

(3) It ſays, that he was then in his fifty ſecond year.

(4) At Leyden, for Vander Aa, 1695.

(5) In Præfat.

(6) Biblioth. Bibliothec. in Mantiſſa antiquariæ Supellectilis, pag. m. 341.

(7) Biblioth. Belgic pag. 1.

(8) In alloquio ad Lectorem.

(9) Ubi ſupra, pag. 87.

(10) Gronovius, in Præfat.

(11) In 2. Monito ad Lectorem.

(12) Gaſſendus in Vita Peireſkii, lib. ii, ad ann. 1606, pag. m. 265.

(13) Mihi familiaris; liberalibus ſtudiis à primis adoleſcentiæ annis delectatus, condiſcipulum habuit Andream Schottum Soc. Jeſu Preſbyt. Swert. ubi ſupra.

(14) In Præfatione.

(15) Kirchmannus, cap. iii, de Annulis, pag. 13. Edit. Ludg. Bat. 1672.

(16) At pag. 97.

GORLÆUS, (DAVID) a native of Utrecht, lived in the XVIIth century. He publiſhed ſome books of Philoſophy (a), in which he departed from the common opinion of the ſchools. Regius, a diſciple of Deſcartes, being brought into trouble for a theſis concerning the union of the ſoul and body, alledged that he had uſed Gorlæus's own words. This did him no ſervice; and gave an opportunity to Voëtius, profeſſor of divinity, to blaſt as much as poſſible Gorlæus's opinions [A].

(a) Exercitat. Philoſophicæ, anno 1620, in 8vo. Item Idea Phyſices. Konig. Biblioth. Vet. & Nov. pag. 355. See Sorel, pag. 248, of his book, intituled, la Perfection de l'Homme.

[A] Voëtius ..... blaſted as much as poſſible Gorlæus's opinions.] You will find the hiſtory of all this in Mr Baillet (1). He tells us, that Regius had maintained, amongſt other things: * ‘That from the union of the ſoul and body there reſults, not a real, but only an accidental being .... it was enough for Voëtius, that this was not agreeable to the uſual language of the ſchools, to declare Regius an heretic, and to proceed to the degrading of him. It was in vain for Regius to excuſe himſelf, by ſaying, he was not the author of this way of ſpeaking, but Gorlæus, in whoſe writings he had found it ‘in

(1) Vie de Deſcartes, Tom. II, pag. 145, 146. ad ann. 1641.

* Ex mente & corpore non fit unum per ſe, ſed per accidens.

‘ in the very words uſed in the diſputations. ‘ Voëtius had it decreed, in the name of the faculty of divinity . . . . That the ſtudents ſhould ‘ avoid Regius's lectures, as doctrines pernicious ‘ to religion. A few days after, Voëtius printed ‘ ſome theſes; to which he added three corollaries. ‘ The firſt wereof was this: the opinion of the atheiſt ‘ Taurellus, and of David Gorlæus, teaching, that ‘ man, made up of a body and a ſoul, is a being per ‘ accidens, and not per ſe, is abſurd and erroneous. ‘ The third was this: the philoſophy, that rejects the ‘ ſubſtantial forms of things, with their proper and ‘ ſpecific faculties, or their active qualities, and conſequently the diſtinct and ſpecific natures of things, ‘ ſuch as Taurellus, Gorlæus, and Baſſon, have endeavoured to introduce in our days, is inconſiſtent ‘ with Moſes's phyſics and all that the ſcripture ‘ teaches us. This philoſophy is dangerous, favourable to ſcepticiſm, proper to deſtroy our belief concerning the rational ſoul, the proceſſion of the ‘ divine perſons in the Trinity, the incarnation of ‘ Jesus Christ, original ſin, miracles, prophecies, ‘ the grace of our regeneration, and the real poſſeſſion of devils.’

This manifeſtly ſhews the power of cuſtom and prejudices. It is a weight that drags us whither the intereſt of our cauſe forbids us to go. For what can be ſaid more contrary to the intereſt of thoſe fundamental doctrines of religion (2), than to maintain, that they ſtand in need of the doctrine of the ſchools, concerning the diſtinction of ens per ſe, and ens per accidens, and the nature of forms that conſtitutes the ſpecies of bodies? Ens per ſe, and ens per accidens, are inexplicable phraſes, a meer jargon of the Spaniſh logicians, which ſignifies nothing: and as to ſubſtantial forms, what is ſaid of their nature, and the way of their production and deſtruction, is ſo abſurd and incomprehenſible, that they cannot be ſet up for doctrines neceſſary to religion, without dangerouſly expoſing the ſublimeſt truths of the goſpel, and filling the general courſe of nature with ſo many myſteries, that religion will have no prerogative over nature. It is certain, that the moſt profound myſteries of the goſpel are at leaſt as eaſy to comprehend, as the doctrine of forms, and the nature of the ens per ſe of the ſchools.

This reflexion affects Voëtius but in a remote and indirect manner; for if we read his whole corollary, we ſee, that the reaſon of his apprehending ſo much danger to the doctrines of the goſpel, from the rejection of forms, is not that rejection itſelf, but the motive of it (3). He obſerves, that the principal reaſon of thoſe, who deny them, is the inexplicable manner of their production; and then he ſhews, that, upon the like foundation, it is to be feared the mind of man will proceed to deny myſteries, &c. This alters the ſtate of the queſtion, and puts the diſpute in a capacity of being more eaſily ended. It is but explaining the miſunderſtanding, and ſhewing the diſparity. As for thoſe, who condemn the rejection of forms in it ſelf as prejudical to religion, I repeat it, they deſerve to be made acquainted with what I have ſaid before.

You will find in the remark [E] of the article HEIDANUS, ſomething concerning the inexplicable difficulties of the peripatetic doctrine about ſubſtantial forms. But, to ſee this in it's whole extent, you need only read the firſt volume of Hadrian Heereboord's theſes, from the 125th page to the 148th; where he enforces the profound and ſubtil reaſonings of William Pemble, who has written in Engliſh upon this ſubject.

(2) I mean thoſe that are ſpecified in the third corollary.

(3) Quidquid ſit de ſumma rei, quam Philoſophorum diſquiſitioni relinquimus, hoc unum ſaltem hyponema ſtudioſis noſtris ſubjicimus: Achillei argumenti iſtius, quo formas explodere conantur, conſequentiam ſuſpectam habeant; quæ eſt hæc, negatur eſſentia & exiſtentia formarum, quia earum origo ſeu modus originis incertus eſt, aut explicari non poteſt, ſic ut patroni formarum & ſibi & aliis in eo ſatisfaciant. Hoc periculoſo axiomate ſemel hauſto proclive erit vanitati, ſcepticiſmo & petulantiæ humani ingenii, diſputare, non dari animam rationalem, &c.

GOSELINI (Julian), born at Rome in the year 1525, was, at ſeventeen years of age, ſecretary to Ferdinand Gonzaga, viceroy of Sicily. He continued ſo when that viceroy was made governor of Milan. He had the ſame poſt under the dukes of Alba and Seſſa, who were ſucceſſively governors of that ſtate after the death of Gonzaga. The duke of Seſſa took him with him to the court of Spain, where Goſelini made himſelf ſo acceptable by his addreſs and prudence, that the duke was told he would do well to employ only this negociator in his affairs with the king. Goſelini was gratified at the ſame time with a penſion for life of 200 crowns per annum. The marquis of Peſcara, who ſucceeded the duke of Seſſa, had the ſame conſideration for Goſelini, and the ſame confidence in him as his predeceſſors: but things altered ſtrangely under this marquis's ſucceſſor, the duke of Albuquerque. He treated Goſelini in ſuch an odd and barbarous manner, as had like to have coſt him his life and honour at once. However, the end of this perſecution was honourable to this ſecretary. He dexterouſly warded off the blow, and managed himſelf with that prudence during all this heavy ſtorm, as to make it turn to his honour. He got again into that employment under the marquis of Aimonte, and the duke of Terranova, who were governors of the Milaneze, and whoſe ſecretary he was, to their great ſatisfaction. Amongſt many good qualities, he is ſaid to have been a pacifier of quarrels, and to have had a very particular talent for it. The thing deſerved to be obſerved on his epitaph, Titulo res digna ſepulchri: nor has it been forgotten (a). The affairs of the ſecretaryſhip, which took him up above forty years, hindered him not from publiſhing ſeveral books [A]. He died at Milan the twelfth of February 1587, being near ſixty two years of age (b).

(a) Componendis diſcordiis nato.

(b) Taken from Ghilini, Teatro d' Huomini Letterati, Part. I, pag. 134. See alſo Proſp. Mandoſio Bibl. Roman. pag. 26.

[A] He publiſhed ſeveral books.] Theſe are the titles of ſome of them: Rime: Diſcorſi: Lettere: Ragionamento ſopra i Componimenti del Borgheſi: Dichiarazione di alcuni Componimenti: Vita di Don Ferdinando Gonzaga: Trè Congiure, cioè de Pazzi e Salviati contra i Medici, del Conte Giouan Luigi de' Fieſchi contra la Republica di Genoua, & d'alcuni Piacentini contra il loro Duca Pietro Luigi Farneſe. He alſo wrote Latin verſes and letters, and tranſlated into Italian a French book, intituled, A true account of things that happened in the Netherlands ſince the arrival of Don Juan of Auſtria, &c. Varillas, doubtleſs, did not know, that Goſelini had written the conſpiracy of the count of Fieſque, ſince, in giving the reaſon of his treating of this conſpiracy, he names (1) but four authors, who have publiſhed the hiſtory of it, Hubertus Folietta, Agoſtino Maſcardi, Madam de Scuderi, and cardinal de Rets. He acknowledges, that they are incomparable each in their kind; but that the two firſt aſcribe too much to France in that project, and the two latter do not aſcribe enough to it.

(1) In the preface to the Hiſtory of Francis I.

GOSSELIN. I know three authors of Normandy, who have born this name. WILLIAM GOSSELIN, a native of Caen, lived in the XVIth century, and ſtudied mathematics [A]. JOHN GOSSELIN lived in the ſame century. He was [A] WILLIAM GOSSELIN applied himſelf to the mathematics.] This appears by the work, he publiſhed at Paris in 1577, with this title: De Arte magna, ſeu de occulta parte numerorum quæ & Algebra & Almucabala vulgo dicitur libri quatuor, in quibus explicantur æquationes Diophantis, & regulæ quantita- tis was of Vire, and was the king's library-keeper. He applied himſelf very much to aſtrology [B], and died very old by an extraordinary accident. We ſhall ſee what Scaliger ſaid of him [C]. ANTONY GOSSELIN was of Caen, where he was Regius Profeſſor of hiſtory and eloquence, and principal of the college du Bois. He publiſhed the hiſtory of the ancient Gauls in Latin, in 1636. He was miſtaken in a great many things, as Mr Bochart ſhewed in ſome obſervations he compoſed upon that work; but he would not publiſh them, fearing to diſpleaſe the friends and relations of the author. They have been inſerted in the laſt edition of his works.

tis ſimplicis & quantitatis ſurdæ. He added ſome demonſtrations and inventions of his own to his French tranſlation of the arithmetic of Nicolas Tartaglia, an Italian author. This verſion was printed at Paris in 1577 (1), and at Antwerp by Plantin, the year following (2).

[B] JOHN GOSSELIN applied himſelf very much to aſtrology.] Witneſs the book he publiſhed at Paris, in 1577, intituled, Hiſtoria imaginum cœleſtium noſtro ſæculo accommodata in qua earum vicinitates ſeu habitudines inter ſe atque ſtellarum fixarum ſitus & magnitudines explicantur. Six years before, he had publiſhed, La Main harmonique, ou les Principes de Muſique antique & moderne, & les proprietez que la moderne reçoit des ſept Planetes; as alſo, Ephemerides, ou Almanach du jour & de la nuict pour cent ans commençans en l'an 1571 (3). He printed, at Paris, in 1582, a table of the reformation of the year, and a French verſion of the Gregorian calender (4). Note, that Voſſius (5) has made no mention of theſe two authors. It is a ſign he had not heard of them.

[C] He died very old ..... We ſhall ſee what Scaliger has ſaid of him.] ‘Goſſelin the king's library-keeper is dead, being burnt to death: he fell into the fire, and, being alone, by reaſon of his age, could not get up again, which is a common fate to old people. Mr Caſaubon will ſucceed him. Goſſelin ſuffered no body to go into the library; ſo that Mr Caſaubon finds unexpected treaſures there (6).’

From this paſſage two things may be inferred: one is, that John Goſſelin died about the beginning of the XVIIth century: the other, that his place was given to Caſaubon.

(1) Taken from Du Verdier Vau-Privas, Bibl. Franç. pag. 478.

(2) La Croix du Maine, pag. 147.

(3) Taken from Du Verdier Vau-Privas, ubi ſupra, pag. 708.

(4) La Croix du Maine, pag. 230.

(5) In his book De Scientiis Mathematicis.

(6) Scaligerana, pag. m. 97.

GOUDIMEL (CLAUDIUS), one of the moſt excellent muſicians of the XVIth century, was maſſacred at Lyons in 1572, becauſe he was a Proteſtant. The Proteſtant Martyrology makes mention of him [A]. D'Aubigné is miſtaken in placing him amongſt thoſe, who were murdered at Paris on St Bartholomew's day [B]. Varillas has not committed this fault; but he is to blame for believing, that Goudimel and Claudin the younger were one and the ſame perſon [C]. He makes a curious obſervation againſt thoſe who excepted not ſo ſkillful a muſician out of the maſſacre [D]. If notice had [A] The Proteſtant martyrology makes mention of him.] In theſe words (1): ‘Claudius Goudimel, an excellent muſician, and whoſe memory will live for ever, for what he has ſo well done upon David's Pſalms in French, the greateſt part whereof he has ſet to muſic, in the form of motets, of four, five, ſix, and eight parts; and had not death prevented it, he would have quickly compleated the whole work. But the enemies of GOD's glory, and ſome wicked perſons, who envied the honour he had acquired, have deprived the lovers of Chriſtian muſic of ſuch an happineſs.’

[B] D'Aubigné is miſtaken in placing him among thoſe, who were murdered in the maſſacre of Paris on St Bartholomew's day.] After having named many eminent perſons killed in the Paris maſſacre, he adds: ‘Goudimel, an excellent muſician, and Perrot a civilian, were all thrown out at the windows, and dragged along the ſtreets, and caſt into the river, at the inſtance of the duke of Montpenſier, who had joined with thoſe we have ſpoken of, to cry out, kill, and that they had attempted upon the king's life (2).’ If he had conſulted Thuanus, as he has in other caſes, he would have avoided this miſtake. For this is what Thuanus ſays in that place of his hiſtory, wherein he mentions the maſſacre of Lyons. ‘Eandem fortunam expertus eſt Claudius Goudimelus, excellens noſtra ætate Muſicus, qui Pſalmos Davidicos vernaculis verſibus à Clemente Maroto & Theodora Beza expreſſos ad varios & jucundiſſimos modulationum numeros aptavit, quibus & hodie publice in concionibus proteſtantium ac privatim decantantur (3). ——— The ſame fate attended Claudius Goudimel, an excellent muſician of our time, who ſet the Pſalms of David, tranſlated into metre by Clement Marot and Theodore Beza, to various and moſt pleaſing tunes, which at this time are ſung both publickly and privately by the Proteſtants.’

[C] Mr Varillas ... is to blame for believing, that Goudimel and Claudin the younger were one and the ſame perſon.] We ſhall ſee in the following remark, that he has done it. To confute him, I muſt alledge here a notable fact concerning this Claudin, which will inform us, that he was alive nine years after the Paris maſſacre. I have found this fact in the commentary, that has been printed with the life of Apollonius Tyaneus, tranſlated into French. I ſhall ſet down the words of the commentator (4): ‘It was alſo by theſe two Phrygian and Subphrygian tunes, that Timotheus made an experiment of his skill in the perſon of Alexander, by the former making him run to arms, as he was at table, and by the latter bringing him back to his former tranquillity. I have ſometimes heard the Sieur Claudin the younger ſay (5), who, without diſreſpect to any one, far exceeded all the muſicians of the preceding ages; that an air, which he had compoſed with it's parts, was ſung at the ſolemnity of the late duke of Joyeuſe's marriage (6), in the time of Henry III, king of France and Poland, of happy memory, whom GOD abſolve; which, as it was ſung, made a gentleman take his ſword in hand, and ſwear aloud, that it was impoſſible for him to forbear fighting with ſome body. Whereupon they began to ſing another air of the Subphrygian mode, which made him as peaceable as before; which I have had ſince confirmed by ſome that were preſent: ſuch power and force have the modulation, motion, and management of the voice, when joined together, upon the minds of men (7). ...... To conclude this long annotation: If one would have an excellent experiment of theſe twelve modes, let him ſing, or hear ſung, the Dodecachorde of Mr Claudin the younger, of whom I have ſpoken above; and I aſſure myſelf he will find in it all thoſe figures and variations managed with ſo much art, harmony, and skill, as to confeſs, that nothing can be added to this maſter-piece, but the praiſes that all the lovers of this ſcience ought to beſtow upon this rare and excellent man, who was capable of carrying muſic to the utmoſt degree of it's perfection, if death had not fruſtrated the execution of his noble and profound deſigns upon this ſubject.’

[D] ... he makes a curious obſervation upon thoſe, who excepted not ſo excellent a muſician out of the maſſacre.] Theſe are his words: ‘Mandelot (8) vainly attempted to prevent the maſſacre of thirteen hundred Calviniſts at Lyons, and eſpecially the incomparable muſician Goudimel (9), ſo well known by the name of Claudin the younger. His greateſt crime was the compoſing the nobleſt airs to Marot's and Beza's Pſalms, which were ſung in the Proteſtant congregations; and in his puniſhment no regard was had to the Roman law, which indulged thoſe that were eminent in their profeſſion, becauſe the public, by taking them off, loſt incomparably more than it gained by the example of their puniſhment (10).’

(1) Book x, fol. 727, ad ann. 1572.

(2) Hiſt. Univerſelle, Tom. II, livr. i, chap. iv, ad ann. 1572.

(3) Thuan. Hiſtor. lib. lii, pag. m. 1084.

(4) Artus Thomas Sieur d'Embry, Comment. ſur la Vie d'Apollonius, livr. i, chap. xvi, p. 282.

(5) The author puts here this marginal ſummary: The elogium of Claudin the younger, the honour of all the muſicians.

(6) He married in 1581.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) He commanded at Lyons. See Thuanus, ubi ſupra, pag 1083, who taxes Mandelot with baſe hypocriſy in pretending to diſapprove the maſſacre, and to puniſh the authors of it.

(9) I defy Varillas to cite any author, who ſays, that Mandelot was particularly deſirous to ſave this muſician's life.

(10) Varillas, Hiſt. de Charles IX, lib. ix, pag. 471, 472, of the Paris edition, in 12mo, 1684.

had been taken how Goudimel wrote his name, it had not been ſo diſguiſed, as it has been [E]. There are ſome of his letters (a) printed amongſt the poems of Meliſſus, his intimate friend. He there writes himſelf Goudimel. Meliſſus made ſome verſes upon the ſad deſtiny of his friend. I ſhall ſet down the epigram, in which it is obſerved, that Goudimel would have found more humanity amongſt the waves of the Ægean ſea, as heretofore Arion, than he found in his native country [F]. I believe this muſician was of Franche Comté [G].

(a) They are in Latin, and well written.

The indulgence of the Roman law, which Varillas ſpeaks of, will excite the curioſity of a great many readers. They will look upon it as a very remarkable particular: but as they know he has impoſed much, even in point of hiſtory, the principal object of his ſtudies, they will not think him very worthy of credit in a matter of civil-law, which was not his province. Wherefore, to ſet them at eaſe, I will give them a better authority, that is, the teſtimony of a man of much more learning, who has cited two very grave authors. See then what Girac has obſerved againſt Coſtar (11). 'Our doctor offends a-new againſt the rules of the 'civil-law, he who pretends ſometimes to diſcuſs mat'ters of right. It is abſolutely falſe, that an artiſt de'ſerves ſo much the more to be puniſhed, as his work 'ſhall be admired, and charm the beholders.' All the 'interpreters of the civil-law maintain the contrary; 'and it is a practice frequently obſerved by princes 'and ſovereign courts, to give thoſe their life, who 'excel in any art, though they deſerve to loſe it for 'the crimes they have committed *.'

(11) Girac, Replique à Coſtar, §. xxvi, pag. m. 235.

* Hinc apparet ratio ejus quod paſſim juris utriuſque Interpretes adnotarunt, ſcilicet, pœnam eſſe vel remittendam vel minuendam delinquenti ob inſignem ejus peritiam, ſeu ex eo quod artifex ſit celebris magnique nominis, &c. Covarr. lib. ii. Var. Reſol. cap. ix, n. 6. Vide Jul. Clar. Sent. lib. v, §. fin. qu. 60, n. 26, & alios.

[E] If notice had been taken how Goudimel ſubſcribed, his name had not been ſo diſguiſed as it has been.] Thuanus calls him Gaudimelus: Gisbert Voëtius (12), Gaudimellus: Varillas, Gaudinel: Jeremiah de Pours, Guidomel. 'The ſame Guidomel ſet to muſic the 'Pſalms of David, printed at Paris by Adrian le Roy 'and Robert Balaard, in the year 1565. He alſo 'compoſed nineteen ſpiritual hymns, printed at Paris 'by Nicholas du Chemin, in the year 1555 (13).'

(12) Polit. Eccleſ. Tom. I, pag. 534.

(13) Jeremiah de Pours, Divine Melodie du St Pſalmiſte, liv. ii, cap. xli, pag. 581.

[F] I ſhall ſet down the epigram, in which it is obſerved, that he would have found more humanity among the waves, than . . . in his own country.] It is at the ſeventy ninth page of a book, intituled, Meliſſi Schediaſmatum Reliquiæ, and was printed in 1575, in 8vo. It contains ſeveral pieces of poetry upon Goudimel, which are not Meliſſus's.

Prenſus ab externo ſi Goudimel hoſte fuiſſes
  Vector in Ionio Muſice clare mari;
Ille tibi vitam vel non voluiſſet ademtam,
  Lenitus cithara carminibuſque tuis;
In tutos aliquis vel, ſicut Ariona, Delphin
  Tergore portaſſet te quaſi nave locos.
Audivere tuos Galli moduloſque probarunt
  Indigenæ, decori queis tua Muſa fuit:
At datus es letho, licet inſons, inque cruenti
  Stagnanteis Araris præcipitatus aquas.
Proh ſcelus indigenûm! nam barbarus hoſtes in hoſtem
  Barbaricum LANIIS mitior eſſe ſolet.

Had'ſt thou been ta'en by foreign foes a prey,
Sweet lyriſt, ſailing in th' Ionian ſea,
Thy ſong had given thee life and liberty.
Or, like the fam'd Arion heretofore,
A dolphin's back had born thee ſafe to ſhore.
France rank'd thy muſe her ornaments among,
Each Gallic ear delighted with thy ſong.
Yet thou to death, unmerited, waſt ſent,
Thrown into Arar's ſtream, thy puniſhment.
From Frenchmen this . . . . thy countrymen . . . . to bear!
Barbarians to their foes leſs cruel are.

I would forgive the Latin poets, what cannot be excuſed in the hiſtorians, viz. the leaving out, changing, or adding, of ſome letters to Goudimel's name, it being a very harſh word in Latin poetry.

[G] I believe that this muſician was of Franche Comté.] I gueſs ſo, becauſe his birth-place was ſituated upon the Doux, a river that runs by Bezançon.

Goudimel ille meus, meus (eheu!) Goudimel ille eſt
  Occiſus. Teſtes vos Arar & Rhodane,
Semineces vivoſque ſimul violenter utriſque
  Abſorptos viſi plangere gurgitibus.
Sequana cum Ligeri flevit, flevitque Garumna;
  Præcipuè patrius flevit amara Dubis.

My friend, my Goudimel, is dead and gone:
Witneſs ye ſtreams of Arar and the Rhone!
Faſt as ye roll'd the carnage to the deep,
I ſaw ye both the cruel ſlaughter weep.
The Dubis, Loire, Garumna, and the Seine,
Were ſeen in mournful murmurs to complain.

I have found theſe verſes at the ſeventy ninth page of the Meliſſi Schediaſmatum Reliquiæ.

GOVEA (ANDREW) (a), in Latin Goveanus, a native of Beia in Portugal, was principal of the college of St Barbara [A], at Paris, in the XVIth century, where he educated three nephews, who became famous for their learning. The king of Portugal allowed them wherewithal to maintain themſelves at Paris. MARTIAL GOVEA, the eldeſt of the three, became a good Latin poet, and publiſhed a Latin grammar at Paris. ANDREW GOVEA, his younger brother, taught, firſt grammar, and then philoſophy, in the college of St Barbara, and was at laſt made principal of this college in the room of his uncle: and, becauſe he acquitted himſelf well of that employment, he was invited to Bourdeaux, to exerciſe the like function in the college of Guienne. He went thither in the year 1534, where he diſcharged his duties with an exactneſs very advantageous to youth [B]: this engaged John III, king of Portugal, to ſend for him back into his kingdom, to ſet up a college at Coimbra, like that of Guienne. Govea left Bourdeaux in the year 1547, and took with him ſome learned men fit to inſtruct

(a) So Thuanus calls him, lib. xxxviii, pag. 769; but Andreas Schottus, Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 309, and Ribadeneira, Vita Ignatii, lib. i, cap. iii, call him James. It was he who had a mind to whip Ignatius Loyola.

[A] He was principal of the college of St Barbara.] This is the right tranſlating of Andrew Schottus's Collegii Barbarani præfectus (1), and not principal of the college of Barbarini, as Mr Teiſſier renders it (2).'

(1) Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 300.

(2) Teiſſ. Elog. Tom. I, pag. 291.

[B] ANDREW GOVEA . . . . diſcharged his duties with an exactneſs which was very uſeful to youth.] This may be ſeen in Buſinus's preface prefixed to Gelida's letters, printed at Rochelle in 1571. 'Ubi 'quamdiu egerit, quem ſe geſſerit (Andreas Goveanus) '& quomodo ab rege ſuo in patriam ſit revocatus, Co'nimbricenſis ſcholæ inſtituendæ gratia, quæ ſimilis 'eſſet Burdigalenſi, in præfatione Buſini in epiſtolas 'Gelidæ cognoſci poteſt (3). —— Where, during his 'abode, how he (Andrew Govea) behaved, and how, he 'was recalled by his king into his own country, in order 'to regulate the ſchool of Coimbra after the example 'of that of Bourdeaux, may be ſeen in Buſinus's preface 'to the epiſtles of Gelida.' ſtruct youth [C]. He exerciſed the ſame office at Coimbra, as he did at Bourdeaux (b). He deſigned to return to Bourdeaux, after having ſpent two years in putting the college of Coimbra in a good method; but he died before that time (c) in June 1548, being fifty years of age, or upwards (d). He was a prieſt and a preacher [D], and never printed any thing (e). ANTONY GOVEA, the youngeſt of the three brothers, was the moſt famous of them all. See, in Moreri, what Thuanus (f) ſays of him: it would be needleſs to repeat it. I ſhall only obſerve, that if it be true, as Thuanus affirms, that Govea read the civil-law at Grenoble (g) [E] to a numerous auditory, the author of the Bibliotheque of Dauphiné ſhould not have ſaid, he practiſed in Grenoble, and read in the univerſity of Valence. There is another reflexion to be made upon Thuanus's narrative [F]. By way of ſupplement to Moreri, I ſhall ſay, that Govea ſtudied the civil-law at Touloufe in 1539; that he had before that been a teacher at Bourdeaux, in the college,

(3) Elias Vinetus, Epiſt. ad Schottum, in Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 475.

[C] He took with him ſome learned men fit to inſtruct youth.] George Buchanan, and Patrick Buchanan his brother were of the number; and ſo were Nicolas Grouchi, William Guerente, Elias Vinet, Arnoul Fabricius, John la Coſte, James Tevius, and Antony Mendez (4).

[D] He was a prieſt and a preacher.] I do not know whether Beza deſerves credit, when he makes him doctor of the Sorbonne: I do not believe it: however, it will not be improper to ſet down his words. 'It came to nothing at laſt, ſays he (5), except that a 'poor ſervitor was delivered into the hands of An'drew Govea, a Portugeſe, principal of the college, 'doctor of the Sorbonne, (commonly ſirnamed Sina'pivorus, that is, Muſtard-Eater) to be laſhed.' Beza had been ſpeaking of Aymon de la Voye, a Proteſtant martyr, burnt at Bourdeaux, in the year 1541, and of ſome ſcholars who were taken the next day, being ſuſpected of having ſtuck up a paper, which was found faſtened to the poſt.

[E] If it be true . . . that ANTONY GOVEA taught . . . . at Grenoble.] Having not the books I want, I leave abundance of things in uncertainty: they, who have left them ſo, having all ſorts of libraries at hand, are more to be blamed than I am: however, the uncertainty I am in will move ſome readers to make a full enquiry into the matter. I do not ſcruple to repeat this remark, becauſe I am perſuaded, that this dictionary will be read by piece-meal; and therefore it is neceſſary to mention this more than once.

Andreas Schottus might ſatisfy me concerning what I have read in Thuanus about Govea's being a profeſſor at Grenoble, were it not that, in the very place, where he declares, that Govea taught in that city, he writes inaccurately. Here is the whole paſſage (6). 'Cadurci jus annos aliquot magno concurſu docuit, & 'Valentiæ Delphinatus anno à Chriſto nato 1555. ad 'tit. de vulgari & pupillari ſubſtitutione dictabat. 'Toloſæ 6. antea anno Andreæ natura atque animo 'fratri, beneficiis vero parenti librum de jure accre'ſcendi inſcripſit. Gratianopoli ad legem Falcidiam 'quæ perdifficilis eſt dictabat anno 1566 (7). Quarto 'poſt anno uxorem ibi domum duxit, ex eaque libe'ros ſuſtulit Petrum & Manfredum, quorum illum Pe'trus Bertrandus Cadurcorum Epiſcopus in baptiſmatis 'fonte ſuſceperat.' The natural meaning of theſe words, is, 1. that Govea taught the civil-law at Cahors, before he taught it at Valence; that is, before the year 1555. 2. That he taught at Grenoble in the year 1566, and married there in 1570. 3. That the biſhop of Cahors was godfather to the eldeſt of his ſons. Theſe three things appear ſo diſordered, that they offend an exact reader. Good ſenſe teaches, that Govea was profeſſor at Cahors, when he deſired the biſhop of the place to be godfather to his ſon: but, according to this account, he taught at Cahors before the year 1555; and therefore what does Schottus mean, when he ſays, that Govea was a profeſſor at Grenoble in 1566, and married there in 1570; and that the biſhop of Cahors was godfather to his eldeſt ſon? have not I reaſon to diſtruſt Father Schottus? a German civilian, who has reprinted at Leipſic the lives of ſome civilians, increaſes my miſtruſt; for he makes a very ſolid objection againſt theſe words of that Jeſuit, Gratianopoli ad legem Falcidiam . . . . dictabat 1566. The objection is this: 'Videtur hic Schottus temporis 'rationem minus rectè obſervaſſe, fieri enim non po'tuit ut prælectiones ſuas ad L. Falcidiam anno de'mum 1566 habuerit Goveanus Gratianopoli, qui 'eaſdem jam an. 1560. Michaëli Hoſpitalio Franciæ 'Cancellario inſcripſerat (8). —— This Schottus ſeems 'to have been miſtaken as to the time; for Govea could 'not have read his Prælectiones ad L. Falcidiam in 'the year 1566, at Grenoble, having inſcribed them 'long before, in 1560, to Michaël Hoſpital, chancellor 'of France.'

Note, that Stephen Paſquier affirms (9), that Antonius Goveanus taught the civil-law at Grenoble, and died there. He is out at leaſt as to the laſt fact. I have juſt read, in the twelfth letter of the ſecond book of 1560, that Govea was profeſſor at Grenoble. 'Ei '(Cujacio) Valentiæ ſuccedet Gribaldus, pulchrum 'ſane par, ubi ipſe & Loriotus conjuncti fuerint, & 'habuerint Gratianopoli vicinum Goveanum, qui 'utroque eſt longe ſceleratior. —— Gribaldus will ſuc'ceed Cujas at Valentia, where he and Loriot will be 'colleagues, and have Govea for their neighbour at Gre'noble, who is wickeder than them both.'

[F] There is another reflexion to be made upon Thuanus's narrative.] Theſe are his words (10): 'Ab 'Æmilio Ferreto qui Avenione jus civile docebat, 'cum Lugduni privatis ſtudiis intentus deſideret (An'tonius Goveanus) ad illius perplexæ ſcientiæ profeſ'ſionem evocatus eſt. —— Antony Govea, being intent 'upon his private ſtudies at Leyden, was called from 'thence by Æmilius Ferretus, who taught the civil'law at Avignon, to be profeſſor of that intri'cate ſcience.' The ſequel of the diſcourſe ſhews, that Ferretus did not adviſe Govea to ſtudy the civil-law, but to teach it: and this is clear enough from the words I have quoted. According to thoſe words of Thuanus, Govea was invited to Avignon by Ferretus, to teach the civil-law. Upon this, two difficulties ariſe; one is taken from this, viz. That Thuanus, having ſaid, that Govea quickly got the true way of explaining the civil-law, for which he was ſo admired, as to provoke the jealouſy of Cujas, adds, Igitur Goveanus Toloſæ primum, dein Divione Cadurcorum, poſt Valentiæ & Gratianopoli jus civile magna auditorum frequentia profeſſus eſt. The ſubſtance of which narrative is therefore this: Govea, being invited by Ferretus to Avignon to teach there the civil-law, quickly became an excellent interpreter of it, ſo far as to raiſe the jealouſy of the great Cujas. He therefore taught the law firſt at Toulouſe, then at Cahors, afterwards at Valence and Grenoble. May not one aſk this great hiſtorian where he has left Avignon? does he not manifeſtly contradict himſelf? ſhould he not have ſaid, that Govea taught firſt in that city? the ſecond difficulty lies in this; that, in the Bibliotheque of the Spaniſh writers, where there is an abridgement of Govea's life taken from his own writings, it is ſaid indeed, that he taught the civil-law at Cahors, Valence, and Grenoble; but as to Avignon and Toulouſe, it is only ſaid, that he ſtudied the law in thoſe two places with great application. 'Juvenis natu grandior tres 'fere annos in Juris civilis ſtudio operam dedit 'Æmilio Feretto Avenione profitenti, ſuæ memoriæ 'facile principi; quemque parentem alterum appellare 'lib. 2 de Juris dictione non dubitat: neque ex eo 'tempore à Juriſconſultorum libris longius unquam 'oculos dimovit. Toloſæ mox tanta in ſtudio aſſi'duitate, tantaque eſt uſus contentione, ut majore non 'poſſet (11). —— When he grew to manhood, he 'ſtudied the civil-law almoſt three years under Fe'rettus, profeſſor at Avignon, a man of the greateſt 'abilities, and whom he does not ſcruple to call an'other father in his ſecond book De Juris Dictione; 'and from that time he diligently ſtudied the civilians. 'Afterwards he purſued his ſtudies at Toulouſe with the

(b) Ex Elia Vineto, Epiſt. ad Schottum, in Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 475.

(c) Schottus, in Biblioth. Hiſpan. pag. 618. See alſo Thuanus, lib. xvii, ſub fin.

(d) Vinetus, ubi ſupra.

(e) Id. ibid.

(f) Lib. xxxviii, pag. 769, 770. ad ann. 1565.

(g) Gratianopoli jus civile magna auditorum frequentia profeſſus eſt.

(4) Schottus, Bibl. Hiſpan. pag. 617.

(5) Hiſt. Eccleſ. des Egliſes, lib. i, pag. 28.

(6) Andr. Schottus, Bibl. Hiſpan. pag. 401.

(7) Paul Freberus, tranſcribing this in his Theatrum, pag. 849, ſays, anno 1555, and makes it the beginning of a paragraph. They are two groſs miſtakes.

(8) Frider. Jac. Leickherus, in Not. ad Vitas Clariſſ. Juriſconſultorum, pag. 202, 233. Edit. Lipſ. 1686.

(9) Paſquier, Recherch. livr. ix, chap. xxxvii, pag. m. 898.

(10) Thuan. lib. xxxviii, pag. 769.

(11) Bibl Hiſp. Schotti, pag. 300.

college, whereof his brother was principal; that, in 1542, he taught at Paris under his uncle [G]; that, ſome time after, he returned to Bourdeaux to his brother; that he continued his abode in that city after his brother was gone to Coimbra (h); that he was reckoned an atheiſt by ſome people [H]; and that it is not probable he died in 1565, as Thuanus affirms (i); nor in 1595, as Nicolas Antonio ſays. This laſt author has not been perfectly exact [I]. Nothing can be ſaid more glorious to Antony Govea, than what 'the greateſt application.' A famous hiſtoriographer of Savoy (12) would confute the narrative of many writers, if what he ſays was true, that, in the year 1559, the duke of Savoy ſet up an univerſity at Mondevis, and, amongſt other learned men, made Antony Govea profeſſor there.

[G] In 1542, he taught at Paris under his uncle.] When Andrew Govea the nephew went to Bourdeaux, in 1534, he had been for ſome time principal of the college of St Barbara at Paris, in the room of Andrew Govea his uncle (13). And therefore, ſince the latter was principal at Paris in 1542 (14), we muſt conclude, that he reſumed his poſt, when his nephew went to Bourdeaux; which Elias Vinetus ſhould have obſerved in expreſs words, to make his relation more intelligible.

[H] He was reckoned an atheiſt by ſome people.] 'He was a counſellor at Grenoble: he read lectures 'in the univerſity of Valence, and wrote ſome 'books in thoſe two towns; where (15) he was accuſed of having ſpoken ill of the deity; and he 'was obliged to vindicate himſelf, which he did in 'an excellent diſcourſe, that was formerly in manuſcript in the library of Ennemond de Rabot d'Illins, firſt preſident in this parliament; upon which 'de Gordes, the king's lieutenant in this province, 'took occaſion to become his protector. This liberty of ſpeaking made Calvin call him an atheiſt in 'one of his works (16).' If the work, out of which I have taken this paſſage, contained two or three volumes in folio, the author might be excuſed for uſing a looſe citation; but it is a book of 224 pages in 12mo. The author might therefore have taken the pains to look for the place, where Calvin ſpeaks ſo ill of Govea, and he would have given great ſatisfaction to his readers by citing it; for he would have ſaved them the trouble of peruſing eight or nine volumes in folio. I will not be guilty of that fault, as large as my work is; but I ſhall quote Calvin's words, and mark the page where they are to be found. 'Agrippam, Villanovanum, Doletum, & ſimiles vulgò 'notum eſt tanquam Cyclopas quoſpiam Evangelium 'ſemper faſtuoſe ſpreviſſe: Tandem eo prolapſi ſunt 'amentiæ & furoris, ut non modò in Filium Dei 'execrabiles blaſphemias evomerent, ſed quantum ad 'animæ vitam attinet, nihil à canibus & porcis putarent 'ſe differre. Alii (ut Rabelæſus, Deperius, & Goveanus) guſtato Evangelio, eadem cœcitate ſunt percuſſi. 'Cur iſtud? niſi qui ſacrum illud vitæ æternæ pignus, ſacrilega ludendi aut ridendi audacia antè profanarant (17)? - - - - It is notorious, that Agrippa, 'Servetus, Doletus, and ſuch like, always treated the 'goſpel with the utmoſt contempt. At length they 'came to ſuch a pitch of madneſs, that they not only 'poured forth execrable blaſphemies againſt the ſon of 'GOD, but thought themſelves, as to the life of the 'ſoul, upon a level with dogs and ſwine. Others (as 'Rabelais, Deſperiers, and Goveanus) having taſted of 'the goſpel, were ſtruck with the ſame blindneſs. Why 'ſo? unleſs becauſe they had before ſacrilegiouſly and 'contemptuouſly profaned that ſacred pledge of eternal 'life?' We learn from theſe words, that Govea was a ſcoffer, and that at firſt he approved the reformation. This matter of fact is little known. See here the two verſes againſt Govea, concerning his want of faith.

Antoni Goveane, tua hæc Marrana propago,
In cœlo & cellis non putat eſſe Deum.

Govea, thy Jewiſh race a GOD deny
Both in the cellar, and the ſky.

They ſerved for an anſwer to this diſtich, which he had made againſt a counſellor (18):

Dum tonat, in cellas propero pede Vallius imas
Confugit: in cellis non putat eſſe Deum.

When thunder rumbles in the skies,
Down to the cellar Vallius flies.
There, to be ſure, he's ſafe: why ſo?
He thinks there is no GOD below.

You will find theſe four verſes in the firſt Scaligerana, with ſome other things that are to Govea's honour. 'Goveanus doctus erat vir, & valens dialecticus, optimus poëta Gallicus, nec enim Hiſpanum 'judicaveris, adeo bene Gallice loquebatur. - - - - Govea was a learned man, an able Logician, and a good 'French poet; for you would not take him for a Spaniard, he ſpoke French ſo well.' In the ſecond Scaligerana, the atheiſm, of which Calvin accuſes Govea, is called a calumny: 'Goveanus fuit doctus Luſitanus. Calvinus vocat illum Atheum cum non fuerit; 'debebat illum melius noſſe. ——— Govea was a 'learned Portugueſe. Calvin calls him an atheiſt, 'when he was not one: he ought to have known him 'better.

[I] Nicolas Antonio has not been perfectly exact.] He affirms (19), that Antony Govea taught the civil-law at Toulouſe, about the year 1539; but Elias Vinet deſerves more credit, who had a moſt intimate acquaintance with Andrew and Antony Govea, and was deſired by Andrew Schottus to ſend him the hiſtory of them. He only ſays, that, in the year 1539, Antony Govea ſtudied the civil-law at Toulouſe (20). Every one ſees the difference between ſtudying, and teaching the civil-law. Nicolas Antonio adds, that Govea was profeſſor a little after at Paris, and at Bourdeaux, and that at laſt he fixed at Cahors, where he taught the civil-law with a wonderful reputation; which, reaching as far as Turin, moved the duke of Savoy to invite him into his ſervice, offering to make him maſter of the requeſts and his counſellor. Cadurci demum ſubſtitit juris civilis anteceſſor in ſummo laudis atque exiſtimationis loco poſitus. Quod cum proſpexiſſet ab ipſa Auguſta Taurinorum Sabaudiæ Dux, &c (21). There are many miſtakes in this account. Govea's fame was heard of from a nearer place, after he had left Cahors: he read in the duke of Savoy's neighbourhood, at Valence in Dauphiné; and it was not in Quercy that this prince's offers were made to him. Beſides, the princeſs Margaret (22), ſiſter to Henry II, and wife to the duke of Savoy, recommended him to her huſband. Now, as ſhe was a learned woman, ſhe always deſired to know, who they were that diſtinguiſhed themſelves in France by their parts and learning. Nicolas Antonio pretends, that Govea was ſtill alive in the year 1595; for, ſays he, Teſauro, the younger, makes an honourable mention of him under this year, in the nineteenth quæſtio forenſis. If I had that book, I ſhould perhaps diſcover, that this commendation was not beſtowed upon that Govea I am ſpeaking of, but upon his ſon; and, though I could not diſcover it, I ſhould however believe, that Govea did not live till 1595; for Vinetus, who died in 1587 (23), ſpeaks of him as of a man that was dead (24). Nicolas Antonio, having falſely ſuppoſed, that Govea was alive in 1595, cenſures Elias Vinetus (25), who believed that he died at ſixty years of age. This cenſurer's reaſon is, that Govea taught the civil-law at Toulouſe in 1539. He is in the right to infer from thence, that Govea, being alive in 1595, died older than Vinetus believed. This conſequence is not ſo ſtrong, if we ſuppoſe, that Govea ſtudied the civil-law in 1539; yet it is ſtrong enough, becauſe Vinetus obſerves that Govea had been a teacher at Bourdeaux, before he ſtudied the civil-law at Toulouſe. A teacher of a claſs is commonly above twenty years old; and ſo Govea would have been at leaſt ſeventy ſeven years old in 1595. You will aſk me, what I have then to ſay againſt Nicolas Antonio? Is not Vinetus juſtly beaten at his own weapons? I anſwer, no; for ſince he died in 1587, he could not ſuppoſe that Govea was alive in 1595, and it is only upon this ſuppoſition that Nicolas

(h) Ex Epiſt. Eliæ Vineti, ubi ſupra.

(i) See the remark [I].

(12) Guichenon, Hiſt. de Savoye, Tom. I, pag. 678.

(13) Andreas apud patruum Grammaticam primum, mox Philoſophiam profeſſus, ab eodem ſcholæ illi tandem præfectus fuit. Vinetus, in Bibl. Hiſpan. pag. 475.

(14) Illic (Lutetiæ) Antonium Goveanum vidi primum an. à Chriſto nato 1542, quum doceret apud patruum. Id. ibid.

(15) The plain meaning of this is, that he was accuſed at Grenoble, and at Valence; but it is not at all likely, that this accuſation ſhould have been renewed in another place. It ſeems the author expreſſed himſelf wrong. He meant, that Govea was accuſed in one of theſe two towns. He ſhould have expreſſed himſelf without any equivocation; and he ſhould have told us, whether he was proſecuted at Grenoble or at Valence.

(16) Allard, Bibliotheque de Dauphiné, pag. 118, 119.

(17) Calvinus in Tractatu de Scandalis, in Volumine Tractatuum Theologicorum, pag. 90. col. 1. Edit. Genev. 1611.

(18) In the parliament of Bourdeaux, and not of Toulouſe, as it is affirmed in the Prima Scaligerana, pag. 86. See Mr Menage's Anti-Baillet, Tom I, p. 262, wherein he ſhews, that this counſellor's name was Brian de Vallée.

(19) Nic. Anton. Biblioth. Hiſpan. Tom. I, pag. 97.

(20) Literas ante profeſſus eſt quam ego qui veni an. Chriſt. 1539 quo tempore Toloſæ jam operam juri dabat. Vinetus, Epiſt. ad Schott. in Bibl. Hiſpan. pag. 475.

(21) Nic. Anton. ubi ſupra.

(22) Thuanus, lib. xxxviii, pag. 770.

(23) Thuanus, lib. xxxviii, pag. 137.

(24) Qui Taurinis deceſſiſſe fertur libellorum ſupplicum magiſter. Vinetus, ubi ſupra.

(25) He calls him wrong, Elias Venetus: Schottus's Bibliotheca Hiſpanica contains the ſame fault.

what Ronſard ſaid of him (k). Several of Govea's writings have been publiſhed both upon philology and the civil-law. Some maintain that he excelled the great Cujas in parts [K]. I will ſay ſomething of MAINFROI GOVEA, his ſon [L].

cholas Antonio's cenſure can be well grounded. It is certain he did not know when Vinetus died; his cenſure is an undoubted teſtimony of it: nor did he know, that Thuanus has beſtowed an encomium upon Govea; for had he known it, he would have cited that place, and not another, wherein that great hiſtorian ſpeaks of him only occaſionally (26). Beſides, Thuanus having placed Govea's death in the year 1565, Nicolas Antonio would not have failed to take notice of that miſtake, which, according to him, is an egregious one. Many people, and amongſt others Mr Allard, at the 119th page of the Bibliotheque of Dauphiné, and Mr Konig, at the 356th page of the Bibliotheca vetus & nova, follow Thuanus therein; but Andrew Schottus is none of them, ſince he affirms, at the 301ſt page of the Bibliotheca Hiſpanica, that Govea taught at Grenoble in the year 1566, and got children there after the year 1570.

[K] Some maintain that he exceeded the great Cujas in parts.] Antony Faber pretends, that Govea and Cujas were the two moſt excellent civilians of their age; but with this difference, that Govea had a happier genius, and, that, truſting too much to his parts, he did not think that labour was either honourable or neceſſary; whereas Cujas, of a leſs penetrating genius, laboured like a man, who was perſuaded, that, by dint of application, thoſe things might be diſcovered, which nothing can conquer but the ſtrength of wit. They that underſtand Latin will be pleaſed to ſee in what manner Antony Faber has pronounced this judgment. Tulit ætas noſtra maximos in Juriſprudentia viros non paucos, ſed præcipuos, ſi quid mei ingenii eſt, (cæterorum pace dixerim) Anton. Goveanum & Jac. Cujacium. Illum ut mihi quidem videtur, multo feliciore ingenio ad Juriſprudentiam natum: ſed qui naturæ viribus tam conſideret, ut diligentiæ laudem ſibi non neceſſariam, minus etiam fortaſſe honorificam putare videretur. Hunc contra, minus lucido præſtantique ingenii acumine, ſed qui aſſiduo labore ea quoque ſe adſequi poſſe crederet, quæ ſolis ingenii nervis parari queunt (27). Cujas himſelf was much of this mind: he would have given Govea the precedence, if he had obſerved him to be as ſtudious, as he was ingenious. Adoleſcens (Cujacius) Antonii Goveani Juriſconſulti ingenium admirabatur, ſed indiligentia hominis notata, nihil deterritus eſt, deterritum iri ſe dicens à jure tractando, ſi homo Luſitanus tanto ingenio, tamque ſubtili, labores civilium ſtudiorum ſeriò ſuſcipere ac ſubire voluiſſet (28).

Paſquier gives the pre-eminence to Cujas above Govea. ‘Taking a review, ſays he (29), of the three claſſes of thoſe that have written upon the civil-law; in the firſt, I highly value Accurſius amongſt the gloſſators; in the ſecond Bartolus . . . . and amongſt thoſe of the laſt, which I call humaniſts, I give the firſt place to our Cujas, who, according to my judgment, never had, nor has, nor perhaps ever will have, his equal. And, in the midſt of the latter, I ſee none that has written in more elegant language than Govea and Duarenus, for the little they have left of their works; and of theſe two, I give the precedence to Govea.’ I do not underſtand how Duarenus can be ſaid to have written little, when his works make a large folio (§ α).

[(§ α) Duaren has not written near ſo much as Cujas. This is what Paſquier would ſay, not in lib. 9. ch. 10. p. 902. but lib. 9. ch. 39. p. 902. of the edition of 1643. Rem. Crit.]

[L] I will ſay ſomething of MAINFROI GOVEA, his ſon.] He was born at Turin, and got a good faculty of writing both in proſe and verſe. He underſtood polite literature well, and the civil and canon law; and got the eſteem of the duke of Savoy, his maſter, who honoured him with a counſellor's place in the ſenate of Turin, and in the council of ſtate. He died in 1613. We have his Conſilia: Notæ & Animadverſiones in Opera Julii Clari: Carmina: Orazione funebre nelle morte di Filippo II Rè di Spagna (30).

(k) See, below, citat. (26).

(26) I grant, that in that place he beſtows a more exquiſite encomium upon him occaſionally, than when he ſpeaks of him ex profeſſo; for he reckons him among thoſe learned men who live in colleges, and are ſo happy as to have no manner of pedantry. Buchanan, Turnebus, and Muret, are the three others whom he places in that number, according to Ronſard's opinion. See, above, citat. (29) of the article BUCHANAN.

(27) Antonius Faber, in Præfat. lib. vii, & ſeq. Conjectur ad Petrum Fabrum apud Leickherum in Not. ad Vitas Clariſſ. Juriſconſultorum, pag. 200.

(28) Papyr. Maſſo in vita Cujacii, pag. 300, 301.

(29) Paſquier, Recherch, livr. ix, chap x, pag. 902.

(30) Taken from Ghilini, Teatro, part. II, pag. 189.

GOULART (Simon), a native of Senlis, and miniſter of Geneva, was one of the moſt indefatigable writers of theſe latter times [A]. When he did not put his name to a book, he denoted it by theſe three initial letters, S. G. S., which mean Simon Goulart Senliſien (a). It is by this mark father Labbe (b) believes with reaſon that he diſcovered him to be the author of the marginal notes, and ſummaries, in Nicetas Choniates's Annals, of the Geneva edition, in 1593. Goulart died at Geneva very old, in 1628 [B]. The ordinary date of his epiſtles dedicatory is from St Gervais, which is the name of part of Geneva. If we did not know, that he dated in the ſame manner the letters that he did not deſign for the public (c), we ſhould doubtleſs believe, that he did it, becauſe this date did not make his compoſures ſuſpected by the Catholics, as the name of Geneva would have done. He had a very extenſive knowledge of books; for which reaſon Henry III deſiring to know the author, who diſguiſed himſelf under the name of Stephanus Junius Brutus, to vent a very republican doctrine, ſent a man on purpoſe to Simon Goulart, to be informed of it; but Goulart, who knew all the myſtery, would not diſcover it, for fear of expoſing thoſe that were concerned (d). Scaliger

[A] He was one of the moſt indefatigable writers of theſe latter times.] This appears by the multitude of books he adorned with notes and ſummaries (1), or comments, or which he turned into French, or wrote of his own. Du Bartas's weeks are one of the books, upon which he has commented. He did not content himſelf to tranſlate Camerarius's hiſtorical meditations into French, but added many thing to them. He made a great collection of admirable and memorable ſtories. La Croix du Maine will inform you of many French tranſlations written by Simon Goulart; that of the hiſtory of Portugal (2); of the chronicle of Carion; of ſome tracts of Theodoret; of John Wierus's books concerning the impoſture of devils. Add to this the verſion of all the works of Seneca, publiſhed at Paris, in two volumes, in 4to in the year 1590. The ſame author writ ſeveral tracts of devotion and morality, and upon the affairs of his time. D'Aubigné praiſes the latter; for, giving the titles of ſome books of this kind, he goes on thus: ‘To which I will add the ſeveral learned, pathetic, and cogent writings, which Simon Goulart, of Senlis, has written on ſeveral occaſions; a writer fit to write hiſtory, if his profeſſion had permitted him to write without judging (3).’

I have obſerved in the margin, that Simon Goulart added notes and ſummaries to Amiot's Plutarch. I muſt farther ſay, that he added to them ſome parallels, upon which Varillas paſſes no favourable judgment. ‘As ingenious, ſays he (4), as was Simon Goulart, of Senlis, miniſter of Geneva in our father's time; and as diligent as he was to add to the French Plutarch the compariſons that are wanting in the Greek, there is but one that is good, which is that of Alexander the Great with Julius Cæſar.’

[B] He died very old, in 1628 (§ α).] We learn from a letter that he wrote to Scaliger, the ſeventeenth of October 1606 (5), that he was then at the end of his ſixty third year. There are few that have been in the miniſtry ſo long as he: for he ſucceeded Calvin in the year 1564 (6).

[(§ α) Simon Goulart died at the age of eighty ſix years, and had preached ſeven days before his death. This is what d'Aubigné ſays, in the laſt page of his Opuſcula Miſcellanea, where we find the elogy of this miniſter. Rem. Crit.]

(a) In the catalogue of the Bodleian library, he is called Simon Goulartius Sanliſienſis Sylvanectinus. The word five ſhould have been put between the two laſt words.

(b) De Sciptorib. Eccleſ. Tom. II, pag. 765.

(c) See the letters he wrote to Scaliger, in the collection publiſhed by James de Reves, at Harderwyc, 1624.

(d) See his funeral oration, pronounced by Mr Tronchin, profeſſor of divinity.

(1) This he did to all Plutarch's works, tranſlated by Amiot.

(2) Written by Oſorius.

(3) D'Aubigné, Hiſt. Univerſ. Tom. III, lib. iii, cap. xxiii, pag. m. 401.

(4) Varillas, Hiſt. de Louis XI, livr. xi, at the beginning, pag. m. 358, 359.

(5) It is the 52d of the third book in the collection of James de Reves.

(6) Spon, Hiſt. de Geneve, pag. m. 263.

liger eſteemed him much [C]. A ſon of Simon Goulart was miniſter of the Walloon church at Amſterdam, and earneſtly eſpouſed the Arminian intereſt [D].

[C] Scaliger eſteemed him much.] 'Mr Goulart ... 'has ſucceeded well upon his Cyprian. He is a fine 'man, who has learned every thing of himſelf; and 'who began the Latin tongue late, when I was at 'Geneva. It is ſaid, that his ſon pleaſes his church. 'I like Mr Goulart's performance upon his Cyprian: 'I have read it throughout. His ſermons were very 'perſpicuous. He has caſtrated Montagne's works; 'Quæ audacia in ſcripta aliena! Non putaſſem Goulartium, quod ſerius incæpit, tam bene poſſe ſcribere, 'ut fecit (7).' I ſhall now ſpeak of his ſon.

[D] One of his ſons eſpouſed the Arminian intereſt.] Being provoked by a young miniſter, his colleague, he preached one day againſt thoſe, who ſay, that, by virtue of the decrees of reprobation, ſome children, who die at the breaſt, or in their mothers womb, are damned eternally. He was ſuſpended for it in 1615 (8). He was one of the Remonſtrant miniſters, who, for refuſing to ſubſcribe to the ſynod of Dort, were turned out of their places, and expelled the country. He retired to Antwerp; from whence he wrote ſome letters, that have been inſerted in the collection, which I cite in the margin. He wrote one to his father in March, 1620 (9), in which he mentions a book, which he had printed two years before, with this title: Examen des opinions de M. F. Baſſecourt (10) contenues en ſon livre de diſputes, intitulé, Election éternelle & ſes dependances. He retired into France after the end of the truce between the Dutch and the Spaniards, and ſtaid ſome years at Calais, from whence he went into the country of Holſtein. There is one of his letters (11), which gives no good teſtimony to the miniſters, with reſpect to the wars of religion, which prevailed in France at that time. According to Mr Witte, he was born at Senlis (12), and died at Fredericſtadt in 1628, at fifty two years of age. Mr Mollerus, who thought he was of Geneva, before his reading the ſecond Tome of the Diarium Biographicum, changed his notion, when he knew that Mr Witte made him a native of Senlis: Senliſienſem Silvanectinum eſſe rectius forte tradit vir clariſſimus Henn. Wittenius (13). I think Mr Mollerus's firſt opinion the more probable of the two; and as he obſerves, that Mr Witte aſcribes to Goulart the ſon, the works he ſhould have aſcribed to Goulart the father; he might have ſaid, that probably the time of the death of the one has been confounded with that of the other (14). See what he afterwards obſerved in his book De ſcriptoribus homonymis, at the 678th and 679th pages.

(7) In Scaligeranis, pag m. 97, 98.

(8) See the Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ & Theologicæ, pag. 414, Edit in fol.

(9) It is the 274th of the ſame Epiſtolæ Eccleſiaſticæ, &c.

(10) He was a miniſter, who had been a monk.

(11) It is the 424th. See page 696.

(12) Senliſienſis; Silvanectinus, Witte, Diar. Biograph. Tom. II, pag. 35. There ſhould be ſite between thoſe two words. Mr Mollerus, ubi infra, quotes them without a comma.

(13) Mollerus, Iſagoge ad Hiſtor. Cherſ. Cimbr. part. II, pag. 223.

(14) Witte places the death of Goulart, the ſon, on the nineteenth of March, 1628.

GOULU (NICOLAS), in Latin Gulonius, the ſon of a Vine-Dreſſer near Chartres [A], was made Regius Profeſſor of the Greek tongue in the univerſity of Paris, in the year 1567 (a), in the place of John Daurat, whoſe daughter he had married. He tranſlated from Greek into Latin, Gregentius's diſpute againſt Herbanus the Jew (b), which Giles de Noailles, ambaſſador of France in Turkey, brought from Conſtantinople. This verſion, together with ſome notes of Nicolas Goulu, was printed with the Greek text at Paris in the year 1586. A collection of ſeveral pieces of this profeſſor had already been printed in the ſame city, in 1580 [B]. He had two ſons, John and Jerom, of whom I ſhall ſpeak hereafter. Magdalen Daurat, his wife, was a learned woman. Her epitaph ſhews, that ſhe underſtood the Greek, Latin, Italian, and Spaniſh tongues. Mr Menage (c) affords me all theſe particulars. We ſhall ſee in the articles of Nicholas Goulu's ſons, or in the remarks of this article, what remains to be obſerved concerning his works. It is ſomewhat probable, that d'Aubigné meant him in the eighth chapter of the firſt book of his Baron de Fæneſte. The place is very ſatirical [C]. Some wonder, that Daurat did not oblige his ſon-in-law to change his name of Goulu [D].

(a) Du Breul, Antiq. de Paris, pag. 565.

(b) Menage, Rem ſur la Vie d'Ayraut, pag. 252, & 501.

(c) Ibid.

[A] He was the ſon of a vine-dreſſer near Chartres.] William du Val, who, in his catalogue of the royal profeſſors, ſays that Nicolas Goulu was of Limouſin, has commited a fault; and perhaps has done it by conſidering, that Daurat, who had given Nicolas Goulu one of his daughters, and his place, was of that country. Goulu himſelf declares, before ſome Latin poems, which he publiſhed, that he was of Chartres (1).

[B] A collection of ſeveral pieces of this profeſſor had been already publiſhed.] Namely, the tranſlation of Apollinaris's Greek paraphraſe upon the Pſalms: a paraphraſe in Greek verſe upon the Magnificat, the Nunc Dimittis, the Song of Zachary; an hymn of JESUS CHRIST; and a preface in Greek verſe upon Apollinaris's paraphraſe. This book was unknown to the laſt continuator of Geſner's epitome, and to Du Verdier Vau-Privas, who made ſome additions to that epitome. And it does not appear in the catalogues of Draudius, nor in that of Oxford, nor in that of Thuanus, nor in that of the archbiſhop of Reims.

[C] The place is very ſatirical.] For the honour of the learned Magdalen Daurat, I could wiſh, that either Nicolas Goulu had been married twice, and that the four following lines concerned his other wife; or that d'Aubigné was not miſtaken about the country of him he mentions: for this would prove, that this ſatire does not concern Nicolas Goulu. However it be, it is thus he ſpeaks: 'There was, at 'Paris, a native of Loudun, and a learned man, 'called le Goulu: he was mad, when his wife took 'to board thoſe that ſtudied the law: he would 'only have little boys: upon this, four verſes were 'made, the ſenſe whereof is well worth the rhime.' They are theſe:

Du Goulu ſavant ne prend gueres
Les barbus pour Penſionnaries;
Il choiſit les petits enfans,
Mais la Gouluë les veut grands.

Goulu to board will ne're take in Youths with a beard upon their chin;
Children alone he'll entertain;
But Madam Goulu will have men.

That which might make one ſuſpect, than John Daurat's ſon-in-law is not here meant, is, to ſee, that he is not ſtyled profeſſor, or Greek reader; which probably d'Aubigné was not ignorant of; and he was not a man, who on ſuch an occaſion would be wanting to characterize a man. Let us therefore leave the thing undecided. Du Verdier Vau-Privas did not know this man's chriſtian name. 'Daurat 'ſays he (2), had a daughter, whom he married to 'G. Goulu, a public reader of the Greek tongue, 'with whom he had ſome debate; and, ſpeaking of 'him, he called him mon Goulu, (my glutton.)'

[D] Some wonder that Daurat did not oblige him to change his name of Goulu.] I borrow this remark from Mr Baillet. 'This ſame Daurat, ſays he (3), 'who ſeemed to be aſhamed of, and diſguſted with, 'the name of Diſnemandi (dine-early), made no 'ſcruple to marry his daughter to another learned 'man, named Goulu (glutton); which name denotes 'ſomething ſtill baſer than that of Diſnemandi, and 'which is not much better than lurco among the 'Latins. After what he had done for his own name, 'there is reaſon to wonder he did not make it an 'article in the contract of his daughter's marriage, 'that Goulu ſhould change his name; and that he 'was willing, that not only his ſon-in-law, but alſo 'his grand-children, ſhould preſerve that name, and 'render it immortal to poſterity, without taking any 'farther liberty than that of changing it into Latin 'by the word Gulonius.' Doubtleſs there is reaſon to wonder at it: for on one hand, the practice of

(1) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayraut, pag. 251, 252.

(2) Proſopographie, Tom. III, pag. 2576.

(3) Auteurs déguiſez, pag. 156.

of metamorphoſing one's name was common at that time amongſt the learned; and, on the other, it muſt needs be ſomewhat unpleaſant to bear a name, which excites certain ideas, and occaſions a thouſand ſilly alluſions. It is very probable, that, when families began to diſtinguiſh themſelves by proper names, ſome perſons were called by a name that ſuited them for certain defects. (a) This is in all likelihood the reaſon why, in all countries, ſome families bear the name of blind, crooked, and black. Upon this ſcore, Daurat ſhould have been diſpleaſed with a name that made people think he was deſcended from a ſtarveling, and that his ſon-in-law had not a better original. (b) I omit the ſcurvy jeſts, that the poets of Balzac's party grounded upon the name of his adverſary Father Goulu. See the Vaticinium Galateæ de exitio Pantophagi, prefixed to Mr de la Motte-Aigron's anſwer (4).

(4) Compare with this what you find in remark [A] of the article FEU-ARDENTIUS.

(a) it was certainly so among the Romans & many instances may be produced of great familys

(b). Nothing is meaner lower lived than to Joke upon a mans Na[me] Puns upon Name seldom shew wit or Learning —

GOULU (JOHN), ſon of him I have been mentioning, had not perhaps more merit than his father, though he made more noiſe. He was born at Paris the twenty fifth of Auguſt 1576 (a), and, being admitted an advocate, he deſigned to exerciſe that profeſſion in the parliament of that city; but he had the misfortune to be at a ſtand the very firſt time he pleaded a cauſe [A]; and it is thought, that this diſgrace made him reſolve to leave the world, and turn monk. He choſe the order of the Feuillants, and was admitted into it in 1604. He was ſo much eſteemed in his order, that he had always ſome office in it, and at laſt was made general [B]. His religious name was that of Dom John of St Francis. As he underſtood Greek, he applied himſelf to tranſlate into French Epictetus's Enchiridion, Arrianus's Diſſertations, ſome tracts of St Baſil, and the works of Dionyſius the Areopagite [C]. He added to this laſt tranſlation an apology for the works of this Dionyſius. He alſo reviſed the Latin verſion his father had made of the tracts of St Gregory Nyſſen againſt Eunomius, and publiſhed it. It is in the edition of St Gregory Nyſſen (b), procured by Fronto Ducæus (c). Father Goulu, not contented with making tranſlations, engaged alſo in controverſy, and wrote a book againſt that, which Du Moulin had publiſhed concerning the call of paſtors [D]. We have alſo his life of Francis de Sales, biſhop of Geneva; and his funeral oration of Nicolas

(a) St Romuald. Theſaur. Chron. ad ann. 1629.

(b) Labbe, de Script. Eccleſ. Tom. I, pag. 382.

(c) At Paris, 1615.

[A] He had the misfortune to be at a ſtand, the firſt cauſe he pleaded.] My voucher is one of Father Goulu's enemies, viz. Mr de la Motte-Aigron, (1) who relates the adventure in ſuch a manner, that it manifeſtly appears by a great number of circumſtances, that John Goulu had the misfortune to be at a ſtand the firſt time of his pleading. La Motte-Aigron dares not affirm, that, having ventured upon a ſecond tryal, he had the ſame ill luck; but he tells us (2), that ſome have ſaid it; and he inſinuates (3), that Goulu never pretended to preach after he turned Feuillant. But Balzac gives us to underſtand the contrary, in theſe words: 'His picture, ſays he '(4), is ſhewn as a rarity in an apartment of the 'galleries of the Louvre: it was drawn by the 'painter of the heroes and heroines, and ſo much 'to the life, that it wants nothing but ſpeech. Some 'ſay, that this ſilence is not ſo much an imperfec'tion of art, as one of the properties of my adver'ſary; and that, when he pleaded in parliament, and 'PREACHED before the chapter, (for he has been 'an advocate and a PREACHER) he was uſed thus 'to keep gravity, and frequently to conclude 'without ſaying a word. The ill tongues are pleaſ'ed to make themſelves merry upon it; and al'ledge, amongſt other inſtances, the mute Rhetori'cian, ſo ill treated by the poet Auſonius (5), upon 'whoſe picture he thus plays at the end of an epi'gram: what is Rufus doing in his chair? the ſame 'thing as in his picture.'

I am going to cite another paſſage, not becauſe it makes mention of that adventure, but becauſe it may ſerve to undeceive thoſe, who believe it no great crime to prevaricate with the words of an author, in order to render him odious. I maintain, that this baſeneſs differs not from that of notaries, who falſify a contract: let us hear a man upon this, whoſe eloquence has a great deal of majeſty. 'You 'muſt confeſs, ſays he (6), that it is no ſmall effect 'of the providence of GOD, that ſo dangerous a man 'ſhould have been thwarted in the firſt profeſſion 'he had choſen, and expelled from the bar by ſo 'notable a diſgrace as happened to him in a full au'ditory. The fatal blow, his tongue was ſtruck 'with, has been the preſervation of many families: It 'has been a bleſſing to the widows and orphans, that 'might have fallen into his hands; and on that day 'probably GOD ſecured this poor kingdom from 'many volumes of falſe contracts, and wills of the 'ſame nature, wherewith his fine wit threatened it '(7).' For the reſt, Father Goulu's elogy, which I ſhall quote in the following remarks, ſpeaks of him as a man, who might have ſignalized himſelf amongſt the moſt famous advocates. Foro jam aſſuetus, ubi celeberrimus inter Juriſconſultos tunc temporis eminere poſſet. We muſt not deprive an elogy of the privilege of being ſubreptitious, but we ſhould not extend it ſo far as to make it obreptitious.

[B] He choſe the order of the Feuillants . . . . . He was made general.] They, who ſay he was twice general (8), did not conſult his elogy in the ſecond edition of his Dionyſius the Areopagite (9). This elogy informs us, that, from the time of his noviciate, he had always ſome employments in the order; and that at laſt he was raiſed to the firſt, which he exerciſed for ſix years; after which he was made counſellor, and aſſiſtant to him that ſucceeded him. From whence it appears, that la Motte-Aigron is miſtaken, when he ſays (10), that Dom John Goulu has been theſe three years general of his order. He wrote this in 1627, or in 1628. Father Goulu died in the beginning of 1629, being no longer in the office of general, which he had exerciſed ſix years: the concluſion is evident. An author of Livonia (11) ſays, that this father was general of the congregation of the order of Citeaux: he ſhould have ſaid, of the congregation of the Feuillants, which is a branch of the order of Citeaux.

[C] He applied himſelf to tranſlate into French Epictetus's Enchiridion . . . . . and the works of Dionyſius the Areopagite.] I have not named each tranſlation according to it's time; but here they are in better order. The firſt was that of Dionyſius the Areopagite, which was printed in 1608, and reprinted in 1629, and in 1642. The ſecond was that of Epictetus: it came out in 1609, and it appears by the licence, that he undertook it for queen Mary de Medicis. The third was that of St Baſil's homilies upon the Hexameron, which was printed in 1616 (12).

[D] He wrote a book againſt that, which Du Moulin publiſhed concerning the call of paſtors.] I find a great difference betwixt the monk St Romuald, and la Motte-Aigron; not only with reſpect to the quality of this anſwer, which the latter deſpiſes, as much as the other commends it; but alſo with reſpect to the time, in which it was written. It was in the life-time of Francis de Sales, if we believe the monk: who tells us (13), that this prelate, having read the book of the Call of Paſtors againſt Du Moulin, judged, that Father Goulu was the only perſon fit to ſucceed in the labours of cardinal du Perron againſt Hereſy. But la Motte-Aigron pretends (14), that this father officiouſly undertook this anſwer after the death of Coëffeteau; and he admires how he ſhould preſume to think himſelf a proper combatant to ſucceed the great Coëffeteau againſt Du Moulin. Francis de Sales died ſome months before Coëffeteau; and therefore he had not ſeen Father Goulu's anſwer, if

(1) Réponſe à Phyllarque, pag. 74, & ſeq.

(2) Ibid. pag. 75.

(3) Ibid. pag. 80, 83.

(4) Relation à Menandre, part. I, pag. m. 309.

(5) In the 47th epigram.

REFLEXION on the crime of falſe quotations.

(6) Balzac, Oeuvres diverſes, Diſc. xiv, pag. m. 377.

(7) This is grounded upon a conceit, that Goulu falſified and altered what he cited out of Balzac. See, concerning that fault, the Avis au petit Auteurs des petits livrets, which came out during the controverſy about the chimerical cabal of Rotterdam, in 1691, and 1692.

(8) Mr Menage is one of them, Remarq ſur la Vie d'Ayraut, pag. 252.

(9) It came out in the year 1629, in 4to. Father de Viſch has inſerted that encomium in his Bibliotheca Scriptorum ſacri Ordinis Ciſtercienſis, pag. 220.

(10) Pag. 72.

(11) Witte, Diar. Biographic. in Append.

(12) Ex Biblioth. Ciſtercienſ. Caroli de Viſch.

(13) Theſaur. Chronol. ad ann. 1627.

(14) Pag. 91, 92.

Nicolas le Fevre, preceptor to Lewis XIII: but it is ſaid he never recited it [E]. To ſpeak the truth, he got no great reputation by thoſe pieces; but he was engaged in an affair in the year 1627, that made him extreamly talked of [F]. A Feuillant, who went only by the name of Brother Andrew (d), had made a ſmall collection of thoughts, whereof he believed Balzac had only been the tranſcriber. Thoſe, who envied Balzac's glory, ſo mightily cried up this piece, which was only handed about in manuſcript, that it gave occaſion to the Apology, which Ogier, his good friend, publiſhed, in which Brother Andrew was very ſeverely treated. The copy that was ſent to Father Goulu, who was then general of the order, was taken for a challenge, which put him into a furious paſſion. He publiſhed two volumes of letters againſt Balzac, wherein he horribly inveighs againſt him. He gave himſelf the name of Phyllarchus, that is to ſay, Prince des feuilles, Prince of the leaves, as his adverſaries rendered it; and it is not to be doubted, that he had in view his quality of general of the Feuillants, when he diſguiſed himſelf under this falſe name. To have a right notion of his animoſity, one need only conſider, that he did all that lay in him to engage the whole world in the ruin of Balzac, and gave him up to all the rigour of the ſecular power: nay, he attempted to engage the women in the puniſhment of this adverſary. He directed his ſpeech to them, uſing the flattering words of handſome ladies (e); and declared, That if they had never ſo little courage, they were obliged to put out Balzac's eyes with the points of their needles; or, in caſe of mercy, to ſubmit him to the ſame puniſhment the court ladies deſigned to inflict on John de Meun; which was that of the laſh. The zeal of Father Goulu, who thus, in a book, raiſed all the world againſt an author, whoſe whole fault conſiſted in uſing ſome thoughts, that were inſipid, too free, and too immodeſt, and in not repreſſing the heat and exaggeration of a growing imagination; this zeal, I ſay, that came from the preſs, was not the moſt miſchievous. That of his emiſſaries, who as far as his juriſdiction reached, and wherever they could ſet foot, vented, in converſation, a thouſand diſadvantageous things againſt Mr de Balzac [G], according to the cuſtom of bigots [H], was much more dangerous. Then it was that Father Goulu's

(d) It is he, whom Balzac calls Dom André de St Denys, in the letters he wrote to him after they were reconciled. See the remark [C] of the article BALZAC (JOHN, &c.)

(e) The fifteenth letter of the firſt Tome.

if it was undertaken at the time ſpecified by la Motte-Aigron. But that you may know on which ſide the miſtake lies, I ought to inform you, that Father Goulu's book againſt Du Moulin came out in 1620, and Coeffeteau did not die till 1623.

[E] We have .... his funeral oration of Nicolas le Fevre .... but it is pretended, that he never recited it.] La Motte-Aigron poſitively affirms it; and therefore we muſt read with ſome caution what is ſaid in Moreri's dictionary, in the article of Nicolas le Fevre, that John de St François, a Feuillant, made his funeral oration. Mr Balzac (15) cites a paſſage of it, which is in a very high-flown ſtyle, and ſomewhat harſh. It was printed the firſt time in 1612. The author put his name only to the ſecond edition in 1616. The third edition was enlarged with two tracts (16).

(15) Relat. à Menandre, part. III.

(16) Bibliot. Ciſtercienſ. Caroli de Viſch.

[F] He was engaged in an affair in the year 1627 that made him extremely talked of] This is the epoch of Balzac's and Father Goulu's difference; for that which incenſed the latter, was, the apology publiſhed for the former, and printed off the eighth of April 1627. The firſt volume of Phyllarchus's letters, which came out the ſame year, is chiefly levelled at Mr Balzac; but the apologiſt is alſo attacked in it from time to time. This ſhews, that Menage and Peter Borel are miſtaken, in ſaying, the one (17), that prior Ogier anſwered Father Goulu's books againſt Mr Balzac, in a book, intituled, Mr Balzac's apology; the other (18), that Des Cartes very ſeaſonably recommended Mr Balzac, in oppoſition to Father Goulu, in the year 1625, to cardinal Barberini, legate in France. It is certain, that prior Ogier's book was publiſhed before Phyllarchus's letters, and that, in 1625, Balzac had no controverſy with Father Goulu.

(17) Remarques ſur la vie d'Ayraut, pag. 252.

(18) Vitæ Carteſii Compend.

Richelet has committed the ſame fault as Mr Menage. 'Father Goulu, ſays he (19), inveighed more 'againſt Balzac; for he wrote a very ſevere criticiſm 'upon his writings, which might have given ſome 'trouble to that eloquent man, if Mr Ogier, a young 'eccleſiaſtic, had not writ an apology, wherein he 'ſhewed, that the good father was in the wrong.' We ſhould, in matters of fact, follow the advice, which Des Cartes gives with reſpect to philoſophical ſpeculations, examine every thing afreſh without any regard to what others have written concerning it: but it is infinitely more convenient to ſtand to the teſtimony of others, and this is what prodigiouſly multiplies the aſſertors of falſities.

(19) Richelet, vie des Auteurs François, prefixed to a collection of letters, pag. 42.

[G] His emiſſaries .... vented in converſation a thouſand diſadvantageous things againſt Mr Balzac.] The proof of this is to be found in the Relations to Menandre. You there ſee (20), that, in all the places ſubject to the general of the Feuillants juriſdiction, Balzac was now called the monſter; and that he was known to the novices and lay-brothers only by that name. You there find Balzac's complaints againſt the inventions and artifices of calumny. 'Nothing has 'been omitted, ſays he (21), to give credit to my ad'verſary, and to deſtroy my reputation. A ſchool 'difference is become an affair of ſtate; and a ſport 'about ſyllables and words is grown into a general 'war of wits. Many ſtories have been ſpread to my 'prejudice, and many more to the advantage of my 'enemy. All voices have been canvaſſed; all France 'has been ſollicited for him. He has neither wanted 'orators, nor poets, nor paraſites, who have preached 'him up, and ſung him, and drank to his victory in 'good companies.... (22) Not to ſpeak of the practi'ces carried on out of the kingdom, and of the mon'ſtrous picture that has been made of me in all the 'courts of chriſtendom; you need only know what 'happened at Paris in the firſt heat of the war. For 'three months together, ſeveral men of his faction 'went out every morning, two and two, being or'dered to do me ill offices in all the diſtricts of the 'vulgar, and every where to ſpread their ſlanders, 'with a deſign to raiſe the populace upon me, and 'move them to treat my perſon, as their ſuperior has 'treated my book...... To ſtrengthen their crew, 'they have been in queſt of men, condemned by the 'public voice; men, famous for their debaucheries 'and ſcandalous lives; known all over the kingdom by 'the ill opinion they entertain of the Chriſtian faith, 'and the contempt they profeſs of our holy myſte'ries. They have offered to this ſet of people; who 'can believe it? but it is true, however, that they have 'offerred them their protection againſt the Jeſuits; and 'that they have emboldened them againſt the alarms 'of their conſcience, and the threatenings of the laws: 'It is true, that they promiſed them their favour and 'teſtimony, in caſe they ſhould be accuſed of impiety, 'or of any other capital crime, provided they would 'join with them on this occaſion, and declare war 'againſt me, under the banner of my adverſary.'

(20) Balzac, Oeuvres diverſes, pag. 310. Rouen, 1658, in 8vo.

(21) Ibid. pag. 336.

(22) Ibid. pag. 339.

[H] .... according to the cuſtom of bigots.] This is their method. Some of them write libels, which others ſet off in converſation; and there are no cavils, but by this means they convert into good reaſons with abundance of people. It is a ſcene that is acted in all countries: ſuch people are ſo well known, that it has been no difficult thing to paint them to the Goulu's fame ſpread far and near [I]. He had for his partiſans, on one hand, almoſt all the monks [K], becauſe Balzac had ſpoken of their learning with a little too much contempt; and, on the other, all thoſe, who envied the great reputation of this young author. A great many writings were publiſhed pro and con (f), and they even came to ſword and piſtol; which probably ſilenced ſome writers, who did not care to come to blows. Father Goulu did not long enjoy the pleaſure of raiſing ſo great a diſorder in the Republic of Letters; for he died the fifth of January 1629 (g) [L]. He was buried in the choir of the Feuillants at Paris. It was ſaid among other things, in his epitaph, that he had reſtored, by his writings, the purity of the French tongue (b). Balzac exclaimed againſt it [M]. La Motte-Aigron, one of his defenders, publiſhed ſome things concerning Father Goulu, that are ſomewhat ſingular [N].

(f) See Sorel's Bibliotheque Françoiſe, chap. vii.

(g) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayraut, pag. 252. St Romuald, Journ. Chronol. Tom. I, pag. 24.

(b) Scriptis ſuis mirum quantum adulteratam eloquentiæ puritatem revocaverit, conſervaverit, illuſtraverit.

the life. This has been lately done by ſome wits of Paris (23): but what does it ſignify to draw their pictures? Are their artifices and contrivances ever the leſs formidable?

(23) Madam. des Houlieres Mr de la Bruyere, the abbot de Villiers, &c.

[I] Then it was that Father Goulu's fame ſpread far and near.] Beſides what I have juſt now quoted out of the Relation to Menandre, here is another extract of it, which admirably proves, that this quarrel made Father Goulu's name fly into all parts (24). 'Some of 'his partiſans have affirmed, that he had received a 'brief from our holy father the Pope .... Others 'have ſaid, that the aſſembly of the clergy ſent deputies to him, to congratulate him on the proſperity of 'his arms ...... There is no prince or princeſs, no 'lord or lady, to whom he has not made a preſent of 'his books, moſt of them bound like a common-prayer-book, or devout prayers. They have paſſed 'the Rhine, the Danube, and the ocean; they are 'gone over the Alps, and Pyrennees: they are the 'ſubject of all converſations, and get into every 'cloſet. Whole carts have been loaded with them 'to be ſent to the ſiege of Rochelle. ..... (25) 'His picture is ſhewn as a curioſity in an apartment 'of the galleries of the Louvre ..... A man muſt 'be a ſtranger to the court, or have no noble curioſity, who has not ſeen the picture of this dreadful 'prince.'

(24) Balzac, ubi ſupra, pag. 337, 338.

(25) Ibid. pag. pag. 309.

[K] He had, for his partiſans, on one hand, almoſt all the monks.] It is not without reaſon, that I make this exception, ſince Balzac declares (26), 'that many 'honeſt monks had publickly blamed Father Goulu's 'fault.' Entire orders, continues he, that is, as he he himſelf informs us a little lower, 'the principal 'men of their ſocieties, have given teſtimony to my 'innocence, and proteſted againſt the inſincerity of 'my enemy .. Amongſt his own monks there are ſome, 'who are not very well ſatisfied with what he has 'done ... He has not received, from the old and 'ſevere monks, the praiſes, that have been given 'him by the young and jovial ones ..... Beſides, 'things are not ſo well united in his ſtate, but there 'is ſome diſunited part that ſuffers, or makes others 'ſuffer. That venerable body has it's wounds, and 'it's ſecret infirmities; and, if I was willing to take 'advantage of the diviſion I have diſcovered, and to 'improve the diſcontents of uneaſy minds, I could 'make a notable diverſion. It is certain, that ſome 'have offered to ſerve me in it, even in Italy, and 'that I might have been furniſhed with memoirs for 'that purpoſe, but I would not make uſe of them.' He ſhews in another place (27), that, if he did not uſe all his ſtrength againſt a monk, the reaſon was, that he would not give the Huguenots the pleaſure of laughing. Perhaps this was the reaſon why la Motte-Aigron, his ſecond, did not publiſh the Latin book, wherewith he had threatened (28) Father Goulu, which was to reveal a great many myſteries. You ſee what it is to be ingaged in the ſervice of the church; there is no venturing to expoſe you, and you go unpuniſhed, for fear of affording other religions matter of laughter. I have ſpoken in another place (29) of a man, who, being deſirous to diſſuade his ſon from the bar, in order to make him a clergyman, alledged a very good reaſon to him; but he forgot another, which is ſtill better, that is, the impunity I have juſt now mentioned.

(26) Ibid. pag. 342, 343.

(27) Ibid. pag. 316.

(28) Réponſe à Phyllarque, pag. 71, 322.

(29) Above, in remark [L] of the article ACCIUS.

[L] He died the fifth of January 1629.] The author of the Elogy of Father Goulu, and Peter de St Romuald, who mentions this date, add, that Father Goulu died, being fifty four years old. I could not keep to this, having adopted the birth-day, which I have found in St Romuald, viz. the twenty fifth of Auguſt 1576. I know not whether I have followed a good guide; for though, as a Feuillant, it ſeems he could not be miſtaken about ſuch a fact, yet it cannot be denied that he has confuted himſelf, ſince he ſays, in the Abridgment of his Theſaurus, and in his Chronological Journal, that Father Goulu died fifty four years old. It is a wretched thing to be forced to make uſe of unexact authors; one had better have to do with writers, whoſe faults have ſome coherence. At leaſt, a man ſhould give notice, when he uſes different calculations, in which of them he has been miſtaken. However it be, la Motte-Aigron may be taxed with great negligence, who, writing againſt Father Goulu in 1628, made him ſixty years old (30) and above, and about forty years older than the Samaritane (31).

(30) Pag. 101.

(31) Pag 72.

[M] Balzac exclaimed againſt it.] See his Latin poem, intituled, Crudelis Umbra, and the Latin letter (32), in which he ſo ingeniouſly applied theſe two verſes of Ovid to his enemy.

(32) It is at page 243, of the Paris Edit. 1651, in 12mo.

Ergo & adhuc metuendus erat: Cinis ipſe ſepulti
In caput hoc ſævit: tumulo quoque ſenſimus hoſtem (33).

Still formidable, tho' in earth laid low,
Dreadful in death, and in the grave a foe.

(33) Thus Ovid, Metamorph. lib. xiii, ver. 503, brings in Hecuba ſpeaking of Achilles, who deſires, that Polexena may be ſacrificed.

Peter de St Romauld ſays in his Theſaurus Chronologicus (34), that Father Goulu's epitaph is of Mr Corneille's making. Note, that the duke of Vendome, natural ſon to Henry IV, and Francis of Lorrain, his wife, cauſed to be put on Father Goulu's tomb, the epitaph which is to be ſeen there. Mr Menage affirms it in the 252d page of his remarks on the life of Peter Ayrault.

(34) Ad ann. 1629.

[N] La Motte-Aigron has publiſhed ſome things concerning Father Goulu, that are ſomewhat ſingular.] Father Goulu (35) being as yet but tutor in a gentleman's houſe, who lived at Paris, went with him into the country of Angoumois, and lodged with him in the houſe of la Motte-Aigron's father. He was there tormented with ſuch an exceſſive thirſt, as forced him to drink in all ſorts of companies, and even when he was in bed; and yet he was very well. By good fortune he happened to be in a plentiful country for wine; but, in the midſt of that plenty, the moderate ſize of the glaſſes ſerved only to provoke his thirſt. They looked for ſome in the houſe, and amongſt the neighbours, and not finding any large enough, they had one made on purpoſe, which was preſerved in the family in memory of Phyllarchus; for ſo it was called. It was large indeed, but not comparable to Neſtor's cup; for there was no occaſion for three men, to lift it; any one might eaſily take it up with both his hands. This indiſpoſition of Father Goulu (36) is more remarkable than that, which obliged him, a long time after (whilſt he lodged in the ſame houſe, in his generalſhip) to eat nothing but fleſh, though (37) he had ſo freſh a complexion, and was in ſo very good caſe, that no body thought he ſtood in need of a diſpenſation.

(35) Réponſe à Phyllarque, pag. 318.

(36) Ibid. pag. 322, 324.

(37) Ibid. pag. 330.

I do not know where la Motte-Aigron learnt, that Neſtor's cup required the ſtrength of three men to lift it: Homer does not ſay ſo; but only that, when it was full, another could hardly take it from the table; but, that Neſtor did it with eaſe.

Ἄλλος μὲν μογέων ἀποκινήσασκε τραπέζης
Πλεῖον ἐόν· Νέστωρ δ' ὁ γέρων ἀμογητὶ ἄειρεν·

Alius quidem non ſine labore ſubmoviſſet à menſa
Plenum exiſtens: Neſtor vero ſenex ſine labore tollebat (38).

(38) Homer. Iliad. lib. xi, ver. 635.

Neſtor (what others wou'd effect with pains)
Alone, with eaſe, the goblet's weight ſuſtains.

We find, in the eleventh book of Athenæus, a long explication of Homer's verſes relating to this cup; but, far from meeting with any thing in it that favours la Motte-Aigron, I have found in that author, that the thing is not to be underſtood as if no Greek could have lifted the cup, but that no old man like Neſtor could have done it. Hercules, who was a great drinker (39), had a very great cup; but I do not obſerve, that it required three men to carry it. Statius allows but two.

Huic pretium palmæ gemini cratera ferebant
Herculeum juvenes. Illum Tyrinthius Heros
Ferre manu ſola, ſpumantemque ore ſupino
Vertere ſeu monſtri victor, ſeu Marte, ſolebat (40).

An huge Herculean cup, the victor's mead,
Two youths bring forth, and ſweat beneath the weight.
This erſt Alcides, when from toilſome war,
Or ſlaughter'd monſter, he return'd, was wont
Singly to lift, and quaff the liquor off.

Many things might be ſaid concerning Hercules's cup, which was of that prodigious capacity, according to ſome, as to have ſerved him for a veſſel upon the ſea (41); but all this would be foreign to the purpoſe (42).

GOULU (Jerome), younger brother of the foregoing, was Regius Profeſſor of the Greek tongue in his father's place; whom he ſucceeded at eighteen years of age (a), in the year 1595 (b). He was afterwards phyſician of the faculty of Paris. I ſpeak of his children in a remark [A]. It has been ſaid in the elogy of the general of the Feuillants, that he reſigned the profeſſorſhip of the Greek tongue to his younger brother [B].

[A] I ſpeak of his children in a remark.] His wife was Charlote de Monantheuil, daughter to Henry de Monantheuil, dean of the faculty of phyſic at Paris, and Regius Profeſſor of mathematics. From this marriage proceeded, amongſt other children, NICOLAS GOULU, who wrote a book of elogies on the Goulu's; JAMES, ſteward of the king's houſhould, known by the name of Mr de Monantheuil, and Martha wife to Renatus Labitte, advocate in the parliament, grand-nephew to that James Labitte, judge of Maienne, who made an index to the books of the civilians, and who has been honourably mentioned by Cujas, in the firſt chapter of the fourth book, and in the fifteenth chapter of the fifth book of his obſervations (1).

[B] The general of the Feuillants reſigned the profeſſorſhip of the Greek tongue to his younger brother.] Theſe are the firſt words of that elogium (2). ‘Inter Gallos doctrina illuſtres Joannes Gulonius annumerari meretur, quem Nicolaus pater (Joannis Aurati gener ac in regia Græcæ linguæ profeſſione ſucceſſor) ſingulari naturæ bonitate præditum adoleſcentem non vulgariter & adeo felici ſucceſſu inſtituit, ut ab Academiæ Pariſienſis curatoribus digniſſimus ſit judicatus, qui ſublato è vivis parente literariam ejus profeſſionem ſuſciperet: ſed in fratrem ſe minorem muneris iſtius functionem paterna pietate tranſmiſit. - - - - John Goulu deſerves to be ranked among the learned men of the French nation, whom his father Nicholas (ſon-in-law of Joannes Auratus, and ſucceſſor in the royal profeſſorſhip of the Greek tongue) educated with ſuch ſucceſs, by reaſon of his uncommon genius, that the curators of the univerſity of Paris thought him the moſt fit perſon to ſucceed his father in his profeſſorſhip: but he, with a paternal piety, delivered over that employment to his younger brother.

GOURNAI (Mary de Jars, de), adopted by Michael de Montagne [A], and famous for her learning. See, in Moreri, what family ſhe was of, and ſeveral other circumſtances of her life. I have not much to add to it. We find in the Perroniana, a very diſobliging touch upon this gentlewoman [B]: The occaſion of it was a ſatire, [A] She was adopted by Michael de Montagne.] She expreſſed no leſs reſpect and zeal for this father by adoption, than for her true one. You will acknowledge this, if you conſider well what ſhe ſays in the preface to Montagne's eſſays. She cauſed this book to be printed in the year 1635, and dedicated it to cardinal de Richelieu. The preface ſhe added to it deſerves to be read, and will particularly pleaſe thoſe, who love the hiſtory of books, and editions. The judgment ſhe made of Montagne's firſt eſſays, and the affection ſhe expreſſed for Montagne, upon the bare eſteem ſhe conceived for him long before ſhe ſaw him, put that author upon many reflexions, and occaſioned the adoption. He eſteemed her from that time and foretold ſhe would be capable of the fineſt things (1).

Paſquier acquaints us with ſome circumſtances of this kind of adoption. ‘Michael Montagne, ſays he (2), left two daughters; one that came from his marriage, heireſs to all his eſtate, who is well married: the other his daughter by adoption, heireſs of his ſtudies; both of them moſt virtuous ladies: but I cannot conclude my letter without ſpeaking more particularly of the ſecond. She is Madam de Jars, related to many great and noble families of Paris. She never intended to have any other huſband than her honour, inriched with the reading of good books, eſpecially the Lord Montagne's eſſays; who, in 1558, making a long ſtay at Paris, ſhe came on purpoſe to viſit him, to be perſonally acquainted with him. Beſides, Madam de Gournai, her mother, and ſhe, brought him to their houſe at Gournai, where he was three months, in two or three ſeveral journies, with all the civil treatment that could be deſired. At laſt, this virtuous lady, hearing of his death, croſſed almoſt all France, by the help of paſſports, as well by her own deſire, as that of the widow and daughter of the deceaſed, who invited her to come and join her tears and lamentations with theirs. The ſtory is truly memorable.’

[B] We find in the Perroniana, a very diſobliging touch upon this lady.] I ſet down the paſſage at length. As Mr Pelletier was telling him (3) one day, ‘that he had met Mademoiſelle de Gournai, going to petition the lieutenant-criminal (4), to prohibit La Defence des Beurrieres, (a Vindication of the Butter-women) becauſe therein ſhe is called a ſtroller, and one that has ſerved the public; he ſaid, I do not believe the lieutenant will order any one to ſeize her body; for few would take that pains; and as for what is ſaid, that ſhe has ſerved the public, ſhe has done it ſo privately, that it is only gueſſed at. To ſhew the contrary, ſhe needs only put her picture to her book; which is the anſwer I once made to Mademoiſelle de Surgeres, who deſired me, at Mr Rets's, to prefix an epiſtle to Ronſard's works, to ſhew that he did not love her in a diſhonourable way. I told her, inſtead of this epiſtle, you need only prefix your picture to them.’ I am certain, Mrs de Gournai would have taken this raillery for the greateſt affront: for, though nature had amply made amends for the faults of her face, by the perfections of her mind; ſo that, if ſhe had been deſpiſed for her body, ſhe had a ready and glorious conſolation, yet there is no probability, that ſhe was ever ſo humble as to renounce the eſteem of her bodily agreeableneſs, ſo much as reaſon required. I queſtion whether the virtue of the greateſt ſaints would be proof againſt ſo deſperate an affront as this.

viz.

---

(39) Macrob. Saturn. lib. v, cap. xxi.

(40) Stat. Theb. lib. vi.

(41) Macrobius, ubi ſupra.

(42) I ſpeak of it in the remark [D] of the article HERCULES

(a) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de Ayrault, pag. 254.

(b) Du Breul, Antiq de Paris, pag. 565.

(1) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie d'Ayrault. pag. 254.

(2) Apud Carol. de Viſch, Bibl. Ciſterc. pag. 220.

(1) See Montagne's Eſſays, lib. ii, cap. xvii, at the end, pag. m. 606.

(2) Paſquier, in the ſecond volume of his letters, book xviii, pag. m. 384, 385.

(3) That is cardinal du Perron.

(4) Methinks the prohibition of books belongs to the lieutenant-civil.

ſatire, wherein ſhe was brought in, and which was one of the ſequels of the Anti-Coton [C]. There was alſo a libel publiſhed under the title of Anti-Gournai (a). Notwithſtanding cardinal du Perron's biting raillery, he had an eſteem for this learned gentlewoman. He is in the liſt of thoſe, who have praiſed her [D]. She was regularly paid the little penſion granted her by the court (b); and ſhe always lived unmarried. She was very well received, when ſhe waited upon the princeſſes [E]. She had done well not to write againſt the partiſans of the Anti-Coton. A perſon of her ſex ought carefully to avoid ſuch quarrels. Satiriſts are a ſort of ruſtics, who obſerve no meaſures (c): They attack women in the moſt ſenſible part. She was repreſented, not only as older than ſhe was [F], but alſo as a woman of a bad life (d). There were publiſhed much at the ſame time two ſtories, which are but little alike, concerning Mr de Racan, and Mrs de Gournai [G]. I wonder Moreri ſhould ſay, that her books did not come out till after her death (e).

(a) See the remark [C], at the end.

(b) See the remark [D].

(c) Ruſtica progenies neſcit habere modum.

(d) See the remark [C].

(e) See the remark [D].

viz. To ſilence the calumny of thoſe ſatirical wits, who ſay you have not preſerved an exact continence, you need only ſhew your ſelf or your picture. It is certain, that cardinal Perron carried the inſult beyond all bounds; and I believe the gentlewoman would have been more willing to have had no learning, and very little wit, than to paſs for a perſon ſo void of handſomneſs, as to preſerve her virginity, only becauſe ſhe could find none that would take it.

[C]. . Occaſioned by a ſatire, wherein ſhe was brought in, and which was one of the ſequels of the Anti-Coton.] This ſatire, in the Perroniana, is called La Defenſe des Beurrieres (the Defence of the Butter-women). I could eaſily believe this was not the true title, and and that it ſhould be called Le Remerciment des Beurrieres (the Thanks of the Butter-women); for I have read a ſatire (5) intituled, Le Remerciment des Beurrieres de Paris au Sieur de Courbouzon Montgommery, in which are theſe words at the beginning (6): And particularly by the noble defence of the Fathers Jeſuits, which, following the ſteps and memoirs of Mrs Gournai, who has always well ſerved the public, you have publiſhed a week ago. Some pages after, we read this (7): Not long ago (it is a butter-woman, who ſpeaks to the Sieur de Courbouzon) ſome aukward people went about to interlope upon your market, and to rob you of your cuſtom, as one Peletier, and Mrs Gournai, a maid of fifty five years of age, who have pretended to publiſh defences for the Jeſuits, as having an intereſt in the cauſe, under pretence they have been recalled and re-eſtabliſhed at the requeſt and ſollicitation of the poſtilion-general of Venus. To which if we add a paſſage which I put in the margin (8), I think it will be manifeſt, that all the complaints Mrs Gournai deſigned to make to the judges, concerned the Remerciment des Beurrieres. For the reſt, what I have cited from this ſatire ſhews, that Mrs de Gournai (9) publiſhed ſome pieces for the Jeſuits, and againſt the Anti-Coton. Here is the title of the piece, that is ridiculed in the *Remerciment des Beurrieres: le Fleau d'Ariſtogiton, ou contra le Calomniateur des Peres Jeſuïtes, ſous le titre d'*ANTI-COTON, par Louïs de Montgommery Sieur de Courbouzon. We may affirm a thing, which Mr Baillet does not affirm (10), viz. that the author of the Fleau d'Ariſtogiton appeared under his true name. Mr Baillet thinks, that Courbouzon's piece came out after the Fleau d'Ariſtogiton (11), whereas they are both one and the ſame. The adverſaries of the Jeſuits were not contented with inſulting our maid in the Remerciment des Beurrieres, but they writ a book againſt her, which they intituled, Anti-Gournai. Mr Baillet ſpeaks of it, but not in giving the liſt of the pieces that came out on occaſion of the Anti-Coton (12): nay, he does not ſeem to have known, that this gentlewoman was concerned in that Anti.

[D] Cardinal du Perron . . . is in the liſt of thoſe who have praiſed her] To prove this, I will ſet down a very long paſſage, which concerns her, in the memoirs of the abbot de Marolles. They, who ſhall think I might have been contented to tranſcribe part of it, are ſuch as are not curious to know the particulars of the lives of illuſtrious perſons. It is not for ſuch readers that I write. I make this declaration once for all. ' This honeſt maid, (thus it is the ' abbot de Marolles ſpeaks concerning our Mrs Gournai) ' whom I have always very much eſteemed, and ' whom I have frequently viſited, had a candid and ' generous ſoul. The beauty of her mind was greater ' than that of her body; and ſhe knew abundance ' of things, which are not common to perſons of her ' ſex. We have ſeveral books of her writing, both ' in proſe and verſe, that are collected into one volume, which ſhe printed in her life-time, and intituled, Preſens de la Demoiſelle de Gournai. They, ' who attempted to jeſt upon her, had no reaſon to ' boaſt of it. Many great perſons have praiſed her, ' both in her life-time, and ſince her death; and, amongſt others, Michael de Montagne, Juſtus Lipſius, cardinal du Perron, cardinal Richelieu, Mr Coſpean biſhop of Nantes, Mr de Rochepoſai biſhop of ' Poitiers, Mr Seguier chancellor of France, and the ' ſuperintendants, who always carefully paid her a ' little penſion, which the king allowed her; and ' ſhe refuſed a larger, for the keeping a coach, which ' I know was offered her by cardinal Richelieu. Many learned men did alſo frequently viſit her; and the ' good lady reckoned, in the number of her beſt ' friends, Mr de la Mothe le Vayer, the prior Ogier, ' and his brother, and Meſſieurs Haberts, Ceriſai, Leſtoile, Boiſrobert, de Revol, Colletet, Malleville, all ' well known in the republic of learning; and, if I ' miſtake not, ſhe did me the honour to place me ' among them (13).'

[E] She was very well received, when ſhe waited upon the princeſſes.] The ſame abbot de Marolles ſays ſo, ſpeaking of the duke of Retelois, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Nevers. ' Mrs Gournai, ' ſays he (14), was one of his great diverſions, ' and though he was of a galanting temper, yet there ' was no lady but he would leave to diſcourſe with ' her, whether he ſaw her at his ſiſter's, or whether ' he found her at Madam de Longueville's, his aunt, or ' at the counteſs of Soiſſon's, whom ſhe viſited ſometimes.

[F] She was repreſented as older than ſhe was.] See, in the remark [C], the paſſage of the Remerciment des Beurrieres, where ſhe is ſaid to be fifty five years old, when ſhe was but forty five. She died in 1545, at eighty years of age; ſhe was therefore but forty five in 1610.

[G] There were publiſhed two ſtories, which are but little alike concerning Mr de Racan and Mrs Gournai.] The firſt is to be found in the Menagiana (15), and the other in the Recueil des bons mots (16). The firſt repreſents Mr de Racan and Mrs de Gournai, as two perſons, who very frequently viſited each other, and ſpoke their mind very freely, when they diſliked each other's verſes; which, amongſt authors that are friends, is the very top of familiarity. But, on the contrary, the ſecond ſtory is wholly adapted to perſuade us, that there was an ill underſtanding betwixt them. It goes under the name of one of Boiſrobert's good ſtories, and is called, the three Racans. It is pretended, that this gentlewoman deſiring to know the marquis de Racan, there was a wit, who perſuaded him to give her a viſit; but, when he knew the day and the hour, he had the malice to ſend to this gentlewoman, ſome time before, a perſon of the court, pretending to be the marquis de Racan. When this viſit was over, he went himſelf to Mrs de Gournai, and called himſelf the marquis de Racan. He was received, and expreſſed to the lady a great ſurprize, that any one ſhould have the confidence to aſſume his name, to pay her a viſit. As ſoon as he was gone, the true Racan arrived. ' Mrs de Gournai had immediately notice of it: ſhe ' was a Gaſcon (17), and ſomething choleric in her ' temper; ſhe flew into a paſſion at the ſight of this ' third Racan, and, without waiting till he ſpoke to ' her, Muſt I ſee nothing but Racans all the days of ' my life? ſaid ſhe in a rage; and arming herſelf ' with a ſlipper, ſhe vigorouſly charged him, and drove ' him out of her chamber, without hearing him ſpeak, ' giving him all the ill language her anger could ſug-

(5) Printed at Niort in the year 1610.

(6) Pag. 3.

(7) Pag. 8.

(8) Father Coton . . . firſt addreſſed himſelf to a Damoiſelle Carabineer, who, in defence of this Venerable, had ſoon ſpent the powder of her flaſk, and having ſhewn to the Sieur de Courbouzon the merchant, from whom ſhe had this ammunition, they made him play the Forlorn Hope. Ibid. pag. 11, 12.

(9) It is ſhe whom Father Richeome calls an Amazon. See Mr Baillet's Anti, Tom. I, pag. 146.

(10) Tom. I, of the Anti, pag. 146.

(11) Ibid. pag. 145.

(12) See the firſt Tome of the Anti, pag. 176.

(13) Memoires de l'Abbé de Marolles, pag. 58. ad ann. 1623. See alſo what he ſays, pag. 105, ad ann. 1636. He ſays, that he took lodgings in the Ruë de St Honore, in that gentlewoman's neighbourhood, and that ſhe was then printing the firſt edition of her works.

(14) Ib pag. 58.

(15) Printed at Paris in 1693.

(16) Printed at Paris, in 1693.

(17) I do not think this is true. I wonder that Hilarion de Coſte, who ſpeaks ſo much of her, Vies des Dames Illuſtres, Tom. II, pag. 658, & ſeq. does not ſay what place ſhe was of. The paſſage of Paſquier, above, in the remark [A], ſeems to me to prove, that ſhe was not a Gaſcon.

When Mr Menage ſuppoſes, in his Requeſte des Dictionaires, that Mrs de Gournai was extraordinarily concerned for the diſgrace of the old words, which the gentlemen of the French academy ſuppreſſed, he did not make uſe of a fiction; for it is very true, that this lady was very angry at this change of language [H]. I do not know whether any verſes ‘ geſt: which ſo ſurprized the poor marquis de Racan, that he could not anſwer a word, but got away in haſte, thinking that this learned lady was run mad (18).’ I could eaſily believe this to be a fable; and I chiefly judge ſo, becauſe of the aſſault of the ſlipper. Probably it was either a meer invention, or a flouriſh of Boiſrobert, to make a jeſt both of Racan and this learned lady. However, this adventure is very inconſiſtent with the great intimacy, mentioned by Menage, between that learned lady and the marquis de Racan. The following paſſage is to be found in the Menagiana (19). ‘ The marquis de Racan one day viſited Mrs de Gournai, who ſhewed him ſome epigrams ſhe had made, and aſked his opinion of them. Mr de Racan told her, they had nothing good in them, and were without any wit. She anſwered, he ought not to take notice of that, becauſe they were epigrams after the Greek faſhion. They went afterwards to dine together at Mr de Lorme's, a phyſician. A diſh of ſoop being brought in, that was not very good, ſhe, turning to Mr de Racan, told him, Sir, this is a bad ſoop: madam, ſaid he, it is a ſoop after the Greek faſhion.’ I ſhall obſerve, by the by, that this ſtory has undergone the alterations uſual to ſtories of this nature: the circumſtances of it are prodigiouſly diverſified. Read this paſſage of the defence of Voiture (20). ‘ Some body tranſlated once, for one of our poets (21), who did not underſtand Greek, ſome epigrams of the Anthologia . . . . He found them ſo flat and inſipid, that, dining the next day at a prince's table, where a ſoop was brought in, that taſted of nothing but water, turning to one of his friends, who had ſeen thoſe epigrams with him, here is, ſaid he, a true ſoop after the Greek faſhion.’

Note, that the ſtory of the three Racans has been inſerted in the continuation of the Menagiana (22); and ſo it is ſuppoſed, that Mr Menage contradicted himſelf ſometimes in his converſations.

[H] She was very angry at this change of language.] Here follows a paſſage, in which Sorel takes notice of an omiſſion of Father Bouhours. ‘ To ſpeak of a perſon, who was very angry at that time with this ſuppreſſion of words, he ſhould have mentioned good Mrs de Gournai, whom Ariſtus, one of the interlocutors in the dialogues in queſtion, places amongſt the illuſtrious and ingenious women. Certainly ſhe well deſerved it. But I would ſtill place, above her learning, her generoſity, goodneſs, and other incomparable virtues. It muſt however be owned, that ſhe always kept ſome reſentment againſt the new authors of her time; but ſhe had reaſon for it; for ſome of them took a particular delight in expoſing her. Thoſe, who formerly ſaw her, know that ſhe was in a violent paſſion, when ſhe mentioned the new band, or the new cabal, and that it was her foible. She might afford matter enough for diſcourſe about the language, both on account of what ſhe was heard to ſay, and of what ſhe has written about it. Thoſe, who are not old enough to have converſed with her, muſt have recourſe to her book, intituled, Les Avis & les Preſens de la Demoiſelle de Gournai. There are in it many chapters concerning the French language, and amongſt others, the chapter of Diminutives, and ſome about poetry, in which ſhe would revive the words compounded in imitation of the Greeks, and keep up Ronſard's language, without any exception (23).’ Let us ſee how Menage has deſcribed the paſſion of this lady. He at firſt mentions the proſcription of theſe noble words:

. . . . Moult, ains, jaçoit,
Ores, adonc, maint, ainſi-ſoit,
A-tant, ſi que, piteux, icelle,
Trop plus, trop mieux, blandice, iſnelle,
Pieça, tollir, illic, ainçois.
As being bad French:

And then he feigns, that the dictionaries declare, in their requeſt, that

. . . . Bien que telle outrecuidance
(Soit dit ſauf vôtre reverence)
Fiſt préjudice aux Suppliants
Vos bons & fideles Clients;
Et que de GOURNAY la Pucelle,
Cette ſavante Demoiſelle,
En faveur de l'Antiquité
Euſt nôtre Corps ſollicité
De faire ſes plaintes publiques
Du décri de ces mots antiques:
Toutefois, &c.

Though ſuch preſumption (with reverence be it ſpoken) does a prejudice to your petitioners, your good and faithful clients; and that the learned Madam Gournay, in favour of antiquity, has ſollicited our body to make it's public complaints againſt the decrying theſe ancient words: Nevertheleſs, &c.

Doubtleſs, many perſons ſaid, that Mrs de Gournai, being affected with the diſtemper of old people, condemned the reformation of the language, only becauſe it was the production of young authors; or becauſe ſhe could not approve of it, without owning, that, at her great age, ſhe wanted to go to ſchool again. Doubtleſs, they applied to her what Horace ſaid of ſome people, who fancy that their taſte is the only rule of what is good, or that it were a ſhameful thing for them to yield to new-comers, and to confeſs, in their old age, the vanity of the ſtudies of their youth.

Vel quia nil rectum, niſi quod placuit ſibi, ducunt;
Vel quia turpe putant parere minoribus, & quæ
Imberbes didicêre ſenes perdenda fateri (34).

Or that they like their own opinions beſt;
Or that they ſcorn, when aged, to ſubmit
To greener years, and leſs experienc'd youth.

But, all things duly conſidered, this gentlewoman was not ſo much in the wrong as is imagined; and it were to be wiſhed, that the beſt authors of that time had vigorouſly withſtood the proſcription of many words, which have nothing of harſhneſs in them, and would ſerve to vary the expreſſion, to avoid verſes, conſonancies, and ambiguities. A falſe delicacy, which was too much indulged, has very much impoveriſhed the French language. The beſt writers complain of it; even thoſe, who are leaſt in want of words, and whoſe fruitful genius is able to ſupply that defect. See the reflexions of Mr de la Bruyere (25). Some of them beſtow a thouſand bleſſings on the biſhop of Meaux, the biſhop of Niſmes, and ſuch other authors of the firſt rank, when they ſee them uſe words beginning to grow obſolete. This re-inſtates, and makes them young again; at leaſt it is a barrier againſt preſcription, and may be oppoſed to the cavils of the Puriſts. Our language is very much indebted to the writers, who ſay certes in proſe, and expoſe themſelves for that word in their works (26). The ſame obſervation might be made with reſpect to other very convenient words, which the falſe delicacy of ſome wits, or the caprice of cuſtom, have deprived, and daily deprive us of. The cauſe of the evil does not wholly lie in the inconſtancy of living languages, which the antients have experienced, and very well deſcribed.

- - - - Mortalia facta peribunt;
Nedum ſermonum ſtet honos & gratia vivax:
Multa renaſcentur quæ jam cecidere, cadentque,
Quæ nunc ſunt in honore vocabula, ſi volet uſus,
Quem penes arbitrium eſt & jus & norma loquendi (27).

When mortal labours fall a prey to time,
Can language plead exemption from decay?

(18) Recueil des bons Contes & des bons Mots, pag. 158, Dutch Edit.

(19) Pag. 138 of the firſt Dutch Edition.

(20) Coſtar, défenſe de Voiture, pag. 274.

(21) It was Racan.

(22) Printed at Paris in the year 1695.

(23) Sorel, de la connoiſſance des bons livres, pag. m. 418, 419.

(24) Horat. Epiſt. i, lib. ii, ver. 83.

(25) La Bruyere, Caracteres de ce Siecle, in the chapter concerning ſome uſages, pag. 635, & ſeq. of the eighth edition of Paris.

(26) La Bruyere, ubi ſupra.

(27) Horat. de Arte Poet. ver. 68.

verſes were made in praiſe of her cat; but I am perſuaded, that the wits would have made many poems upon that ſubject, if her miſtreſs had been young and handſome. It was a cat, whoſe fidelity has been immortalized by the abbot de Marolles [I].

Cuſtom, the ſovereign arbitreſs of ſpeech,
Old words revives, and antiquates the new.

There is I know not what conſpiracy in the matter, which proceeds, not ſo much from the readers, that are authors, as from thoſe, that are not. The latter give themſelves the pleaſure of criticiſing, without knowing what trouble there is in compoſing. Thoſe, that are ſenſible of it, are more indulgent to words. I except two ſorts of authors: the young, and thoſe who write but a little piece in two or three years. A young author, who hardly reads any books but ſuch as are the neweſt, calls fine language only the terms and expreſſions he finds in them. Wo to every word, and phraſe, which he finds elſewhere: this is a word of the old court, ſays he; it begins to grow obſolete. As for a writer of half a page a day, he has not time to be ſenſible of the trouble occaſioned by the ſuppreſſion of abundance of expreſſions, which were good in the reign of Henry IV, and Lewis XIII. For which reaſon he pretends to be diſguſted at all the words, that are ſuſpected of being old. But, if he were to compoſe a long work, and at a quicker rate, he would not be ſo ſqueamiſh: the difficulties of the task, the intricacy of the repetitions, the almoſt unavoidable neceſſity of rhiming in proſe, &c. would diſcover to him the prejudice that is done to authors by impoveriſhing the language they make uſe of.

[I] She had a cat, whoſe fidelity has been immortalized by the abbot de Marolles.] He did the ſame ſervice to a linnet of his landlady. ‘ A linnet, ſays he ‘ (28), that did belong to the moſt worthy and moſt ‘ virtuous Mrs Belleville, in whoſe houſe I lodge at ‘ Paris, lived with her above fourteen years; and, tho’ ‘ it were never ſo fine weather, this little bird never ‘ attempted to fly away, when it's good miſtreſs put ‘ him out of his cage on her chamber-window. Mrs ‘ de Gournai's Piaillon (which was the name of her ‘ cat), for the ſpace of twelve years that ſhe lived with ‘ her, never went out of her chamber one night, ‘ to run upon the gutters and tiles, like other cats.’ If this gentlewoman had had ſuch galants as Catullus, her cat would have been celebrated as much as Lesbia's ſparrow. Note, that the abbot de Marolles forgets not this ſparrow, nor Melior's parrot (29), nor Stella's pigeon (30). To theſe examples we may add Madam des Houlieres's ſpaniel (31).

(28) Marolles, Suite des Memoires, pag. 98, 99.

(29) See Statius, Silv. iv, lib. ii.

(30) See Martial, Epigr. viii, lib. i.

(31) See the firſt Tome of the Mercure Galant, 1672, pag. m. 83, 103.

GRAIN (BAPTIST LE), maſter of the requeſts in ordinary to Mary de Medicis, queen of France, has writ ſome pretty good hiſtories [A]. He was born about the Year 1563 (a). He does not expreſs any bitterneſs againſt the Proteſtants; on the contrary, he declares ſtrongly for the edict that was granted them [B].

(a) See his Decad of Henry IV, lib. i, pag. 80. Edit. of Rouen, 1633, in 4to.

[A] He wrote ſome pretty good hiſtories.] We have two decads of his. The firſt is the hiſtory of Henry the great: the ſecond is the hiſtory of Lewis XIII, from the beginning of his reign to the death of the mareſchal d'Ancre in 1617. ‘ In ſome parts of it, he ‘ has given us ſome particulars, that are not to be ‘ found elſewhere; and it is thought this hiſtory was ‘ impartially written, as by a true Frenchman.’ This is what Sorel (1) ſays concerning the firſt decad. As to the ſecond, he ſays (2), ‘ that this hiſtory having ‘ been publiſhed in the time, and during the credit of ‘ thoſe, whom the hiſtorian ſpeaks of, what happened ‘ before is very much cried down. The mareſchal ‘ d'Ancre, and thoſe of his party, are very ill treated. ‘ Even the good ſervants of the queen-mother are not ‘ ſpared, which formerly made this book ſought for, ‘ by ſome out of curioſity, and by others with a de‘ ſign to ſuppreſs it. It is eſpecially obſerved, that ‘ as to what concerns the biſhop of Luſſon, who ‘ was afterwards cardinal de Richelieu, this author ‘ mentions a letter of his directed to the mareſchal ‘ d'Ancre, which is ſaid to be written in very ſub‘ miſſive terms.’ There is good reaſon for ſaying ſo (3).

[B] He declared ſtrongly for the edict that was granted to the Proteſtants.] See the ſeventh book (4) of the decad of Henry IV, where you will find a fine apology for this prince, on account of the edict of Nantes; an apology, I ſay, ſupported with examples and reaſons. D'Aubigné took care to inſert the ſubſtance of it in his hiſtory (5). Le Grain had not changed his principles, when he writ his decad of Lewis XIII; for he there (6) apologizes for the letters patents (7), wherein his majeſty declared, that he meant not to comprehend his ſubjects of the pretended Reformed religion in the oath and proteſtation made at his coronation, OF EMPLOYING HIS SWORD AND POWER FOR THE EXTIRPATION OF HERESIES. Theſe two fine paſſages in favour of toleration are found in a book of Colomiés (8).

(1) Bibliotheque Françoiſe, pag. m. 352.

(2) Ibid. pag. 353, 354.

(3) See Le Grain, liv x, pag. 411, ad ann. 1617.

(4) Pag. m. 704.

(5) Tom. III, livr. v, chap ii, pag. m. 631.

(6) In the eighth book, pag. 299.

(7) They were regiſtred in the parliament the fourth of Auguſt, 1616.

(8) Intituled, Rome Proteſtante, pag. 65, & ſeq.

GRAMMONT (GABRIEL DE), a French cardinal, in the XVIth century. I ſpeak of him only to correct ſome faults of Mr Moreri [A].

[A] I ſpeak of him, only to correct ſome faults of Mr Moreri.] I. The interview of Clement VII, and Francis I, at Marſeilles, was not in 1552, but in 1532. II. Cardinal Grammont was not rewarded with the biſhopric of Poitiers, for having perſuaded the Pope to that interview; for he was poſſeſſed of that biſhopric, when he left France, to go and negotiate with Clement VII. III. Theſe words, the king gave him the archbiſhopric of Bourdeaux and Toulouſe, which he was going to take poſſeſſion of, ought to be cenſured, ſince they naturally ſignify, that both theſe biſhoprics were beſtowed at the ſame time upon this cardinal. But this is falſe. Beſides, we know not which of thoſe two archbiſhoprics he was going to take poſſeſſion of. Mr Moreri's phraſe does not determine it. IV. It is not true, that this cardinal died before he took poſſeſſion of the archbiſhopric of Toulouſe: for he did it by proxy, the twenty ſeventh of October 1533, and in perſon, the fifteenth of March following. V. The caſtle of Balura is a chimera; he ſhould have ſaid the caſtle of Balma: the cardinal died there, the twenty ſixth of March (1) 1534, according to du Bouchet. This caſtle belongs to the archbiſhops of Toulouſe, and is but half a league diſtant from the city. VI. If the cardinal was ſeized with a hectic fever, it was not when he went to take poſſeſſion of the archbiſhopric: Moreri ſhould have ſaid, that his journey to Rome brought upon him a long diſtemper, of which he died, eleven days after his taking poſſeſſion. Does a man die of a hectic fever in ſo few days? What ſurpriſes me is, that Catel (2), one of the authors quoted by Moreri, ſupplies me with the correction of all the faults before-mentioned. What is this man thinking of, to quote authors whom he never ſaw? Catel corrects a fault of John du Bouchet, concerning the name of the caſtle (3); and therefore Moreri might have certainly known it's true name.

(1) Moreri ſays. the twenty fourth of March.

(2) Memoires de l'Hiſtoire du Languedoc, livr. v, pag. 945.

(3) Du Bouchet ſays, that the cardinal died at Abalme, a place belonging to the archbiſhopric, two leagues from Toulouſe.

GRAMOND (GABRIEL BARTHOLOMEW DE), in Latin Gramondus, preſident in the parliament of Toulouſe, and ſon to the dean of that parliament [A], compoſed

[A] He was ſon to the dean of the counſellors of the parliament of Toulouſe.] The name of the dean of the counſellors was BARTHOLOMEW DE GRAMOND. He was a man of great probity, and perfect poſed an hiſtory, that is eſteemed [B]. I have read, in a German author, a remarkable fact, which I very much doubt of [C]; but, if it were true, it would be very much to preſident de Gramond's glory. Patin's letters do not confirm what the German author ſays [D].

fect integrity. His ſon gives him this character, in relating an action, more becoming a courtier, than a ſenator zealous for good diſcipline. He ſays (1), that Mr de Montmorency, governour of Languedoc, would have his wife to be received, in all the towns of his government, with ſuch honours as had never been uſed. He deſired in particular, that the magiſtrates of Toulouſe would ſend armed men to meet her. His propoſal was often rejected; and it was repreſented to him, that plays, dances, and muſic, are a proper pomp for a woman's reception; but the military honours ought to be reſerved for thoſe, who have a juriſdiction over arms. Bartholomew de Gramond was of another opinion, viz. that the ducheſs of Montmorency ſhould be received in the way that her husband deſired; he was deputed to the Capitouls (2) from the parliament, and perſuaded them to comply with the deſire of the governour of the province. This happened in 1619. We find here no footſtepts of the antient Roman gravity. Our hiſtorian had done more for his father's glory, if he could have ſaid, that the deputy of the parliament confirmed the Capitouls in their reſolution to reject the innovations, which the duke of Montmorency required of them for his ducheſs. This conduct had beſpoke him a man, who had made good uſe of Tiberius's counſel moderandos fœminarum honores (3), and of the ſpeech of Severus Cæcina, a Roman ſenator, in the reign of that emperor. It was rejected, but is it to be wondered at? Rome had loſt all it's fine maxims. Note, that this ſenator gave his vote, for not ſuffering the governours of provinces to bring their wives with them (4). He gave very ſolid reaſons for it.

[B] He compoſed an hiſtory that is eſteemed.] It contains, in eighteen books, the tranſactions of France, from Henry the fourth's death, to the year 1629 (5). It was printed at Toulouſe in the year 1643. Foreigners have thought it worthy of their preſſes both in Holland and Germany (6). I make uſe of the edition of Mentz in 1673, in 8vo. This author's ſtile is a little too conciſe, and not natural enough; but it ſhews, that preſident de Gramond was maſter of the Latin tongue. He had publiſhed, at Toulouſe, in the year 1623, the particular hiſtory of the war, that Lewis XIII made with his Proteſtant ſubjects.

[C] I have read, in a German author, a remarkable fact, which I very much doubt of.] Chriſtian Funccius ſays, that the preſident de Gramond, following Thuanus's footſteps, in his boldneſs to ſpeak the truth, and diſcover the faults of the government and of great men, got many enemies, and was not ſafe in his own country. ‘In eo Thuano par quod intrepide dicat, quid ‘ſentiat, non diſſimulans graviſſima aulæ & magnatum ‘peccata, indeque idem quod Thuanus, fatum expertus. Simul enim ac prima pars hiſtoriæ prodiit, ‘multorum incurrit odia: ita ut vix Tholoſæ tuto vivere potuerit. Quare non prodiit tenus hac, niſi ‘pars prima: ſi altera ſuccederet, opus eſſet incomparabile, vel non niſi cum ipſa antiquitate comparandum. Arcaniſſima enim reip. Gallicæ autor penetraverat (7).’ Mr Graverol, advocate of Nîmes, who was very much acquainted at Toulouſe, and whom I conſulted upon this particular, anſwered me ſeveral things, but nothing, whereby it appeared that he had ever heard of ſuch a thing.

[D] Patin's letters do not confirm what the German author ſays.] Guy Patin is ſo far from repreſenting Mr de Gramond as a martyr for the truth, that he calls him a baſe flatterer. I believe he ſtrains things, and that at the worſt, the German writer's extream would be leſs vicious than Patin's. However, here are Patin's words: ‘I have the hiſtory of Mr de Gramond, preſident of Toulouſe, ‘that you ſpeak of. I have often diſcourſed with him, ‘whilſt he was in this city. He was a good old ‘man, but he had a weak and bigotted ſoul. He ‘was very deſirous to get ſome memoirs, in order ‘to carry on his hiſtory to the late king's death: ‘but cardinal Mazarin would not give him that employment. He is lately dead at Toulouſe (8). His ‘book is very indifferent, and infinitely below Thuanus's hiſtory. It is full of falſities and flatteries ‘unworthy of a man of honour. When it was ‘printed off, and ready for ſale, Mr de Gramond ‘cauſed fifteen leaves to be reprinted, the better to ‘flatter cardinal Richelieu, who was then at the ‘higheſt pitch of favour. This good man thought ‘there were no words ſtrong enough to praiſe him: ‘but he got nothing by it; for the cardinal died ‘ſoon after (9).’

(1) Gramond. Hiſtor. Galliæ, lib. iii, pag. 213, ad ann. 1619.

(2) It is the name of thoſe, who preſide in the town-houſe of Toulouſe.

(3) Tacit. Ann. lib. i, cap. xiv.

(4) Id. ibid. lib. vi, cap. xxxiii.

(5) And not to the year 1639, as Moreri ſays.

(6) Note, that it is very much quoted by the German authors. See, among others, Pellerus in his Politicus ſceleratus impugnatus.

(7) Chr. Funccius, Tom. I, Orbis Imper. pag. 443, apud Konig, Bibl. pag. 358.

(8) We may conclude from thence, that Konig, who places his death in the year 1672, is miſtaken; for that letter of Patin is dated the fifteenth of September, 1654.

(9) Patin, letter xc, Tom. I, pag. 365.

GRAMONT (Scipio de) lord of St Germain, and ſecretary of the king's chamber, was a native of Provence. I have ſaid elſewhere (a) that he ſaw at Rome the funeral honours of Mr de Peireſc, and that he died at Venice ſome time after. He wrote ſome Books [A], and, among others, one intituled Le Denier Royal: Traitté curieux de l'Or & de l'Argent. Naudé ſpeaks of this work with praiſe [B]. It is in 8vo, printed at Paris in the year 1620.

[A] He wrote ſome books.] He publiſhed at Paris, the Art of Conſequences, in 8vo, in 1614; of the nature, quality, and wonderful prerogatives of the Point in 8vo, 1619. His Abridgment of Artifices, treating of ſeveral new inventions, and eſpecially of a ſecret and exquiſite means of underſtanding and learning any language whatever, even Latin and Greek, in one year, was printed at Aix in Provence, in 1640, in 8vo.

[B] Naudé ſpeaks of his Denier Royal with praiſe.] Theſe are his words: ‘Quoniam res ipſa (vectigalium ‘impoſitiones) plerumque à neceſſitate dependet, aut ‘Principum voluntate, quæ leges non admittunt, inde ‘eſt, quòd pauci admodùm reperti ſunt, qui de illis ‘Politicum quidquam monere voluerint. Quare unicum tantummodò proferam Scipionem Gramontium; ‘ex cujus Nummo Regio, Gallicè quidem edito, ‘plurima depromi poſſunt, quæ rem ipſam præclarè ‘illuſtrent, ſimúlque legentium animos reficiant ‘dulci pabulô variæ lectionis, & graviſſimâ diverſarum obſervationum varietate (1). —— Becauſe ‘the thing itſelf (the impoſition of taxes) often depends on neceſſity, or the will of princes, which admit not of law; thence it is, that but few political ‘writers are found on that ſubject. I ſhall therefore ‘produce only one, viz. Scipio Gramont; from whoſe ‘Denier Royal, publiſhed in French, many things may ‘be taken, which excellently illuſtrate the matter, ‘and at the ſame time refreſh the minds of the ‘readers with a great variety of learning and obſervations of different ſorts.

(a) In remark [C] of the article PEIRESC.

(1) Naudé, Bibl. Politic. cap. xiii, pag. 543, Edit. Crenianæ.

GRANDIER (Urban), curate and canon of Loudon, burnt alive as a magician, was the ſon of a royal notary of Sablé, and was born at Bovére near Sablé. He was a good preacher, which made the monks of Loudon envy him at firſt, and at laſt hate him, when he preſſed the obligation of confeſſing to one's curate at Eaſter. He was a handſome man, agreeable in converſation, and neat in his cloaths, which made him ſuſpected of being beloved by the women, and of loving them [A]. He was accuſed, in 1629, of having lain with women in his own church. The official of Poitiers condemned him to reſign his benefices, and to live a penitent. He appealed from that ſentence; and, by a decree of the parliament of Paris, he was referred to the preſidial of Poitiers, which declared him innocent. Three years after, ſome Urſuline nuns of Loudon were thought by the common people to be poſſeſſed [B]. Grandier's enemies immediately ſpread the report, that it was by his means, and accuſed him of magic: Which ſeems very odd; for if they believed he could ſend the devil into peoples bodies, they ſhould have been afraid of provoking him [C]; they ſhould have uſed him kindly

---

[A] He was ſuſpected of being beloved by the women, and of loving them.] The Mercure François (1) ſays that Urban Grandier was a majeſtic and ſtately man, who had ſome reading and good parts, and beſides was endowed with ſome natural and acquired perfections; but that, by a reduplication of extraordinary vices, particularly whoring and lewdneſs, he had ..... proſtituted the honour of his character; and that his intention was, in canvaſſing for the place of ghoſtly father of the Urſulines, to make a diſhoneſt ſeraglio of their convent, and as many filthy concubines as there were handſome virgins. The letter of Dr Seguin, a phyſician of Tours, ſays (2), that even Grandier's partiſans acknowledged, that he lived in a debauchery, that was a downright impiety, profaning the moſt holy things, and openly abuſing the religion he preached with great reputation. I have ſaid, in the text of this article, that he was accuſed of having lain with ſome women in his own church. Mr Menage, who relates it, ſays only, in the notes, that he was accuſed of adultery; he does not ſay, that it was with the wife of a magiſtrate of Loudun. It is Monconis (3), who ſays this, upon the credit of the ſuperior of the Urſulines. The relation, publiſhed in Holland, in the year 1693, does not permit us to doubt of the lewdneſs and pride of this prieſt.

(1) Tom. XX, pag. 748.

(2) Ibid. pag. 777.

(3) Voiages, Part. I, pag. 9.

[B] Some nuns of Loudun were thought by the common people to be poſſeſſed.] Mr Menage (4), not contented with this clauſe, adds: as to the learned, the greateſt part of them maintained, that thoſe nuns were only diſtempered, not finding in them, whatever has been ſaid to the contrary, any of the three ſymptoms that the Roman ritual requires, as a ſign of being truly poſſeſſed by the devil; which are divination, the underſtanding of languages which the perſon has not learned, and a ſupernatural ſtrength of body. He quotes two books that were written againſt this pretended poſſeſſion; one by Duncan, a famous Scotchman, phyſician of Saumur; the other by James Boutreux, Sieur d'Etiau, a learned man of Angers: And he relates what Claudius Menard, lieutenant of the provoſtſhip of Angers, ſays of James Boutreux's book, in his catalogue of the writers of Angers. ‘Laudunenſis theatri ſcenam aggreſſus, Parochi Granderii tepidatas ſilentio longo favillas memoriamque ſcripto vindicare auſus, dubiæ quæſtionis thema renovavit, ut triſtes virginum malè tractarum pœnas, vel exercitæ potius trophæa virtutis ad ſcurrilia planorum ludibria, vindicandique & ſuppoſiti in Granderium, ut credi vult, maleficii miniſteria perſonata traduceret, grandi certè mentis fiducia, calami ſcriptique libertate, neſcio an ceſſura feliciter. —— Meddling with the farce of Loudon, and undertaking to vindicate the memory of the curate Grandier, he revived a doubtful queſtion, and with great confidence, how ſucceſsfully I cannot ſay, juſtified the puniſhment of the nuns, and cleared Grandier from the imputation of magic.’ See the remark [I]. Now, as to what Mr Menage obſerves, that the underſtanding of tongues, which is one of the three ſigns of a true poſſeſſion, was not found in thoſe nuns, it is fit to obſerve what Dr Seguin, a phyſician of Tours, ſays, that they anſwered in the Taupinanboux language, in which Mr de Launai Razilli ſpoke to them, whom I believe, ſays he, more than my ſelf, and whom I alledge to you, becauſe you know him to be a credible man (5). But ſince Menage, who was not ignorant of the contents of this letter, nor of the other ſtories publiſhed about the underſtanding of tongues attributed to theſe nuns, does nevertheleſs affirm, that they did not ſhew thereby that it was a true poſſeſſion, it is plain, that relations are not much to be depended on in ſuch caſes. What Balzac ſays in his Entretiens, deſerves a place here. If, ſays he (6), for divination, he was accuſed of magic .... the devils he correſponded with muſt needs have been meer black-guards in Lucifer's troops. They muſt have been leſs learned than thoſe of Loudun, who had not ſtudied ſo far as the third claſs, as one of cardinal Richelieu's courtiers ſaid. They muſt needs be of the order of thoſe ignorant devils, who, in Theodoret's orations, commit faults in the number, and the language, and offend againſt the meaſures of verſe, and the rules of ſyntax (7). Here follow ſome proofs of the ignorance of the devils of Loudun. Maſs being ended, Barré came up to the mother ſuperiour, to give her the communion, and to exorciſe her, and, holding the ſacrament in his hand, ſpoke to her in theſe words; Adora Deum tuum, Creatorem tuum; worſhip thy GOD, thy Creator: being preſſed ſhe anſwered, Adoro te, I worſhip thee. Quem adoras, whom doſt thou worſhip? ſaid the exorciſt to her ſeveral times. JESUS CHRISTUS, replied ſhe, making motions as if ſhe had ſuffered violence. Daniel Drouïn, aſſeſſor in the provoſtſhip, could not forbear ſaying ſomewhat loud, here is a devil, who does not underſtand concord. Barré, changing the phraſe, asked her, Quis eſt iſte quem adoras? who is he, whom thou worſhippeſt? he hoped ſhe would ſay ſtill JESUS CHRISTUS; but ſhe anſwered, JESU CHRISTE. Upon which many preſent cried out, this is bad Latin. Barré confidently maintained ſhe had ſaid, Adoro te JESU CHRISTE; I adore thee, O JESUS CHRIST (8).

Here is a very ſharp raillery againſt the Capuchin director of Martha, who was ſaid to be poſſeſſed. It was reported, that ſhe had two devils in her body, one called Belzebub, and the other Aſhtaroth. The judges of Angers examined them in Greek and Latin. Belzebub, in a paſſion anſwered, ‘that if he pleaſed, he could anſwer as well in Greek as in Latin. The Capuchin, to afford him an excuſe, ſaid, Belzebub, my friend, there are ſome heretics here, and that is the reaſon why you will not ſpeak. They ſpoke Latin to Aſhtaroth, who excuſed himſelf upon his youth (§α). Belzebub excuſed himſelf, ſaying, he was a poor devil. Hereupon there was a great diſpute betwixt thoſe on the bench, whether devils were bound to go to ſchool. The civilians maintained, that it was the proprium in quarto modo of demoniacs, to ſpeak all languages, as he of Cartigni in Savoy, who was tried in ſixteen languages; by the ſame token, that the miniſters of Geneva durſt not exorciſe him. Thoſe of Angers were bolder. They begun thus: Commando tibi ut exeas Belzebut & Aſtarot, aut ego augmentabo veſtras pœnas, & vobis dabo acriores. The ſecond time he ſaid; Jubeo exeatis ſuper pœnam excommunicationis majoris & minoris. And at laſt being in a great paſſion he added; Niſi vox exeatis, vos relego & confino in infernum centum annos magis quàm Deus ordinavit (9).’ I doubt not but this is an invention of the author.

[(§α) An alluſion to theſe words of Lucifer to Aſhtaroth, fol. 45. verſo, of the Conception à Perſonages.

Aſtaroth, ne parle jamais:
Tu es encore trop novice.

Aſhtaroth ſay nothing;
You are yet too young. REM CRIT.]

(4) Remarques ſur la Vie de Guillaume Menage, pag. 340.

An obſervation upon the knowledge of tongues in thoſe that are poſſeſſed.

(5) Merc. Franç. Tom. XX, pag. 777.

(6) Entretien xvii.

(7) See the Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, March 1684, pag. 10, of the ſecond edition.

(8) Hiſtoires des Diables de Loudun, printed at Amſterdam 1693, pag. 57.

(9) Confeſſion Catholique de Sancy, livr. i, chap. vi.

[C] If they believed he could ſend the devil into peoples bodies, they ſhould have been afraid of provoking him.] Mr Menage was ſo fond of this thought, that, after he had uſed it in the life of William Menage (10), he inſerted it in his notes upon that life. They accuſed Grandier, ſays he, of magic, the ordinary crime of thoſe who have none, and which,

(10) De Malincio fingit ſe aſſentiri (Armandus Richelius) nam ut verè Apuleius & ipſe maleficii reus poſtulatus, id genus crimen non eſt ejus accuſare qui credit, accuſare enim eo crimine is eum timeret, quem vi cantaminum poſſe tantum fateretur. Menag. in Vita Guillelmi Menagii, pag. 83.

kindly, for fear he ſhould poſſeſs them with a legion of devils. However they accuſed him of magic. The Capuchins of Loudun, his great enemies, thought it expedient, in order to ſucceed in their accuſation, to ſtrengthen themſelves with the powerful authority of cardinal Richelieu. To this purpoſe, they wrote to Father Joſeph, one of their fraternity, who had a great intereſt with his eminence, that Grandier was the author of a libel, intituled, La Cordonniere de Loudun [D] (the ſhoemaker's wife of Loudun), which was very injurious to the perſon and birth of cardinal Richelieu. This great miniſter, amongſt many perfections, had the fault to proſecute with the utmoſt rigour the authors of the libels printed againſt him: So that, ſuffering himſelf to be perſuaded [E] by Father Joſeph, that Grandier was the author of La Cordonniere de Loudun, he writ immediately to Mr de Laubardemont, counſellor of ſtate, his creature, who was commiſſioned by the king to demoliſh the fortifications of Loudun, to inform himſelf carefully of the affair of the nuns; and gave him ſufficient intimations, that he wiſhed the deſtruction of Grandier. Mr Laubardemont made him a priſoner in December 1633, and, having taken ample information of the matter, he went to concert the buſineſs with the cardinal. Letters patents were iſſued out, the eighth of July 1634, to bring Grandier to his trial. Theſe letters were directed to Mr Laubardemont, and to twelve judges of the courts in the neighbourhood of Loudun, all indeed honeſt men, but all credulous perſons, and for that reaſon choſen by Grandier's enemies [F]. The eighteenth (a) of Auguſt 1634, upon the depoſition of Aſhtaroth [G], a devil of the order of the Seraphins, and the chief of the poſſeſſing devils; and of Eaſas, Celſus, Acaos, Cedon, Aſmodæus, of the order of the thrones; and of Alex, Zabulon, Nepthalim, Cham, Uriel, and Achas, of the order of the principalities; that is, upon the depoſitions of the nuns, who pretended to be poſſeſſed with thoſe devils; the commiſſioners gave judgment, by which Urban Grandier, prieſt, curate of the church of St Peter in Loudun, and canon of the church of the Holy Croſs, was declared duly attainted and convicted of the which, according to the excellent thought of Apuleius, who was formerly accuſed of the ſame crime, is not believed by the accuſers themſelves; for if a man was truly perſuaded, that another could kill him by magic, he would be afraid of provoking him by accuſing him of that abominable crime. But tho' this argument ſeems to be very ſolid, I am of opinion, that there have been ſome people, at all times, who believed thoſe guilty, whom they accuſed of magic: for, in the firſt place, we muſt not too much rely on men's acting conſequentially; beſides, it is generally believed, that, when the judges have laid hold on a magician's cauſe, he can do no more miſchief. Laſtly, it is believed, that a magician will not venture to attempt any thing againſt his accuſers, ſince this would be furniſhing proofs againſt himſelf.

(a) Mr Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de Guill. Menage, pag. 342, is miſtaken in ſaying the 8th.

[D] They wrote to Father Joſeph .... that Grandier was author of a libel, entituled La Cordonniere de Loudun.] This libel is ſo intituled, becauſe a ſhoemaker's wife was introduced ſpeaking in it. Mr Menage takes the fooleries, that this ſatire is ſtuffed with, for a ſtrong proof, that Grandier did not make it (11): and he heard Mr Bouillaud ſay, that it was certain Grandier was not the author of that libel (12). Mr Bouillaud, a native of Loudun, had been familiarly acquainted with him (13). See, in the relation printed at Amſterdam (14), with what artifice this ſatire was made uſe of, to deſtroy Grandier.

[E] .... Cardinal Richelieu ſuffering himſelf to be perſuaded.] I have read ſomewhere, that he promoted this farce, in order to intimidate Lewis XIII, and keep him more ſubſervient to his deſigns, by theſe ſtories of ſorcery, with which they ſtunned his ears. This is not probable, tho' it muſt be confeſſed, that the ſublimeſt Genius's are commonly ſuch as leaſt neglect the occaſions, that ſeem moſt ridiculous and abſurd. I ſpeak of thoſe great genius's, who govern a ſtate. Their great penetration makes them diſcover ſecret ſprings, where one would think there are none; becauſe they know better than other men what uſe may be made of a trifle; becauſe they are better acquainted with the weakneſs of mankind, and know better what the ignorance and weakneſs of ſome, and the malice of others, can produce. We muſt not therefore argue thus upon all occaſions: ſuch a thing is ſo abſurd, ſo mean, ſo extravagant, that a man of ſenſe and judgment would never mind it; and conſequently it is falſe, that ſuch a miniſter of ſtate made uſe of it, invented, or ſupported it. The author of the hiſtory of the edict of Nantes obſerves (15), that many people looked upon the comedy, that was played for many years by the Urſulines of Loudun, to be an affair of religion. I believe he means, that thoſe people fancied this farce was acted in order to undermine the edict of Nantes. He pleaſantly relates the ridiculous anſwers made by thoſe nuns. Note, that he ſays, that Grandier governed the convent of the Urſulines; but, in the errata, he corrects it, by ſaying, that he ſometimes viſited the nuns. This laſt fact is no more conſiſtent, than the other, with the relation publiſhed in 1693. In the 25th page of it you will find theſe words: It is at leaſt certain, that thoſe nuns had lived ſeven or eight years at Loudun, without ever being viſited by him: and, in the year 1634, when they were confronted with him, it appeared that they had never ſeen him. Father Tranquille has alſo maintained it in one of his books, and that the curate never meddled with their affairs.

At this very moment I call to mind, that it is in the Sorberiana that I read what I ſaid at the begining of this remark. The paſſage is curious. We there find, that Mr Quillet challenged the devil of thoſe nuns, and nonpluſſed him, and that all the devil's-craft was confounded; that Mr Lobardèmont (16) was offended at it, and iſſued out a warrant againſt Quillet, who, perceiving, that this mummery was carried on by cardinal Richelieu, to intimidate the late king (17), who was naturally very fearful of the devil, thought it was not ſafe for him to be at Loudun, or in France, and went into Italy (18).

Naudé confirms what concerns the diſgrace of this challenger. Theſe are his words: 'Duncan and 'Quillet having oppoſed the impoſture of the nuns of 'Loudun, the former was reprimanded for it, and ſeverely threatened by cardinal Richelieu; and the latter was forced to go and ſerve the marquis de Cœuvre 'at Rome (19).'

[F] The judges were all choſen by Grandier's enemies.] The reflexion, that Mr Menage makes upon this, deſerves to be ſet down: It is to be obſerved, ſays he (20), that no innocence can be proof againſt the choice of judges: let an accuſer chuſe the judges, and he will cauſe all the Janſeniſt biſhops to be burnt by Moliniſt judges, and all the Moliniſt biſhops by Janſeniſt judges. Here is a ſubject for reflections (21). The attorney of the commiſſion, called Deniau, counſellor in the preſidial of la Fleche, wrote a tract concerning the devils of the nuns of Loudun (22), to vindicate the ſentence of the commiſſioners.

[G] Upon the depoſition of Aſhtaroth.] This appears from the ſecond verbal proceſs of the exorciſt (23). There were three poſſeſſions: during the firſt, the devils, except one, refuſed to tell their names: they only anſwered that they were enemies of GOD. During the ſecond and third, they diſcovered their names

(11) Granderii non eſſe tot ineptiæ quibus ſcatet arguunt. Id. ibid.

(12) Menage, Remarques ſur la Vie de Guillaume Menage, pag. 343.

(13) Ibid. pag. 341.

(14) Pag. 99.

(15) Tom. II, livr. x, pag. 538, ad ann. 1634.

(16) It ſhould be Laubardemont.

(17) This expreſſion is bad: it ſignifies Henry IV; and the intention of the author is to ſpeak of Lewis XIII.

(18) Sorberiana, voce Quillet, pag. m. 172.

(19) Naudé, Dial. de Maſcurat, pag. 310.

(20) Menage, ubi ſupra, pag. 342.

(21) See ſomething like it in the remark [F] of the article MONTAIGU (JOHN).

(22) Menage, ubi ſupra.

(23) In the twentieth volume of the Mercure Franç. pag. 760, 762.

the crime of magic, ſorcery, and poſſeſſion happening by his means in the perſons of ſome of the Urſuline nuns of Loudun, and other ſecular women mentioned in the proceſs: For the reparation of which crimes he was condemned to an amende honourable, and to be burnt alive, with the magical pacts and characters being in the rolls, together with the manuſcript book, by him written againſt the celibacy of prieſts [H], and his aſhes to be ſcattered in the air (b). Grandier, having heard this terrible ſentence without any commotion, deſired to have the guardian of the Franciſcans of Loudun for his confeſſor: He was doctor of divinity of the faculty of Paris. They refuſed him, and offered him a Recollect, whom he would not make uſe of; ſaying, that he was his enemy, and one of thoſe, who had moſt contributed to his ruin. They perſiſted in their reſolution to give him no other confeſſor than this Recollect, and he perſiſted in his refuſal; and ſo he made only a mental confeſſion to God: After which, he went to the place of execution, and died very conſtantly and chriſtianly. As he was upon the pile, a great fly (a kind of a drone) happened to buz about his head. A monk, preſent at the execution, who had read in the council of Quieres (c), that the devils are always at hand, when men are dying, to tempt them (d), and who had heard ſay, that Belzebub ſignifies in Hebrew the god of flies, cried out immediately, that it was the devil Belzebub that flew about Grandier, to carry his ſoul to hell; upon which a very pleaſant ſong was made. The devil's-craft of Loudun laſted a Year longer after the death of Grandier. Theophraſtus Renaudot, a famous phyſician, and inventor of the French-Gazette, made an encomium on Grandier, which was printed at Paris in looſe ſheets. This is taken from Menage (e), who vindicates our Grandier, and calls the poſſeſſion of thoſe nuns a chimæra [I]. Nay, one would think that he deſigned to deny in general names and dignities, and accuſed Grandier by name. It is remarkable that they anſwered in French, though the exorciſts ſpoke to them in Latin But it is much more remarkable, that their teſtimony ſhould have been admitted in a court of juſtice, and made a proof in a tryal, wherein a man was condemned to be burnt alive. Were they ignorant of what our Saviour ſays of the devil (24)? Seguin's thoughts are very ſingular. It ſeems, ſays he (25), that it is not ſo much the judgment of men, as of GOD, who ſent the devils from hell for the confuſion of this wretch: for it is a wonderful thing how the devils roſe up againſt him, and forced him to acknowledge, that they were his accuſers. I leave it to the Sorbonne to determine, whether any exceptions ſhould have been admitted againſt them, ſpeaking from GOD and giving evident proofs of the truth, which they were forced to utter. It aſtoniſhes one to think, that Chriſtian judges ſhould reject the exceptions made againſt ſuch witneſſes; for it is matter of faith, that they are the fathers of lies. It were in vain to ſay, that the force of exorciſms hindred them from lying; for the experience of the contrary had been lately ſeen. The ſecond verbal proceſs imports (26), That ſo many exorciſms had been practiſed, and indefatigably continued, ſo many faſts, oraiſons, and prayers had been made, that the maſter-devil and his aſſociates having promiſed to ſtrike the magician ſo violently, and in ſuch a part of his body, that it would be as viſible as painful; and moreover, having acknowledged that he yielded to the almighty power of GOD, and declared that he would retire from this monaſtery for ever; at laſt, on the thirteenth day of October 1632, he departed from the body of the ſaid mother ſuperior, and notified his departure by ſeven phlegms which ſhe ſpit a great way: likewiſe the devil of ſiſter Clara departed from her body; and afterwards all the nuns remained undiſturbed, every thing was quiet, and the whole nunnery enjoyed a holy peace. But they kept not their promiſe; they impoſed upon the exorciſts: from the twentieth of November, of the ſame year 1632, moſt of the nuns found themſelves moleſted and diſturbed by evil ſpirits (27).

[H] The manuſcript written by him againſt the celibacy of prieſts.] Mr Menage, who heard Mr Bouillaud ſay, that there was no proof, that Grandier was the author of this book (28), does not diſown, that it was found among his papers (29). He adds, that this book was not ill written, that it was dedicated to a woman, and that it ended with theſe verſes:

Si ton gentil eſprit prend bien cette ſcience
Tu mettras en repos ta bonne conſcience.

If your fine ſenſe takes this ſcience right, you will lull your good conſcience to reſt.

Doubtleſs he had this from Seguin's letter, inſerted in the Mercure François; but, perhaps, he ſhould not have concealed what is added there, that Grandier confeſſed, upon the rack, that he writ this little book. This phyſician is not to blame for ſaying (30), that this little book makes one ſuſpect that Grandier was married. Note, he goes on, That it is dedicated to his deareſt concubine, whoſe name is every where omitted as well as in the title . . . I cannot forbear telling you, continues he, that this tract ſeems to me very well done, and very coherent as far as the concluſion, which is wrong, and diſcovers it's venom. There is nothing in it tending to magic; it ſeems rather, that the contrary might be inferred from it, if we had not otherwiſe ſufficient proofs of. He had been ſaying a little before: As for the reſt, he was a man of a very reſolute and ſtrong mind; and Mr Preſident told me, he admired him at his tryal, and regretted his loſs. The funeral oration of Scævola Sammarthanus, made at Loudun by Grandier, is printed amongſt the works of Sammarthanus (31).

[I] Mr Menage . . . calls the poſſeſſion of thoſe nuns a chimera.] He thinks it very probable (32) that they were only tormented with the ſuffocation of the matrix; and he ſays (33), that Grandier deſerves to be added to Gabriel Naudé's catalogue of great men unjuſtly accuſed of magic. However, he confeſſes (34), that he heard the ſuperior of the Urſulines of Loudun ſay: ‘ that, when ſhe was delivered from the devils that tormented her, an angel engraved upon ‘ her hand JESUS MARIA JOSEPH F. DE SALLES, ‘ and that ſhe ſhewed him her hand, on which thoſe ‘ words were really engraved, but lightly, and like thoſe ‘ croſſes * we ſee on the arms of the pilgrims, who ‘ have been in the Holy Land. He heard her ſay farther, that the angel engraved firſt, on the upper part ‘ of her hand, the name of Francis de Salles; that this ‘ word removed lower to give the precedence to thoſe ‘ of Joſeph and Maria, and that all three removed lower ‘ ſtill to make room for that of JESUS.’ He has done well not to ſay in expreſs words, that he took this for an impoſture; the reader underſtands it well enough. But Monconis (35) leaves no room to doubt of the cheat; for which reaſon it will not be amiſs to relate here what he ſays of it. He went to viſit this ſuperior of the Urſulines, the eighth of May 1645, and becauſe ſhe made him wait to ſpeak with her above half an hour, he ſuſpected ſome artifice. He deſired her to ſhew him the characters, which the devil ſhe was poſſeſſed with had imprinted upon her hand, when he was exorciſed (36); ſhe did it: ‘ he ſaw, ‘ in letters of a blood-colour upon the back of her left ‘ hand, beginning from the wriſt to the little finger, ‘ JESUS; below, drawing towards the ſhoulder, Maria; ‘ lower, Joſeph; and lower ſtill in the fourth line, ‘ F. de Salles. She told him all the villanies of the ‘ prieſt Grandier, who had been burnt for ſending ‘ the devils into the convent; and how a magiſtrate ‘ of the town, whoſe wife he had debauched, had ‘ complained of it to her, and that they agreed to (b) See the twentieth Tome of the Mercure Franç. pag. 771.

(c) Apud Cariſiacum.

(d) Certum eſt quia ad omnes homines quando egrediuntur de corpore, veniunt Diaboli & ad juſtos & ad peccatores. A letter of the fathers of that council to Lewis king of Germany.

(e) In vita Guillelmi Menagii, in the remarks upon that life.

(24) St John, viii, 44.

(25) Mercure François, ibid. pag. 777, 778.

(26) Mercure François, ibid. pag. 761.

(27) Ibid. pag. 762.

(28) Remarques, pag. 343.

(29) The author of the Hiſtory of the Edict of Nantes, ubi ſupra, inſinuates, that Grandier had publiſhed that piece.

(30) Mercure François, ibid. pag. 779.

(31) Menage, Remarques, pag. 346.

(32) In Vita Guill. Menagii, pag 82.

(33) Remarques, pag. 339.

(34) Ibid. pag. 344.

* See Thevenot, chap xlvi, of his Travels in the Levant.

(35) Voiages, Part. I, pag. 8, & 9.

(36) According to Menage, it was an angel who imprinted thoſe characters, when the poſſeſſion was over.

neral all that is ſaid of magicians [K]. This were to get out of one difficulty by another [L]. Since the compoſition of this article, the Hiſtory of the Devils of Loudun has been printed in Holland (f); and it appears manifeſtly by that book, that the pretended poſſeſſion of the Urſulines was a horrid contrivance againſt the life of Grandier. This relation is extreamly curious, and attended with all the pieces relating to that trial. I found one thing in it, at which I was a little ſurprized, with reſpect to the great outcries that were made againſt Father Coton [M].

We

‘ impeach him, notwithſtanding the ſtrong inclinations this miſcreant gave her by his conjurations, from which the mercy of God preſerved her. At laſt, Mr de Monconis took leave of her, and deſired to ſee her hand again, which ſhe very civilly gave him through the grate: he obſerved to her, that the letters were not ſo red as when ſhe came, and that thoſe letters ſeemed to peel off, and all the skin of her hand to riſe, as if it had been a thin skin of ſtarch-water dried up: with the end of his nail, by a gentle touch, he took off part of a leg of the M; at which ſhe was very much ſurpriſed, though the place remained as fair as the other parts of the hand. He was ſatisfied with this.’ I do not in the leaſt queſtion it. The diſcovery of ſuch a notable forgery, which had infatuated ſo many people, was an ineſtimable treaſure to ſuch a man as he. The new hiſtory of the devils of Loudun will inform you; ‘ that, when the wrinkles of old age had made the hand dry and lean, the drugs, that were uſed to mark thoſe names anew, being no longer able to imprint them; the good mother ſaid then, that God had granted her prayers, and ſuffered thoſe names to be defaced, which were the occaſion of abundance of people coming to trouble and importune her, and withdraw her frequently from her acts of devotion (37).’ You will there find alſo, that Ceriſantes had the art of marking a name upon his hand (38), and that the queen's maids, in 1652, laughed at the engravings of the Urſulines (39).

[K] Nay, one would think that he deſigned to deny in general all that is ſaid of magicians.] In effect, he laughs at the firſt ſcene of this horrible tragedy, and draws from it ſome proofs for Grandier's juſtification. That firſt ſcene conſiſted in this, that one of the nuns, being by night in her little, but moſt chaſte, bed (40), perceived a ſpectre reſembling their deceaſed confeſſor, and which owned, that it was he himſelf, and that he was returned to impart very extraordinary things. The ſpectre ſaid, it would appear to her the ſame hour the night following; it failed not to appear, and received the ſame anſwer as at firſt, that ſhe could not treat with it without the privity of her ſuperior. Hereupon this ſpectre took Grandier's perfect ſhape. ‘ He talked to this nun of love-affairs, ſollicited her with addreſſes equally inſolent and laſcivious . . . . She ſtruggles, no body aſſiſts her; ſhe torments herſelf, no body comforts her; ſhe calls, no body anſwers; ſhe cries out, no body comes; ſhe trembles, ſhe ſweats, ſhe faints, ſhe invokes the holy name of Jesus; at laſt the ſpectre diſappeared.’ I own, with Mr Menage, that this is proper enough to clear Urban Grandier as to magic; but not to juſtify him in other reſpects. Could not he, without being obliged to the devil Cedon for opening the door (41), gain the door-keeper and get into this nun's chamber, pretending to be a ghoſt and diſguiſing himſelf with a mask reſembling their late ghoſtly father. This nun's ſtory ſeems to intimate the accompliſhment of the venereal act. Mr Menage ſays alſo (42), that no man of ſenſe will believe, that Grandier had the power of diſpoſing of devils at his pleaſure, to ſend them to torment innocent virgins conſecrated to GOD. In fine, he praiſes the prudence and juſtice of Lewis XIV, ‘ who has ſtopped the courſe of the proceedings againſt thoſe, who are accuſed of magic and witchcraft, having commuted the penalty of death into baniſhment, with reſpect to many perſons condemned, by a decree of the parliament of Roüen, to be burnt, as guilty of this crime; and having afterwards, by a decree of his council of ſtate, the twenty ſixth of April 1672, ordained, that, through all the province of Normandy, the priſons ſhould be opened to all perſons, that were detained for the ſame crimes; and that, for the future, ſuch as ſhould be accuſed of it ſhould be judged according to the declaration, which his majeſty promiſes, by this decree, to ſend into all the juriſdictions of France, to regulate the proceedings that are to be obſerved by the judges in the trials of magic and witchcraft.’

[L] . . . . It is to get out of one difficulty by another.] It is certain, that the moſt incredulous and ſubtile philoſophers muſt needs be puzzled with the phænomena relating to witchcraft. But, as to Grandier, I do not know but we might apply to him what Olympias ſaid upon the ſight of a miſtreſs of her husband, whom ſhe found extreamly handſome and witty: let no body ſuſpect her any longer of witchcraft, for all her enchantments are in her perſon (43). The curate of Loudun was a handſome genteel man, and a fine ſpeaker; and this probably was the magic, with which he tempted the ſuperior of the Urſulines (44), and ſubjected the nuns to violent and laſcivious ardors (45). The vow of continence and devotion not being ſufficient to remove this diſorder, it was believed to be ſupernatural. This imagination ſpared ſelf-love the ſhame of cheriſhing ſo long a criminal paſſion. They therefore believed themſelves bewitched; all the machine was out of order: and, for the honour of that ſociety, the firſt advances were not to be retracted. There is nothing more dangerous for people, that believe their good reputation to be neceſſary to the church, than to make a falſe ſtep. This mother-ſuperior of the Urſulines might perhaps be ſincere at firſt; but ſhe was not ſo, when ſhe received Monconis's viſit; and yet ſhe muſt carry on the farce to ſalve what was paſt. Thoſe, who perfectly knew the little town of Loudun, when thoſe devil-crafts firſt began, might have explained them better than can be done at preſent.

Within a few months after I had compoſed what I have now ſaid, I heard, that a man of that country was printing an exact relation of this adventure, at Amſterdam. I have found in it the confirmation of what I had conjectured, with an explication of the particular and perſonal paſſions, which occaſioned this ſtrange mummery; and if we believe the author of the relation, the ſuperior was never in earneſt.

[M] . . . . . great outcries againſt Father Coton.] He ſet down upon a piece of paper ſeveral queſtions he meant to propoſe to a woman poſſeſſed with the devil. Amongſt other queſtions, this was one: what is the moſt proper paſſage of ſcripture to prove purgatory (46)? The Proteſtants joined with a great number of Catholics in crying out againſt this impious curioſity, and inſulting both the father confeſſor of Henry IV, and the whole order of the Jeſuits. Yet it is certain, that this confeſſor did but follow herein the practice of his church, excepting ſome queſtions he would have offered concerning political affairs. Did not the exorciſt of Loudun ask the devil (47), Which was the beſt means, by which a creature departed from GOD might return to him? Did he not ask him (48), whether ſince his fall he had ever taſted the pleaſures of divine love? . . . . . . And which is the ſtrongeſt bond that faſtens men to the creatures? . . . (49) Whether there was any body in hell, who had had a great reliſh of the divine love upon earth? The devil anſwered at large theſe queſtions, and even diſcovered many ſecrets of his politics, and the means to overthrow them. Theſe things have been not only practiſed at Loudun, but are the current ſtyle of the exorciſts, as the Proteſtant divines object to the Roman Catholics. ‘ Si quis attente legerit nupera exorciſtarum ſcripta, ut Monachi Michaelis hiſtoriam Ludovici Gaufridi & obſeſſarum mulierum, non ſatis mirari poterit impietatem & ſtoliditatem hominum, qui judicium controverſiarum fidei à dæmonibus expoſcunt, eos fingunt pœnitentiæ prædicatores, eos adigunt, ut preces ad Deum fundant, & omnia religionis & pietatis externa munia obeant (50).’ So that the particular hatred againſt the Jeſuits was the reaſon of declaiming againſt the conduct of

Father

(f) At Amſterdam, 1693, in 12mo. It has been tranſlated into Dutch.

(37) Hiſtoire des Diables de Loudun, pag. 469.

(38) Ibid. pag. 394.

(39) Ibid.

(40) Mercure François, ubi ſupra, pag. 749.

(41) It is ſaid, that the third time the nuns were poſſeſſed, he came in, in the night, through a door, which the devil opened to him. Mercure François, ubi ſupra, pag. 762.

(42) Remarques, pag. 341.

(43) See the remark [I] in the article APULEIUS, where I have ſet down the Greek words of Plutarch.

(44) Monconis, ubi ſupra.

(45) Mercure François, pag. 761.

(46) Thuan. Hiſtor. lib. cxxxii, pag. 1053, ad ann. 1604.

(47) Hiſtoire des Diables de Loudun, pag. 371.

(48) Ibid. pag. 372.

(49) Ibid. pag. 373.

(50) Heidegg. Diſſert. Selectar. Triacade, pag. 98. See alſo Voëtius, Diſput. Tom. III, pag. 622, 623.

We find in the life of a Jeſuit, who was one of the exorciſts of the nuns of Loudun, ſeveral particulars upon this ſubject. I will mention two things out of it, one of which is very ſurprizing [N].

Father Coton, which is not cenſured when others make uſe of it. I do not ſpeak of the Proteſtants. A reſpect of perſons will always prevail among men.

[N] I will mention two things, one of which is very ſurprizing.] I know them only from Mr Couſin's extracts. Here is what I have read in his Journal des Sçavans, in the place where he mentions the life of Father Seurin (51). ' Upon occaſion of this father's conflict with the devils, the author of his life (52) proves at large the truth of the nuns of Loudun being poſſeſſed by the devil, eſpecially by the teſtimony of two of the greateſt wits of this age. The one is cardinal Richelieu, who ſent exorciſts to Loudun, maintained at the king's expence; and the other my lord Mountagu, who, having ſeen the devils go out of the body of the mother of the Angels, was perfectly convinced of it, and diſcourſed of it with Urban VIII, when he abjured his hereſy, and made profeſſion of the Catholic faith before him.' What I am going to ſay is much more extraordinary. You will ſee there a man, who redeemed JESUS CHRIST; that is, who, to reſcue him from the hands of the devil, gave up himſelf to the devil. Read theſe words of the journaliſt (53). ' When Father Seurin exorcized the nuns of Loudun, the devils declared, that two magicians had ſeized three hoſts, to prophane them. Father Seurin fell to prayers, to obtain the deliverance of his maſter's body, and conſented, that his own body ſhould be ſubmitted to the power of the devils, in order to redeem it. The offers were accepted, and the exchange performed. The devils took the three hoſts out of the hands of their agents, and put them at the foot of the Pyx of the holy ſacrament that was then expoſed; and one of them entered into the body of the father, who remained poſſeſſed, or obſeſſed, the greateſt part of his life.'

(51) Journal des Sçavans, May 9, 1689, pag. 311, Dutch Edit.

(52) His name is Henry-Maria Boudon.

(53) Journal des Sçavans, ubi ſupra.

GRAPALDUS (FRANCIS MARIUS), a learned man, lived in the XVIth century. He was of Parma; and, when his country, being freed from the French yoke, was reſtored to the obedience of Julius II, he was choſen chief of the embaſſy that was ſent to that Pope (a). His eloquence and fine ſhape recommended him to that employment (b). He excellently harangued Julius II, and publiſhed ſome verſes upon the ſubject of his ſpeech. The Pope crowned him with his own hand, with great ſolemnity, in the Vatican. Grapaldus, encouraged by this poetical crown, put himſelf upon writing a great many verſes, which have been printed (c). The work, in which he ſhewed his learning moſt, is that, wherein he deſcribes all the parts of a houſe [A]. He died of a retention of urine, being above fifty years of age (d).

(a) Jovius, in Elogiis, cap. lxii.

(b) A præſtanti facundia & inſigni corporis proceritate legationis princeps. Id. ib.

(c) Ex eodem, ibid.

(d) Id. ibid.

[A] The work, in which he ſhewed his learning moſt, is that, wherein he deſcribes all the parts of a houſe.] Paul Jovius paſſes this ſound judgment on it. ' Sed multo uberius, ſays he (1), & latius ingenii famam propagavit, edito libro de partibus ædium, quo per optimas diſciplinas perornatum diligenti cultura ingenium demonſtravit. —— But he acquired a much greater and more extenſive character by the book he publiſhed on the parts of a houſe, in which he diſcovered a fine genius improved by learning.' This book has been often printed. The firſt edition is that of Parma by Antony Quintianus. I do not know the year, but only that the author put out a ſecond ſeven years after: it was larger than the firſt (2). Geſner mentions only the editions of Baſil in 1533, and 1541, in 4to. That which I uſe is of Dort in 1618, in 8vo.

(1) Jovius, in Elog. cap. lxii.

(2) See the advertiſement to the reader.

GRASSIS (PARIS DE) is very much to be blamed for a cheat he put upon the public. He compoſed an epitaph upon a mule [A], which he cauſed to be engraved on a piece of marble, and afterwards hid it in the earth in his vineyard. Some time after, he ordered ſome trees to be planted in the place where this marble was buried; and when they came to tell him of the diſcovery of this inſcription, he gave it out for a thing that had been foretold concerning his mule. The thing was only laughed at for ſome time, and the marble was little taken notice of; but ſome years after it grew conſiderable, and paſſed for an antique with abundance of people [B]: Inſomuch that Thomas Porcacchi inſerted this epitaph in a book, as a genuine piece of antiquity (a). Paris de Graſſis is not the only perſon, that laid ſuch ſnares for antiquarians [C]. I believe,

(a) Ex Muſeo Italico Mabillonii, Tom. I, pag. 176.

[A] He compoſed an epitaph upon a mule.] He pretended, that one Publius Craſſus had erected this monument to his mule. DIS PEDIBUS SAXUM is the beginning of that inſcription.

[B] This epitaph paſſed for an antique with abundance of people.] Father Mabillon affirms it. ' Viris eruditis non nullis fucum fecit, ſays he (1), opinantibus id eſſe antiquum ..... Thomas Porcacchius inter alios hoc epitaphium pro genuino, & antiquo habuit in libro Funeralium: immo Alexander VII in Adverſariis ſuis notat id repertum fuiſſe prope ſanctum Petrum. —— Several learned men were deceived by it, taking it for an antique ..... Among others, Thomas Porcacchi took it for genuine and antient in his book De Funeralibus. Even Alexander VII, in his Adverſaria, obſerves, that it was found near St Peters.' He tells us, that Sebaſtian Maccius relates the ſtory of this impoſture in his collection of antient inſcriptions, which is in manuſcript in cardinal Chigi's library. Maccius had this from Annibal de Graſſis, biſhop of Jaccentia (2).

[C] He is not the only perſon, that laid ſuch ſnares for antiquarians.] I will give but one inſtance of the like impoſtures, though it were eaſy to compile a great number of them. The ninth of Auguſt 1505, three ſtones were found near the cape of Roco de Sintra in Portugal. There was upon thoſe ſtones a Latin inſcription in old characters, containing this prophecy:

Sibylla vaticinium occiduis decretum,
Volventur ſaxa literis, & ordine rectis,
Cum videas Occidens Orientis opes.
Ganges, Indus, Tagus, erit mirabile viſu,
Merces commutabit ſuas, uterque ſibi.
Soli æterno, ac Lunæ decretum.

This was taken for a Sybilline oracle (3), and ſome learned men tried their ſkill in explaining thoſe verſes; but at laſt it was diſcovered, that Cajado, a Portugueſe poet, was the author of them, and that it was he, who had buried thoſe ſtones, and taken his opportunity to have them dug out. ' Fraudem detexit Caſpar Varrerius: Scilicet, quo tempore Emmanuel Luſitaniæ Rex, per Vaſcum Gamam, navigationes in Indiam Orientalem feliciter tentaſſet: Ulyſſepone vixit Hermicus Cajadus, poeta celebris, Angeli Politiani diſcipulus (4): hic tria marmora literis antiquis, hoc vaticinium continentibus, incidi, & clam ' circa

(1) Mabillon. in Muſeo Italico, Tom. I, pag. 176.

(2) Ut Maccius refert ex Annibale de Graſſis Bononienſi Jaccentiæ Epiſcopo. Id. ibid.

(3) Hos verſus Sibyllinos eſſe Valentinus Moranus, Jacobus Navarch, Ferdinandus Lopez in ſuis Hiſtoriis Indiæ Orientalis, ſibi & aliis perſuaſerant. Jo. Euſebius Nierenbergius de Origine Sacræ Scripturæ, lib. iii, cap. iii, apud Voëtium, Diſput. Tom. IV, pag. 696.

(4) Nicolas Antonio, Biblioth. Hiſpan. Tom. I, pag. 433, ſays, that Cajadus, at his arrival in Italy, found, that Politian was dead.

believe, to ſay by the by, that this is the ſame man, who, in the beginning of the XVIth century, was maſter of the ceremonies under many popes, and biſhop of Peſaro, and brother to cardinal Achilles de GRASSIS. His journal was cited in the writings on the diſpute concerning the precedence between the republic of Venice and the duke of Savoy (b). His Ceremoniale is printed and eſteemed (c). He expreſſed a great zeal againſt a plagiary; for it is he whom preſident Couſin ſpeaks of, in a paſſage which I ſhall ſet down [D].

circa oppidum Syntra, leviter terrâ tegi curavit. Poſtquam verò, tractu temporis, aliquam antiquitatis ſpeciem contraxiſſent, amicos quoſdam, in villâ ſuâ, circa quam hæc marmora occultata erant, convivio excipit; quibus ſtrenuè epulantibus nunciat villicus, foſſores marmora, ignotis literis inſcripta, inveniſſe, procul dubio theſaurum eo loco defoſſum eſſe. Advolant omnes, inveniunt lapides, mirantur vaticinium, non ſanè foliis inſcriptum: Rex, hujus fraudis conſcius, ſtuporem tamen ſimulat, verſus aulicis deſcribendos tradit, ipſa verò marmora, tanquam ſanctiora κειμήλια, in gazophylacio religiosè ſervat (5). —— Caſpar Varrerius detected the fraud: For, at the time when Emanuel, king of Portugal, ſent Vaſcus Gama, with ſucceſs, on a voyage to the Eaſt-Indies, there lived at Lisbon one Hermicus Cajado, a famous poet, and a diſciple of Angelus Politianus: this man got three marbles engraved with antient characters, containing this prophecy, and had them privately buried a little way under ground, near the city Syntra. But after that, through length of time, they had contracted an appearance of antiquity, he invited ſome friends to his country-houſe, near which theſe marbles were hidden; and, during the banquet, his ſteward brought word, that certain marbles, inſcribed with unknown characters, had been dug up, and that there was certainly ſome treaſure buried there. Away run the company, find the ſtones, and wonder at the prophecy, not written indeed on leaves. The king, who knew this cheat, yet ſeemed aſtoniſhed, orders his attendants to copy the verſes, and lays up the marbles as great curioſities in his Muſæum.' There are thoſe, who ſay, that Cajado hoped by this trick to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of his king, and ſqueeze ſome money out of him. 'Poſtea tamen compertum eoſdem confictos & impoſitos fuiſſe à quodam Hermo Charado Luſitano, qui illos marmori inſcripſerat, defoderatque ut ſitu humoreque terræ aliquantulum deformati, vetuſtatis indicium exhiberent: rurſuſque per mercenarias operas refoderat, ut hoc tam nobili atque peregregio antiquitatis monumento, Regis (Luſitaniæ, Emanuelis) gratiam, avidè in Orientis opes intenti, pecuniamque aucuparetur: ut teſtantur Cæſar Orlandius & Gaſpar Barrerius, quos refert Ortelius in theatro magno Tab. 5. novi orbis, & ab eo mutuatus Malvenda lib. 3, de Antichriſto cap. 16. Torniellus in annalibus 2. tom. anno mundi 3043. num. 7. pag. 48. (6). —— It was afterwards diſcovered that they were not genuine, but the contrivance of one Hermus Charadus a Portugueſe, who had inſcribed them on marble, and buried them, that, being a little deformed by lying in the moiſt earth, they might paſs for antiques; and that he had afterwards dug them up, that, by ſo noble a monument of antiquity, he might gain the favour of Emanuel, king of Portugal, who was then eagerly intent on the riches of the Eaſt, and might ſqueeze ſome money out of him; as we learn from Cæſar Orlandius, & Gaſpar Barrerius, &c.'

[D] It is he, whom preſident Couſin ſpeaks of, in a paſſage, which I ſhall ſet down.] 'Chriſtopher Marcel, nominated to the archbiſhopric of Corfu, having recovered a copy of a book written by Auguſtin Patricius, under the pontificate of Innocent VIII, concerning the rites of the Romiſh church, printed it at Venice in 1516, and dedicated it to Leo X, without mentioning Auguſtin Patricius the true author of it, who had been maſter of the ceremonies at Rome from the time of the pontificate of Pius II, his uncle, who gave him the ſirname of Picolomini, to that of Innocent VIII, under which he corrected the Roman pontifical, and compoſed that Ceremoniale. Paris de Craſſis, who was maſter of the ceremonies under Leo X, had no ſooner ſeen this Venice edition, but he made his complaint of it to his holineſs, as of a crime that could not be expiated but by fire, that ſhould conſume the author and the copies. The Pope, who had licenſed that edition, pretended to take fire upon the remonſtrance of this zealous maſter of the ceremonies, and ordered a congregation to examine the affair, But notwithſtanding the diligence of Paris de Craſſis, many new editions of that book came out ſoon after, at Cologne, and elſewhere (7).'

This is what we find in Mr Couſin's extract of the ſecond volume of the Muſæum Italicum. I have conſulted this ſecond volume ſince the firſt edition of my dictionary, which convinces me, that Ovid had a great deal of reaſon to ſay, that it is beſt drinking at the fountain-head, Gratius ex ipſo fonte bibuntur aquæ (8).

I have found, that Paris de Graſſis's paſſion againſt the archbiſhop of Corfu proceeded not ſo much from his aſcribing to himſelf a book written by another man, as from his divulging, even with alterations, ſuch ceremonies as ought to remain concealed. He remonſtrates in a letter to Leo X (9), that he has been maſter of the ceremonies near ſixteen years; and that he ſhould think himſelf inexcuſable, if he ſhould quietly ſuffer them to be corrupted, and publiſhed, and his predeceſſors robbed of their due praiſes. He does not diſſemble, that one of his grievances conſiſts in this, that the publication of thoſe things leſſens their veneration, and expoſes to contempt, what the veil of ſecrecy and myſteriouſneſs made venerable. 'Quemadmodum juſti cujuſque principis eſt curare, ne quiſquam ſuo jure fraudetur: ita, ſi diligenter inſpexerimus, ad quempiam alium non magis ſpectat quam ad Romanum Pontificem, ne ſacræ ſuæ ceremoniæ maculentur, neve aliqua in parte alterentur, ac præſertim ne corrumpantur: ſed & quod omnium principum eſt, ne prolatæ in vulgus velut proſtitutæ pontificalium ſacrorum exiſtimationem minuant, flocci faciant, & contemnantur (10). —— As it is the duty of every juſt prince to take care, that no one be deprived of his right, ſo, if we carefully conſider it, no one is more concerned, than the Pope, to ſee that religion be not prophaned, nor it's ceremonies in any reſpect altered, or corrupted: but, which is incumbent on all princes, to take eſpecial care, that, by being made public, they do not expoſe the ceremonies of the pontificate to the contempt of the vulgar.' He alledges the example of the ancient Heathens, who would not ſuffer the myſteries of the gods to come to the knowledge of prophane men. He inſtances particularly in the conduct of the old Romans, and king Tarquin, who cauſed Marcus Tullius to be thrown into the ſea, as a puniſhment for giving the book of the ſacred ceremonies to be tranſcribed. Our de Graſſis deſired, that the archbiſhop of Corfu's book ſhould be burnt with the author, or at leaſt that the author ſhould be puniſhed as ſhould be thought proper. The Pope thought it a reaſonable demand, and promiſed to have it examined in the next conſiſtory. 'Hanc epiſtolam cum in manibus Papæ dediſſem, legiſſetque libenter & avide, & acceptaſſet rationes & argumenta in ea per me allegata; verſus ad cardinales aliquos, qui ſibi forte adhærebant, dixit me rationem habere ſuper petitionibus meis: & librum ceremoniarum nuper impreſſum omnino comburi ſimul cum falſo auctore, ſicut poſtulaſſem, aut ſaltem ipſum auctorem corrigi & caſtigari omnino debere prout præſentibus videretur. Itaque ad primum conſiſtorium rem & cauſam differre (11). —— The Pope, having received from me this letter, and having eagerly read it, and approved the reaſons and arguments alledged by me in it; he turned to ſome cardinals, who ſtood near him, and ſaid to them, that my petition was reaſonable, and that the book of ceremonies lately printed, together with their counterfeit author, deſerved to be burnt, as I had deſired; at leaſt that the author ought to be corrected and chaſtiſed, as ſhould ſeem proper to thoſe preſent: he therefore referred the matter to the next conſiſtory.' We do not know what was the iſſue of this affair, there being ſome ſheets wanting in de Graſſis's Ceremoniale, in the

---

(b) See Graſwinckel, de jure Præcedentiæ, pag. 263, 320, 329.

(c) See Naudæus, Bibliograph. Polit. pag. m. 42.

(5) Montan. Legat. Belg. ad Japan. pag. 15, apud Lomeierum de Biblioth. pag. 366, 367.

(6) Neirembergius, ubi ſupra.

(7) Journal des Sçavans, March 7, 1689, pag. 141, 142, Dutch Edit.

(8) Ovid. in Epiſt. ex Ponto, Epiſt. v, ver. 8.

(9) Written in the year 1517.

(10) Muſæum Italic. Tom. II, in Appendice, pag. 588.

(11) Id. ibid. pag. 592.

place where the narration was to be continued (12). Father Mabillon can hardly forbear laughing at de Graſſis's great zeal; and it is with ſome pleaſure that he obſerves (13), that the book of the archbiſhop of Corfu was not burnt. He ſays, that the judicious Catholics do not build their veneration for the Pope upon thoſe occult ceremonies, but upon his quality of head of the church. However, it muſt be confeſſed, that this zealot for ſecrecy had reaſon to ſay, that it was to be feared, that, if the myſteries of the Roman Ceremoniale came to be divulged, the people would not have ſo right a notion of them (14). For it is uſual to admire much more what is not known, than what is. Nay, he ſeems to be ſorry that the pontifical is made public; which, ſays he, is the cauſe that, to the contempt of the prieſthood, the ceremonies contained in that book fall daily into the hands of the profane; and the ſectaries make uſe of it to ridicule our religion. Sed utinam etiam & illa quæ dixi, ſecretiora forent & magis recondita. Non enim ea quotidie ad profanas manus in ſacerdotii contemptum, nec ad alienas ſectas in noſtræ religionis irriſionem devenire videremus (15). Be it how it will, we may very well ſay, that he is too angry with the prelate of Corfu. He vilifies him at ſuch a rate, that I queſtion whether he conceived not as great an averſion for him, as they formerly incurred, that divulged the myſterious ceremonies of Ceres; a ſort of people, that others were afraid to embark with in the ſame veſſel, for fear of being involved in their deſerved puniſhment.

Eſt & fideli tuta ſilentio
Merces. Vetabo, qui Cereris ſacrum
  Vulgarit arcanæ, ſub iiſdem
  Sit trabibus, fragilemque mecum
Solvat phaſelum: ſæpè Dieſpiter
Neglectus, inceſto addidit integrum (16).

And ſilence has it's ſure reward . . . .
O may I never ſpread my ſails
With him, who myſteries reveals!
For oft neglected Jove has ſent,
Without diſtinction, puniſhment
On the prophane and innocent.

(12) Ibid. in Commentar. pag. 6.

(13) Ibid. pag. 7.

(14) Quod ſi ſacrorum arcana pandantur, & ſacræ publicentur ceremoniæ, illico futurum eſt, ut omnis opinio minuatur, ut pontificia auctoritas elangueſcat neceſſe eſt Ibid. in Append. pag. 589.

(15) Ibid pag. 588.

(16) Horat. Od. ii, lib. iii.

GRASWINCKEL (Theodore), a native of Delft, was a very learned civilian in the XVIIth century, which he made appear by ſeveral works [A]. He was not only well verſed in matters of law, but alſo in the belles lettres, and Latin poetry. His merit was acknowledged; for he had good preferments at the Hague [B]. The republic of Venice made him knight of St Mark. He died of an apoplexy at Mechlen, the 12th of October 1666, at ſixty ſix years of age, and was buried in the great church of the Hague, where his epitaph is to be ſeen, which is very glorious to him.

[A] He made it appear by ſeveral works.] He publiſhed a book, at the Hague, in 1642, intituled, De jure majeſtatis, which he dedicated to the queen of Sweden. In which he lays down the principles moſt favourable to monarchs, and the moſt oppoſite to Buchanan's republican maxims. He took the part of the republic of Venice againſt the duke of Savoy, in the diſpute of precedency: For he publiſhed a book in 1644, De jure præcedentiæ inter ſereniſſimam Venetam rempubl. & ſereniſſ. Sabaudiæ ducem, in which he confutes the diſſertation publiſhed upon that ſubject in favour of the duke of Savoy. He had for a long time given proofs of his zeal for the republic of Venice. In the year 1634, he wrote an anſwer to the Squittinio, which he intituled, Libertas Veneta, ſeu Venetorum in ſe ac ſuos imperandi jus. In 1652, he wrote againſt one Burgus, a Genoeſe, who, as well as Selden, pretended, that the ſea, no leſs than the earth, was ſubject to the dominion of ſome ſtates. Maris liberi vindiciæ adverſus Petrum Baptiſtam Burgum Liguſtici maritimi dominii aſſertorem, is the title of Graſwinckel's work (1); who, the year following, publiſhed a like tract againſt Welwood. I have alſo ſeen a treatiſe of his De præludiis juſtitiæ & juris, printed in 1660, in which he refutes a Portugueſe Jeſuit (2). He added a diſſertation to it, De fide hæreticis & rebellibus ſervanda. I will not forget his Stricturæ adverſus Felden, nor his commentary upon Salluſt, and upon a Spaniſh author, De vita & nece Caſſii (3) & Bruti, nor his tranſlation of David's pſalms into heroic verſe, nor his verſion of Thomas à Kempis (4) in elegiac verſe, nor his poem in hexameter verſe, in which he deſcribes the life of Andrew Canterus, a native of Groningen, who was a prodigy of learning in his younger years. He alſo wrote ſome books in Dutch; The art of living well; a commentary upon the edicts de Annonis; and two volumes in 4to (5), concerning the ſovereignty of the ſtates of Holland.

[B] He had good preferments at the Hague.] He was advocate fiſcal of the demeſnes of the ſtates of Holland, and recorder and ſecretary to the bipartite court, for the ſtates-general.

(1) Soprani, in his collection of the writers of Liguria, ſpeaking of Burgus, ſays, that Thomaſo Graſeninckelio wrote againſt him in 1652. Oldoini has tranſcribed this fault in his Athenæum Liguſticum. This is a falſification of our Graſwinckel's name and ſirname.

(2) Called Ferdinand Rebellus.

(3) See citation (51) of the article BRUTUS (Marcus Junius).

(4) De imitatione Jeſu Chriſti.

(5) They were printed after his death; one in 1667, and the other in 1674.

GRATAROLUS (William) a learned phyſician, lived in the XVIth century. He was born at Bergamo in Italy; and he left his country, to go into Germany, in order to profeſs the Proteſtant religion. After ſome ſtay at Baſil, he was invited to Marpurg, to be profeſſor of phyſic. But he ſtaid there only a year; whether it be, that the Heſſian air did not agree with him, or that he regretted the loſs of the pleaſures he had enjoyed at Baſil (a). He returned to that town ſome time after [A], where he died at fifty two years of age. He wrote ſeveral good books [B]. It is ſaid, that (a) Nobilis hunc miſit Cattis Baſilea, ſed anno Vix ſemel exacto rurſus eò rediit, Sive quod Haſſiaco non poſſet vivere cælo, Sive quod in votis urbs Baſilea foret. Petrus Nigidius, apud Freber. Theatr. p. 1252.

[A] He died at Baſil ſome time after.] It is affirmed in the Theatrum of Paul Freherus, that he died the ſixth of May 1562, for which the fourth part of John James Boiſſard's Icones virorum illuſtrium is quoted: they might alſo have quoted the Diarium Hiſtoricum of Reuſnerus. The new edition of Vander Linden (1) places this phyſician's death in 1562. Konig places it in 1566, and Thuanus (2), and Bucholcer (3), on the 16th of April 1568. Two prefaces (4), with ſome little pieces, which Gratarolus, being at Marpurg, dedicated, the 25th of Auguſt 1562, to the Landgrave of Heſſe, prove that he did not die at Baſil the 6th of May of the ſame year. It is a ſad thing to find ſuch a diſagreement among authors about a thing of this nature, which might ſo eaſily be exactly known. I have obſerved the like variations about Giſanius. See the remark [A] of his article.

[B] He wrote ſeveral good books.] Theſe are the titles of ſome of them; de Memoria reparanda, augenda, conſervanda, ac de Reminiſcentia. The firſt edition, which is of the year 1554, has been followed by many others (5). De prædictione morum, naturarumque hominum facili, & inſpectione partium corporis. Prognoſtica naturalia de temporum mutatione perpetua, ordine literarum. De literatorum & eorum qui magiſtratibus funguntur conſervanda præſervandaque valetudine. De vini natura, artificio, & uſu, deque omni re potabili. De regimine iter agentium, vel equitum, vel peditum, vel navi, vel curru, ſeu rheda, &c. viatoribus quibuſque utiliſſimi libri duo. He publiſhed ſome books of other authors, and added to them ſomething of his own. Petri Pomponatii liber de cauſis occultorum affectuum, ſeu de incantatione, cum præfatione & gloſſulis. Petri Aponenſis libellus de venenis ad manuſcriptum exemplar correctus, cui adjecit multa ejus argumenti utilia. Correctiones & additiones in librum Italicum falſo attributum Gabrieli Fallopio, cui titulus eſt ſecreta Fallopii. He made a collection of ſeveral tracts concerning the ſweating diſeaſe in England, and concerning baths, and a compilation of ſeveral books of alchimy (6). It cannot be denied that he was a public ſpirited man, ſince he not only ſought remedies, that might be uſeful to magiſtrates,

(1) De Script. Medic. pag. 376.

(2) Thuan. lib. xliii, ſub fin.

(3) Bucholcer. in Indice Chron. pag. m. 622.

(4) Printed at Straſburg, in 1563, 8vo.

(5) Vide Lindenium renovatum, pag. 376, 377.

(6) Id. pag. 377, & Paul Freher. in Theatro, pag. 1252.

that he excelled in the art of phyſiognomy (b). Beza wrote ſome letters to him, which are printed (c).

(b) Taken from Paul Freberus, ibid.

(c) The 42d, and 46th.

magiſtrates, but alſo thoſe that are proper for all ſorts of travellers. He did not forget ſtudious men; for he endeavoured to enable them to preſerve their health, and ſtrengthen their memory. A man, who could ſupply their neceſſities on this account, would deſerve divine honours in the republic of letters, in which memory is almoſt as neceſſary as life.

GRAWERUS (ALBERT),

GRAWERUS (ALBERT), born at Meſecow in the March of Brandenburg, in the year 1575, was in great eſteem with the divines of the confeſſion of Ausburg. He may be compared to thoſe ſoldiers of fortune, who, going through all the military degrees, at laſt are advanced to the firſt poſts. At firſt, he only taught ſchool in Hungary (a) [A]; but, when Agria was taken (b) the Ottomans, he retired to Wittemberg, from whence he went to Iſleben, to direct the ſchool there: After this he was made dean of Mansfield (c); then he was admitted doctor of divinity in the univerſity of Iëna (d), and, two years after, he was profeſſor there in the ſame faculty. At laſt, in 1616, he obtained the ſuperintendency of the churches of the country of Weimar (e). He died the 30th of November 1617 (f). He was the hotteſt divine imaginable; and never any man wrote with greater paſſion againſt thoſe of the confeſſion of Geneva. It is to him chiefly that the miſſionaries have recourſe [B], when they deſign to ſhew the feuds, that reign betwixt the two Proteſtant communions. He was furious, not only in verbal diſputes, but alſo in his writings [C]. They are numerous [D]; and moſt of them againſt the Calviniſts. He alſo writ againſt the Socinians and the Romiſh church.

(a) Firſt at Scepuz. and then in 1597, at Caſſovia.

(b) In the year 1599.

(c) In the year 1607.

(d) In the year 1609.

(e) Ex Spizelio, in Templo Honoris reſerato, pag. 39. See alſo Freberus's Theatrum, pag. 394, 395.

(f) Freher pag. 395. Spizelius ſays, 1616.

[A] At firſt he only taught ſchool in Hungary] This is the idea we ſhould form, by conſulting only Spizelius; but, if you read the funeral oration (1), you will find, that the baron Gregory Horwath, having ſet up a new college at Scepuz (2), made Grawerus rector of it, on the recommendation of Giles Hunnius, and that Grawerus taught there both philoſophy and divinity.

(1) Apud Freherum, in Theatro, pag. 394, 395.

(2) In the year 1595.

[B] It is to him the miſſionaries have recourſe.] Father Adam, writing a book againſt Mr Daillé, produced I know not how many Germans, one Giles Hunnius, one Zephyrius, one Gibelin, one Philip Nicholas, and one Granverus (3), who are full of invectives againſt the Calviniſts. He chiefly inſiſted upon a treatiſe of Grawerus, intituled, The moſt abſurd abſurdities of the Calviniſtical abſurdities (4). Here follows the prudent anſwer of Mr Daillé, but ſomewhat diſobliging to the author I ſpeak of in this article. 'They are angry brethren; we muſt excuſe their paſſion, and comfort ourſelves with the teſtimony that even their virulence gives to the goodneſs of our cauſe, in our controverſies with them. Were they not in the wrong, they would not come to injurious language. It is certainly error that diſcompoſes them. Truth has more gentleneſs and reſerve, and is not uſed to fly out into ſuch outrage. For, that Luther and his diſciples were in a rage, when they writ thoſe ſhameful and horrible things you have collected, is evident by the extravagance of their very words; as, to omit the reſt, by this ridiculous title of one of their books, which you fail not to repreſent: The moſt abſurd abſurdities of the Calviniſtical abſurdities. A learned man would not ſpeak ſo fooliſhly if he was in his right ſenſes.' He concludes that chapter with theſe words: Thanks be to GOD, they are not all ſo paſſionate as your Gibelins and Granveres. Some of them are more gentle and tractable; and the late Dr Calixtus, a divine of Helmſtadt, the moſt learned of all the Lutherans of his time, has ſufficiently ſhewn it in two or three books (*), which he publiſhed upon this ſubject (5).

Note, That Mr Daillé might have taxed the jeſuit Adam with ill tranſlating the title of our Grawerus's book. This is the true tranſlation of it: The Calviniſtical abſurdities more abſurd than all other abſurdities.

(3) So it is in Mr Daillé's Reply, part II, pag. 86; but it ſhould be Grawerus.

(4) The Latin title is, Abſurda abſurdorum abſurdiſſima, Calviniſtica abſurda, hoc eſt invicta demonſtratio Logica & Theologica aliquot horrendorum paradoxorum Calviniani dogmatis in articulis de perſona Chriſti, Cœna Domini, baptiſmo, & prædeſtinatione. Jenæ, 1612, in 4to. It is the ſecond edition.

* Judicium de Controv. Luther. & Ref. ann. 1650. Deſiderium & ſtudium Concord. Eccleſ. ann. 1651.

(5) Daillé, Replique à Adam, part. II, chap. xiv, pag. m. 86.

[C] He was furious .... in verbal diſputes ... and in his writings.] He had a conference with Amling, in the year 1604, in the caſtle of Schochwiz; and he printed it with notes, which breathed nothing but his zeal for Lutheraniſm: Veritatis Lutheranæ amore notulis quibuſdam aſperſis evulgatum (colloquium cum Amlingo). He never made ſuch efforts in favour of his party as on that occaſion. 'Singulari zelo & fervore ſpiritus ſancti motus ſtrenuè & maſculè adverſus hoſtium quorumvis cohortes depugnavit, nec quicquam omiſit quo veritatis cœleſtis doctrina aſſeri propugnarique queat, CUM PRIMIS in graviſſimo illo colloquio cum Amlingo habito (6).—— Being moved by an extraordinary zeal, and the fervor of the holy ſpirit, he ſtrenuouſly, and with manly courage, oppoſed whole legions of foes, and omitted nothing, which might aſſert and defend the heavenly doctrine of truth; ESPECIALLY in the conference he had with Amling.' Judge how much he inveighed againſt Sebaſtian Lamius, whom he convicted of Calviniſm in a ſynod. Quemadmodum etiam in ſynodo Hungarico-Keyſmarcenſi anno 95 habita Sebaſtianum Lamium heterodoxiæ Calvinianæ convicit (7). No doubt he accuſed him as a falſe brother, who, under the name of a Lutheran miniſter, hatched Calviniſtical errors; which alone was ſufficient to heat a man of a ſedate mind: Beſides, he diſputed againſt him in a ſynod. The circumſtance of the place was enough of itſelf to move his ſpleen. I muſt not forget, that he was called, the ſword and the ſhield of Lutheraniſm (8).

(6) Spizelius, in Templo Honoris reſerato, pag. 43.

(7) Id. ibid.

(8) Id. pag. 40.

[D] His writings are numerous.] The bare titles will manifeſt the exceſs of his zeal. Bellum Calvini & Jeſu Chriſti, at Magdeburg 1605. Harmonia præcipuorum Calvinianorum & Photinianorum, at Jena 1612, in 4to. I have already mentioned the Abſurda abſurdorum, &c. His Anti-Lubinus, hoc eſt Elenchus paradoxorum & emblematum Calviniſticorum D. Eilhardi Lubini, de prima cauſa & natura mali, at Magdeburg 1606, in 4to, is a book againſt the Calviniſts, though Eilhard Lubin lived and died a Lutheran, as Mr Baillet affirms (9); for doubtleſs Grawerus ſuſpected him to be of Calvin's opinion in ſome things. I omit the titles of his other books. You will find them in Spizelius (10), and in Paul Freherus (11).

(9) In the firſt Tome of the Anti, pag. 351.

(10) Ubi ſupra, pag. 40.

(11) Theatrum Viror. illuſtr. pag. 395.

GREGORY I,

GREGORY I, ſurnamed the Great, born at Rome of a patrician family, diſcovered ſo much ability in the exerciſe of the ſenatorial office, that the emperor Juſtin the younger made him prefect of Rome (a). He laid down this dignity, when he found, that it made him too fond of the world, and ſhut himſelf up in a convent [A], under the

(a) Maimbourg, Hiſtoire du Pontificat de St Gregoire.

[A] He ſhut himſelf up in a convent.] It was in that of St Andrew. He had founded it at Rome in his paternal houſe (1), and had given the government of it to Valentius, whom he took from a country monaſtery (2). He founded ſix other convents in Sicily, and ſold the reſt of his eſtate, and gave the price of it to the poor (3).

(1) Maimbourg, Hiſtoire du Pontificat de St Gregoire le Grand, pag. 7, Dutch Edit.

(2) Monaſterio ſuo urbano Valentium ex Monaſterio S. Equitii in provincia Valeria accitum præfecit. Cave, Hiſt. Literar. Scriptor. Eccleſ. pag. 430.

(3) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra.

the diſcipline of the abbot Valentius (b). He was quickly taken out of it by Pope Pelagius II, who made him his ſeventh deacon, and ſent him nuncio to Conſtantinople, to demand ſuccours againſt the Lombards. He returned to Rome after the death of the emperor [B], and was for ſome time ſecretary to Pope Pelagius; after which he obtained leave to retire into his monaſtery (c). When he thought to enjoy there a quiet life, he was elected Pope by the clergy, the ſenate, and people of Rome; and, after uſing all imaginable means to avoid this dignity [C], he was obliged to accept it (d). It appeared by his conduct, that they could not have elected a more deſerving perſon for that great poſt; for, beſides that he was learned, and inſtructed the church by writing and preaching, he knew very well how to manage the tempers of princes for the temporal and ſpiritual intereſts of religion. The particulars of his conduct in this reſpect would carry me too far; and I am the more willing not to enlarge upon it, becauſe every body may inform himſelf of it in a modern writer (e). But I ſhall obſerve, that our Pope undertook the converſion of the Engliſh [D], and happily effected it, by the aſſiſtance

(b) Others call him Valentinus.

(c) Maimbourg, pag. 7, & 8.

(d) He was inſtalled the third of September, 590.

(e) Maimbourg, in the above quoted book.

[B] He returned to Rome after the death of the emperor.] This emperor's name was Tiberius: He died the 14th of Auguſt 582 (4); which manifeſts a great fault of Mr Maimbourg. He ſays (5), that, though Gregory could obtain no ſuccour, yet he proved very uſeful and ſerviceable to the church, ſince he compoſed, at Conſtantinople, his excellent book of morals upon Job, and by his learned conferences obliged the patriarch Eutychius to retract his errors concerning the reſurrection. After which, continues he, his nunciature ending by the emperor Tiberius's deceaſe, who died at that time .... he returned to Rome. He places theſe conferences in the year 586; he muſt therefore believe, that Tiberius did not die before this year, which is a groſs error in chronology. Dr Cave places the ſame conferences and the death of this emperor in the year 586 (6). He has therefore committed the ſame fault. Baronius (7) places likewiſe this emperor's death in the ſame year: His falſe chronology was not known to Mr du Pin (8).

(4) Chron. Alexandr. See Father Pagi, Diſſert. Hypatica, pag. 336, & Denys de Sainte Marthe, pag. 100, 101, of St Gregory's Hiſtory.

(5) Ubi ſupra, pag. 8.

(6) Ubi ſupra, pag. 430.

(7) In Annal.

(8) Nouv. Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſiaſt. Tom. V, pag. 102. Dutch Edit.

[C] He uſed all imaginable means to avoid this dignity.] He wrote to the emperor a moſt preſſing letter, in which he intreats him not to confirm his election, and to give orders for the immediate choice of another man of a greater capacity, ſtrength, and holineſs, than he (9); and, when he underſtood, that his letter had been intercepted by the governor of Rome, being perſuaded that his election would be confirmed at the imperial court, he betook himſelf to flight, and went and hid himſelf in a cave in the midſt of a foreſt, being reſolved to live there ...... till, not knowing where to find him, they ſhould proceed to a new election (10). He could never reſolve to accept the papal dignity, till he underſtood from ſome heavenly ſigns, that it was GOD's will he ſhould be Pope. It is ſaid (11), that a dove flying before thoſe that looked for him, led them the way they were to go; or, that a miraculous light diſcovered to them the place of his retreat. This very much reſembles the adventure of the Magi who went to worſhip the new born Meſſiah. Mr Maimbourg's exclamation upon St Gregory's reluctancy, is very judicious. 'A great example, ſays he (12), which ought to confound the furious ambition of thoſe, who, having nothing comparable to the holineſs, learning, and ability of this great man, who buried himſelf alive in the earth, to avoid the pontificate as a thunderbolt, do, by their ſcandalous intriguing, a kind of violence to the Holy Ghoſt, to raiſe themſelves, againſt his orders, by ways purely human and uncanonical, to the higheſt place in the church'. See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (13), in the extract of a book, intituled, De Clerico renitente. I ought not to forget another paſſage of Maimbourg, concerning St Gregory's anſwers to the letters he received from all parts (14), 'To let him know how much they ſhared in the joy, which every body expreſſed for his exaltation ..... He anſwered, that he was extreamly ſorry he had been taken from his ſolitude, to be engaged anew in worldly affairs. But, becauſe experience has ſhewn in all ages (it is Maimbourg's reflexion) that the fine things, which a man of parts can ſpeak and write, are not always a good proof of his integrity and virtue; and that many think and act quite contrary to what they preach and write; I ſhall not inſert here what this great pontiff ſaid of himſelf upon this ſubject in his writings.' But there is one thing, which equity will not allow me to omit: It is a fault of the famous Peter du Moulin, animadverted upon by Mr Maimbourg. That no body may complain of my extenuating or amplifying the thing, I will uſe the animadverter's own words (15).

(9) Maimb. ibid. pag. 13.

(10) Id. ibid. pag. 10.

(11) Ibid.

(12) Pag. 14.

(13) For the month of February, 1685, pag. 179.

(14) Maimb. ubi ſupra, pag. 14.

'The miniſter du Moulin, in a little piece he has written, under the falſe title of The life of St Gregory I, ſurnamed the Great .... would make us believe .... that this Roman pontiff was of a religion contrary to ours. But, not to give myſelf the trouble of confuting ſo wretched a libel, I ſhall only ſhew, to evince what credit he deſerves, that he begins with the moſt horrible and groſſeſt impoſture that ever was. For thus he ſpeaks, in the ſecond chapter, pag. 9, to prove, againſt the teſtimony of Gregory of Tours, that St Gregory did not oppoſe his being created biſhop. Thoſe, ſays he, who have written St Gregory's life, particularly Gregory of Tours, ſay, that he made ſome reſiſtance; but this does not agree with what St Gregory himſelf ſays, in the fourth epiſtle of the firſt book, where he ſays, that he did not oppoſe his being made a biſhop, and he cites in the margin theſe words; Sibi ut imponeretur epiſcopatus non reſtitiſſe. Let any one read that epiſtle, and he will find the quite contrary. St Gregory complains to his friend John, patriarch of Conſtantinople, that he had not, by his good offices, which he ſhould have done him with the emperor, hindered the confirmation of his election; and he ſpeaks in this manner: If we are commanded to love our neighbour as ourſelves; why do not you love me as yourſelf? For I know with what earneſtneſs you have declined epiſcopacy; and yet you did not interpoſe againſt the laying this ſame burden upon me. St Gregory here complains in expreſs words, that the patriarch did not oppoſe his being made biſhop of Rome; and the miniſter du Moulin will have it, that St Gregory confeſſes in this place, that he made no reſiſtance, aſcribing to that holy Pope, what he himſelf ſays of the patriarch of Conſtantinople by way of complaint.'

(15) Maimbourg, in the preface to his Hiſtoire du Pontificat de St Gregoire.

[D] He undertook the converſion of the Engliſh.] He ſent into England ſome monks of his monaſtery (16), under the conduct of Auguſtin their abbot (17), whom the biſhops of France conſecrated firſt biſhop of the Engliſh nation, according to the power they had from St Gregory (18). Etheldred reigned then in England, and had married Aldeberga, or Bertha, daughter to Charibert king of France, a young princeſs of much wit, inſtructed in good learning, and very zealous for the Catholic faith (19). She diſpoſed him to hearken to the Pope's miſſionaries. 'He ordered them to come into his preſence, and would not hear them but in the open field, according to an ancient ſuperſtition of the people, that if they had a mind to uſe any charm, or ſecret enchantment, to deceive him, it might vaniſh away, and loſe all it's force in the open air .... He heard them very calmly, and told them, that he was extreamly well pleaſed with what they ſaid; but that thoſe fine things, eſpecially the magnificent promiſes they had made him of an eternal life, not appearing to him very certain, he did not think it expedient to forſake what he had learned from his anceſtors, to run after uncertainties (20).' He permitted them to preach in his kingdom, and ſuffered all thoſe, who liked their doctrine, to embrace it. He himſelf was converted (21.) 'And, becauſe the example of kings is commonly very powerful, either in good or ill things, moſt of the Engliſh embraced the Chriſtian faith after him. And that, which compleated their converſion, was his gentleneſs and moderation. For he 'did

(16) Viz Of the monaſtery which he had founded at Rome, in his own houſe.

(17) Maimb. ubi ſupra, pag. 201.

(18) Id. ibid. pag. 206.

(19) Ibid. pag. 207.

(20) Ibid. pag. 208, ad ann. 597.

(21) Ibid. pag. 212, ad ann. 600.

aſſiſtance of a woman (f), according to the uſual courſe of revolutions of religion. His maxims concerning the conſtraint of conſcience were not uniform, and he ſometimes was very remiſs [E]. And indeed it is very difficult to have rules for a thing ſo contrary to did not force any body to renounce their ancient ſuperſtitions, having learnt from his teachers, that the ſervice that is done to JESUS CHRIST ought to be voluntary (22).' The queen mightily contributed to theſe converſions; for ſhe not only diſpoſed the king her huſband to uſe the miſſionaries kindly, but alſo to become a convert. There have been few revolutions of religion, either for the better or worſe, which women have not chiefly influenced. Maimbourg gives us ſome examples of it (23). 'We may ſay, that, as the devil formerly made uſe of the artifices of three empreſſes *, the wives of Licinius, Conſtantius, and Valens, to eſtabliſh the Arian hereſy in the eaſt; ſo God, to aſſault his enemy with his own weapons, was pleaſed to employ three glorious queens, Clotilda, wiſe of Clovis; Ingonda, wiſe of Ermenigildus; and Theodelinda, wiſe of Agilulphus, to ſanctify the weſt, by converting the French from Heatheniſm, and exterminating Arianiſm out of Spain and Italy, by the converſion of the weſtern Goths and Lombards.' In another work, he had only mentioned the ſervices done by women to bad cauſes. 'As if it was the fate of every hereſy, ſays he (24), as has been verified by an hundred examples, ſtill to find it's protection, and, if I may ſo expreſs myſelf, it's ſtrength in the weakneſs of ſome princeſs, who, either out of vanity to procure herſelf honour, or out of illuſion, thinking perhaps to merit by it, deſires to become the head of a party, which, not being able to maintain itſelf, falls, and, at laſt, overwhelms her miſerably under it's ruins.'

[E] He ſometimes was very remiſs.] The inconſiſtency of his maxims manifeſtly appears in his not approving, that the Jews ſhould be forced to be baptized, and approving the conſtraining of heretics to return to the church. 'St Avitus, biſhop of Clermont in Auvergne . . . . going after his clergy, in a proceſſion through the city, all the people that followed him . . . . . fell ſuddenly upon a ſynagogue of the Jews, and pulled it down, ſo that there remained nothing of it but the place all levelled, without ſo much as one ſtone upon another (25). The prelate, deſigning to make uſe of ſo favourable an occaſion, ordered the Jews to be told, that they muſt either be converted, or depart out of his dioceſe. Three hundred of them were converted, and the reſt obliged to depart. 'This example was quickly after followed in Spain and Italy, and eſpecially in Provence, where more ſtill was done than he did. For, without endeavouring to bring them over to the Chriſtian faith by holy inſtructions and good examples, they forced them to be baptized whether they would or not; which cauſed as many profanations of ſo ſacred a thing, and as many ſacrileges, as there were baptized Jews. St Gregory, to prevent ſo great a miſchief, wrote † to Virgilius archbiſhop of Arles, and to Theodorus biſhop of Marſeilles, two very good men, commanding them to ſee, that the Jews ſhould not be forced to receive baptiſm, for fear the ſacred fonts, in which men are regenerated to a divine liſe by baptiſm, ſhould be to them an occaſion of a ſecond death, more fatal to them than the firſt by apoſtacy. He had written, a little before, the ſame thing to the biſhop of Terracina (26).' He commanded him to leave the Jews the entire liberty of aſſembling in the place that was granted them for the celebration of their feaſts (27). This is what he wrote ſome time after to the biſhop of Cagliari in Sardinia. 'The laws, ſays he to him, indeed forbid the Jews to build new ſynagogues; but they permit them to poſſeſs the old ones without any moleſtation ‡. And he adds, what he ſaid alſo upon occaſion of the Jews of Marſeilles, that they are to be won to the faith by preaching, and not by violence; that GOD will have the ſacrifice of the mind and heart to be voluntary; and he adds, that ſuch as are converted by force and neceſſity, return to their vomit, when they can (28).' So far all goes very right; but here follows a ſtrange diſtinction, which makes a monſtrous medley in his ſyſtem. '(29) Not but that, according to him, there is in this a great difference betwixt infidels and heretics, eſpecially at the beginning of hereſies. For the latter ought to be treated as rebels, traytors, and perjured people, who have violated their faith to GOD and the Catholic church, from which they are departed, by revolting againſt her, and attempting as much as in them lies, to deſtroy her. They may be forced to return to their obedience and duty; and, if they will not do it, they ought to be puniſhed, according to the imperial laws, the holy fathers, and Calvin himſelf, who wrote a treatiſe upon this ſubject, to juſtify his conduct, with reſpect to Servetus, whom he cauſed to be condemned to the flames at Geneva. It is otherwiſe with Heathens, Jews, and Mahometans; and even with thoſe heretics, who, being born in hereſy, which they have received from their anceſtors, have not been bred up in the church any more than thoſe infidels. They ought not to be conſtrained directly and by main force, eſpecially when they have been tolerated for ſome time. But St Gregory teaches us, both by his doctrine and example, that it is good to conſtrain them indirectly, according to the goſpel, which ſays, Compelle intrare;' which may be done two ways; by a rigorous treatment of the obſtinate; and by doing good to thoſe that are converted. 'It is thus St Gregory will have the Manichees to be perſecuted who are obſtinate in their hereſy: and that he orders the biſhop of Cagliari to raiſe the taxes of the peaſants, and of thoſe among the Heathens that belong to the church, and hold her lands, and ſtill poſitively refuſe to embrace Chriſtianity: but, on the contrary, he will have the converted Jews to be eaſed of one third of what they are obliged to pay to the Roman church for the lands of her patrimony, which they cultivate in Sicily, that the others, being allured by the hopes of a like abatement, may more eaſily turn Chriſtians; and to ſuch as might ſuſpect theſe intereſted converſions, he ſays *, that, if theſe people are hypocrites, and not true converts, yet much will be got by it, in that their children at leaſt will become good Catholics.'

This might afford matter for a long diſcourſe; but I ſhall content myſelf with ſome few notes. I. It is certain, that the alternative of converſion or baniſhment is very hard, and moſt proper to make hypocrites. For what will not people of an indifferent piety do, not to loſe the delights of their native country? In a word, all thoſe, who propoſe this alternative, condemn it as a tyrannical action, wherever they are expoſed to it themſelves; an evident ſign, that they only judge of the juſtice of an action by the rule of their intereſt, Quod volumus ſanctum eſt. II. This is giving the church a power, which ſhe has not, to pretend, ſhe can treat all thoſe, that leave her, as temporal ſtates treat rebels. The church can have none but voluntary ſubjects, and can never require an oath derogatory to the law of order, which will have us, at all times, and in all places, to follow the light of conſcience; and conſequently thoſe who, to obey this light, break the faith, which they have given her, ought to be compared to thoſe, who prefer primitive and abſolute oaths, before poſterior and conditional ones; for it would be an impious thing to engage in a formulary of faith, without preſuppoſing it to be good: and thus all the oaths, by which men are engaged to the church, are conditional; but the obligation to the light of conſcience is natural, eſſential, and abſolute. What may be ſaid of thoſe, who, to obey their conſcience, break their oaths to the church, is, that from underſtanding men they are grown ignorant. But is there any well governed ſtate, that enacts any puniſhment againſt ſuch as forget their learning, and againſt thoſe who get new notions, whereby they are perſuaded, that what they took to be an error is a truth? We may therefore ſay, that, if the church had the power to puniſh, as rebels, ſuch as forſake her, ſhe would have a greater power than is exerciſed by the moſt deſpotic princes (30). She might puniſh as a capital crime the change of ſome ideas. III. It is no difficult thing to apprehend, that this is a chimerical diſtinction; for a man, who has been bred up in the church, could never renounce the power of leaving it, whenever his conſcience ſhould prompt him to ſide with another communion: and therefore he has as much

SOME Reflexions upon the maxims of St Gregory, concerning the conſtraint of conſcience.

(f) See the remark [D].

(22) See the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for February 1686, pag. 193, 201, againſt Maimbourg's compariſon between the converting method of Ethelred, and that of Lewis XIV.

(23) Ubi ſupra, pag. 69.

* Conſtantia, Euſebia, Dominica.

(24) Hiſt. du grand Schiſme d'Occident, livr. ii, pag. m. 183, ſpeaking of the princeſs of Wales, who protected Wicliffe See alſo what he ſays in the ſame work, livr. iv, pag. 79.

(25) Maimb. Hiſt. du Pontific. de St Gregoire, pag. 239.

† Dum quiſpiam ad baptiſmatis fontem non prædicatione, ſed neceſſitate pervenerit, ad priſtinam ſuperſtitionem remeans inde deterius moritur, unde renatus eſſe videbatur. Lib. i, Epiſt. xlv.

(26) Maimb. ubi ſupra, pag. 240.

(27) Ibid. pag. 241.

‡ Quia ſicut legalis definitio Judæos novas non patitur erigere Synagogas. Ita quoque eos ſine inquietudine veteres habere permittit.

(28) Ibid. pag. 242.

(29) Ibid. pag. 243, 244.

* Etſi ipſi minus fideliter veniunt: hi tamen qui de iis nati fuerint jam fidelius baptiſantur Aut ipſos ergo, aut eorum filios lucramur. Lib. ix, Epiſt. vi.

(30) That is, being conſidered only as ſovereigns; for it is to be obſerved, that the ſovereigns, who puniſh what they call hereſy, do it only by virtue of their religion; and therefore, properly ſpeaking, it is their religion that inflicts the puniſhment: QUOD NOTANDUM.

to reaſon. But, to make amends for it, his morals concerning the chaſtity of eccleſiaſtics were very rigid [F]: For he pretended, that a man, who had loſt his virginity, ought not to be admitted to the prieſthood; and he ordered the candidates to be examined upon that point. He excepted widowers from that neceſſity, provided they had been regular in their marriage, and had lived for a long time continent. He was alſo very ſevere with reſpect to calumny [G]. All things duly conſidered, he deſerves the ſirname much right to follow that communion, as thoſe that have been bred in it; for all the right of the latter conſiſts in being perſuaded that their religion is good. IV. My maxims are ſo certain, that each party acknowledges the truth of them, when they do not ſuppoſe their own principle. A Jew is ſo far from calling a man, who forſakes Chriſtianity to embrace Judaiſm, a traytor and a rebel, that he calls him a man faithful to GOD, to the truth, and to the true church: he calls none perfidious men, but ſuch as renounce the Jewiſh religion. This is the way of all religions. V. As for the two methods of the Compelle intrare, I refer the reader to the Philoſophical Commentary. I ſhall only obſerve, that the epithet of Merchants of the word of GOD (31) belongs peculiarly to thoſe who uſe theſe two ways of converting (32); and that it is morally impoſſible but that ſovereigns, who authorize them, muſt be put upon unjuſt and baſe meaſures (33). VI. The reaſon why St Gregory would not have the Jews to be converted by force, is very good; becauſe, ſaid he, thoſe, that are converted in that manner, return to their vomit, when they can ſafely do it. He was therefore very much in the wrong, to order that they ſhould be converted, by over-rating the obſtinate, and diſcharging thoſe, that turned Chriſtians, from a third part of the tax; for it is manifeſt, that they, who are converted in that manner, return to their vomit, when they have it in their power. VII. And, if his reaſon for converting the Jews, by raiſing the taxes of the obſtinate, and moderating thoſe of the converted, be good, he is to blame for diſapproving the forcing them to baptiſm; for conſider his reaſon: If they are not true converts, yet much will be got by it, in that their children at leaſt will be good Catholics. May not the ſame thing be ſaid with reſpect to thoſe that are baptized by force? He cannot therefore be excuſed from a pitiful contradiction.

[F] His morals concerning the chaſtity of eccleſiaſtics were very rigid.] In the buſineſs of chooſing a biſhop, he principally recommended it to the electors to inform themſelves, whether the perſon propoſed was guilty of adultery, or meer fornication. ‘Nay, he would have them to aſk him in private whether he had been guilty of that ſin, admoniſhing him, that, if he was guilty of it, tho' no body knew it, and there was no proof to convict him, yet he could not in conſcience receive orders; that, nevertheleſs, they ſhould be given him, if he proteſted that he was free from that vice; but, if he confeſſed it, it ſhould be gently repreſented to him, that he ought rather to think of a cloiſter to do penance, than of the prieſthood, of which his crime, tho' ſecret, made him unworthy (34). This great pontiff underſtanding (35), ‘That ſome eccleſiaſtics of Sardinia had committed that ſin, after they had received orders, ordered not only that they ſhould be depoſed, without any hopes of being ever reſtored to the functions of their miniſtry; but alſo that, to prevent ſo great an evil, none ſhould be admitted * to ſacred orders, and eſpecially to epiſcopacy, without aſſurance, that they had always lived chaſtly, and even preſerved their continency many years after they were ſeparated from their wives, in order to be admitted to the prieſthood.’ The ſuffrages being divided at Naples in the election of a biſhop, this Pope, without more ado, declared plainly that he could not approve John the Deacon (36), ‘(37) becauſe he had been well informed he had a very little daughter. What preſumption, added he, is this in him, to aſpire to epiſcopacy, when he is manifeſtly convicted, by this little child, of the ſmall ſpace of time he has preſerved his continence †?’ He cauſed it to be inviolably obſerved, according to the canons, ‘that every eccleſiaſtic and beneficed man, whether ſub-deacon, deacon, prieſt, abbot, or biſhop, who ſhould be guilty of impurity, if there were proofs of his crime, ſhould be depoſed, and put to penance in a monaſtery, and incapacitated to be ever reſtored to his order and dignity . . . . . . Hearing ⸸ that the abbot Secundinus, who was a very wicked man, had committed horrible crimes, he ſaid, that, without ſeeking proofs for a judicial conviction, it ſufficed that he himſelf, perhaps boaſting of what this ſort of debauchees call a good fortune, had confeſſed, ‡ that he had ſported with women, which had not hindered him from being an abbot; whereupon he cauſed him to be depoſed (38).’ He treated in the ſame manner the biſhop of Docleatina, a city of Illyricum, at preſent called Cataro; and he gave order to his metropolitan, ‘that, if this wicked man, who had been juſtly depoſed for having ſtained his character by this infamous vice, durſt ever pretend, or even intimate by a ſingle word, that he had ſtill ſome thoughts of being a biſhop, he ſhould be confined to a monaſtery to do penance all his life time, and be deprived of the communion till his death . What is very obſervable herein, is, that the biſhop of Tarentum being not accuſed, but only ſuſpected, of keeping a concubine ſince he was a biſhop, he adviſes him very ſeriouſly, that, if he is conſcious of this crime, tho' it were in ſecret, and he denied it, and there was no convincing proof againſt him, yet he is obliged in conſcience to depoſe himſelf, and to forbear all ſacerdotal functions. This will ſeem the more ſtrange, becauſe this biſhop having committed another crime, which in the eyes of the world ſeems to be much greater, he inflicted a much leſſer puniſhment on him. For this angry prelate having been diſobliged by one of the poor old women, that were kept at the expence of the church, cauſed her to be beaten at ſuch a rate, that ſhe remained half dead. It is certain, that, if ſhe had died a few days after ſhe had been ſo cruelly beaten, he had been moſt ſeverly puniſhed, according to the rigour of the canons, as guilty of murther: however, becauſe ſhe died not till eight months after, St Gregory did not think, that her death was to be aſcribed to the blows ſhe had received, and contented himſelf with ſuſpending him for two months. But for the ſin of incontinence, which, by the laws of human juſtice, ſhould be puniſhed leſs rigorouſly than that other action ſo unworthy of a biſhop, he declared to him, that, if he had committed it, tho' it could not be proved, it was abſolutely neceſſary, for the ſatiſfaction of his conſcience, that he ſhould leave his biſhopric (39).’

Mr Maimbourg does not leave this ſubject without ſaying, ‘that the rigour of the canons upon this point is not at preſent in uſe, and that a man is not obliged to follow St Gregory's opinion upon this caſe of conſcience (40).’

[G] He was very ſevere with reſpect to calumny.] All that Mr Maimbourg ſays upon this ſubject ſeems ſo good to me, that, finding nothing uſeleſs in it, I ſhall not abridge it. He obſerves (41) firſt, that there is a very ſubtile oppreſſion, †† and the more dangerous, becauſe it is moſt difficult to be diſcovered, viz. Calumny, which the wiſeſt of men, and even thoſe, who glory in ſuffering joyfully the firſt (42), find ſo barbarous and intolerable, that they cannot hinder their conſtancy from being ſhaken, be their minds ever ſo ſtrong. After which, he goes on thus: ‘I know that the ⸸⸸ civil and canon laws appoint puniſhments for this crime, ſo much complained of in the world; but they are not always well obſerved with reſpect to eccleſiaſtics, as St Gregory teſtifies, and eſpecially in the communities, where calumny hardly meets with any rebuke, under pretence that the puniſhing of a falſe accuſation would take away the liberty of bringing true ones, and diſcovering puniſhable faults to the ſuperiors. Now this is what St Gregory could in no wiſe bear with, as appears by many of his letters. In effect, Epiphanius ‡‡, prieſt of the church of Cagliari, having been falſely accuſed of ſome great crime by other Sardinian eccleſiaſtics, who had even brought the accuſation before the Pope; he himſelf, ſurname of Great: But he cannot be excuſed for proſtituting his praiſes, to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of an uſurper [H], who had lately committed the moſt execrable parricide that hiſtory affords. It is a very remarkable inſtance of the ſlavery a man falls into, when he will maintain himſelf in great poſts. If we compare his flatteries of the emperor Phocas, with thoſe, wherewith he careſſed a moſt wicked queen of France [I], we muſt acknowledge, that they, who forced him to be Pope, knew him

---

(31) 2 Cor. ii, 17.

(32) This puts me in mind of theſe two verſes of Ennius: Nec mi aurum poſco, nec mi pretium dederitis,
Nec cauponantes bellum, ſed belligerantes.
Give me nor gold, nor baſe reward, but thoſe,
Who fight to conquer, not to trade in, foes.
Cicero, de Offic. lib i, cap. xii.

(33) See the New Letters againſt Maimbourg's Hiſtory of Calviniſm, Tom. I, pag. 205, & ſeq. and what is ſaid of queen Mary's way of converting people in England. Nouv. de la Republ. des Lettres, Novemb. 1685, pag. 1283.

(34) Maimb. ibid. pag. 351.

(35) Id. ibid.

* Sed ne unquam ii qui ordinati ſunt pereant, provideri debet quales ordinantur, ut prius aſpiciatur ſi vita illorum continens in annis plurimis fuerit, &c. Lib. iii, Epiſt. xxvi.

(36) One of the two, who had been elected.

(37) Maimbourg, ibid. pag. 353.

† Nam quâ præſumptione ad epiſcopatum audet accedere, qui adhuc longam corporis ſui continentiam, filiola teſte, convincitur non habere. Lib. viii, Ep. xi.

⸸ Qui poſt acceptum ſacrum ordinem lapſus in peccatum carnis fuerit, ſacro ordine ita careat ut ad altaris miniſterium ulterius non accedat. Lib. iii, Epiſt. xxvi. Si Clericus fuerit à ſuo remotus officio, pro ſuis continuo lugendis exceſſibus in monaſterium detrudatur. Lib. iii, Ep. ix. Lib. i, Ep. xviii, xlii.

‡ Hoc ſolum ad ejus damnationem poteſt ſufficere, quod etiam ipſe de ſe dicitur fuiſſe confeſſus quod à ſtatu habitus ſui in lapſum corporis ceciderit. Lib ii, Ep. xxiii, Ind. 11.

(38) Maimb. ibid. pag. 354.

 Si forte poſt depoſitionem ſuam inverecunde ac mente perverſa aliquid de epiſcopatu loqui, atque rurſus ad hoc qualibet aſpirare præſumptione tentaverit Lib. x, Ep. xxxiv.

(39) Maimb. ibid. pag. 355, & ſeq.

(40) Maimb. ibid.

(41) Id. ibid. pag. 460.

†† Calumnia conturbat ſapientem. Eccl. cap. vii, ver. 8.

(42) That is, the unhappineſs of being oppreſſed by the violence of thoſe who govern.

⸸⸸ Digeſt. lib. iii, tit. 2, Grat. cap. v, q. 6, cauſ. 6, q. 1.

‡‡ Lib. iii, Ind. 12, Epiſt. xxiv.

better

‘ ſelf had a mind to hear the cauſe thoroughly. And, as he found it was nothing but a meer calumny, wherewith they deſigned to oppreſs this prieſt's innocence, he ſent him back fully abſolved to his biſhop, enjoining him to reſtore him to his order, and to deprive the accuſer of the communion, unleſs he was ready to ſhew, by canonical and moſt evident proofs, the truth of his allegations. This is what the law * requires, which adds, that the falſe accuſer of his brother ought to undergo the ſame puniſhment the accuſed would deſerve, if he was found guilty. Here is ſomething farther. Hilary, ſub-deacon of the church of Naples, having brought a falſe accuſation againſt John, deacon of the ſame church, which could not be maintained againſt many witneſſes, who atteſted the deacon's innocence; the holy pontiff was very much offended, that Paſchaſius, their biſhop, had not as yet puniſhed the ſlanderer. Whereupon he gave order to the defender, Anthemius, to tell him from him, that he would have him firſt deprived of his office of ſub-deacon (†), of which he was unworthy: ſecondly, that he ſhould be publickly whipped; for this ſort of correction was in uſe at that time to chaſtiſe clerks, as may be ſeen in St Auſtin (⸸), tho' this cuſtom has been ſince aboliſhed: and laſtly, that, having been thus chaſtiſed, he be ſent into exile, that is, either into a monaſtery to do penance, or by the order of the magiſtrate, to whom alone it belonged to puniſh a criminal with baniſhment by the law of the ſtate. And as he manifeſted his abhorrence of calumny, by puniſhing it ſo ſeverely; ſo he kept ſtrictly upon his guard, that he might not be overreached; and never believed any informer, till having examined the leaſt circumſtances of the accuſation, and exactly heard both ſides, he could not in the leaſt doubt of the truth of it. He was moreover ſo much afraid of being deceived by the artifices of calumniators, that, when he could, he forbore giving his judgment about an accuſation, referring himſelf to ſome other perſon, on whoſe ſufficiency and probity he intirely depended.’

[H] He cannot be excuſed for proſtituting his praiſes, to inſinuate himſelf into the favour of an uſurper.] The emperor Maurice's army, being revolted againſt him at the inſtigation of Phocas, marched towards Conſtantinople, and took it without any difficulty. The emperor was delivered to Phocas, who by an unheard of cruelty, cauſed five little princes, Maurice's children, to be murdered in his preſence, before their father's eyes, whom that unfortunate father could not ſave (43). The nurſe of the youngeſt had cunningly withdrawn him from the maſſacre, and ſubſtituted her own in his place; but Maurice, who perceived it, cauſed his own child to be returned to the executioners. (44). ‘After this, the tyrant, more cruel than the wildeſt beaſts, being no ways moved with ſo brave and generous an action, which melted all the aſſiſtants into tears, commanded this poor little innocent to be killed, and the bloody ſacrifice of his cruelty to be perfected, by laying Maurice upon the bodies of his five children, as upon an altar, where he was inhumanly butchered.’ The eldeſt ſon of Maurice had been a little before ſent to the king of Perſia; but he was taken at Nicæa, and beheaded. ‘The cruel Phocas put alſo to death almoſt all the relations and friends of the emperor Maurice, and even the empreſs Conſtantina, and her three daughters, contrary to the promiſe he had made to the patriarch Cyriacus, that he would ſuffer them quietly to live in a monaſtery where they were. In fine, there was never ſo much innocent blood ſhed, nor ſo many miſeries and misfortunes, as in his reign . . . . (45). And indeed there never was a more infamous tyrant than this wretched man, without virtue, birth, honour, and merit, horribly ill-ſhaped, abominably ugly, of a frightful aſpect, appearing always in a fury when he ſpoke, drunken, laſcivious, brutiſh, ſanguinary, without any ſenſe of humanity, being wholly a wild beaſt in his look and humour, and having nothing of a man, but a very deformed ſhape; in a word, having all the ill qualities, which may be ſet in oppoſition to thoſe, which the hiſtorians have extreamly praiſed in Maurice (46).’ I have uſed Maimbourg's words, that nobody may ſay I have aggravated Phocas's crimes, to caſt a greater blot upon St Gregory; and I will ſtill uſe the ſame author's expreſſions, as to this Pope's flatteries, that I may not be accuſed of repreſenting thing to his diſadvantage. I confeſs, ſays that hiſtorian (47), that what I have been ſaying may offend thoſe, who, after this, ſhall read the three epiſtles (‡) which this holy Pope wrote to Phocas, and to Leontia his wife, when they knew at Rome what had been done at Conſtantinople, when he was crowned emperor there. For he ſeems in thoſe three letters to rejoice, and to thank GOD, for his coming to the crown, as for the greateſt advantage that could happen to the empire, and to ſpeak of him in the moſt advantageous terms, as of an admirable prince, who would make it flouriſh again, by delivering it from all miſeries wherewith it had hitherto been afflicted. And he thanks GOD, that the world, being delivered from ſo hard and uneaſy a yoke, began to enjoy the ſweets of liberty under his reign. Maimbourg gives the beſt colour he can to this ſtrange flattery (48): he alledges ſeveral reaſons for it; but he ſays nothing of the true one; which is, that Maurice had declared for the patriarch of Conſtantinople againſt Pope Gregory (49), in very nice diſputes, ſuch as are always the differences about authority, or ſuperiority. The pope, overjoyed to be delivered from an emperor, who favoured the patriarch of Conſtantinople, loaded this new prince with praiſes, in order to obtain from him what he deſired againſt his rival (50). There are hardly any examples of a virtue, that has been proof againſt the jealouſy of authority, or the intereſt of a party. Tho' a prince be endowed with the nobleſt qualities, if he is withal contrary to a certain church, and is baniſhed, or killed, ſhe looks upon this as a heavenly favour, and reſpectfully kiſſes the human hand, that procures it, eſpecially when this hand acts contrary to the other prince. In ſuch a juncture, two contradictory propoſitions are found in the mouths of the clergy: the party, that loſes it's patron, conſiders this loſs as a horrid conſpiracy of infernal powers; it cites both divine and human laws againſt the revolution: but the other ſide ſpeaks of nothing but the wonderful ways of providence, the paternal care of heaven, and runs into political doctrines. But I queſtion whether this prepoſſeſſion was ever carried to ſuch infamies, as thoſe of St Gregory. What a fall! what blindneſs! what baſe condeſcenſion! a Pope, who is ſo ſevere to a poor fornificating clergyman, and ſo terrible in his ſentences thereupon, writes to Phocas, without ſo much as expreſſing his wiſh, that Maurice and his children had not ſuffered death. There are no men, that make greater outcries againſt the Sceptics than the clergy, and yet no men are more uſed to turn the rules of morality like a noſe of wax, according to the reciprocal intereſt of their cauſe: which at the bottom is a moſt dangerous Scepticiſm.

[I] A moſt wicked queen of France.] It was queen Brunehaut. In all the letters this Pope writ to her, he beſtowed upon her (51) all the praiſes that can be given to one of the moſt perfect princeſſes in the world, ſo far as to make no difficulty to ſay, in a very affirmative manner, that the French nation was the moſt happy in the world, ſince they deſerved ſuch a queen, endowed with all ſorts of virtues and good qualities (). The following paſſage on this ſubject is to be found in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres (52). We ought to make more account of this Pope's good intentions, than of his exceſſive complaiſance for queen Brunehauld, the moſt wicked woman in the world, as almoſt all hiſtorians ſay, but at the ſame time the moſt artful at gaining the clergy, becauſe in the midſt of her heinous crimes, ſhe ſhewed an extraordinary munificence towards churchmen (53), and in her foundations of churches and con- vents,

---

* Cod. l. iv, & ix, tit. de probat. leg. finali. Cum calumniantes ad vindictam poſcat ſimilitudo ſupplicii. Cauſ. 2, q. 8, c. 3.

† Lib. ix, Ind. 4, Ep. lxvi. Ut eundem Hilarium prius ſubdiaconatus quo indignus fungitur privet officio atque verberibus publicè caſtigatum faciat in exilium deportari, ut unius pœna multorum poſſit eſſe correctio.

⸸ Qui modus coërcitionis, & à magiſtris liberalium artium, & ab ipſis parentibus, & ſæpe etiam, injudiciis ab epiſcopis ſolet uſurpari. Aug. Ep. clix.

(43) See Maimb. ubi ſupra, pag. 179.

(44) Ibid. pag. 180.

(45) Ibid. pag. 181.

(46) Ibid. pag. 182, ex Cedreno.

(47) Pag. 183.

‡ L. xi, Ep. xxxviii, Ind. 6, & 45, 46.

(48) See how Dr Cave, Hiſt. Liter. Scriptor. Eccleſ. pag. 431, expreſſes himſelf: Anno 603, datis ad Phocam tyrannum literis imperium illi peſſimis flagitiis arreptum gratulatus eſt: quin & ſi verum fateri fas ſit adeo turpiter in hac re lapſus eſt Gregorius, ut ſceleſtiſſimo parricidæ excogitatiſſimis adulandi artibus blandiri, & in piiſſimi principis Mauricii manes acerrime debacchari non erubeſceret.

(49) Maimbourg owns it, pag. 124.

(50) Phocas favoured the court of Rome, and made a law, whereby he forbad the biſhop of Conſtantinople to ſtile himſelf Oecumenical Patriarch, declaring that this title did only belong to the biſhop of ancient Rome. See Maimbourg, pag. 126.

(51) Maimbourg, ubi ſupra, pag. 313.

 Præ aliis gentibus gentem Francorum aſſerimus felicem, quæ ſic bonis omnibus prædictam meruit habere reginam. L. xi, Ep. viii.

(52) Nouvelles de la republique des Lettres, Febr. 1686, pag. 196.

(53) See Maimbourg, ibid. pag. 236.

better than he knew himſelf. They perceived, that he had all the policy and addreſs, that are requiſite to get powerful protectors, and to draw earthly bleſſings upon the church. It is very probable, that the zeal he expreſſed againſt the ambition of the patriarch of Conſtantinople, was ill governed [K]. It is not certain, that he cauſed the noble monuments of the old Roman magnificence to be deſtroyed [L], leſt thoſe, who came to Rome, ſhould give more attention to the triumphal arches, &c. than to holy things. The ſame ought to be ſaid of what is reported, that he cauſed a vaſt number of Heathen books [M], and particularly Livy, to vents, not forgetting to make a devout requeſt for relics to the holy Father ...... Maimbourg proves the exemptions, which are ſaid to have been granted by this Pope to the pious queen Brunehauld, to be fictitious; for it is this virtue St Gregory praiſes in her, and the like will ever be done to any one that is liberal to the church, the cully of thoſe people, who ſometimes are cullies in their turn. This puts me in mind of the anſwer that was given by a Carthuſian to Philip de Comines. ‘The body of John Galeazzo, a great and wicked tyrant ..... is in the Carthuſian monaſtery at Pavia, near the park, higher than the great altar, and the Carthuſians ſhewed it me, at leaſt his bones, which ſmell as nature requires: a native of Bourges called him ſaint, and I aſked him in his ear, why he called him ſaint, when he might ſee painted about him the arms of many towns he had uſurped, to which he had no right? ..... he anſwered me ſoftly, in this country, we call ſaints all thoſe that are our benefactors (54).’ This rule of theſe good monks is of all times and countries.

[K] The zeal he expreſſed againſt the ambition of the patriarch of Conſtantinople was ill governed.] This patriarch is honoured as a ſaint in the Greek church. He was called John the Faſter. The ſurname, Faſter, was given him, becauſe he was a man of incredible abſtinence, and prodigious auſterity of life ..... (55). He did all that was poſſible to prevent his exaltation to the patriarchal throne (56). Pope Gregory gave him this teſtimony, Quo ardore, quo ſtudio Beatitudo veſtra Epiſcopatus pondus fugere voluerit ſcio (57). But when this great faſter had ſat for ſome time upon that fine throne, he was no longer maſter of his pride. Perhaps, he was tainted with this vice before he was made a patriarch: for it frequently happens, that, when corrupt nature cannot plunge men into pleaſures, ſhe makes it up by other faults, eſpecially by the ſpirit of pride. Perhaps, the patriarchal dignity, by I know not what contagious fatality, inſpired John the Faſter with ambition. Be it how it will, this great dignity enabled him to give himſelf a free ſcope: he might colour his ambitions with the pretence of the rights of his patriarchate. Thoſe, who pretend to an auſtere devotion, may more eaſily conceal their faults, when they are not in a poſt, which permits them to alledge the intereſts of the church, the glory of GOD, charity to one's neighbour, &c. But, when they are in poſſeſſion of ſuch poſts, they may let looſe many paſſions, and fully indulged them, under the ſacred auſpices I have mentioned. To return to John the Faſter: he aſſumed the title of Oecumenical Patriarch: the Pope ſo reſented it, that he forbad him, under pain of excommunication, to call himſelf ſo any more. John the Faſter was ſo little moved with his threats, that he ſtill retained that title. And he did it with that haughtineſs, or rather affectation, that, in the acts of a ſynod, which he ſent to Rome ..... he ſtyled himſelf almoſt in every line Oecumenical Patriarch (58). This was the orgin of a very great quarrel betwixt St Gregory and him. Many pretend this was only a diſpute about words, and Maimbourg ſeems to prove it well enough. But he cannot do this without affording a terrible ſatire againſt the two principal prelates of that time, the biſhop of Rome, and the patriarch of Conſtantinople: for can any thing be more ridiculous than the ſtorms they raiſed, if it be true, that their diſpute was only a vain queſtion about a name (59)?

[L] It is not certain that he cauſed the noble monuments of the Romans to be deſtroyed.] It is certain he has been accuſed of it, as it appears from theſe words of Platina, who rejects this accuſation. ‘Neque eſt cur patiamur Gregorium hac in re à quibuſdam literarum ignaris potiſſimum carpi, quod ſuo mandato veterum ædificia ſint dirupta, ne peregrini & advenæ (ut ipſi fingunt) ad urbem religionis cauſa venientes poſthabitis locis ſacris, arcus triumphales & monumenta veterum cum admiratione inſpicerent. Abſit hæc calumnia a tanto Pontifice Romano præſertim: cui certe poſt Deum patria quam vita charior fuit (60). —— Nor ought we, in this matter, to let Gregory be cenſured by the ignorant and illiterate, for ordering the buildings of the ancients to be demoliſhed, leſt travellers and ſtrangers (as they pretend) coming to Rome on a religious account, ſhould neglect places of devotion, and view with admiration the triumphal arches and monuments of the ancients. Be this reproach far from ſo great a Pope, who, certainly next to GOD, valued his country dearer than his life.’ The ſame hiſtorian obſerves, that Sabinian, who ſucceeded Gregory, expreſſed a violent reſentment againſt his predeceſſor, ſo far as almoſt to burn his books. Some inhabitants of Rome excited the new Pope to this, becauſe, ſaid they, St Gregory had mangled, or thrown down, the ſtatues of the ancient Romans. Platina rejects alſo this accuſation. Paululum etiam abfuit quin libri ejus comburerentur, adeo in Gregorium irâ & invidiâ exarſerat homo malevolus. Sunt qui ſcribant Sabinianum inſtigantibus quibuſdam Romanis hoc in Gregorium molitum eſſe, quod veterum ſtatuas tota urbe dum viveret, & obtruncaverit & disjecerit: quod quidem ita vero diſſonum eſt, ut illud quod de abolendis ædificiis majorum in vita ejus diximus (61).

[M] He is accuſed of cauſing a vaſt number of heathen books to be burnt.] It is ſaid, that the Palatine library, founded by Auguſtus, was reduced to aſhes by St Gregory. I have read this no where but in Joannes Sariſberienſis, and therefore I give no great credit to it: theſe are his words. ‘Si vero mathematicorum via eſſet uſquequaque laudabilis, non tantopere pœnituiſſet magnum Auguſtinum ſe eorum conſultationibus inclinaſſe. Ad hæc doctor ſanctiſſimus ille Gregorius qui melleo prædicationis imbre totam rigavit & inebriavit eccleſiam, non modo matheſin juſſit ab aula, ſed ut traditur à majoribus, incendio dedit probatæ lectionis ſcripta, Palatinus

Quæcunque tenebat Apollo,

In quibus erant præcipua, quæ cœleſtium mentem, & ſuperiorum oracula videbantur hominibus revelare (62). —— But if the method of the aſtrologers were every way commendable, the great St Auguſtin would not have been ſo ſorry that he had conſulted them. Beſides, the moſt holy doctor St Gregory, he who edifyed the church with the eloquence of his preaching, not only baniſhed aſtrology from court, but, as the tradition ſays, burnt the moſt valuable books of that ſcience in the Palatine library; among which were thoſe, which ſeemed to reveal the will of heaven to men.’ He ſays in another place, that St Gregory ſuppreſſed profane books, to raiſe a greater eſteem for the ſacred ones. Fertur beatus Gregorius bibliothecam combuſſiſſe gentilem, quo divinæ paginæ gratior eſſet locus & major autoritas, & diligentia ſtudioſior (63). What is certain, is, that this Pope had conceived a great averſion for heathen books, as it appears from this paſſage of his hiſtory. Deſiderius, archbiſhop of Vienna, ‘was a man of an extraordinary merit, of admirable learning, and a ſhining virtue, to whom St Gregory writ more than once with great commendations of him; and yet he found fault with his conduct, and ſharply reproved him, as being guilty of a great crime, for ſpending his time in teaching ſome of his friends grammar and literature, and explaining the poets to them. He aſſures him, that this unlucky piece of news had given him ſo much trouble, that all the joy he had conceived, upon hearing the ſucceſs of his ſtudies, and his great capacity, was changed into ſorrow: Becauſe, ſays he ††, the praiſes of Jupiter and of CHRIST cannot ‘be to be burnt [N]. He died the tenth of March 1604. I will make no obſervation concerning his works, referring my reader to Mr du Pin, whoſe work is more common than this dictionary will be. I had almoſt forgot this Pope's zeal for the pſalmody of the church [O].

---

(54) Philip. de Comines, Memoires, livr. vii, pag. m. 451.

(55) Maimb. ibid. pag. 103.

(56) Ibid. pag. 106.

(57) Gregor lib. i, Epiſt. iv, Ind. 9, apud Maimb. pag 106.

(58) Maimb. ibid. pag. 109.

(59) See Nouv. de la Repub. des Lettres, Febr. 1686, pag. 189.

(60) Platina, in Gregorio I.

(61) Id. in vita Sabiniani.

(62) Joan. Sariſberienſis de nugis Curialium, lib. ii, cap. xxvi, pag. m. 104.

(63) Id. ibid. lib. viii, cap. xix, pag. 557.

†† Quia in uno ſe ore cum Jovis laudibus Chriſti laudes non capiunt. Et quem grave nefandumque ſit epiſcopis canere quod nec Laico religioſo conveniat ipſe conſidera. Quantò execrabile eſt hoc de ſacerdote enarrari, tantò utrum ita nec ne ſit diſtrictâ & veraci oportet ſatisfactione cognoſci.

The book which Dom Denys de Sainte Marthe (g) has publiſhed (h), intituled, The Hiſtory of St Gregory the Great, was not come out, when I wrote this article. I have juſt now peruſed that hiſtory; and I ſhould take it for a continual panegyric on this great Pope, if the author had not frequently interrupted his praiſes by many obſervations, wherein he explains things, illuſtrates matters of fact, or confutes ſome other writers. In his preface, he gives a catalogue of thoſe, who have writ the life of St Gregory, in which he cenſures ſome faults of the miniſter Peter du Moulin, beſides that, which we have ſeen in the remark [C]. He does not ſeem well pleaſed with Maimbourg [P]. He confutes cardinal Baronius as to what concerns St Gregory's having been a monk, and he oppoſes ſome notions of Mr Gouſſainville (i). What he obſerves againſt the centuriators of Magdeburg, is intermixed with falſe criticiſms; we ſhall ſee it below [Q]. I do not find, that he blames Pope Gregory for any thing; he acts the

' be in the ſame mouth: conſider what an unworthy and abominable thing it is for a biſhop to ſing ſuch verſes, as a devout and religious layman could not repeat with decency, and without doing injury to his profeſſion. He adds, that tho' he has been informed from other hands, that it was not ſo, yet he cannot but lay it much to heart, and that he will make a more exact enquiry into the truth of it, becauſe it is a horrid, and even execrable thing, to hear ſuch a report of a prieſt and a biſhop. But ⸸⸸ if, ſays he, at laſt, to comfort him, I can be fully ſatisfied that this report againſt you is falſe, and that you do not amuſe your ſelf with theſe fooleries of human learning, and worldly ſciences, I ſhall give thanks to GOD for not ſuffering your heart to be defiled with the praiſes full of blaſphemies, which thoſe profane authors beſtow on the moſt wicked men (64).' Maimbourg did not fail to reflect upon himſelf after this narrative. See his words in the Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres for September 1686, pag. 1034, and in Mr Seckendorf, pag. 4. of the firſt book of the Hiſtory of Lutheraniſm.

[N] . . . And particularly Livy.] Antonius, archbiſhop of Florence, is the moſt ancient author cited for this by Voſſius. It is ſaid, that Livy was thus treated, becauſe he inſiſts too much on the ſuperſtitious rites of the heathens. At mirificus zelus fuit S. Gregorii, qui ut S. Antoninus, & ex eo Jo. Heſſelius, ex utroque Raderus ad Martialem tradit, Livium propterea combuſſit, quod in ſuperſtitionibus & ſacris Romanorum perpetuo verſetur (65).

[O] I had almoſt forgot this pope's zeal for the pſalmody of the church.] ' (66) He eſpecially applied himſelf to regulate the office, and the ſinging of the church: to which end he compoſed his Antiphonary . . . . (67). Nothing can be more admirable than what he did on this occaſion. Though he had upon his hands all the affairs of the univerſal church, and was ſtill more burthened with diſtempers, than with that multitude of buſineſs, which he was neceſſarily to take care of, in all parts of the world; yet he took time to examine with what tunes the pſalms, hymns, oraiſons, verſes, reſponſes, canticles, leſſons, epiſtles, the goſpel, the prefaces, and the Lord's prayer, were to be ſung; what were the tones, meaſures, notes, moods, moſt ſuitable to the majeſty of the church, and moſt proper to inſpire devotion: and he formed that eccleſiaſtical muſic ſo grave and edifying, which at preſent is called the Gregorian muſic. He moreover inſtituted an academy of ſingers ‡‡, for all the clerks to the deaconſhip excluſively, becauſe the deacons were only to be employed in preaching the goſpel, and diſtributing the alms of the church to the poor; and he would have the ſingers to perfect themſelves in the art of true ſinging, according to the notes of his muſic, and to bring their voices to ſing ſweetly and devoutly, which, according to St Iſidore *, is not to be obtained but by faſting and abſtinence. For, ſays he, the ancients faſted the day before they were to ſing, and lived, for their ordinary diet, upon pulſe,  to make their voice clearer and finer; whence it is that the Heathens called thoſe ſingers, bean-eaters. I queſtion whether, at preſent, the ſingers would willingly ſubmit to that method, to which they are not uſed. However, St Gregory took care to inſtruct them himſelf, as much a Pope as he was, and to teach them to ſing well. Joannes † Diaconus ſays, that, in his time, this Pope's bed was preſerved with great veneration in the palace of St John of Lateran, in which he ſung, tho' ſick, to teach the ſingers; as alſo the whip, wherewith he threatened the young clerks and the ſinging boys, when they were out, and failed in the notes.' Here I muſt make an obſervation, againſt thoſe, who cite authors without examining circumſtances. The Walloon miniſter, who publiſhed a large book concerning the Divine Melody of the Holy Pſalmiſt, in the year 1644, did not trouble his head whether things were changed, or not, ſince Joannes Diaconus, who writ the hiſtory of St Gregory. Joannes Diaconus lived in the IXth century. He ſays, that the whip was ſtill preſerved, wherewith this Pope threatened the muſic ſcholars. But it does not follow, that we may uſe the preſent tenſe as he does, in relating this particular, and therefore the Walloon miniſter juſtly deſerves cenſure. His words are theſe (68): Gregory the Great, before cited, inſtituted a ſchool of ſingers, and built them colleges, with a ſuitable revenue. His bed is ſtill ſhewn at Rome, to this day, upon which he lay and ſung, and the whip, wherewith he corrected his diſciples, and the authentic antiphonary. Naucl. 94.

[P] Denys de Ste Marthe does not ſeem well pleaſed with Maimbourg.] He ſays, that the Hiſtory of St Gregory's Pontificate, publiſhed by this author, does not comprehend the whole life of that ſaint (69). He adds, that Mr Maimbourg mentions only ſome paſſages of his pontificate, which ſuited with his deſigns and views, neglecting all the reſt, which nevertheleſs deſerves to be known. I know, ſays he, in another place (70), ' that a famous writer, who has publiſhed the hiſtory of St Gregory's pontificate, and pretends to great impartiality, has blamed him for being ſo warm in a trifling matter. And yet I doubt not, but that, if St Gregory, or any other Pope, had pretended to ſtyle himſelf oecumenical patriarch; and if John, patriarch of Conſtantinople, or any other biſhop, had oppoſed him in it, the ſame writer would have cenſured the Pope for it, as being an intolerable preſumption and uſurpation, and praiſed the generoſity of the patriarch, of the biſhop, and, in general, of any one, who would have oppoſed him: ſo dangerous it is to write a hiſtory with a prepoſſeſſed mind, which makes a writer as eager to intermix his opinions with the things he relates as to relate thoſe things with a perfect ſincerity.' This gives an ill idea of Maimbourg's probity.

[Q] What he obſerves againſt the centuriators of Magdebourg is intermixed with falſe criticiſm.] Every body knows, that there is a great diſpute betwixt the Proteſtants and the Roman Catholics, concerning the vows of celibacy; and one of the arguments alledged by the Proteſtants, is, that theſe vows are attended with many diſorders, and works of darkneſs (71), unfruitful if you pleaſe in the goſpel-ſenſe, but moſt fruitful in another ſenſe, ſince they give life to a vaſt number of human creatures. It is true, theſe are fruits that are not ſuffered to ripen: they are ſtifled as much as poſſible before their birth; which is done to conceal the firſt crime, but not without a ſecond ſin ſtill more enormous than the firſt. This is what is ſaid by the controverſiſts; and they add, that the diſcovery of theſe diſorders has ſometimes occaſioned the revocation of the ſevere law of celibacy. Here follows the part of an apologiſt every where, in the praiſes beſtowed upon Phocas and queen Brunehauld,

---

(g) A Benedictin of the congregation of St Maur.

(h) At Roüen, 1697, in 4to.

(i) Who put out an edition of St Gregory's works, in 1675.

⸸⸸ Si poſthæc evidenter ea quæ ad nos perlata ſunt falſa eſſe claruerint, nec vos nugis & ſæcularibus literis ſtudere conſtiterit; Deo noſtro gratias agimus, qui cor veſtrum maculari blaſphemis nefandorum laudibus non permiſit.

(64) Maimb. ubi ſupra, pag. 263, 264.

(65) Voſſius, de Hiſtor. Lat. pag. 98.

(66) Maimb. ubi ſupra, pag. 327.

(67) Ibid. pag. 330, & ſeq.

‡‡ Scholam quoque Cantorum quæ hactenus, eiſdem inſtitutionibus in S. R. Eccl. modulatur conſtruit. L. iv, Ep. xliv.

* Iſid. de Eccl. Offic. lib. ii, cap. 12. Pridie quam cantandum erat cibis abſtinebant pſallentes, legumine in cauſâ vocis aſſidue utebantur, unde & cantores apud gentiles Fabarii dicti ſunt.

† Uſque hodie lectum ejus in quo recubans modulabatur, & flagellum ejus quo pueris minabatur, veneratione congruâ cum authentico Antiphonario reſervatur. Jo. Diac. lib. ii, cap. vi.

(68) Jeremiah de Pours, Divine Melodie, pag. 1070.

(60) Denys de Sainte Marthe, in his preface.

(70) Idem, Hiſt. de St Gregoire, livr. iii, chap. i, pag. 336, 337.

(71) See Epheſians, v, 11.

follows a long paſſage of Denys de Ste Marthe. I will not undertake to confute a ſtory, mentioned by the centuriators of Magdebourg *, which deſtroys itſelf. They pretend, that St Gregory the Great, having made a decree to ſeparate prieſts from their wives, was obliged to revoke it, becauſe of the enſuing conſequences. A little after this regulation, (ſay they) the Pope having ſent ſome people to fiſh in a pond that belonged to him, inſtead of fiſh, they drew out ſix thouſand heads of little children. Gregory therefore, knowing that theſe children were the fruits of the prieſts incontinence, whom he had deprived of their wives, revoked his decree, and did penance for the ſin he had committed in occaſioning ſo many crimes. They add, that St Udalric, archbiſhop of Augsburg, writ this to Pope Nicolas. This whole ſtory is a confuſed heap of ſilly falſities. For what reaſon did they chuſe the Pope's fiſh-pond, rather than the Tiber, or other public places, to throw thoſe ſix thouſand heads of children in? What became of their bodies, which are not mentioned? Is it credible, that thoſe, who killed them, and whoſe intereſt it was to conceal them, would have cut off their heads, and carried them within the precincts of the Pope's palace, to have their crimes quickly diſcovered? Were they not afraid they would float upon the water? How were they all agreed to carry thoſe heads to the ſame place? For it is not ſaid that any were found elſewhere (72). Theſe are difficulties, which Baronius and Bellarmin do not offer in confuting this ſtory of the Magdeburg centuriators. I know not whether they may have been invented by Denys de Sainte Marthe: he will give me leave to tell him, that if they may ſeem ſpecious to thoſe, who go no farther than the firſt impreſſions, they will appear deſtitute of ſolidity to thoſe, who examine things attentively. It will be granted me, that, in matters of fact, thoſe, who undertake to confute an adverſary, ought to raiſe objections contrary to his deſign. Now let us ſee whether the objections of Father de Sainte Marthe are ſuch. I think they would be ſolid, if Udalric, and thoſe, who alledge his letter, pretended, that the murtherers of thoſe baſtards cut off their heads, and threw them only into the Pope's pond. This aſſertion would be liable to the inconveniencies mentioned by the author; and it were a moſt difficult thing to alledge any probable reaſon againſt his ſeveral queſtions. But this was not the meaning of the centuriators, who only deſigned to relate what had been diſcovered in St Gregory's pond: and, if they ſaid nothing of the Tyber, or other public places, it is not becauſe they did not believe, that any baſtards of the clergy had been thrown into them, but becauſe they knew not, that the ſame crimes had been likewiſe diſcovered in thoſe places, or becauſe they were contented with the conſequences, that might be drawn from what had been ſeen in the pond. They ſuppoſed it was an eaſy thing to draw this inference: ſix thouſand children have been found in the Pope's Pond only; therefore the number of the children, who have been ſtifled, to prevent the infamy of their fathers and mothers, is almoſt infinite: for how many have been thrown into the Tyber, and into wells, and common ſhores? How many have been buried, &c? When a man ſays, that many medals or bones have been found in digging up the foundations of a palace, does he pretend, that it is the only place, where ſuch things might be found? and becauſe he ſays nothing of the other places, may one deny what he affirms? It is to be obſerved, that there was a particular reaſon to mention that pond, rather than the Tyber, &c. Rivers do not uſe to be drained, but ponds are drained from time to time, in order to take all the fiſh out of them; and then one may know whether any children have been thrown into them. To know the number of them, it is ſufficient to count the heads, which are ſingle parts of a child, and may be eaſily diſtinguiſhed: which is the reaſon, why it was ſufficient to mention the heads, in Udalric's epiſtle. Father de Sainte Marthe ought not to think it ſtrange, that no mention ſhould be made of the bodies. If commiſſioners had been appointed to inſpect the pond, they might be blamed, if their verbal proceſs did not contain more circumſtances than Udalric's letter. It had been their duty to obſerve, whether any bones had been found, beſides the heads; whether all the bodies were without fleſh; whether ſome were only half rotten, or half eaten, by the fiſh, and ſuch like particulars: but an author, who alledges this diſcovery as an argument againſt the law of celibacy, need not inſiſt upon ſo many circumſtances; it is enough for him to ſay, in general, that ſix thouſand heads were found. If what Father de Sainte Marthe affirms concerning the ſituation of that pond was true, it would be a conſiderable objection: but who told him, that this pond was in the incloſure of the palace? Would Baronius have omitted this reaſon, if it had been well-grounded? Would he have ſaid only, that fiſh-ponds were not public, and that they were ſtrictly looked after (73)? This is but a weak reaſon; for centinels are not placed in the night about a pond; care is only taken, that no fiſherman may get into it without the owner's leave; but this will not prevent the throwing of a child into it.

Perhaps many controverſiſts, engaged in the defence of the centuriators againſt Father de Sainte Marthe, would perhaps be contented with this apology. I know ſome, who would look no farther, and who, in a moſt inſulting manner, would boaſt of having obtained a compleat victory over the monk, who undertook to confute this paſſage of thoſe German authors. As for me, who think it an honour not to imitate (74) a conduct ſo contrary to ſincerity, I declare, that Denys de Sainte Marthe has alledged ſome other arguments incomparably more ſolid than thoſe, which I have refuted: for he adds (75), but how can they have the impudence to ſay, that St Gregory grew remiſs, in proceſs of time, as to the continence of prieſts? Did ever any Pope expreſs a greater zeal for the obſervation of it? One may know what he thought of the matter, by the anſwer he made to St Auguſtin, who propoſed ſeveral difficulties to him: for, when he anſwers the ſecond article, he excludes, in expreſs words, the clerks, promoted to ſacred orders, from the number of thoſe, who are allowed to marry. The better to confound the heretical writers, who give credit to this fabulous ſtory, I have already ſhewn, that Pope Nicolas I was dead before St Udalric was born, and that this holy man had been dead a long time before Nicolas II was made Pope. Here are two good arguments againſt the centuriators: Baronius (76) and Bellarmin (77) made uſe of them with great advantage. The benedictin ſhould have been contented with them; for mixing falſe reaſons with good ones is the right way of multiplying replies and rejoinders in infinitum: an adverſary, who meets with falſe proofs in his way, may eaſily keep up a diſpute; and many perſons of his party, who never read the works of the contrary party, will think that he has got a compleat victory. Which is the reaſon why things are never cleared with reſpect to many people, and why many others conſider as matters problematical, ſuch facts as moſt deſerve to be rejected. It ſeems to me, that the ſtory mentioned by the centuriators, and their Udalric, is altogether groundleſs; for, on the one ſide, there is no footſtep to be found, any where elſe, of the law of celibacy being revoked by St Gregory, and of his doing penance for it; and, on the other, it plainly appears from the writings of that Pope, that he never permitted prieſts to marry. His whole remiſſneſs conſiſted in not requiring that the ſub-deacons, who had been ordained before the decretal (78) of his predeceſſor, ſhould be obliged to part with their wives; but he forbad their being promoted to ſuperior orders; and commanded, that the biſhops ſhould ordain no new ſubdeacons till they had made them promiſe to live in celibacy (79). Therefore unleſs it be clearly made out, that St Gregory revoked the law of celibacy and did penance for it, and moreover if it be not clearly proved that there was an Udalric, biſhop of Augsburg, cotemporary with a Pope called Nicolas, thoſe, who alledge the letter of one Udalric, and the ſix thouſand heads found in St Gregory's fiſh pond, will never deſerve any credit.

I ſhall make two or three obſervations more. I. The centuriators do not give a good turn to this ſtory. Theſe are their words: Beatus Gregorius Magnus Papa primus aliquando ſuo quodam decreto uxores ſacerdotibus ademit. Deinde paulo poſt cum idem Gregorius juſſiſſet ex piſcina ſua piſces aliquot capi, piſcatores pro piſcibus ſex millia capitum infantium ſuffocatorum repererunt,

* Centur. vi, cap. vii.

(72) Denys de Sainte Marthe, ubi ſupra, liv. ii, chap. iv, pag. 206.

(73) Cum certum ſit piſcinas illas in quibus piſces aſſervari ſolent, non fuiſſe omnibus publicas, ſed optime cuſtoditas. Baron. ad ann. 591, n. 21, pag. m. 29.

(74) Longe mea diſcrepat iſtis Et vox & ratio. My voice and judgment differ wide from theſe. Horat. Sat. vi, lib. i, ver. 92.

(75) Sainte Marthe, ubi ſupra, pag. 207.

(76) Baron. ubi ſupra, n. 19, 20, 21.

(77) Bellarmin. de Clericis, lib. i, cap. xxii, pag. m. 1124, 1125.

(78) The decretal, whereby Pelagius II ordered, that all the ſubdeacons of Sicily ſhould part with their wives.

(79) See Sainte Marthe, ubi ſupra, pag. 205, 206.

Brunehauld, the many fabulous miracles related by that Pope in his dialogues [R], and his unſettled principles about perſecution for religion, &c. He is one of thoſe, who deny, that St Gregory delivered the ſoul of the emperor Trajan from hell (k). If it were true, that part of this Pope's books was burnt after his death, and that they would have repererunt. Quam cædem infantium cum intelligeret S. Gregorius ex occultis fornicationibus vel adulteriis ſacerdotum natam eſſe; continuo revocavit decretum, & peccatum ſuum dignis pœnitentiæ fructibus purgavit (80). They ſuppoſe, that Pope Gregory made a decree againſt the marriage of prieſts, and that, not long after, he ordered ſome fiſh to be taken out of his pond, but that the fiſhermen found in it ſix thouſand heads of children, inſtead of fiſh; whereupon the pontiff revoked his decree, and amended his fault by fruits worthy of repentance, being ſenſible that the murther of ſo many children proceeded from the prieſts incontinency. I repeat it again, this narrative is ill turned. It is ſuppoſed, that ſix thouſand children were thrown into the Pope's pond in a very little time, and that the fiſhermen, who found the ſix thouſand heads of thoſe poor creatures, took no fiſh. This account is very abſurd: ſo great number of children, drowned in the ſame place, requires many years (81), and would rather increaſe fiſh, than wholly deſtroy them. This ſtory would look more probable, if it had been ſaid, that St Gregory abrogated celibacy, which had been eſtabliſhed a long time; and that he permitted the clergy to marry, becauſe, having ordered his pond to be cleared, which had not been cleared for many years, ſix thouſand heads of children were found in it. This account affords as many years as one can deſire. I conclude, (which is my ſecond obſervation) that the ill placing of circumſtances (82) makes a matter of fact doubtful, unlikely, ridiculous, and abſurd, tho' it be never ſo certain and true in itſelf; for, ſuppoſing it to be true, that ſix thouſand heads of children were found in that place, Udalric, and the centuriators, relate the thing ſo careleſsly, as to make one doubt of it. I obſerve in the third place, that Theophilus Raynaud ſuppoſes, in a paſſage quoted by me in another place (83), that the heads were found in the well of Pope Gregory II; ſo that he miſtakes both the place and the Pope. Bellarmin asks (84) how it came to be known, that the ſix thouſand children were baſtards of the clergy, and not of laymen; which is indeed an objection, but no perplexing difficulty. For, tho' Pope Gregory might think, that laymen had a ſhare in the procreation of thoſe children, he would have been ſenſible, that celibacy impoſed upon the clergy occaſioned a greater debauchery. It is certain, that lay-people deſtroy abundance of children to conceal their fault (85). Take notice, that Udalric, biſhop of Augsburg, lived in the Xth century, and that the letter in queſtion was printed in the book, intituled, Orthodoxologia Sanctorum Patrum, at Baſil, in the XVIth century.

[R] The many fabulous miracles related by this Pope in his dialogues.] ' Some learned men, who do not ' approve the recital of ſo many miracles, doubt ' whether St Gregrory is the author of thoſe dia' logues, becauſe they do not appear to them wor' thy of ſo great a doctor (86).' Denys de Sainte Marthe, who ſpeaks thus, ſolves the doubts of thoſe learned men with very ſolid reaſons, and ſhews that thoſe dialogues are the works of St Gregory. Mr du Pin is of the ſame opinion (87); but he owns at the ſame time, that they do not ſeem to be worthy of the gravity and judgment of that holy Pope, being full of extraordinary Miracles, and almoſt incredible ſtories. It is true, he relates them upon the credit of others; but he ſhould not have been ſo credulous as to believe them, and afterwards to publiſh them as matters of fact . . . . The ſtories mentioned in thoſe dialogues, are frequently grounded upon a bare relation of ſome ignorant old men, or upon common reports. The miracles, are ſo frequent, ſo extraordinary, and often wrought for ſo inconſiderable reaſons, that it is a difficult thing to believe them all. He tells ſome ſtories which can hardly be reconciled with the lives of thoſe he ſpeaks of; as the voluntary impriſonment of St Paulinus in Africa, under the king of the Vandals. Viſions, apparitions, and dreams, are more frequently to be met with in the dialogues of that Pope, than in any other author. Hence it is, that he owns about the latter end of his work, that more diſcoveries had been made in his time about the other world, than in all the foregoing ages. But I do not think that any body will warrant the truth of all thoſe relations. Father Denys de Sainte Marthe acknowledges (88), ' that he would not warrant all the mi' racles and viſions contained in thoſe dialogues.' Nevertheleſs he does not blame that Pope. That holy man, ſays he, might relate ſome upon the teſtimony of perſons a little too credulous. He thought they were not to be ſlighted by reaſon of the edifying things he obſerved in them. The prudent reader ought to examine what degree of certainty he allows them, and who are his authors. This monk plainly ſets up for an apologiſt, who thinks, that St Gregory is not in the leaſt to be blamed. But the worſt is, that the reaſons he alledges to prove it are not ſolid; for if one may be allowed to publiſh a relation, becauſe it contains ſome things that are edifying, how many fables may not one give out as true and pious hiſtories? tho' a writer does not ſay in expreſs words, this is matter of fact, no body ought to doubt of it; yet if he does not quote cotemporary and grave authors, but only an ancient tradition, he cannot be juſtified, and does not afford a ſufficient preſervative. He ought expreſsly and formally to ſay, I relate this as a thing doubtful, you are free to believe it or not, I have not a good authority for it: I ſay, he ought to expreſs himſelf thus, that one may be ſure he is not perſuaded of the truth of what he ſays, and does not eagerly deſire, that others ſhould believe it. Any one, who relates a miraculous event, without intimating any thing, whereby it may appear that he doubts, or is willing others ſhould doubt of it, does plainly ſhew, that he mentions it as matter of fact. It were in vain to ſay, that an hiſtorian is not allowed to ſuppreſs whatever ſeems to him to be falſe, and that it is his duty to mention thoſe which are well atteſted, tho' he does not believe them to be true; I ſay, ſuch an objection would be inſignificant, for it is no confutation of what I have laid down. What I aſſert concerns an hiſtorian, who does not intimate in the leaſt, that he doubts of what he relates, or that he allows every body to disbelieve it. A good hiſtorian who mentions a thing, which he takes to be falſe, adds to it, it is ſaid, or ſome other clauſe, which ſhews more clearly ſtill what he thinks of it (89); and therefore when he adds no ſuch thing, it is a ſign he believes what he ſays, and is willing that his reader ſhould give credit to it. This is the general aim of all thoſe, who relate things, of which they are perſuaded; they deſire others ſhould believe them, and, if any one ſhould tell them, that he does not believe them, they would take it as an affront, and a piece of contempt. Now if theſe maxims are true, with reſpect to the writers of hiſtory, they are much more ſo with reſpect to a divine, who relates miraculous events in a moral book, or in a treatiſe of devotion, or, in general, in ſuch a work of that of St Gregory. It ought to be ſuppoſed, not only that this Pope believed all the miracles he mentions, but alſo that he deſired all his readers ſhould likewiſe believe them. He was therefore too credulous, he wanted judgment; and it was not his fault if he did not inſpire his readers with his credulity. For if a prudent reader rejects part of what he relates, he does it without any hints from him. If any one ſhould ſay in his vindication, that he did not believe every thing that he relates; I will ask, whether he was willing that his readers ſhould give credit to every thing, or not? if he was, he is an impoſtor: if he was not, why did he give himſelf the trouble to write ſuch things? The beſt apology that can be made for him, is to ſay, that he was too credulous, and wanted judgment.

This is what may be ſaid in oppoſition to Father de Sainte Marthe's apology for the miracles, about which St Gregory might be miſtaken. The apologiſt does not ſay, whether he believes, that there are many miracles of this ſort in the dialogues of that Pope; but one may eaſily gueſs, that he does not

(k) See the remark [A] of the article TRAJAN.

(80) Magdeburgenſ. apud Baronium, ubi ſupra, n. 19, pag. m. 27.

(81) Baron. ubi ſupra, n. 21, alledges this reaſon.

(82) Apply here theſe words. Nihil eſt, Antipho, Quin male narrando poſſit depravarier. The beſt ſtory may be ſpoilt in the telling. Terent. in Phorm. Act. iv, Sc. iv, ver. 16.

(83) In the article BELLARMIN, remark [E].

(84) Bellarmin. ubi ſupr, pag. 1125.

(85) Confer quæ infra in the remark [C] of the article PATIN.

(86) Sainte Marthe, ubi ſupra, pag. 273.

(87) Du Pin, Bibl. des Auteurs Eccleſ. Tom. V, pag. 138, Dutch Edit.

(88) Ubi ſupra, pag. 275, 276.

(89) Equidem plura tranſcribo quam credo: nam nec adfirmare ſuſtineo de quibus dubito, nec ſubducere quæ accepi. — Indeed I tranſcribe more than I believe: for I will not affirm what I doubt of, nor ſuppreſs what I have received. Q. Curtius, lib. ix, cap. i. See hereupon Frienſhemius's commentary, where you will find many ſuch paſſages out of other hiſtorians. See alſo Tacitus's Annals, lib. iv, cap. xi, and Maimbourg, livr. v, of the Hiſtoire des Croiſades, quoted in the Penſées diverſes ſur les Cometes, pag. 203. La Mothe le Vayer, Diſc. ſur l'Hiſtoire, mentions ſeveral paſſages of Livy, whereby it appears, that he uſes caution in relating prodigies.

have been all deſtroyed, had it not been for an incident [S] much the ſame with that, which, in former times, prevented the Romans putting to death the ſenators, as having murdered Romulus (l), ſome perſons would infer from it, that the glory of that Pope, and of ſome other ancient fathers, is like rivers, which, being very ſmall at their ſpring, grow very large at a great diſtance from it. Something might be ſaid againſt this compariſon; but it is certain, generally ſpeaking, that the objects of memory are of a very different nature from the objects of ſight. The latter leſſens in proportion to their diſtance, whereas the former do commonly increaſe, according as we are remote from their time and place (m).

not believe it. He very much enlarges, to ſhew, that the extraordinary things, related in thoſe dialogues, were very frequent at that time. One of his reaſons for it is, that there were many heretics to be converted, and many Catholics, who did not believe the immortality of the ſoul and the reſurrection of the dead (90). It is an undeniable matter of fact, ‘that, in St Gregory's time, many chriſtians wavered in the belief of thoſe two fundamental doctrines of our religion. He † is ſo humble as to confeſs, that he himſelf had formerly doubted of the reſurrection: and therefore he makes it is buſineſs, in many of his homilies, to inculcate thoſe truths into them. As there have been, at all times, many libertines, even within the pale of the Catholic church, there have always been many people whoſe intereſt it was, that there ſhould be no future life, no reſurrection and judgment, and therefore they eaſily believed it; for a corrupt heart will ſoon be attended with an erroneous mind. However it be, it is certain, that Italy, and particularly Rome, was full of ſuch unbelievers in St Grery's time. It were needleſs to prove it, after what has been ſaid upon this ſubject by the laſt tranſlator of dialogues, in his excellent preface. Gregory of Tours ⸸ mentions a diſpute he had with one of the prieſts of his church, who maintained, that there was no reſurrection to be expected. He alſo ſpeaks of a deacon of the church of Paris, who pretended to be a man of great parts, and who fell into that error, diſputing about it with great eagerneſs: from whence it may be inferred, that many others in France were engaged in that dangerous hereſy. If any one reads the dialogues, he will find, that Peter, the deacon, knew many chriſtians, who doubted of the immortality of the ſoul ‡. Was it not therefore becoming the mercy of GOD, that he ſhould work miracles at that time, to help the weakneſs of thoſe poor infidels? and is St Gregory to blame becauſe he collected them?’ I ſhall only make two ſhort obſervations upon this: One is, that, if thoſe unbelieving Catholics queſtioned only whether the ſoul was immortal, and whether the bodies ſhould be raiſed out of their graves, they argued very pitifully; for the truth of the goſpel being once admitted, it is a ridiculous thing to raiſe any doubts about thoſe two points. The other is, that perhaps there never were ſo many unbelievers, as in the XVIth and XVIIth centuries; I mean ſuch unbelievers, as are not contented to reject the building, without deſtroying the foundation, but who reject both the foundation and the building. Beſides, there were in thoſe two centuries a great many heretics (9), who wanted to be converted. Miracles ſhould therefore at leaſt have been as frequent in theſe ages, as in that of St Gregory. From whence we may conclude, that the argument of Father Denys de Sainte Marthe proves nothing, becauſe it proves too much.

